"At times I have them all. It was but yesterday my eye, which had been fixed on the Savior, could no longer discern him. I was surrounded with darkness; the floods came in upon my soul, my hopes perished, and my mind was filled with dismay. I called after my Lord, but there was no voice, nor any that answered. At length, I saw the outline of his divine form, in the midst of the gloom; but he seemed to stand with a sorrowful countenance and an averted eye. Again, I cried for help, but in vain—the sorrows of death compassed me, and the pains of death gat hold upon me, I was sinking in despair—once more I lifted my voice, 'Lord save me, or I perish!' He turned, a smile was on his countenance, and O, that look of love. I rushed to his arms, and ever since I have leaned upon his bosom."

I sat down by the bed-side, and could no longer repress my tears—her language, with its matchless tone and manner, completely overpowered me. My own sad delinquencies rushed upon my memory. I felt my unfitnes to die, and though I had long professed the religion of Jesus, very few of its living consolations had reached my heart. I could only smite upon my breast, and cry out as the publican did. "God be merciful to me a sinner."

I tarried a little longer in that chamber of death—it seemed to me as the gate of heaven, and acted as a mighty magnet to raise my sluggish affections. A new train of emotions passed through my mind. I resolved by the grace of God, I would so live, that the same glory of heaven might shine on my dying hours.

"Farewell, dear brother," she said, as I rose to depart, "we shall meet at the judgment bar; we have walked together in Christian faith and love, and it is my last prayer that in sweeter communion and holier service, we may unite with the general assembly and church of the first born."

The next day was the Sabbath; as its evening sunlight faded away, the spirit of my friend took its flight for the land of glorified immortals. I followed in imagination as she entered the gates of the city, and was welcomed to the presence of her Lord. Who would not exclaim, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like theirs." In two days after she was buried. The church was thronged with an immense multitude who had come to attend the last solemn offices which affliction can pay to the departed. A single voice, in the sweetest tones of music, sang the hymn—

"How blest is onr sister, bereft
Of all that could burden her mind;
How easy the soul that has left
This wearisome body behind."

It was followed by a fervent prayer, and then we conveyed her to the silent solitary mansions, nevermore to be disturbed till the archangel's trump, on the morning of the resurrection, shall call her forth, a glorified and immortal form, to dwell forever in the presence of her Lord.

Reader, thou too art immortal—while thou readest these lines, the sands of Time are running, and every moment brings thee nearer to thy final account, and the day of recompense. What hast thou done with thy heart? Who is master of thy affections? What kind of influence controls thy life? Take these three questions to thy place of retirement—demand an answer, for in that answer are the issues of life and death. Are other subjects pressing on thy mind? Let them go—whatever they are, they are trifles compared with the soul—let them go, they will sink thee in endless ruin; let them go, God requires it, and without the sacrifice of all for Christ, your destruction will be inevitable and eternal.

THE WEARY AT REST.

The grave is a place where the weary are at rest. How soothing is this sentiment, "The weary are at rest!" There is something in the expressions which affects the heart with uncommon sensations, and produces a species of delight, where tranquility is the principal ingredient. The sentiment itself is extensive, and implies, not only that we are delivered from the troubling of the wicked, as in the former clause, but from every trouble and every pain to which life is subjected.

Those, only, who have themselves been tried in affliction, can feel the full force of this expression. Others may be pleased with the sentiment, and affected by sympathy. The distressed are, at once, pleased and comforted. To be delivered from trouble—to be relived from power—to see oppression humbled—to be freed from care and pain, from sickness and distress—to lie down as in a bed of security, in a long oblivion of our woes—to sleep in peace, without the fear of interruption—how pleasing is the prospect!—how full of consolation!

The ocean may roll its waves, the warring winds may join their forces, the thunders may shake the skies, and the lightnings pass swiftly from cloud to cloud; but not the forces of the elements, combined, not the sounds of thunders, nor of many seas, though they were united into one peal, and directed to one point, can shake the security of the tomb.

The dead hear nothing of the tumult; they sleep soundly; they rest from their calamities upon beds of peace. Conducted to silent mansions, they cannot be troubled by the rudest assaults, nor awakened by the loudest clamor. The unfortunate, the oppressed, the broken-hearted, with those that have languished on beds of sickness, rest here together: they have forgotten their distress; every pang extinguished.

The grave is called the harbor of rest, in whose deep bosom the disastered mariner, who had long sustained the asault of adverse storms, moors his wearied vessel, never more to return to the tossings of the wasteful ocean. It is called the land of peace, whither the friendless exile retires, beyond the reach of malice and injustice, and the cruelest arrows of fortune. It is called the hospital house, where the weather-beaten traveler, faint with traversing pathless deserts, finds a welcome and secure repose.

There no cares molest, no passions distract, no enemies defame; there agonizing pain, and wounding infamy, and ruthless revenge, are no more; but profound peace, and calm passions, and security which is immovable. "There the wicked cease from troubling; there the weary are at rest! There the prisoners rest together! They hear not the voice of the oppressor! The small and the great are there, and the servant is free from his master!

THE RELIGIOUS NEWSPAPER.—Auxiliary to the Ministry and the Church.—A prominent design of the religious newspaper, is, to promote the intelligence and piety of the individul members of the church. And this is justly regarded as an important object. It is one great purpose of the ministry. Those excellent pastors whose influence for good will remain on earth long after they shall have gone to their rest, study and labor for this end. Their discourses, rich in thought, and in the elucidation of Scriptural truth, are adapted to lead their people, (almost imperceptibly perhaps to themselves,) to think and reason in order, on sacred themes, and to extend their knowledge as well as to promote their piety. Under such a ministry the church is continually growing in moral power. By such culture, her influence as the light of the world is increased and extended; and by her agency the blessings of salvation are dispensed to thousands.

The religious newspaper is not only suited to the taste of the age, which seeks intellectual gratification in the popular journal, rather than in ponderous didactic volumes; but it is also happily adapted to promote the important object under consideration,—the increase of the intelligence, piety, and influence of the church. Its discussions of doctrinal truths, of principles of order, of relative duties,—its sketches of individual character and experience, drawn from the past—its exposure of error and sin,—its reports of the progress of religion, and of Christian effort, and its various articles of intelligence, are all adapted to interest the popular mind—to extend the reader's acquaintance with the world in which he lives and acts, and to warm his heart by the influences of truth. In this way, the religious paper, entering, without noise, a hundred families in a congregation, exerts an efficient, though silent influence, to enlarge the views of its readers—to prepare them to appreciate the elaborate instructions of the pulpit, and to act their part intelligently in every service to which they are called, for the advancement of the kingdom and glory of Christ.
--Christian Obs. May 6.

Sabbath School Department.

From the Sabbath School Visiter.

LETTERS TO SABBATH SCHOOL TEACHERS.

WHAT TEACHERS OUGHT TO BE.

If the work is so great, what must those be to whom it is committed? We would not set the standard so high as to discourage the humble and the timid; but so high we would set it as to lead all to cry, "Who is sufficient for these things?" and, under the influence of such a cry, to seek the sufficiency that comes from God. "If any lack wisdom, let him ask of God, and it shall be given him." James 1: 5.

1 Teachers ought to be pious.—If such cannot be found, it is better that others should be employed, rather than that the school should not be sustained. But if this letter falls into the hand of an unconverted teacher, the question that I would put is a solemn one, and I pray that it may reach the heart; "Thou therefore that teachest another teachest thou not thyself?" Rom. 2: 21. You have incurred increased responsibility by professing to lead others in a way you know not, and dreadful must be your condemnation if you destroy yourselves and them that hear you. Seek, then, your own soul's salvation, and with the ardor of "first love," and the earnestness of one who knows by sweet experience the joys of forgiven sin, press the claims and the hopes of the gospel on the hearts of your class.

2. Teachers ought to be very pious.—The duties demand entire consecration of the heart. Children are more deeply impressed by the learned heart. Goodness affects them more than greatness. They will be moved by tender appeals. Their youthful sympathies will mingle freely with those who feel for them; and their tears will come, as witnesses that they are touched, when they would sit unmoved under eloquence that astonishes the world. Your aim is to save their souls. Your power with them will be proportioned to your piety. But more than this; you cannot convert your class without God, and his Spirit must be sought by prayer. According to your faith it will be done unto you. Here is your only hope; and bearing this continually in mind, you will learn to look for success corresponding to your own growth in grace. If your scholars are thoughtless and indifferent, if weeks and months pass by, and none of them are converted, instead of being disheartened, it would be well to look into your own soul, and inquire if you are not living away from the throne of grace; if your example is not such as to destroy the effect of your teaching; If you are not in a great measure unconcerned for their salvation. If so, is it strange that your scholars remain in sin? Would you not be surprised to hear that one of them is anxious about his immortal soul? But you ought to be surprised if none of them are. And if you kept your own heart with all diligence, you would watch for the fruit of your labors, and you would expect to see the children for whom you pray, pressing into the kingdom.

You ought to be very holy, that the power of religion may be shown forth in your life, and may exert its influence upon the school in which you teach.

3. Teachers ought to be active.—There is so much to do, in the discharge of a teachers duty, that without great activity much will be left undone, and nothing will be done well. The lesson is to be studied carefully; explanations of difficulties are to be sought out; illustrations are to be found and made ready for use; instruction is to be given concerning great truths, with limited time and to feeble minds; absent scholars are to be visited and brought back, and extra duties in the service of the school are often to be performed. While, in addition to these labors, the whole round of Christian duty in connection with the church is required of every member and without the most untiring activity, it is utterly impossible for you to perform the whole. There are idle teachers, and their works show the consequences. But he who has no heart to be "diligent in business" will not succeed. If you are not willing to take hold in earnest, to make the Sabbath school one of your highest interests, and the object of unceasing thought, study, and labor, you ask to be excused. Perhaps some one else more active can be found to take your place. I do not counsel to desert the school; but I do counsel to awake to diligence, or give way to another.

4. Teachers ought to be diligent.—It requires considerable knowledge to teach the Scriptures to children. To understand the Bible, its history and geography, its allusions to manners, and customs, and facts, its philosophy, and theology, & prophecy, has cost learned men the study of their whole lives. So much is not required of you; but children will often ask questions that are more easily asked than answered, and the teacher must be wide awake to be ready with a reply to every inquiry made. I do not say that great talents are required, but I mean to say that great powers of mind which God has given you ought to be improved by reading and reflection; the various helps that are provided for teachers should be studied, and thus preparation of intellect as well as of heart should be constantly made. If you are conscious that your minds are not peculiarly active, let diligence in study make up the deficiency: and sure am I, that facts would prove the position the most talented teachers are not always the most successful.

5. Teachers ought to be faithful.—You are stewards of God. He has committed to your hands a most interesting trust. He watches with deep solicitude, to see that you are faithful in his employ. Fidelity requires you to take care of your own soul; to live very near to Christ; to drink in much of his Spirit; to come from the mercy-seat to the school; to be careful in your teachings that every thing is understood; to bring the instruction to bear on the heart and conscience; and never to leave your scholars, without having appealed to them directly and personally to embrace Jesus Christ as their Saviour. Fidelity requires all this, and more; and who comes up to this?

And thus might I continue to speak of "what a teacher ought to be," and still fail of describing the character. Let no one say, "It is not above the reach of the humblest teacher in the humblest school in this land. It is not above the standard which you should individually reach. But I have already exceeded my limits, and must leave the portrait half drawn. IRENÆUS.

THE CHILDREN'S PRAYER MEETING.—A Sabbath School having been opened near the village of H——, a laboring man who had a large family, sent his children there for the benefit of instruction, the good effects of which soon appeared. It happened that very near to this man's house, a place was opened for the worship of God, where service was performed every Sabbath evening, at an early hour, and this man and part of his family were in the habit of attending regularly.

One Sabbath evening, the weather being snowy, the man thought it prudent to leave his children and go alone. Some of these young ones, doubtless, were much disappointed in not being permitted to accompany their father, and thought they would have a meeting by themselves. The father, on his return home, was surprised at seeing a light up stairs in his cottage, and thought that the children must be retiring to bed. He opened the door of his cottage, and went softly up stairs, when, to his astonishment, he heard his youngest daughter, a child not more than six years old, in humble strains pouring forth her prayers to that God through whose tender mercy it was, she had been taught to "remember the Sabbath day and keep it holy." When she had finished her prayer, she called upon one of her little brothers to pray (for they met together for that purpose,) and thus they finished that blessed day; experiencing, it is hoped, the blessedness of that promise: "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there will I be in the midst of them."

Children's Department.

THE BARREN FIG-TREE.

'Mother, I'm almost discouraged about my peach tree. I've taken more pains with it than I have with all my roses, and carnations, and tulips, and yet, they all grow and there is nothing but leaves on my peach tree;' and Lewis leaned upon his little garden hoe, and as he brushed the damp hair from his forehead, he fixed his eyes once more on the fruitless branches, which cast their shadow upon the flowering shrubs that grew beneath.

'What have you done to your tree, Lewis, to make it grow?' kindly asked his mother.

'Done, mother!—I have watered it, and dug around it, and bent away the branches of that great apple tree, so that the sun could shine upon it all day: and now I have spent the whole afternoon in hoeing around it, when if it had only grown, I should have got my Sabbath lesson. O, dear, I've a great mind to cut it down.'

'No, Lewis, let it be. Now put your hoe away, and let us go in. You have but a short time to prepare your Sabbath lesson; and——"

'Mother, I don't care about my lesson. I wish it was Monday, instead of Saturday; it seems to me the Sabbath comes so often!' and Lewis petulently laid aside his garden tools, and followed his mother into the house. Had he seen the tear that dimmed her loving blue eyes, and stole silently down her cheek, he would have been sorry he had spoken so lightly of the day dearer to her than all others.

It was evening, and all around was hushed in quietness. Lewis sat by the window, watching the fluctuating shadows in his little garden. At length his father entered. He had patiently listened to Lewis' complaint of his unfruitful tree, and now he spread upon the table a large picture.

'Here, my son, is something for you.'

'O, how beautiful!' eagerly exclaimed Lewis.

'There is a tree all covered with leaves and blossoms, and there is a man cutting down a barren tree, just like my peach tree. Well, that will have to go on Monday, for I won't have it spoiling the looks of my garden any longer. Father, what is this picture?'

'Lewis, a great many years ago, in the eastern country, was a fertile and beautiful garden. The soil was rich, the sun shone clear, and the trees were covered with glossy green leaves. At the earliest dawn of morning, and as the dusky night came on, the watchful gardener watered each plant, and every tree. He never wearied, and most abundantly was his toil rewarded. But there was one tree upon which no fruit ever grew. The bright sun of summer lay smiling upon its branches all the day long; the gentle rain moistened its roots, and the dew of evening descended upon it. Vain were sun, and shower, and evening dew. Untiringly did the gardener cultivate the unyielding tree. Vain were his labors. His eye rested upon its leafy verdure; and the joyous birds built their nests, and warbled their songs among its shady branches; but his heart wearied that such promise should never be realized. For three successive years, at the end of each summer season, the owner had come from a distance, and disappointment had succeeded his expectation with regard to the yet barren tree. Again he came; and now he said to the gardener, "Behold, these three years I come, seeking fruit on this fig-tree, and find none: cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground?

And the gardener answered,

"Let it alone this year, also, till I shall dig about it; and if it bear fruit, well; and if not, then after that thou shalt cut it down."

The father of Lewis paused. For a moment the eyes of his boy were earnestly fixed on the barren tree: then he said;

"Father, I shan't cut down my peach tree this summer."

'My son, there is a deeper meaning in the story I have told you than you have yet learned. The garden represents the world. Our Father in heaven is its owner. You are one of his plants. You have been nourished and watched. A mother's tears and anxieties—a father's prayers and hopes—have been added to the sun of heaven, and the dew of grace. Lo, these ten years has your Maker come seeking fruit. What has he found? Have you been an obedient, dutiful child? Have you loved the Sabbath? Have you sought more than all things else to please Jesus?

'My son, think of this evening's lesson.

Never—never forget the barren fig-tree.—Bring forth fruit here, and hereafter you shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water in the garden above. The glory of God will shine there, and the Lamb lighten forever the fadeless trees of the garden of heaven."

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, June 22, 1842.

Death of a Student.

By reference to our obituary department it will be seen that one of the students of the Institute has been removed by death.—Miss Cazier was a young lady of more than ordinary intellectual powers, and of very exemplary character, and she died much lamented by all that knew her. Before her remains were removed from the Institute, they were taken into the Chapel, where the students and others assembled to take their final look at her. Select passages of Scripture were read by Mr. J. A. Badger, and an appropriate prayer offered by Mr. G. M. Langworthy. From the Chapel she was removed to Lebanon, the residence of her father. We mingled with about forty of the students and some other friends, who followed her remains to her father's residence. The train was indeed a mournful one. Many were the tears that coursed down the face of sorrow, as silent and sad we pursued our winding way. Sad countenances—fast-falling tears, and the heaving bosom showed how strongly her name was embalmed in the memory of her associates.

The following manuscripts have been handed us, as among her last productions.—The prose was her last composition.

Farewell! sweet home, to thee are given
Joys that are dearer to my heart
Than the balmy breeze of even,
Or all that's in the minstrel's art.

Farewell to thee—I leave behind
A mother's love—a father's care—
A sweet and cherished sister kind,
A brother's fond affection there.

Farewell! and if we never meet
May bliss and joys be thine.
And may fond memory vigils keep,
And hope and trust be mine.

C. S. C.

How apt is mankind to prize too lightly what is within their reach, or if they really value it, to think it will never change or be taken from them. They seldom realize the frailty of earthly existence, but cling with an unrelenting grasp to whatever they become attached, and when forced to yield their tiny hold, they do it with regret, forgetting the power and wisdom of Him who created them. How foolish thus to rely on the constancy of worldly things when they are almost invariably doomed to disappointment.

Yet so it is, they raise their expectations for the future, and then weep over the ruin of their blasted hopes.

Pleasure and joy, misery and dejection, are strangely mingled in the cup of life. How small is the distribution of the former, and how universal the latter! It might be said that there never was the being who enjoyed pure and unalloyed happiness, and drank from the stream of life without one bitter draught to poison its existence. But many there are who exert themselves to be merry whilst in the society of others—

"And when the crowd are gone, they weep
Through weariness of earth."

Thus they veil their feelings from the world, although a cloud of doubt and despair may surround them, acknowledging the inconstancy and fleetness of the pleasures they seek, yet seemingly without the power to loose themselves from these charms.

"Oh! trust not, cling not, to the hope of constancy below;
Earth's fragile blossoms smile and droop,
Her waters ebb and flow.
Yon flowret withers as it springs,
Yon bird is on the range,
Ay, even in life's meanest things
This is a world of change."

C. S. Cazier.

Minutes of Association.

The Central Association minutes are ready for distribution. We notice that we omitted to insert the Sabbath, and First-Day exercises. They were as follows:—

Sabbath, A. M.—Ordination Discourse by Br. Joel Greene. Immediately after which, Br. Varnum Hull was ordained to the work of the gospel ministry. Consecrating Prayer by Br. W. B. Maxson. Charge by Br. Eli S. Bailey. Hand of Fellowship by Br. S. B. Crandall. Afternoon Discourse by W. B. Maxson from 1 Cor. i. 10.

First-Day, A. M.—Discourse by Br. N. V. Hull from Hab. iii. 2. P. M. Br. V. Hull from Matt. xvii. 23.

We have never attended any of our annual assemblies where we were more edified. There was a full delegation from all the churches with one or two exceptions, and the utmost harmony was manifest in every action taken. Much time of the Association was taken up in the discussion of important resolutions. The subject of Missionary operations received a good share of attention, and Tract operations, Sabbath Schools, and Sabbath Sanctification were discussed at some length, and with very much interest. One general feeling seemed to prevail, that it was time to take higher ground in christian enterprise. We hope these impressions may be strengthened, and that each returning anniversary may give evidence of the progress of truth.

Ordination.

Br. Solomon Carpenter was ordained to the work of the gospel ministry at Hopkinton, R. I., during the session of the Eastern Association. Exercises as follows:—Sermon by W. B. Maxson. Consecrating Prayer by W. B. Gillett. Charge by Daniel Coon. Hand of Fellowship by David Clawson. Thus another has taken upon him the consecrating vow of a herald of salvation. May the number of faithful heralds be greatly multiplied amongst us.

Missionary Operations.

A Missionary Convention has been formed in Rhode Island for extending a knowledge of the Sabbath of the bible, and urging men to obedience to God's law.—Brothers Campbell, Green, and Crandall have been engaged in this labor.

The Central Association at its sitting in Brookfield, also resolved to go into Missionary operations, and appointed a Board to carry out the wishes of the Association during its recess. It is thought that one or more Missionaries are constantly needed within the bounds of the Association. There are several fields open for labors, And in some places there is some inquiry for the Sabbath of the bible. If S. D. Baptists are right in their views of the Sabbath, (and it is easily proved,) then there is an important trust committed to them. It remains with them to spread this truth before men and urge them to obedience. It is with God to crown their efforts with success. The latter will follow the former as certainly as effect follows cause, for God's word is pledged to sustain his truth, and bless the efforts his people make to advance it.

Resolved, That we regard Sabbath School instruction as a valuable means of bringing sinners under the influence of the gospel, and most earnestly recommend our brethren to establish and sustain them wherever they can.

The above resolution was discussed at some length at the Central Association.—The sentiment contained in it is worthy of more than a passing notice. By reference to the history of Sabbath Schools, it will be seen that the blessing of God has rested on them, and that hundreds have, by their influence, been brought to Christ, who otherwise might have remained in ignorance, and under the power of Satan. 'Tis true that when the gospel is properly presented to the mind, that it is sure to affect it. Sinners can not entirely withstand the force of truth, and those who have not become hardened in sin, are most likely to yield to its influences. Thus it often happens that youth are first taught in the Sabbath School their true character in the sight of God, and are brought to repentance and salvation. Faithful efforts in this way are almost invariably attended with good. If children are not immediately brought to repentance in the Sabbath School, the impressions they there receive are lasting, and at some time may be the means of bringing them to Christ, verifying the promise, cast thy bread upon the waters, and it shall be gathered after many days.

The field of this labor is large. There can scarcely be found a community where all are under religious instruction. There are many communities where multitudes of children are growing up in entire ignorance of God, and of the destiny that awaits immortal spirits beyond the confines of the tomb. Where Sabbath Schools are established, there are numbers who do not come under their influence, and in families where God's name is professed, there are many who grow up in Infidelity, and in ignorance of the bible and its saving doctrines. To teach the vast multitude of children found in every community the gospel of Jesus Christ, which only can save their deathless spirits, is the prime object of Sabbath Schools.

The gospel can not be more successfully urged upon their consideration than by the familiar instruction of the school. Pastors have only occasional opportunities of personally addressing them on the subject of salvation. But the Sabbath School teacher can every week present truth in a new and interesting light, and thus lead on by gentle but certain advances, till the necessity of personal religion is indelibly impressed on the mind. Thus they are prepared to receive the impressions of the spirit, and to yield to the claims of God upon them.

In this department many can labor successfully who are illy prepared for other stations. Every lover of Jesus can enforce truth on tender minds, and all can act efficiently, either by teaching, or bringing in scholars and placing them under the instruction of those prepared to teach.—Those who are brought up to study the bible will not become infidels. This early instruction is a safe-guard which will protect them against the snares laid by Satan to entrap their souls.

The following we take from the Oberlin Evangelist, published at Oberlin, Ohio:—

The Germ of a New Sect.

"We have often been painfully affected with the thought, what a slight circumstance may become the occasion of sundering the body of Christ into divers sects. A short time since a discourse was preached in an obscure neighborhood, in which the subject of Temperance was employed to illustrate a religious truth. After the service, the minister was accosted by a smirkish looking professor of religion thus:—"Sir, you must allow me the liberty of saying that, though I was much pleased with your sermon in the main, I could by no means approve of your lugging in Temperance. I think it is the minister's place to preach Jesus Christ and him crucified; and not to talk about such subjects as Temperance in a gospel sermon."

"We shall not detail the conversation which followed. We allude to this little incident (because it is a little one,) to say that under favorable circumstances even it might become the occasion of forming a new sect. Should the man in question obtain a sufficient number of congenial spirits to join him, we doubt not he would think he was doing God's service, to lead off and form a new church, to be modestly called by his name.

"Nor would this be a very extreme case. There are existing sects whose origin may be traced to circumstances not a whit more important. There is one based upon the exclusive use, in public worship, of a particular version of the Psalms; another based upon the seventh instead of the first day of the week, as Sabbath; another based upon the mode of performing an ordinance.

"Now what an abomination it is that such things as these should be allowed to divide the members of Christ's body! How much like children's quarrels. Is it not time that Christians should cast their miserable Sibboleths to the moles, and the bats, and be one? T."

Of this article we have nothing now to say, save that part that speaks of a sect based on the seventh and not the first day of the week as the Sabbath. It would seem from the general tenor of the article, that the writer thinks that the ground for observing the seventh-day as a Sabbath is very trivial, and deems it an abomination that this should be allowed to divide the members of Christ's body. Let us see how trivial is the ground. When God made a finish of creative operations, he appointed, blessed, and sanctified the seventh-day as a Sabbath. Amid all the awful grandeur of Sinai, when God came down on the mount and spake to men, he renewed and enforced it in the most solemn manner, and explicit terms, and that it might remain, engraved it with his own finger on stone, as an everlasting law. Now if this authority for the seventh-day as the Sabbath is trivial, then all things are trivial and vain, and God is the author of folly. We now ask him of the Evangelist to show us, if he can, reasons for observing the first-day as the Sabbath, around which there is a shadow of divine authority.—And when he has failed in this, as he surely must, we ask him in his own language, if it is not time that he should "cast his miserable Shibboleths to the moles, and bats, and be one" with us in obeying the command of God, found in Exodus xx. 8, 9, 10, 11 verses, and which was repeatedly enforced by Jesus Christ, both in his words and his practice.

For the Register.

Board of Excise.

At an adjourned meeting of the citizens of De Ruyter, held at the Presbyterian Church on Tuesday, June 14th, 1842, for the purpose of expressing their sentiments upon the late act of the Board of Excise in granting Licenses for the sale of spirituous liquors under existing circumstances, A. N. ANNAS was called to the chair, and the following Resolution, which had been presented at a previous meeting, was discussed at considerable length, and unanimously adopted, viz:

Resolved, That the Board of Excise of this town, in granting licenses on the 11th inst., exhibited an utter disregard of the sober and enlightened sense of a large majority in this community, who believe that the Board are in duty bound to withhold all licenses; and that the act of granting them at the reduced price of seven dollars, when they had fixed it at eleven dollars on the first Monday of May, is a truckling with rum-sellers, which is highly reprehensible by every friend of sobriety.

On motion, it was further

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to publish the proceedings of this meeting in our village paper, and to prepare an Address to the inhabitants, setting forth the facts connected with the sale of spirituous liquors in this town, and also embodying such reflections as the nature of the case might suggest.

Messrs. J. A. Badger, A. H. Burdick, M. Spear, G. M. Langworthy, and J. N. Elmore, were appointed said committee.—In obedience to their instructions, the Committee present the following

ADDRESS

To the inhabitants of the town of De Ruyter.

Fellow Citizens—In times of public peril, when some subtle foe is secretly plotting to undermine the liberties of a people, and to plant his hostile feet among them, it becomes every friend of his country and of human rights, to raise the voice of warning—to sound the notes of alarm—so as to arouse the slumbering energies of a people, that are lying at ease, unconscious of their danger. Often has our admiration been excited almost to enthusiasm, at hearing our fathers tell of the constancy, and of the uncompromising fidelity of the Hancocks, and Adamses, and Patrick Henrys, and other leaders of the American revolution, who first sounded the signal of alarm, and raised, in despite of all the proscriptions of royal power, their unflinching arms in resistance to foreign oppression. Having finished their work, they have gone to their rest; and we now enjoy the benefits of their valor and toil.

But while reposing ourselves with those feelings of security, which a consciousness of our exalted national privileges has tended to induce, have we no foe whose secret influences are working our ruin? In the midst of the general security is there no cause for alarm? Far otherwise.—Intemperance, like a subtle serpent, has been fastening his deadly fangs upon us, but we knew it not. Year after year, almost from time immemorial, he has been consigning his thousands, and tens of thousands to an untimely grave. Several years have elapsed since philanthropy first raised her warning voice, to disenchant the multitudes that were just surrendering themselves to the capacious folds of the fell destroyer. Yet little did the unwary victims of delusion heed the admonitory notes which struck their ears. They seemed to stand in mute insensibility, till the enchanting monster had clasped his entwining folds around them; and then they awoke but too late to their danger—they fell, and the dire waves of oblivion rolled over them.—Numberless were the widows and orphans that were left behind, to weep over the grave of a drunken husband and father.

But little more than a twelve-month has elapsed, since six men, in the midst of a debauch, in the city of Baltimore, were suddenly aroused to a consciousness of the peril of their situation; they saw the quivering fangs of the monster that had begun to encircle them. Like men in the desperate struggle between life and death, they put forth their powers, and broke from the enchanted ground, and raised the cry of alarm to their colleagues in danger. It was a cry which sent a thrill throughout the whole length and breadth of our land. It fell upon the ears of thousands in the ditch, and in the gutter, and in the sinks of debauchery, like a signal bell at dead of night, announcing that the devouring element is hastening the work of ruin.

As if by magic, they sprung from their degradation, they left their cups, and again looked up to heaven, bearing the mien of sober men. The work of reform went on. It spread from village to village, and from city to city, closing the dram-shops, purifying the haunts of pollution, and rescuing the drunkard from that vortex of woe that would soon have engulphed him. The tide of reform reached our village and town, and as the fruit of it, about seven hundred pledged themselves to abstain from all that can intoxicate; to use their influence in all suitable ways to discountenance the use of intoxicating drinks throughout the community. The fiery poison was excluded from the bars of three, out of the four, public houses in this town; and the amount of sales, at the remaining public house, and also at the other shops where it was retailed, was supposed to have greatly diminished. The friends of temperance and of humanity had already begun to congratulate each other upon the prospect, that very soon the tide of death would cease to flow, and that strong and intoxicating drinks would soon cease to be drunk, as a beverage, among us. The eyes of the community were anxiously turned toward the Board of Excise, who, it was hoped, would, in the exercise of the discretionary power given to them by the statute of the State, utterly refuse to grant any licenses, and thus put a stop to the traffic in intoxicating liquors by the strong arm of legal authority. Upon the first Monday of May last, the Commissioners of Excise met, and after mature deliberation concluded to raise the price of licenses, which for several years past has been fixed at five dollars, to the sum of eleven dollars.

Although this did not come up to the hopes entertained by many of the friends of temperance, yet they looked upon it as taking comparatively high and honorable ground, and hoped that it would amount to a prohibition of all licenses, inasmuch as the number of dram-drinkers had so greatly diminished, that the unhallowed motives that stimulated the cupidity of the rum-seller, would be also greatly diminished; and consequently he would have far less inducements to apply for a license.

In this they were not disappointed, for no application for license was made to the Board; and they had the satisfaction of believing that if the body and soul-destroying poison should be sold, it would be sold without the official sanction of the legally constituted agents of the people. Notwithstanding, it is shamefully notorious that the authority of the Board was set at defiance, and intoxicating drinks were sold in open violation of the law of the land. There was but one more step to be taken. It only remained to make a prompt and vigorous enforcement of the penalty of the law, to dry up the fountains whence issued the streams of vice, and misery, and degredation and death. In conference with a Committee of the citizens which had been appointed to investigate the circumstances under which spirituous liquors were sold in this village, all the dealers in the article, with one exception, expressed their intention to relinquish the traffic so soon as their stock on hand should be disposed of; and they nearly all stated that the high price for licenses, and the reduced demand for the article, had operated to preclude them from obtaining the legal permission to retail the article. Here, then, was another ground of hope that the sale of intoxicating drinks would soon cease in this village, even if the utmost forbearance were exercised in regard to any legal measures.

But alas! how are the friends of temperance, of peace and good morals, mortified and disappointed; how soon are their dearest hopes blighted and overthrown?

At a meeting of the Board on the 11th instant, two grocer's and one tavern license were granted at the price of seven dollars duty each! And a stipulation was made for another provided that the applicant, upon his return from New York City, should bring into market a new stock of liquors!

Now it cannot be supposed that men act without some adequate motives. Then we must suppose that the Board had the best of reasons, as they supposed, for raising the duty upon licenses at first from five to eleven dollars. This admitted, what circumstances have occurred which render it proper to grant licenses in June for seven dollars, which, on the first Monday in May it was improper to grant for less than ELEVEN dollars? Is it because the Board, upon more mature deliberation, feel that the ground which they at first assumed was too elevated, and that they had fixed too high a price upon the retail of that which poisons the bodies and souls of men? Was it from pure compassion for rum-dealers, because of the pressure of the times and the scarcity of money? Was it for the paltry consideration of twenty-five cents received for signing a license? Finally, was it from a want of that high moral courage requisite to meet the sneers and the reproaches of the rum-dealers, on account of which they chose rather to succumb to them, to yield the point and retract, than to lose their popularity with the devotees to the shrine of intemperance, and with those who minister to their appetites? We hope that the Board were influenced by none of these motives. We ask again, then, for the reasons for that singular and unexpected measure? Individuals of the Board are said to have stated to single individuals of the citizens, that the reason for their having given licenses in the manner they did, was to afford to the dealers in strong liquors an opportunity of selling their stock which they have on hand, without exposing themselves to the penalty of the law; understanding, at the same time, that they were not to replenish their stocks by making any new purchases.

Such an excuse, we admit, appears at first view somewhat plausible; but if it be the true reasons, why did not these individuals come forward, at the meeting of the citizens which was called to deliberate upon the emergency, and state this and other reasons, if they had them, for satisfying the mind of an inquiring community? But let us inquire for a moment how this alleged reason comports with the facts in the case. Two of the grocers, who applied for, and received licenses, have already expressed to the community their determination to replenish their stock of liquors and continue the sale of them; stating farther, one of them at least, that if the licenses had been given at the customary duty of five dollars, they should have felt obligated to discontinue the trade when their present stock was exhausted; but as it is, they have given no assurances of that kind. But in the case of the individual to whom a license was stipulated, provided that he should wish for it upon his return from New York City, the plea we have been considering has not the least shadow of probability. The individual in question has not been in the mercantile or grocer's business for some time, and is consequently supposed to have no old stock of liquors upon hand; but one express condition in his stipulation for a license was, that he should receive it, if he should see fit to purchase while in New York a new stock of spirituous liquors, in connection with the new goods which he designed to purchase, and bring into market in this place. Of the force of the plea, then, which we have been considering we leave the community to judge.

Again, one member of the Board of Excise, in answer to a question proposed to him by one of our citizens, replied, that he 'did not care for what the community or the public might say or think of their late act in granting licenses.' O tempora lamentabilia! Has it come to this, that a public officer—a magistrate of the people in this commonwealth—will act in his official station totally regardless of the will of the people, of whom he is the legally constituted public servant? The same gentleman remarked to another citizen, that he could not say upon his oath that three grocer's licenses and one tavern license were necessary for the good of the public and the traveling community! We ask, what less is this than a violation of his oath of office? What confidence can we have in the faithful administration of justice and the laws, if our magistrates, in their official acts, have no regard for the will of the people, and of the restrictions of the oaths which they take upon their induction into office?

In conclusion, fellow citizens, we submit this matter to your careful consideration. No motives of a political character have induced us to make these strictures, severe as they may seem to some, upon the late official proceedings of the Board of Excise of this town; but we submit the whole to your attention, hoping that it may arouse the community to some efforts to obviate the evils which we so much deprecate and deplore. With you it is left to decide, whether three, of the four corners at the intersection of the principal streets of our town, shall continue to send forth those streams which carry wretchedness, and ruin, and moral desolation, and death, in their course, or whether they shall be purified of the fatal poison, and be made fountains of blessing and happiness to our species; whether the guardianship and protection of virtuous influences shall be thrown around the youth of our community, or whether they shall be constantly liable to be drawn aside into every haunt of dissipation and debauchery; whether the reformed inebriates among us shall be saved to themselves and the community, and be the efficient instruments of inculcating by precept and practice the high principles of sobriety and virtue, or whether they shall again sink to their former degradation, and be lost to all hope for the present and the future, become again the cause of sorrow, and wretchedness, and woe, to their wives, and families, and friends, and finally sink to a drunkard's grave, in dishonor and shame, unlamented and unknown.

J. A. BADGER,
A. H. BURDICK,
M. SPEAR,
G. M. LANGWORTHY,
J. N. ELMORE, } Com.

Missionary Department.

For the Register.

Br. Bailey,—In our last communication we promised a brief account of the religious condition of our friends in Ripley, Ia., which we will now endeavor to give. In that county are many who were once in covenant relation with us, but now are in different circumstances, having mingled with other societies and the majority left the Sabbath. But they wish us to notice that their practice and not their doctrine was changed! and a part of them expressed deep regret for their apostacy. Some, however, remain permanent, but their number is comparatively small. We believe that with sufficient time, and proper means, good might be done there by us as a Denomination. Our friends there have been many years isolated, and destitute of the privileges of society. And although they have groaned, and repeatedly called for help, no minister was ever sent there before, and we at too late an hour to be successful in the time allotted to us. They were exceedingly lonesome, and thought that they and their petitions had been too much neglected. But this is no apology for the violation of God's law. The churches may consider whether they have done their duty in this particular, and many others, or not. If in this case it should prove too late to accomplish what we might have done, it is not in many others. And shall we suffer the numerous groups, settled in these western countries to relax, and be scattered like sheep without a shepherd? As God has prospered us, and we are able, let us forbid it, and send to them, and sustain among them competent ministers, who shall instruct, encourage, and reprove, thus leading them along in the paths of peace. As we considered our mission of an exploring rather than a local nature, we thought not best to stay long in Ripley. And if it had been otherwise, our appointed time was too short to accomplish much, as there were numerous obstacles to remove before we could establish upon a good foundation.

April 9. Attended our last meeting in Milan.

10. Left for Illinois, and in the after part of the day came to Flat Rock Creek, Shelby Co. In that region are some who observe the Sabbath according to the commandment, but are united with first-day people, and they, together, style themselves the separate Baptists.

13. Passed through Indianapolis, and had curiosity gratified by seeing twenty-five Buffaloes, and one Elk, a drove directly from the Rocky Mountains. As to the face of the country through Ia., very much of it where we traveled, is beach woods, low and swampy; but there are exceptions to this, especially on the Wabash River, where the country is beautiful and fertile. The roads were rough and muddy, except the National Turnpike, which we were obliged to follow as far as we could, in order to cross the streams.

15. Came to Terre Haute, and found we could not cross that ford the river having overflowed its banks, so we could not ford the bottom on the opposite side. We were obliged to hire a pilot to ride before us in the water, and went up the river seven miles where we succeeded in obtaining the opposite shore. We were informed that down the Wabash, forty-four miles below Terre Haute, in Sullivan Co., near Bussron Mills Po., are some six or seven families, who have long wished for an administrator to constitute them into a church in connection with the S. D. Baptists; but time, a lack of means, and high water, forbade our searching them out. From the Wabash, we made our way directly towards Fulton Co., Illinois. On our first entrance into that State we crossed several large, low, and to us, lonesome prairies.

19. Passed through Springfield. This town is located on a very beautiful prairie, and in it the State is erecting a magnificent Capitol. As we advanced north, the country and health of the inhabitants increased in goodness.

20. Crossed the Sangamon, Illinois, and Spoon rivers, and at evening put up with the Widow Hull and family. We have at last, after much toil, reached this field.—Here we discover so much to be done that we can not tell which way to go, or what to do first. We have passed through several neighborhoods where it does appear that the people must not be neglected. And to say the least of Ohio, we think that one missionary should be kept there; and Illinois is still more destitute. The calls are from every direction, and to the extent of thirty miles. There is also a great excitement upon the subject of difference between us and other denominations. The people are urging us to plead their cause. If it was for ourselves, or for riches, or worldly emoluments for others, we would lay aside our pen. The kneedy are calling. Parents are weeping for themselves and their children. The cry has gone up before God. Shall we heed or not? If you could but realize the condition of these people, we believe you would, (in addition to what has been done,) supply them with proper instruction.

May God send his spirit through the Churches, from house to house, and heart to heart, until this subject is sufficiently realized, and from the cause we see and enjoy the happy effect. The Lord knows, and eternity will unfold their destitute condition, together with the groans and tears lodged in the bosom of our heavenly Father. Friends of Jesus, will you let them plead in vain? Shall they imploringly cling to the last lingering gleam of hope, and die in despair? Our life will soon be gone, and with it the privilege to do good. The harvest is now ripe. Tares are sown—false reapers are in plundering the field. Darkness, error, and superstition are rushing forth. Infidelity is getting deep root; Satan's kingdom is fortifying, and souls are deceived. O! for able gospel ministers who shall come forth like flaming seraphs with the sword of the Spirit. May all consider this subject well, and not wait too long before they act. J. L. SCOTT.

Centreville, Fulton Co., Ill., May 6, 1842.

News of the Day.

The porter of the Long Island Bank at Brooklyn, while coming to Wall street on the 6th inst., to make his exchanges with the city Banks, had his pocket cut open and robbed of the Bank pocket book, containing over $20,000 in bank bills of various descriptions and checks, about half each.

The Island of Trinidad has been relieved, by order of the British government, from its dependence upon the government of Barbadoes, and restored to its former position of an independent colony, and its governing officer to the rank of governor.

Peaches at the South, especially in Delaware, have been very much injured by frosts, and will possibly yield half a crop.

The proprietor of the York House in Utica, has adopted temperance principles in his public house. We hope all such men will receive a liberal share of patronage.

The Philadelphia Grand Jury, at its session on the 6th inst., presented the rum shops of the city as nuisances, and worthy to be suppressed by law. This is certainly a "true bill."

The Grand Jury in New Orleans, in a late presentment, state that in one of the prisons there was found a woman, who said she had been there four years, without any crime, and without having been brought up for trial.

The Editor of the Boston Notion announces as forthcoming, a Quadruple Notion "to which he will challenge the world to produce an equal." It will contain 104 square feet of surface, over 1,700,000 letters, and be embellished by more than 200 engravings. It will not probably be worth the rags of which it is made.

Col. John Prince lately sued Mr. Grant, editor of the Sandwich (Canada) Herald, for libel. The jury rendered a verdict for the plantiff of sixpence.

The Concord Daily Patriot states that on Friday 3d inst., two lads, sons of Mr. John Pettis, of Windsor, Vt., while at work in a cornfield with an Irish laborer, were killed by being struck on the head with a hoe; one of them was killed instantly, and the other had his skull broken open. This act was supposed to be committed in revenge for some imagined injury from the family.

The site for a fortification near Detroit has at length been purchased for the General Government. The land selected, contains twenty-four acres, and costs $150 per acre.

The house of Mr. Thomas Spalding, in Monroe, Mass., was consumed on the night of the 20th ult., and he was so dreadfully burned in making his escape that he died after three days of intense suffering.

The Secretary of the Treasury has designated the Bank of America as a depository of the revenue in the city of New York.

The crops in several counties in the western part of Ohio are said to promise an abundant and overflowing harvest. The same is said to be true of the crops in Pennsylvania, especially the central and western parts.

Fifty thousand fruit trees have been planted in the vicinity of Detroit this season.

The British navy, the largest in the world, employs in time of peace 33,000 able-bodied seamen, 2,000 lads, and 13,000 royal marines, forming in all an effective force of 46,000 men, and 2,000 lads.

At the present time there are but eight persons in the Alabama penitentiary. The ninth will be one who was sentenced at Mobile on Thursday, to five years imprisonment for robbing the Post Office.

A slave girl lately escaped from her master in Albany. The mayor, being called upon to assist in recapturing her, promptly replied, "In the discharge of my duties as mayor, I recognize no obligation to become a slave-catcher."

Lord Ashburton has sent $100 to Petrich, the Artist, who was attacked by assassins in Washington a few days since.

The Philadelphia Bank has been selected by the Secretary of the Treasury, to receive the Government deposits in that city.

1500 emigrants arrived at Montreal on the 1st and 2d of the present month.

All the button-wood trees in New Jersey are dying this season. So far they have not exhibited the slightest sign of foliage. The Bay State Democrat says, that the same phenomenon is observed in Boston and its vicinity.

Wheat sold at Cincinnati on the 1st at 65 cts. The Chronicle says that the present wheat crop of Ohio will not fall short of 12,000,000.

There arrived at Buffalo, on the 23d inst., nine steamers, four brigs, and twenty-one schooners, principally from Cleaveland, Ohio, all heavily laden with flour, pork, corn, oats, barley, and lumber.

A bill has passed the Legislature of Connecticut, granting $50 a year to Julia Brace, the well-known deaf, dumb, and blind girl.

The Exploring Expedition.—The U. S. ship Vincennes, containing Commandant Wilkes, of the Exploring Expedition, has recently returned, after a cruise of four years. During their absence, the distance of nearly 400,000 miles has been traversed by the various vessels attached to the Expedition, and many of the principal groups and islands in the Pacific Ocean have been visited, examined, and surveyed; a friendly intercourse, and protective commercial regulations, established with the chiefs and natives; aggressions on our citizens and commerce redressed, and a justly merited punishment meted out in some flagrant cases of unprovoked and cold-blooded murder.

The discoveries in the Antarctic Ocean, (Antarctic continent—observations for fixing the Southern Magnetic pole, &c.,) are well known, and precede those of the French and English expeditions.

The Expedition, during its absence, have also examined and surveyed a large portion of the Oregon Territory, a part of Upper California, including the Columbia and Sacramento rivers, with their various tributaries. Several exploring parties from the squadron have explored, examined, and fixed those portions of the Oregon Territory least known. A map of the Territory, embracing its rivers, sounds, harbors, coast, forts, &c., has been prepared, which will furnish the government with a mass of valuable information relative to its possessions on the North-West Coast, and the whole of Oregon.

Experiments were made with the pendulum, on Mouna Loa, on the Island of Hawaii, one of the Sandwich Islands, at a height of fourteen thousand feet above the level of the sea. Topographical surveys and views were made of some of its active and most extensive craters.

Charts of all the surveys have been made, with views and sketches of headlands, towns or villages, &c., with descriptions of all that appertains to the localities, productions, language, customs, and manners.

Several islands not laid down in the charts, have been discovered, on one of which the natives offered worship, evidently believing that their visitors had come from the sun.

About eighty distressed American seamen have been received and shipped on board the vessels of the squadron, at the different ports and islands of the Pacific Ocean—several of them brought to the U. S. in the Vincennes; the remainder are on board the brigs Porpoise and Oregon, now on their way home, and may be expected early in July.

Although the officers and crew of the expedition have been exposed to every variety of climate, the general health of the squadron has been without a precedent.—But one officer, (Mr. Vandeford, master's mate, who died on the passage home,) and only eight of the men have died from disease.

In addition to the large collections already received from the expedition, the Vincennes has now on board a large and valuable collection, including several boxes of live plants, bulbs, &c., collected in the Pacific, Sooloo, Phillippines, Singapore, Cape of Good Hope, and St. Helena.

Avarice.—A deposite of between $1,100 and $1,200 of gold, all in eagles and half eagles, was made at the bank of Chester Co., Conn., last week, belonging to the estate of Mrs. Marshall, widow of the late John Marshall, of Pennsbury township, we believe, some eight or ten miles south of this borough. The gold was found, after a long search, in an old desk, which had in it several secret chambers, and is supposed to have been secreted by John Marshall some time prior to his death, twenty-eight years ago. At simple interest it would have doubled itself twice in that time.

Suffering for Want of Work.—The Philadelphia Spirit of the Times says there are upwards of 2,000 girls out of employment in that city, and that associations are being formed for the purpose of raising money, food, and raiment for any who may be suffering for the want thereof.

There are hundreds in this city, not only girls, but worthy women, with helpless families around them, who are suffering great privations for want of employment; and those in employ receive such scanty remuneration for their labor, as scarcely to afford them the common necessaries of life.—N. Y. Eve. Post.

Mob Law.—A Mr. Morris, while lecturing on Temperance at Troy, Ohio, was violently assaulted, and some days afterwards the leaders of the assailants were taken, tried, fined, and imprisoned. Their friends, to the number of 300, made a rally, and on Monday, the 23d ult., entered the village of Troy, demanded the release of the prisoners, and the restoration of money paid as fines, or they threatened to razee the jail to the ground. After some parley, the inhabitants agreed to repay the fines, and use their influence to procure the release of the prisoners, when the mob withdrew.

The Merchants and dealers of Batavia, have resolved to publish every man who gets into debt to them and then leaves without settling the same. The printers will make something out of it, if the sloping ones are not thereby brought to a sense of their sins and to a due repentance for the same.

Low Birth.—Many of our greatest men have sprung from the humblest origin, as the lark, whose nest is on the ground, soars nearest to heaven. Narrow circumstances are the most powerful stimulant to mental expansion, and the early frowns of fortune the best security for her final smiles. A nobleman who painted remarkably well for an amateur, showing one of his pictures to Poussin, the latter exclaimed:—"Your lordship only requires a little poverty to make you a complete artist."

Resuscitated.—Mr. Charles Gullatt, of Loundoun county, Virginia, was not long since struck by lightning, while sitting in his house, and prostrated in all human appearance in death. When in this condition several neighbors came to witness the lamentable scene. Cold water was thrown profusely on the body, and in the course of twenty minutes he began to exhibit signs of returning animation. The patient finally recovered, but stated that his sensations and pain experienced during the moments of revivification were terrible, beyond the power of language to describe.

A Good Act.—The House of Representatives of Connecticut, have passed a bill repealing all laws restraining the sale of spirituous liquors. A New Haven paper remarks that, as the measure seems to be demanded by public opinion, it will likely be carried through the Senate. This is wise. Sumptuary laws, if they could be enforced, are improper and injurious; for the regulation of meats and drinks, is a matter more successfully left to the influence of public sentiments.—N. Y. Evening Post.

All the real and personal property of the corporation of Detroit has been levied on by the Sheriff.

The streams of the Mississippi were greatly agitated by the great earthquake of the 7th of May.

Outrage and Suicide.—An infuriated wretch in Gloucester county, N. J., enraged because his wife made a profession of religion, lately attempted to murder her, and others, including the pastor of the church, to which she had united herself. Failing, he was arrested and imprisoned, and escaping from confinement, endeavored to murder with an axe, the officers who were endeavoring to recapture him. Hearing fire-arms mentioned, as likely to be used against him, he committed suicide by cutting his throat so effectually as to die almost instantly.—Jersey City Advertiser.

Notices.

Dedication.

The Baptist Church lately erected in this village will be dedicated to Almighty God, on Wednesday, the 29th inst. Services will commence at 11 o'clock, A. M. Sermon by Rev. William Clarke, of Cazenovia.

De Ruyter, June 22, 1842.

NOTICE,

Washingtonians and all Citizens Attend!

A gentleman in this village has received the following:—

"Please give notice that I will be in De Ruyter

ON MONDAY EVENING JUNE 27th, without fail.

Yours,

J. M. CARPENTER."

NOTICE.

The S. D. Baptist Western Association will hold its next annual session with the church in Hayfield, Crawford Co., Pa., commencing on the 5th day of the week before the last Sabbath, (23d inst.,) at 10 o'clock A. M.

The Ministerial Conference of the Western Association will hold its session during the week of the Association, at the same place.

NOTICE.

S. D. DELLAY takes this method of informing his friends and old customers that he has removed his stock of Goods to the Store of H. A. & F. C. DELLAY, where he is now able to offer them better inducements for trade than he ever before has been, in terms of credit, prices, &c. &c. He would also say that he will be permanently there, and intends making De Ruyter a location for years in the mercantile business. He would further say that he has not failed as some of his friends have endeavored to convince the public. He will be glad to see his debtor as well as his creditor, being able and willing to satisfy each.

De Ruyter, March 28 1842. v3n5tf

PROPOSALS

For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead,) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

DIED,

At De Ruyter Institute, on Sunday afternoon, June 19th, Miss CHARLOTTE S., youngest daughter of Dr. John L. Cazier of Lebanon, N. Y., in the 19th year of her age.

Miss C. has been a member of De Ruyter Institute for little more than a year past. As a student, she stood high in the estimation of her Teachers, and of all who had been privileged with her acquaintance.—Seldom, or never, has she given the least cause of complaint of a want of regularity in the performance of appointed duties, or of exceptionable deportment in her intercourse with others, either her equals or inferiors. As a friend, she was bound by the most endearing ties to many a heart, as very many whom she has left behind can amply testify. Upon her first connection with De Ruyter Institute, she entered upon the pursuit of the higher branches of a literary and scientific education; and such was the progress she made as to give to her Teachers and friends the most flattering hopes of her future success.

But no high intellectual endowments, no accomplishments which education can bestow, no natural charm of disposition, can serve as a guaranty to health and life. About three weeks since she was attacked with the scarlatina or scarlet fever, with such violence as to afford some apprehensions of danger. But by prompt medical treatment, her disease was thought after a few days to take a favorable turn. Though her recovery was not as rapid as was at first expected, no particular apprehensions of danger were entertained till a few hours before her death, when it appeared evident that she was fast yielding to the embraces of the King of Terrors. Towards six o'clock on Sunday afternoon she died, and we must leave her spirit in the hands of a holy and merciful God; and her body in its silent resting place till the resurrection morn, when it must awake at the sound of the final trump. To the living, this afflictive dispensation of providence affords another most solemn warning. But to the young, it comes with redoubled force, and tells them that they too may die. But to none does the warning come with more intensity, than to the students whom she has left behind to mourn the departure of a tender friend. It warns the professedly pious among you, that what your hands find to do should be done quickly; it warns the impenitent of the danger of periling the immortal soul, by deferring to the uncertain future the all-important work of the present hour. To all of you, a voice from the grave of your departed friend says, Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh.

J. A. B.

In this village, on the 16th, of consumption, MARY ANNETTE, daughter of Minerva E. and William C Gage, aged 5 months.

A blossom too fair for earth.

In Otselic, on the 11th inst., ALBERT, only son of Avina and Betsey Messenger, of Scarlet Fever, aged 2 years.

In Waterford, Ct., May 11th, Mr. GEORGE P. WELLS, aged 48 years. He met death with entire resignation, and expressed a willingness to depart. In his death, a wife has been bereft of an affectionate husband, five children of an indulgent parent, numerous relatives and acquaintances of a warm hearted and sympathising friend, and the church of Christ a zealous and devoted member.

He was a member of the first S. D. Baptist church in Hopkinton, R. I.

In Waterford, May 24th, Mrs. SARAH ROGERS, aged 88 years. To her, death seemed to have lost its terrors, and we trust she is shouting the victory in the paradise above. She was a member of the S. D. Baptist church in Waterford.

W. M.

In Westerly, on the 25th ult., of the Measles, CYNTHIA C., daughter of Oliver and Phebe Babcock, aged 11 months.

In Westerly, on the 7th inst., ZILPHA, daughter of Benj. and Polly Burdick, aged 20 years—She was a member of the 3d S. D. Baptist church in Hopkinton. She has gone to join the church triumphant.

In Hopkinton, on the 24th instant, POLLY WELLS, widow of Thomas Wells, esq., in the 80th year of her age. She was a member of the 1st S. D. Baptist church in Hopkinton, and has been a mother in Israel, and for years has been waiting her time, looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God, and of our Savior Jesus Christ, and like a shock of corn fully ripe in its season, she has gone home.

In Hopkinton, on the 28th instant, of fever, Hannah B., daughter of Christopher C. and Wealthy Lewis, aged 29 years; she embraced religion about 8 years since, and united with the first S. D. Baptist church in Hopkinton, where she remained an ornament to the church, and an example to the youth, she left the world in full hope of a glorious immortality beyond the grave. The following lines are from a young friend, as a tribute to her memory.

She has gone from the earth,
But we trust she's in heaven,
Where are mansions prepared for the bless'd;
Where a harp tuned celestial
To her will be given,
And her soul be forever at rest

She has gone from amongst us,
And we mourn for the dead;
But her conflicts on earth are all o'er.
And we trust she has gone
Where no sorrows invade,
Neither can she die any more.

In Genesee, on the 4th instant, ADELIA LOISA, daughter of Ann, widow of Eld. Orson Campbell, aged 4 years 10 months.

In Alfred, on the 8th instant, FERNANDO ALBERTO, son of Thomas Hull, aged 1 year 10 months.

MARRIED,

In Truxton, on the 19th inst., by Rev. J. N Lewis, Mr. ARTEMAS V. BENTLEY Esq., Attorney and Counsellor at Law, De Ruyter, and Miss CATHARINE M. SMITH, of the former place.

In East Hamilton, Madison Co. N. Y., June 15, at the residence of Doct. Noah B. Foot, by the Rev. Andrew Peck, DAVID MAINE Jr. Esq. and Mrs. LODEMA PALMER, of Branford, New Haven Co. Conn.

In Lincklaen, on the 15th inst., by Rev. S. M Burdick, Mr. ASHER CHANDLER, and Miss MARY B. HAKES, all of Lincklaen.

At Unadilla Forks, on the 11th instant, by Eld. Russel G. Burdick Mr. GEORGE M. FRISBIE of Scott, and Miss HANNAH S. BABCOCK, of the former place.

LIST OF RECEIPTS.

Of C. Potter, $2, cr E Cleveland, of I D Titsworth, $11, cr Abel Davis, John T Davis, Reese Ayers, Eld. A Estee, Truman Saunders, $2, each vol 3. John Swinney $1,- vol 3, of D Coon, $2 cr O Babcock, of J R Irish $2, cr David Davis, T Gorton, .50, of C M Lewis, $4, cr C Grant, A Lawton, $2, vol 3, of G H Perry $2, vol 3, N Burch, C T Rogers, A Saunders, W Babcock $2 vol 3

LIST OF LETTERS.

Sherman S Griswold, (next week,) C. Potter, Isaac D. Titsworth, Ambrose Corey, P. M., Eld. Daniel Coon, H. S. Babcock, (all right.)

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Notice.

ALL persons who are indebted to the subscriber, either in accounts or note, are requested to call and settle immediately and save cost.

De Ruyter, June 20, 1842.

JAMES M. LETTS.

Not 25 or 50 per cent Reward:

S. G. WALKER

HAS received his NEW GOODS, which he is disposed and determined to sell as CHEAP, if not cheaper than can be bought at any other establishment in De Ruyter. Among his assortment may be found, Dry Goods, Dry Groceries, Crockery, Hardware, &c. Leghorn and Palm-Leaf hats and a variety of other things too numerous to mention.

Hear ye!! Hear ye!! all persons wishing to buy goods CHEAP will please call at the Farmer's Exchange, and examine the quality and prices of his goods before purchasing elsewhere, and, Hear ye again!! any one having a little "Safety Fund" and indebted to S. G. Walker, will please call and deposit.

De Ruyter, May 23, 1842.

"A nimble sixpence is better than a slow shilling."

SPRING GOODS! SPRING GOODS!

CHEAP! CHEAP!! CHEAP!!!

THE undersigned are receiving a large assortment of goods suitable for the spring and summer trade, and invite their friends and the public generally to call and examine them at the one price store. SUTTON & QUINBY.

"Hard times and money scarce,"

IS the general complaint, and economy is the object of every person.

SUTTON & QUINBY have just opened a large assortment of Dry Goods, Groceries, Crockery, Paints, Oils and Dye-Stuffs. Persons wishing to make purchases are invited to call, as we feel confident that our Low Prices and Good Goods must give general satisfaction.

May 24 SUTTON & QUINBY.

BOOKS & STATIONERY.

SCHOOL BOOKS, of all descriptions, Miscellaneous Books & Stationery, at the Book Store of HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

De Ruyter, May 11, 1842. 11v3tf

LOTS OF HATS & CAPS on hand—Fashionable and Old Fashioned, Bell Crowned and Low Crowned; and, to crown all, and not be out of Fashion, Cash and most kinds of stuff received in payment, by HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

FLOUR, PROVISIONS, GROCERIES, and six hundred other things, for sale by 11tf

May 11. HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

BOOTS! BOOTS! SHOES! SHOES!!!

AT the sign of the Mammoth Boot, manufactured invariably of leather tanned in "cold liquor." Please call.

SILK! SILK!! SILK!!!

A BEAUTIFUL assortment of plain, figured and striped, just received and for sale very cheap at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

☞IMPORTANT WORK!

NOW IN THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION,

A DICTIONARY OF

Arts, Manufactures, and Mines,

Containing a clear exposition of their

PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.

By ANDREW URE, M. D; F. R. S., M. G. S., M. A. S., Lond., Mem. Acad. N. S. Philad., S. Ph. Soc N. Germ. Hanov., Mulii, &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings

THIS is unquestionably the most popular work of the kind ever published, and a book most admirably adapted to the wants of all classes of the community. The following are the important objects which the learned author endeavors to accomplish:—

1st. To instruct the Manufacturer, Metallurgist, and Tradesman, in the principles of their respective processes, as to render them, in reality, the masters of their business; and, to emancipate them from a state of bondage to such as are too commonly governed by blind prejudice and a vicious routine.

2dly. To afford Merchants, Brokers, Drysalters, Druggists, and Officers of the Revenue, characteristic descriptions of the commodities which pass through their hands.

3dly. By exhibiting some of the finest developements of Chemistry and Physics, to lay open an excellent practical school to Students of these kindred sciences.

4thly. To teach Capitalists, who may be desirous of placing their funds in some productive branch of industry, to select, judiciously, among plausible claimants.

5thly. To enable gentlemen of the Law to become well acquainted with the nature of those patent schemes which are so apt to give rise to litigation.

6thly. To present to Legislators such a clear exposition of the staple manufactures as may dissuade them from enacting laws, which obstruct industry, or cherish one branch of it, to the injury of many others.

And, lastly, to give the general reader, intent, chiefly, on Intellectual Cultivation, views of many of the noblest achievements of Science, in effecting those grand transformations of matter to which Great Britain and the United States owe their paramount wealth, rank, and power, among the nations of the earth.

The latest Statistics of every important object of Manufacture are given from the best, and usually, from official authority, at the end of each article.

The work will be printed from the 2d London Edition, which sells for $12 a copy. It will be put on good paper, in new brevier type, and will make about 1400 8vo. pages. It will be issued in twenty-one semi-monthly numbers, (in covers,) at 25 cents each, payable on delivery.

☞ To any person, sending us five dollars, at one time, in advance, we will forward the numbers, by mail, post paid, as soon as they come from the press.

To suitable Agents, this affords a rare opportunity as we can put the work to them on terms extraordinarily favorable. In every manufacturing town, and every village, throughout the United States and Canada, subscribers may be obtained with the greatest facility. Address, post paid, La Roy Sunderland, 126 Fulton street, New-York.

⁂ To every editor who gives this advertisement entire 12 insertions, we will forward, to order, one copy of the whole work, provided the papers containing this notice be sent to the New-York Watchman, New-York. 51t12

POETRY.

Lines.

On seeing a Lady's Gold Chain among the contributions for the promotion of Temperance.

Would that thou hadst a voice, thou grateful toy,
To tell me of thy giver. Fancy paints
A young and radiant brow, and a clear eye,
Kindling with purer light, as thou wert thrown
Off from the polished neck. Thou wert, perchance,
Some favored gift,—the talisman of love,—
Or friendship's bright memento. Still 'tis well
That thou art here. Henceforth that love shall be Remembered by those holy deeds that bless
And save mankind; nor could blest friendship ask
A truer token, than such heaven-wrought links
As bind the soul to duty. So go forth
Thou glittering gift, well bartered for the wealth
Of conscious merit. She who wore thee once
With the fond thrill of vanity, hath won
A better ornament than gold, or pearls,
Or rich array.
Fair creature,—still be true
To mercy's angel prompting. What thine hand
Can do for Christ, do thou with all the might
Of woman's tenderness. With flowery hands
Of soft persuasion, draw the erring soul
Back from the beetling precipice, where foams
The fiery flood of ruin. Toil to uproot
Those weeds of vice that by the way-side spring;
And even amid the gardens choicest flowers
Unblushingly intrude. Show gently forth
In thine own hallowed life, the blessedness
Of that meek mind, which temperance and peace,
Fair handed sisters—lead in virtue's path,
And crown with beauty that survives the tomb.

Miscellaneous Department.

TIME AND THE TRAVELER.

AN APOLOGUE.

A traveler stood with folded arms, and, amid the surrounding stillness, thus expressed the thoughts which the scene inspired:—"Where, oh, where, is Babylon the great, with her impregnable walls and gates of brass, her frowning towers, and her pensile gardens? where are her luxurious palaces and her crowded thoroughfares? The stillness of death has succeeded to the active bustle and joyous hilarity of her multitudinous population—scarcely a trace of her former magnificence remains, and her hundreds of thousands of inhabitants have long been sleeping the sleep of death in unknown and unmarked graves. Here thou hast been busy, O Time, thou mighty destroyer!"

The traveler having finished his soliloquy, there appeared before him a venerable person of mild aspect, who thus accosted him: "Traveler, I am Time, whom thou hast called the mighty destroyer, and to whose ruthless sway thou hast attributed the melancholy desolation which is here spread out to view. In this charge thou hast wronged me. Mortals have mistaken my character and office. In their pictorial representations, I am always exhibited as wielding a scythe, as if my only purpose was to mark my way with havoc. But, behold me!—although aged, my step has the elasticity of youth; my hand grasps no instrument of destruction; my countenance expresses no fierce and cruel passions. Deeds of devastation are wrongfully attributed to me, and here I appear to vindicate my name.

"Since this beautiful world sprung from chaos, I have lent my aid to perpetuate its beauty, and to impart happiness to all its inhabitants. My reign has been mild and preservative. I have marked the course of the sun, the moon and the stars, and during the thousands of years in which they have rolled in mighty expanse, I have diminished naught of their lustre—they shine as bright and as sweetly they move on in their course as harmoniously, as they did when the world was in its infancy. Look at the everlasting hills; they stand as proud and as permanently as they did when they rose up at the command of their mighty Creator. Contemplate the ocean in its ceaseless ebb and flow; I have not diminished its mighty resources.

"But the works of man, you will say are corroded by my touch, and the beauty and life of man flee before my approach. Even in this you wrong me. I have witnessed the rise and fall of empires, and have sought countless generations of men pass from the stage of life, but in neither case have I hastened their doom. Sin has been the great destroyer—the vices of men have scattered desolation over the fair face of creation. The thousands who have fallen on the battle-field have not fallen by my hand; the scattered ruins of those once mighty cities, whose memorials have nearly perished, have not been strewn by my hand, but by the hands of earthly conquerors, who have trodden down in their march of conquest, the palaces of the rich, and the hovels of the poor. The great works of man, originating in pride, have been subverted by folly and cruelty. Cities once proud, populous, and magnificent, have utterly disappeared, not by the operation of Time, but in the conflicts of men, and in the execution of his just judgment of Heaven.

"Most diseases derive their origin or their virulence from human vice or folly, and wars, resulting from the passions of men, swell the list of the dead. Many a furrow is marked on the brow of man, which is attributed to Time, in which Time has had no agency; and many totter to the grave who go there prematurely, and not by the weight of years. Men once lived nearly a thousand years, and now they seldom fulfill threescore years and ten. It is not because I am now more emphatically a destroyer, but because their sins and follies have curtailed the term of their existence. Even the works of men in ancient days, might have still stood to be gazed upon, if no other influence than mine had been exerted.

"The stones of Jerusalem's Temple are no longer recognized, but they might now have occupied their places in the glorious structure, had not God otherwise decreed in punishment of man's sins. Look at the Pyramids of Egypt; there they still stand, the lofty and strong monuments of former ages; I have merely effaced the names of their vain-glorious builders.—Traveler! I am not a mighty destroyer. I am the friend of man; I afford him precious opportunities; I mitigate his severest woes; I afford him seed time and harvest, summer and winter, in agreeable vicissitudes; let him be virtuous, and then it will no longer be said I mar his works."

The venerable personage disappeared when he had thus spoken, and the traveler, mentally acknowledging the justice of his vindication, pursued his travels to mark with greater discrimination the wide-spread desolation, which had been brought into the world by human crime.

From the Louisville Advertiser.

FLOGGING AN EDITOR.

Every exchange paper on our table, and the number is not a small one, complains of the want of news. Nothing is going on in Congress, not even a duel—the Boundary Question and the Florida War, are both worn out, and not a murder is to be had for love or money. Even 'shocking accidents,' and 'awful catastrophes' are as scarce as warming pans in the West Indies, and there has not been a mob, or a highway robbery worth a fig, for a long time. What is to be done? What can we poor editors do, to keep our readers in good humor? Some contrive to fill up their columns with their own private concerns, and what is worse yet, with their personal quarrels. But this is an example we do not intend to follow. Patrons, when they pay a publisher for a newspaper, do not expect him to devote it to his private affairs. A clergyman would probably give offence if he were to keep the fodder for his horse in the gallery of the church, or hang up his winter's stock of bacon and sausages around the pulpit. And yet this would be no more palpably appropriating to private use, what belongs to the public, than for an editor to fill his paper with his own personal affairs.

Well, as we are not disposed to occupy our columns with personal abuse, we will try something else, and relate an incident, for the truth of which we can vouch.

About twenty-five years ago, when a certain Western State (which we shall not name) was a territory, and with a few inhabitants, a young lawyer from one of the old States, emigrated thither, and settled in the town of K——. He succeeded admirably in his profession, and rose rapidly into popular favor. He had been there three years, when he induced a printer to come on and print a weekly paper, of which he was editor and proprietor. Squire S. was much pleased for a while, with editing a paper. He was a man of very low stature, but he used the editorial "we" as frequently as if there was a dozen of him, and each as big as Daniel Lambert, or the Kentucky Giant.

Strange to say, there were at that time men in office who were not a particle more honest than they should be; a thing which probably never happened before and never will again. Squire S. felt all the patriotism of a son of '76, and poured out grape shot and canister against public abuses. This soon stirred a hornet's nest about his ears; but as there was no other paper in the territory, there was no reply, and he enjoyed his warlike propensities in security.

At length he published an article more severe and cutting, against malfesance in office, than any that had preceeded it. In fact, though pointed at no one individual in particular, it was a 'scorcher.'

Some three or four days afterwards, he was sitting alone in his editorial office, which was about a quarter of a mile from the printing establishment, his pen was busy with a paragraph, when his door was opened without much ceremony, in stalked a man about six feet in his stockings. He asked 'are you S., the proprietor of this paper?' Thinking he had found a new patron, the little man, with one of his blandest smiles, answered in the affirmative. The stranger deliberately drew the last number of his paper from his pocket, and pointing to the article against rogues in office, told the affrighted editor, that it was intended for 'him.' It was in vain that he protested that he had never seen him before. The wrath of the visiter rose to a fever heat, and from being so long restrained, boiled over with double fury.—He gave the editor his choice, either to publish a humble, a very humble recantation, or take a flogging on the spot. Either alternative was wormwood, but what could he do? The enraged office holder was twice his size, and one blow would qualify him for an obituary notice; he agreed to retract, and as his visitor insisted upon writing it himself, he sat down to the task. Squire S. made an excuse to walk to the printing office, with a promise he would be back to sign it, as soon as it was finished.

S. had hardly gone fifty rods when he encountered a man who inquired where Squire S.'s office was, and if he was at home. Suspecting that he, too, was on the same errand as the other visitor, he pointed to the office and told him he would find the editor within, writing a most abusive article against office-holders. This was enough. The eyes of the new comer flashed fire. He rushed into the office and assailed the stranger with epithets of 'liar'—'scoundrel'—'coward'—and told him he would teach him how to write. The gentleman supposing it was some bully sent there by the editor, sprang to his feet, and a fight ensued that beat the Kill Kenny cats all hollow. The table was upset and smashed into kindling wood; the contents of a jug of ink stood in puddles on the floor; the chairs had their legs and backs broken beyond the skill of surgery to cure them. This seemed only to inspire the combatants with still greater fury. Blow followed blow with the rapidity of lightning, and the force of a sledge hammer.—First one was kicking on the floor and then the other—each taking it in turn pretty equally. The ink on the floor found its way to their faces, till both of them cut the most ludicrous figure imaginable. The noise and uproar was tremendous. The neighbors ran to the door, and exclaimed with astonishment that two negroes were fighting in Squire S.'s office. No one dared separate them. At length, completely exhausted, and pounded to a jelly, they ceased fighting. The circumstances of the case became known, and the next day, hardly able to sit on horseback, their heads bound up, they started homeward, convinced that they had obtained very little satisfaction from their attempt to FLOG AN EDITOR.

KNOWLEDGE.

BY REV. L. WITHINGTON.

There is a close connection between ignorance and vice; and in such a country as our own, the connection is fatal to freedom. Knowledge opens sources of pleasure which the ignorant man can never know—the pursuit of it fills up every idle hour, opens to the mind a constant source of occupation, wakes up the slumbering powers, gives the secret victory contest, and unveils to our astonishment ideal worlds; secures from temptation and sensuality; and exalts us in the scale of rational beings. When I pass by the grog-shop and hear the idle dispute and obscene song; when I see a cart rolled along filled with intoxicated youths, singing and shouting as they go—when I discover the boat gliding down the river, where you can hear the influence of rum by the noise. Where were these people taught to read. Was there no social library to which they could have access? Did they ever know the calm satisfaction of taking an improving volume by a peaceful fireside, or did they ever taste the luxury of improving the mind? You hardly ever knew a young man who loved his home and his book, that was viscious. Knowledge is often the poor man's wealth. It is a treasure no thief can steal, no moth nor rust can corrupt.—But you turn his cottage to a palace, and you give a treasure which is always improving and can never be lost. "The poor man," says Robert Hall, "who has gained a taste for good books, will in all likelihood become thoughtful, and when you have given the poor a habit of thinking, you have conferred on them a much greater favor than by the gift of a large sum of money, since you put into their possession the principle of all legitimate prosperity."

Nor is it to the poor alone; that this remark applies. The rich need occupation. Their hearts are often like seas, which stagnate under a breathless atmosphere, and putrify for the want of a wave. Employment roused by some noble object is the secret of happines; and of all employments, mental lasts the longer. The body soon tires; but the mind, divine in its origin and immortal in its destiny, pursues its labors with transient pausings; and rises from every check with fresh vigor to continue its eternal flight. What a beautiful picture does Cicero give of the secret happiness his studies opened to him. "You will not blame me, my respected judges, at least you will pardon me if while some are hurried in business; some keeping holidays, some pursuing pleasure; some giving their hours to sleep; while one tosses the javelin and another the dice box, I should steal a little time for the recollection of my studies and the improvement of my mind." Yes, he loved these things better than recreation, to him they were more profitable than business and sweeter than sleep.

UNREASONABLENESS,

Surely man is the most unreasonable of all God's creatures! Feed the birds of the air, or the beasts of the field, and they will be satisfied; but the more is given to man, the more he requires.

If he have riches, he will hug his bags of gold, and carry out his plans to increase them. If he have estates, he will join house to house, field to field, and vineyard to vineyard; give him a county or a kingdom, and he will crave for more.

When we rise in the morning, we expect to pass through the day prosperously. If we lie down at night, we expect to enjoy refreshing slumber. If we propose a journey, we expect to perform it unmolested and uninjured.

If we pass through one birth-day, we expect to arrive at another in good health; to eat and to drink, to ride and to walk, to wake and to sleep in peace, without considering that these things cannot take place, unless God, of his infinite mercy, keeps us from a thousand temptations, and delivers us from ten thousand dangers.

So continually are we partaking of God's blessings, that we look on them as things of course; the seed we sow must, in our apprehension, spring up abundantly; our table must be provided for, and the mercies of yesterday must be supplied to-day, and those of this year continued to us through the next. How seldom do we offer up the prayer, "Give us this day our daily bread," (Matt. vi. 11.) with a full consciousness of our entire dependence on our heavenly Father for our supplies! And how frequently do we feel more gratitude to our fellow worms, for a passing act of kindness, than to the Lord of life and glory, for his permanent and unremitted mercies! We bow and cringe to a fellow-sinner, to obtain at his hands the empty baubles of an hour, while the love of the Redeemer of the world, the means of grace, and the hope of eternal glory, are sought for with indifference.

Let us look more to our common mercies as the gift of God. Let our health and strength, our days and nights, our bits and drops, our smallest comforts be regarded as being bestowed by a heavenly Benefactor; and let us bear in mind our own unworthiness, that we may be more reasonable in our desires, and more grateful when they are attained.

A Beautiful Extract.—However dark and disconsolate the path of life may seem to any man, there is an hour of deep and undisturbed repose at hand, when the body may sink into a dreamless slumber. Let not the imagination be started, if this resting-place, instead of being a bed of down, shall be a bed of gravel, or the rocky bed of the tomb. No matter where the poor remains of a man may be, the repose is deep and undisturbed, the sorrowful bosom heaves no more, the tears are dried up in their fountains, the aching head is at rest, and the stormy waves of earthly tribulations roll unheeded over the place of graves. Let armies engage in fearful conflict over the very bosom of the dead, not one of the sleepers heeds the spirit-stirring triumph, or responds to the thundering shouts of victory. How quiet those countlesss millions sleep in the arms of their mother earth! The voice of thunder shall not awaken them—the loud cry of the elements, the winds, the waves, not even the giant-tread of the earthquake, shall be able to cause an inquietude in the chamber of death. They shall rest and pass away, the last great battle shall be fought; and then a small voice at first not heard, shall rise to a tempest, and penetrate the voiceless grave. For a trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall hear His voice.

The following "word of exhortation," which we clip from the conclusion of a homily on "Hard Times," in the Springfield Republic is in our judgment excellent:

"We have a word for Debtors who are pushed to the wall. Let them not be discouraged—Let them not be overcome by despondency. Hope, like truth, lies at the bottom of the deepest well. On the ashes of a burnt dwelling may be laid the foundation of a new building. The darkest hour is just before break of day. After the night comes the morning. If a man stumble, and fall not, he is helpen on his journey. Keep a clear conscience.—Be honest in spite of temptation. Keep up your spirits, not by pouring spirits down, but by doing all that in you lieth for yourself and yours, leave the result to the hand that moves the world. Above all, meet your creditors with your shirt sleeves rolled up, not for fighting, but for work.—Mind all these hints, and you'll be the happier for it now, and the better off hereafter.

"A whole chapter to Creditors: Do AS YOU WOULD BE DONE BY."

Temperance Department.

GIVE ME BACK MY HUSBAND,

BY ELIHU BURRITT.

Not many years since, a young married couple from the far, 'fast anchored ilse,' sought our shores with the most sanguine anticipations of prosperity and happiness. They had begun to realize more than they had seen in the visions of hope, when, in an evil hour, the husband was tempted 'to look upon the wine when it was red,' and to taste of it 'when it gave its color in the cup,' The charmer fastened around its victim all the serpent-spells of its sorcery, and he fell; and, at every step of his rapid degradation, from man to the brute, and downward, a heart-string broke in the bosom of his companion.

Finally, with the last spark of hope flickering on the altar of her heart, she threaded her way into one of those shambles where man is made such a thing as the beasts of the field would bellow at. She pressed her way through the bacchanalian crowd who were revelling there in their own ruin. With her bosom full of 'that perilous stuff that preys upon the heart,' she stood before the pander of her husband's destiny, and exclaimed in tones of startling anguish, 'Give me back my husband!'

'There's your husband,' said the man, as he pointed towards the prostrate wretch—'That my husband! What have you done to him? That my husband! What have you done to that noble form, that once, like a giant oak, held its protecting shade over the fragile vine that clung to it for support and shelter? That my husband! What torpedo chill have you touched to the sinews of that manly arm? That my husband! What have you done to that noble brow, which he once wore high among his fellows, as if it bore the superscription of the God-head? That my husband! What have you done to that eye, which he was wont to 'look erect on heaven,' and see in his mirror the image of his God? What Egyptian drug have you poured into his veins, and turned the ambling fountains of his heart into black, bitter, and burning pitch? Give me back my husband! Undo your basilisk spells, and give me back the man that stood with me by the altar.'

The ears of the rum-seller, ever since the first demi-john of that burning liquid was opened upon our shores, have been saluted, at every stage of his traffic, with just such appeals as this. Such wives, such widows and mothers, such fathers and fatherless, as never mourned in Israel at the massacre of Bethlehem, or at the burning of the Temple, have cried in his ears, morning, night, and evening, 'Give me back my husband! Give me back my father! Give me back my boy! Give me back my brother!

But has the rumseller been counfounded or speechless at these appeals? No! not he: He could show his credentials at a moment's notice, with proud defiance. He always carried in his pocket a written absolution for all he had done, and could do in his work of destruction. He had bought a letter of indulgence—I mean a license!—a precious instrument, signed and sealed by an authority stronger and more respectable than the Pope's. He confounded! Why, the whole artillery of a civil power was ready to open in his defense and support. Thus shielded by the ægis of the law, he had nothing to fear from the enemies of his traffic. He had the image and superscription of Cæsar, on his credentials, and unto Cæsar he appealed; and unto Cæsar, too, his victims appealed, and appealed in vain.

Washingtonians! need I say that you are the last court of these appeals? that the forlorn hope of the cause is now centered upon your exertions? How the strongest statutes of human legislation have sunk into ridiculous impotence, when opposed to the progress of this mighty ruin! How have you found them mere characters written in the sand, compared with the sublime and eternal principles of that law which you have illustrated and enforced in this great work of philanthropy,—the law of sympathy and love,—a law enacted in heaven, to fill earth with the perpetual sunshine of its bliss, and to make man the fellow of the angels! And, brethren, during your short experience, have you ever found this law of love an inadequate substitute for all the legal institutions of human wisdom?

Suppose at the outset of this great reformation, you had been clothed with all the authority of human law; what would have become of the ten thousand happy homes which you have made to smile again where the searing fires of rum had left the black desolation of Sodom? Suppose you had exchanged the bible for the statute-book, and the principles of the gospel for the institutions of man—what would have become of those husbands, fathers, brothers, and sons, which you have, this year given back to hearts bruised and broken by their fall!

Go on, then; carry out this grand and simple system of the gospel, until the world shall see their infinite aptitude for all the emergencies and relations of human life and society; until it shall induce that millennial consummation, when nations shall accept it as a substitute for human legislation, and abrogate the laws which have produced and perpetuated such monstrous inequalities in the commonwealth of humanity.

Worcester, April 14, 1842.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

NO IMPOSITION.

NO STATES PRISON WORK!

THOSE wishing to purchase BOOTS and SHOES of superior quality of custom work, will find just the place by calling at the sign of the
MAMMOTH BOOT

De Ruyter, May 20, 1842

NEW TAILORING ESTABLISHMENT.

J. M. LETTS,

WOULD return thanks for the patronage he has received from his numerous friends and customers. He would say to them that he has taken the room on the first floor, (recently occupied by Dr Ira Spencer, as a Druggist Store,) together with those he occupied before, where he will be happy to wait on all those who will favor him with a call.—He will, as heretofore, WARRANT his work to be done in a superior manner.

N. B. Spring and Summer Fashions just received No. 1 Farmers' Exchange

J. M. L. has engaged an experienced Journeyman who will pay particular attention to making up COATS, of every variety, in a neat and superior style De Ruyter, June 23, 1841

THE FARMER'S EXCHANGE is the place to buy Goods CHEAP. Oct 20, 1841
34tf S. G. WALKER.

STOVES.

COLD WINTER IS COMING

ABRAM N. ANGUS,

LATE of the firm of "Elmore Angus & Ayer," has moved into the new building adjoining the Stone Store of John N. Elmore (La Fayette Block,) where he is receiving the largest and best assortment of STOVES ever before offered in this market, comprising every desirable pattern of Cooking, Hall, Box, Plate, and

Fancy Parlor Stoves.

Which he offers, Wholesale & Retail, on as favorable terms as can be purchased in this TOWN COUNTY or STATE. Most kinds of Produce Old Cast-Iron, and CASH, even, will not be refused in payment for any article in his line o business.

The subscriber manufactures all kinds of Stove Furniture, Pipe, Sheet Iron, Copper.

BRASS AND TIN WARE

Of every description, which he keeps constantly on hand, and offers at as

LOW PRICES

Either at wholesale or retail, as any other man ufacturer in the State. All wares warranted, made of GOOD materials, and not LEAKY.

Eave Troughs

Made and put up to order. Also,

JUST RECEIVED

And for sale a full assortment of Westmoreland Climax Stoves and Cauldron Kettles.

JOB WORK

☞Done well, on short notice, and for reasonabl prices. N. B. Purchasers wishing to buy wil please Call at the Centre Store, La Fayette Block No 3 Cortland Street.

De Ruyter, Oct. 15, 1841. 34tf

L. W BLISS' Window Sash
Bliss' & Co. " Blinds.
Holme's Sampson & Sailsbury Edged Tools consisting of Broad Axes, Hand Axes, Adzes an, Chisels, at Factory prices by J. N. ELMORE,
October 4. Manufacturers' Agent.

JOB PRINTING,

BOOKS, Pamphlets, Way, Hand-Bills, Cards Bills, &c. &c., neatly executed at this office.

50 PIECES BROAD CLOTHS, CASSIMERES, SATINETTES, at reduced prices at the NEW YORK CASH STORE

How to make money,

IS the study of mankind and of the Yankee Nation in particular. The easiest and most practicable plan for accomplishing the desired end in these times is to "Save Money," which can be done by purchasing NEW GOODS, instead of the trashy accumulations of many shops and many years. The place to do this, is at ELMORE'S, whose stock of NEW GOODS is nearly equal to all the rest received in this village and who is daily dispensing great bargains to "Fortune's Favorites."
May 30.

Of Drugs and Meditines,

THE subscriber keeps a much larger stock and sells much lower than those who adevrtise two columns.
May 30. J. N. ELMORE.

4 CASES, Superior quality, fashionable Hats, just received, and for sale low at the
May 30. STONE STORE.

500 PAIRS Boots and Shoes for sale at the
May 30. STONE STORE.

NEW TAILORING ESTABLISHMENT.

THE subscriber would inform the Citizens of De Ruyter and its vicinity, that he has opened a shop in the second story of S. G. Walker's store, Farmer's Exchange, where he may at all times be found, and where those who are pleased to favor him with a call may have their garments made as well as at any establishment west of New York City.

N. B. Garments cut and warranted if made by competent workmen. New York Spring and Summer Fashions just received by W. P. GUEST.
De Ruyter, April 25th, 1842.

FLOUR! FLOUR!! FLOUR!!!

SUPERFINE Flour for sale at the Farmers' Exchange, put up in good order in barrels and half barrels. Said Flour is made from the best of western wheat, at one of the best mills in the state.
S. G. WALKER.
De Ruyter, April 13th, 1842.

BLANKS! BLANKS!!

JUSTICES Blanks, Personal Mortgages, &c, just printed and for sale at this office.
De Ruyter, April 20, 1842.

TEAS, SUGARS.

CALL and see how cheap they are selling them at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.
Oct. 11.

AGENTS FOR THE REGISTER.

NEW-YORK.

Adams--Chas. Potter, H. H. Baker, Job Spencer.
Alfred---James R. Irish, Maxson Greene, Orra Vincent, Samuel Russell P. M.
Berlin—John Whitford.
Brookfield—Andrew Babcock, Silas Bailey, Adin Burdick, Samuel B. Crandall
Bolivar—Rowse Babcock, J. L. Scott.
Clarence—Nathan V. Hull.
Clear Creek—Abel Saunders.
Durhamville—Dea. Joseph Potter.
Edmeston—Dea. Ephraim Maxson
East Rodman—Chester Greene.
Friendship—Zuriel Campbell, Samuel E. Lan[illegible]
Genesee—W. P. Langworthy, Dea. E. P. Crandall, Sheffield B. [illegible], H. P. Greene.
Hounsfield—Charles West
Independence—John P. Livermore.
Lincklaen—[illegible] M. Burdick, Dea. Wm. G. Crandall.
[illegible]—Dennis Hardin,
New York City—Paul Stillman.
Newport—Daniel Truman.
New London—Charles M. Lewis.
Otselic—Dea. Silas Church
Petersburgh—George Crandall.
Preston—Dea. Clark Rogers.
Persia—Dea. Hosea Whitford
Pitcairn, St. Lawrence Co.—Geo P. Burdick.
Sackett's Harbor—Joel Greene
Scott—Ezekiel G. Potter, James Hubbard, Hiram Babcock.
Schenectady—Abel Ward
South Branch—Rowland T. Greene.
Truxton—Russel G. Burdick.
Unadilla Forks—Welcome Stillman, William B. Maxson.
Verona—Oscar Williams.
Watson—Ezra Whitford
West Clarksville—Clarke Saunders.

RHODE-ISLAND.

Westerly—Alexander Campbell.
Hopkinton—Joseph Spicer jr., Jacob D. Babcock.

CONNECTICUT.

Waterford—Lester T. Rogers, Wm. Maxson.
Mystic Bridge T. S. Greenman.

NEW-JERSEY.

Plainfield—Thomas S. Alberti
New Market—W. B. Gillett.
Shiloh—Isaac D. Titsworth, Azor Estee.
Salem—David Clawson.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Crossingville—Thos. B. Brown
Meadville—Dea. Lewis Dunham.
New Geneva—B. F. Bond.
Coudersport—L. G. Maxson
Clifford—Zebediah Burdick.
Sharon Centre—Isaac W. Jones

VIRGINIA.

Lost Creek—Levi H. Bond
Elk Creek—Thos. B. Bond
New Salem--Jepthah F. Randolph.
Lewisport---Joseph Jeffrey
Lowther's Run---Asa Bee.

OHIO.

Bloomfield---Charles Clarke.
Northampton—Simeon Babcock, B. C. Church.
Port Jefferson—Lewis A. Davis
Jackson---Davis Loofbourrow
Butlerville---G. N. Swinney.
Kingsville---Julius M. Todd.

MICHIGAN.

Oporto---Job Tyler.
Tallmadge---Bethuel Church.

WISKONSAN.

Milton, Rock Co—Joseph Goodrich, P. M. Stillman Coon.

IOWA.

Burlington, Des Moines Co.---S. B. Brown.

The Seventh-day Baptist Register

IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY,

AT DE RUYTER, MADISON CO., N. Y.,

BY

JAMES BAILEY.

TERMS.—To village subscribers who have the paper left at their doors, $2 25, in advance, or $2 50, at the expiration of the year.

☞To office and mail subscribers, $2 in ADVANCE

Each communication, involving facts and interded for insertion in the paper, must be accompanied by a responsible name.

No subscription received for a less term than six months.

☞All subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, will be considered as wishing to continue their subscription, and their paper will be sent to them accordingly. No paper will be discontinued till all arrearages are paid except at the discretion of the publisher.

☞Advertisements inserted on the most reasonable terms.

☞All letters and communications to ensure attention should be addressed to the publisher free of postage.

L. D. Roger

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.

VOL. III.—NO 18.] JAMES BAILEY, Editor and Proprietor.—A. H. BURDICK, Printer. [WHOLE NO. 122.

Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy.—The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.—Commandment.—If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments.—Jesus Christ.

Two dollars in advance.] DE RUYTER, N. Y., FOURTH-DAY, JUNE 22, 1842. [Published weekly.

Original Papers.

For the Register.

The Seventh Command.

The direct violation of this command, is universally admitted to be exceedingly heinous in its nature, and disastrous in its consequences; but there are certain violations of its spirit, which are the initiatory steps to its literal violation, that are perhaps not sufficiently noticed. To these violations, I should be happy, could I call the attention of the readers of the Register, being convinced that very many professors of Christianity, lend themselves unwittingly as the fatal allies of licentiousness, and lead not a few to ruin and degradation.

The 10th command which says thou shalt not covet, that is thou shalt not desire in the heart, or indulge in the thought, that which is forbidden in the letter, evinces the spirituality of the law, & the explanation that Christ Jesus gave of this command in the 5th chapter of Matt. 27 and 28 verses, as reaching to the thoughts of the heart, will commend itself as the true import of that law, which is spiritual. God looks directly at the heart, and requires purity in the inward parts, and the pure in heart alone shall see him.

But the point of which I wish more particularly to speak, is the words of the mouth, & to these it is that I referred in introducing this subject; and while treating of it, I trust that those who may feel themselves implicated, will bear in mind the language of Christ, when he says, "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh."

To a proper understanding of this subject, it may be necessary to classify the different kinds of conversation that are deemed more or less a violation of the 7th command, and as tending to pollute and deprave the mind of the young, and render them the easy victims of this soul and body damning sin.

1. Direct licentious conversation and jesting.

2. Double meanings and indelicate allusions.

3. Rehearsing stories of this nature, unnecessarily, and unaccompanied with suitable feelings, such as the circumstances properly viewed ought to call forth.

4. Unnecessary conversation upon matters connected with subjects of medical treatment.

1. Directly licentious conversation and jests, are frequent in bar-rooms, workshops, and among groups of men young and old. There are many who connive at and consent to such conversation, and even indulge in it, who claim to be pure in their own lives. This conversation about things that ought not to be named, will be sufficiently defined in every mind on a moment's reflection, and the sinful and deleterious nature of it will be at once perceived. I would, however, remark, that so far as it has a person as its object, it is a violation of the command, "do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you;" and, secondly, a violation of the domestic ties, pointing out some one of the beloved circle, a child, a sister, or, and perhaps if possible, a dearer object of affection or veneration; but let the sensualist know, the moment he leaves the group in which he has indulged his gross propensities, that some one of his loved relatives may form the subject of similar discourse.

Is such conversation ever indulged in by woman? Is it ever heard from the lips of a parent, amid the family circle?

Are the ears of the young, among their associates, ever poisoned with such filthy conversation? Are thus the minds of both sexes made gross, their passions excited, and the arts of the seducer instilled, and will not their ruin be made sure unless favoring circumstances and a kind providence prevent?

2. Akin to this most obvious violation of God's law, and in some sense more dangerous on account of the insiduous nature of its advances, is the practice of dealing in double meanings, &c. This artillery of the adulterers emissaries, is the more to be feared, as it enters into every circle of society, is confined to no sex or age, to no place or station, shielding itself from open reproof and public notice by its serpentine methods. Those who have allowed their minds to run in this channel, will under almost all circumstances have their jokes and allusions in reference to the relations of life, &c. Words, too, properly used as the names of things and animals, they will enlist as a vehicle through which they may give vent to their impure thoughts, and the person who attempts to avoid those phrases and words which licentiousness and prudery have combined to proscribe, must dwell continually in the region of impure images, and thus the effort to be virtuous, leads to vice, through the familiarity with thoughts that ought never to be indulged. But the use of suitable forms of expression ought, in no case, to be abandoned to this impious coalition. To the pure, all things are pure, and a suitable dignity of bearing and deportment will quickly teach even such charácters, that they are detested intruders, and simple purity of heart, and fixedness of principle, can cope with and foil all the machinations of such wicked ones.

This mode of breaking the 7th command, is frequently associated with the low, and vulgar habits of sly leering, and winking with the eye—habits which good society never tolerates.

3. There may be those who do not indulge in this grossness of speech, who nevertheless retail stories of ignominy and shame with a thoughtless air, and thus prepare the mind for those more direct allusions. They speak of such things without any correspondent feeling of indignation at the vile seducer, or of sorrowing compassion for the wretched and ruined victim. They have no tears to shed at the grave of virtue and peace, where lies entombed the hopes of a father, a mother's pride, and a family's honorable name; nor do they uplift the soul to God for the universal prevalence of his soul-renovating Gospel.

4. Persons of the best repute will frequently indulge in unnecessary conversation in cases requiring medical treatment, and the physician does not always treat the cases brought under his notice, in a purely professional manner. The infirmities of nature require communications upon delicate subjects; but when the necessary communications are made, and information received, the conversation should immediately cease.

The effect of all or any of these violations of purity in speech, is what I have mentioned in the commencement. The mind is familiarized with vice, and when youth are so far depraved as to admit this wickedness in any of its forms in their conversation, they may mutually and without forethought be hurried on to the ruin of their virtue; (if such an expression can be proper in reference to those in whose souls it has already ceased to exist,) and the seducer, having his pathway to the passions paved, may the more surely accomplish his purpose. And now, I ask, while they may be covered with ignominy in this world, and ultimately die in their sin, at whose hands will God require their blood? Let the perhaps unwitting, but nevertheless guilty panderers to the licentious, answer it.

That a radical cure to this leprosy that has corrupted the life-blood of society, may be effected, two things seem to be essential.

1. That ministers of the gospel, and professors of religion shall hold up this subject, (I mean this verbal or spoken adultery,) even in its apparently most inoffensive forms, to merited indignation and abhorrence, and accept of no excuse for unnecessary, unseemly, and untimely conversation upon matters associated with this subject, or leading to looseness or grossness of thought.

That they shall by a gravity of deportment, and dignity of bearing such as becomes the sons of God, and the disciples of the Holy Jesus, restrain and rebuke every approach to obscenity, among those in whose company they may happen to mingle. This leaven of Christ-like deportment, will generally awe into silence the obscene, and make them ashamed without one word of reproof being uttered.

To this end, ministers of the gospel, and professors of christianity must purify themselves, and comport themselves with the following exhortation of the Apostle Paul, in Eph., "But fornication, and all uncleanness, or covetousness, let it not once be named among you, (as becometh saints;) neither filthiness, nor foolish talking, nor jesting, which are not convenient: but rather giving of thanks. For this ye know, that no whoremonger, nor unclean person, nor covetous man, who is an idolator, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ, and of God. Let no man deceive you with vain words, because of these things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience. Be ye not, therefore, partakers with them. For ye were sometimes darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord: Walk as children of the light: (for the fruit of the spirit is in all goodness, and righteousness, and truth;) proving what is acceptable unto the Lord; and have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them. For it is a shame even to speak of things that are done of them in secret."

That this purity of soul may be before the mind, and that the slightest deviation may be detected, the following thoughts may be useful:

I am the temple of God. Whoso defileth that temple, him will God destroy. Jesus Christ is my example; how would such language comport with his character, and how would he treat the offenders of purity and delicacy?

2. Parents must guard the domestic circle from every intrusion, and shun every thing that would wound the most delicate sensibility, or tend in the remotest manner to pollute the thought.

The father with the sons, and the mother with the daughters, and both in the presence of the whole, ought to guard the minds of their children by the most solemn admonitions from the word of God, and exhibitions of the fatal effect of this sin, and all its approaches which tend to deprave the feelings. It ought to be presented as a subject that should only be named when occasion requires; as a familiarity with vice is ever to be avoided as dangerous, nor will it be necessary for parents frequently to recur to the subject, if their own example and deportment is correct; of course, without this, precept will be mockery.

That the members of a family remember, as a means of keeping themselvess aloof from impure conversation, that which has already been alluded to, that the subjects of such conversation, are also the members of some family circle, and that their respectability, their peace and honor, ought to be as dear to them as is that of the members of the circle to which they themselves are attached. Fathers, and brothers, before you indulge in impure conversation, carry yourselves to your own beloved home, and contemplate the several members of that hallowed circle, and thus decide how you should act. As a rule of easy application to the young of both sexes, I would suggest, that they never allow in themselves, or companions, what would not be proper to be spoken at their father's table.

I might have classed physicians among the list of those whose influence can be felt for good or ill in this cause, and certainly there are few, if any, who can effect so much. To them, this subject, in a very peculiar manner, must ever commend itself, and they, of all others, are by every consideration bound to respond to the claims of society, by taking a decided stand.

"Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart, be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength, and redeemer!" ought to be the prayer of every rational being; to it his conduct ought to comport; but all may assuredly know, that if they persist in following their pernicious practices, God will bring them into judgment, and their conduct, with all its consequences, will be fully revealed before the judgment seat of Christ. W. D. C.

Religious Department.

From the New York Evangelist.

A PARABLE.

BY MRS. H. BEECHER STOWE.

There once lived in a certain city, two brothers, who dwelt in houses adjoining each other; and in point of family and worldly circumstances, were in all respects equal. Their father had brought them up and educated them by years of effort and self-denial; and at a great pecuniary sacrifice to himself, had established them in life. The world had prospered with them—they had grown rich, and were enabled to gather around them all the delicacies and luxuries of life. By the same mail, a letter came to each of them, stating that their father's business had come to a crisis, when, unless he received prompt assistance from his children, it would be involved in utter ruin.

Before the receipt of these letters, the brothers had been planning together certain alterations and improvements in their dwellings—the laying out of certain grounds, and the purchasing of various ornamental and convenient articles for their establishment. But upon the arrival of this letter, the younger brother immediately put a stop to all these arrangements, and wrote to his father as follows:

"All that I have, dearest father, is at your disposal. I only wait to be told what is necessary to be done: and it shall be done to the utmost extent of all I have or am. Every thing I possess was given by you, and to your hands I am willing to return it, and to employ it hereafter under your direction; for when all is given, it can never repay what I owe you." And after this, when urged by his family and friends to any particular mode of employing money, his reply was, "I must first hear from my father, and then see what I can spare."

The elder brother on receiving the letter, after a great deal of thinking and disturbance of mind, wrote as follows:

"My dear father, I received your letter, and shall try to do all that ought reasonably to be expected of me, in reference to it; though unfortunately, I can not at present say what it will be. My family expenses are very great, and I have in addition to these, began some rather expensive operations but as soon as I shall see what I can spare, you may rest assured I will do all I am able."

"How very unfortunate this emergency is,' said the elder brother to the younger, the first time they met after receiving this intelligence. I find it very hard to determine what the path of duty is in this case."

"Difficult!" replied the other, opening his eyes with surprise, "to me there seems but one way about it."

"Have you then made up your mind as to what you shall be able to do?" replied the elder brother.

"Yes," said the younger, "I have put my whole property into my father's hands, to be employed as he thinks best."

"Oh, brother! this is going a little too far—this is ultra and excessive. You know of course you must have something for yourself and family."

"Well," replied the younger, "my father knows that as well as I do. I am willing to leave it to him what I shall give, and live on what is left."

"But if his liabilities are so great as might be inferred from his letter, such a course might leave you little enough to live on."

"And will it be less than he had to live on, all those long years when he was struggling with poverty, and denying himself almost the common comforts of life for our support and education?" replied the other. "Surely, it is not for us to be more afraid of poverty for his sake, than he was for ours."

Here the conversation terminated abruptly: the elder brother as he left, soliloquising, "I wonder if it will be generally thought I ought to pursue the same course with my brother in this matter? He is so enthusiastic in all his notions! I am sure I am ready to do every thing that is my duty, if I can only determine what that duty is."

We suppose that every one at all familiar with the religious movement in our day, can discern something of the application of the above, although as in all cases between divine and human things, there are points of difference.

The Christian has a Father, who, through years of toil and self-denial, may, with the sacrifice of his own life, bought for him every earthly and eternal good. It is true, that now that Father is above want and danger of change: but he has left a cause in this world, in which every feeling of his heart is absorbed: and he left it to the efforts of his children, as really as if he did not hold in his hand almighty resources.—There is now an emergency of life and death in this cause: the questions seem to be one of extreme effort, or of entire ruin.

There are also two classes of professing Christians, who may be fitly represented by the two brothers in this story. There is one class, on whose ear the story of these wants of the church, and the consequent appeal for aid, fall like a heavy and unwelcome message. The demand for religious charity strikes them as somewhat alarming—the claims are becoming so vast, the field so wide, they "don't see where it will end." They have their plans and schemes of worldly interest and pleasure—there is a certain style of life, dress, equipage, &c., &c., which must be secured at all events in the first place; and when these are attended to, they mean to give in religious charity, "what they can spare." When the news they hear becomes startling, and the claims more urgent, then they are full of perplexity and alarm; they hear what this and that person in their own station in life are doing, and they wonder "whether as much be expected of them—whether it is their duty to do more," and so on.

But the other class have given themselves heart and soul, mind, body, and estate, to the Lord Jesus, with a full knowledge of all that is involved in such a consecration. There is a perfect understanding between them and their Savior, that FIRST, and before all things else, his cause is to be supported by them, and all that is theirs, and they allow to their own personal interests only what they can do in consistency with this. With them, the work of religious charity is all smooth and easy.

If, then, a Christian find himself constantly perplexed to know what he shall do in this emergency of his Father's cause, let him ask himself, is there not some deficiency in his inmost spirit? When called on to make his appropriations, and to settle the respective claims of personal and benevolent expenditure, let him be able to look up to his Savior, and say with a full heart, "Thou knowest, O Lord! that I count nothing as my own. The cause has the first and deepest place in my heart. I only wait to know thy will, with respect to the employment of every thing that thou hast given. Only direct by thy Providence, and I will shrink from no effort or sacrifice—for no sacrifice can be greater than thine for me!"

Would not such a spirit make the decision of many cases of conscience extremely easy?

THE FORLORN HOPE.

The following forcible illustration was used by Elder Knapp in a farewell sermon:

Some years ago there was a vessel stranded on the shores of Scotland, and as she was tossing and heaving in the howling tempest, and becoming a perfect wreck, hundreds of people collected on the beach, gazing upon the noble ship as she was heaved and tossed by the roaring billows; presently the poor sufferers on board saw, to their amazement, that they were throwing bomb-shells at the ship, and they wondered that they could be so inhuman as to undertake to kill them off with bomb-shells, but soon one reached the deck, and to their joy and surprise, they found a rope attached to it, and one end made fast to a tree on shore; and they made the other end fast to the top of the main-mast, and then making fast another rope to the deck, which was sent to them in the same way, they let down the life-boat, took hold of the rope, and in that way pulled themselves over the raging billows, till they were safely landed on shore. Now, why is it that sinners are so opposed to have truth presented in such a manner, as they will feel its force, and yield themselves up to its convictions, though it be clothed in a manner not the most pleasing to the carnal heart? I have used that language in my discourses, and those figures, which I considered the best adapted to carry the truth home to their consciences; and will you disregard the truths of the living God on account of the shell that contains them? The dreadful tempest is raging around you, and the ship, fitted up by the great Builder of the world, and designed to bear your immortal spirit into the harbor of eternal felicity, is liable every moment to be dashed on the dark mountains of death, and the cargo, which cost the Captain of your salvation his life, is in danger of being swallowed up in the fiery billows that roll around you. And when I see MY MASTER'S vessel, with the priceless cargo on board, liable to be ingulphed in the abyss of sin, I must obey my commission, and cry out, 'Ship ahoy! there are breakers ahead!'—"Trim sail!" and "lay" for the star of Bethlehem; "reef the topsail" of vanity—"take in the mainsail of sin, and lay "hard to" the promised land, or you will be dashed eternally on the rocks of Atheism and Infidelity. This, sinner, is what I am commissioned to do, and I am not at liberty to to turn to the right hand or to the left, till I have by some means arrested your attention, and made you sensible of imminent danger. I must do it, though for the time you may deride, and persecute, and laugh me to scorn; it is no worse treatment than my Master received when on earth; it is no worse than you treat him now; and "the servant is not greater than his Lord;' (John xiv. 20,) "nor he that is sent, greater than he that sent him." Now, because we have thrown some bombshells, by which you might catch hold of the silken cords of love that God is extending to you, and thus be drawn from this tempest-tossed world of sin to heaven, you say we are treating you very ill and uncivil, while we are seeking your eternal salvation.—Boston Courier.

From the Southern Christian Advocate.

The Re-union of the Pious in Heaven.—On brief and fast-rolling billows speeds the tide of time. The companions of our youth, the friends of our sterner manhood, our father's brothers—where are they? In the dust of the earth sleeps all that was mortal of them. In the ruins of the grave lie the loved ones of the former years; and the memorials of them, save what is garnered up in the memory of friendship, is well-nigh perished. We ask ourselves the question—has the light of that clear intellect gone out for ever? the warmth of that cordial heart become extinct? the activities of that mighty energy sunk into eternal stillness? Have we lost our friends? Have they fallen from our arms into the remorseless tomb, the victims of a ruin that shall know no termination? Alas for us were this the case.

On the contrary, the "sure word of prophecy" tells us in terms that cannot mislead, that from the dust and darkness and dishonors of the grave, our friends who have died "in the Lord" shall come forth. It spreads out the prospect of a blissful eternity, all radiant with the smiles of God, and bids us look forward to re-union there, with the dearly beloved and the lost on earth.—In blessed companionship on the path of endless life, in the career of progressive and boundless improvement and happiness, the toils of earth, the conflicts of the battle field and the labor of the journey, shall all be recounted. The narrow defile has been safely passed. The sweet everlasting home above, has been gained. A common triumph has been won. And there, stripped of the last jealousy and infirmity of the present life, that communion of spirit which has grown up out of spiritual affinities, and been nursed by common sympathies and sufferings, and has leaned on Christ for support through the storms of a common trial-time on earth, shall be completed and perpetuated eternally in their Father's house above.

May we not well say, with the eloquent Hall; "To that state, all the pious on earth are tending; and if there is a law from whose operations none are exempt, which irresistibly conveys their bodies to darkness and to dust, there is another, not less certain or less powerful, which conducts their spirits to the abodes of bliss—the bosom of their Father and God. The wheels of nature are not made to roll backward; every thing presses on towards eternity; from the birth of time an impetuous current has set in, which bears all the sons of men to that interminable ocean. Meanwhile, heaven is attracting to itself whatever is congenial to its nature, is enriching itself by the spoils of earth, and collecting within its capacious bosom whatever is pure, permanent and divine."

The Glorious Fulness of Christ.—If the Lord Jesus Christ were not glorious in himself—strip him of the light he dwells in, silence the praises of heaven, remove far away the ten thousand adoring spirits who worship at his footstool, veil him once again in the body of humiliation—yet this one fact, that all blessedness which sinners ever knew has sprung from him, lays the believer at his feet in adoration and wonder. We esteem him rich, who after supplying his own wants, has still wherewith to relieve the wants of others; we call him great, who has preserved a nation; but here are riches that have blessed unnumbered millions for ever, and a power that has saved a world. It is this, which causes the Church below to glory in nothing save the Redeemer's cross; it is this, which the Church above takes as the subject of its loudest praise. It was the prospect of this glory, that enabled Christ himself to "endure the cross, and despise the shame;" it is the enjoyment of this, which now fills and satisfies his soul. And when the Son of man, at the last great day, shall "sit on the throne of his glory," what is it that will make him so glorious there? the hosts of mighty angels around him? an assembled world at his feet? the melting away before his presence of the earth he suffered on, and of the sun which beheld his reproach? No; the salvation of the lost. "He shall appear to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe."—Rev. C. Bradley.

Children's Department.

"O, HOW IT STINGS!"

Story of little Lollotte.

Once, as I was returning home from France, there was on board the ship a little French girl, named Lollotte. She had five fingers on each hand.

We were all very much interested in little Lollotte; but one reason was, she was the most disobedient child we ever knew. She gave her mother constant trouble, and would not mind any thing she told her.

One day we saw, close to the ship, a Portuguese man-of-war. This is a kind of fish that can sail on the top of the water. It looks, in shape, as an egg would floating, only it is about three times as long. It has a little sail stretching over the top, and long strings of various colors, hanging down from the bottom in the water. One of the ladies wished to examine this curious little creature. So a sailor let down a bucket and caught it. When it was laid on the deck, all the passengers gathered round to see it; and little Lollotte broke away from her mother's hand, and ran close up to it. Her mother cried to her not to touch it; and the sailor said, "No, no, don't touch it, for it will sting." Hardly had this disobedient child heard the warning before her hand was upon it. In an instant her cries of agony filled the ship. "O, how it stings! O, how it stings!" For a long hour every ear was pained with her distressing cries, "O, how it stings! O, how it stings!" And there was not one on board who pitied her. All felt that she deserved it all for her disobedience.

My young friends, sin will at last bite like a serpent, and sting like an adder.—You may disobey your parents, be unkind to one another, and use wicked words, but by-and-by you will cry, "Oh, how it stings! O, how it stings!"

Will not each of you, my young friends, offer the prayer of David, "Remember not the sins of my youth," and come and make the Saviour your friend?—G. Abbott.

A WONDERFUL INSTRUMENT.

I suppose some of you will be very much astonished when I tell you that every little boy and girl carries about with them one of the most wonderful musical instruments in the world. It is so curiously constructed that the most skillful men that have ever lived, have never been able to make an instrument that could produce such delightful music. In a little child, it is very small and weak; and what is very remarkable, every body can use it, and the more and longer it is used, the sweeter and better it becomes.

"But how can this be? I think the editor must be telling us a fairy tale, for I never saw a little boy or girl with such an instrument," says Master Inquisitive.

"No, I reckon not," says Master Thoughtful; "he means our throat, for you know that we can all make a great many sounds, and some of them are very sweet."

"Yes, you are right, Master T. The instrument I speak of lies in the upper part of the throat. It is about two inches long, and an inch through, and with it we can make thousands of different sounds.—Some persons have brought it to such perfection that they could get a thousand dollars for a single night.

"Some of you would feel very happy if your father would buy you a piano, with which you could make less than a hundred tones. This would cost a great deal of money; and, besides this, you could not carry it about with you. But the other instrument you can use at home or abroad, as you go to school, or as you return. Besides this, it hardly ever gets out of tune. If you once learn, you can never forget how to use it. Now if you have not, will you not at once commence learning to sing. It will add greatly to your happiness in this life; and what is better, if you are wise and good here, you will join a great company of saints and angels in singing some of the sweetest songs through a long eternity. Thus may it be with each of you.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, June 29, 1842.

The sickness of our foreman has delayed our paper beyond our usual time of publication this week.

7th Command.

We publish an article this week with the above caption. We hope it may be read. Much prominency is given to this command in the scripture. To us there seems to be a peculiar beauty in the arrangement of the second table of the law. It is left with God alone to judge between moral evils, as he alone knows their true nature. Man transcends his limits when he speaks of one law of God as being greater than another in its obligations on men. Each command of the Decalogue comes with all the authority of the great Jehovah, and he who violates the 10th, is equally culpable with him who violates the sixth, or any other' though men may think there is less crime in covetousness than murder. God has thrown divine authority first around those things that seem naturally to be most important. In the arrangement of the 2d table of the law, God has first required honor to parents; second, he forbids murder; third, he protects virtue; fourth, protects property; fifth, character; sixth, forbids covetousness. It would seem from this arrangement that a prominency was given by the spirit to the several things as they occur in order of arrangement. If this is true, then, God has given a prominency to virtue that our laws and public opinion refuse to give. Next to life is chastity placed. Of what comfort can life be when virtue is gone? What pleasure can there be in societies where the destroyer lurks for his prey? If a man is hung for murder, and imprisoned for theft, shall he escape due punishment who does worse than to steal, and robs what God has placed next valuable to life? God's law forbidding adultery is severely just, and every violation of it, whether in actions, "the words of the mouth," or "the thoughts of the heart," shall be followed by the displeasure of God, and certain punishment.

In many communities a most vitiated public sentiment prevails. The violator of the seventh command is cherished in the bosom of society, from which, the violator of the sixth is hung, and the eighth incarcerated in prison. To cherish the licentious, is like cherishing the asp, or inhaling the infectious effluvia from the deadly Bohon Upas. Satan in his work of death, and destruction, has not so faithful an ally as the licentious man. Sustained by statute law and public opinion, and unopposed, he spreads ruin over the fair heritage of God; and with the recklessness of a demon incarnate, enters the domestic circle—the earthly paradise, and bids peace forever depart, and in its place leaves perpetual infamy and wretchedness. All that is lovely, all that is dear, all that is virtuous and heaven-born, falls a prey to the ruthless, soulless libertine, while innocence and virtue have no protection. Even the feeble efforts that are made to check this tide of death, are discountenanced by those professing love to God's law. Where shall innocence and virtue look for protection if it can not be found among the professed respectable? Shall the dolorous notes of wretchedness come in vain to the Christian's ear, and be met by the heartless rebuff, indelicacy! indelicacy!! Alas, for purity! alas, for the honor of God's law when the professedly virtuous are sunk so low as to submit without a word to the enemy most to be dreaded in the domestic circle, and to the darkest, foulest blot ever enstamped on human nature.

Br. Charles Card of Troupsburg, Steuben Co., writes under date of June 15:—

There is considerable excitement in the northwest part of that town on the subject of the Sabbath. During the last session of the Free-Will Baptist Quarterly Meeting, held in that town on the 10, and 11, inst., Eld. Samuel Rider, and Titus Giddings, a Licentiate, took letters of dismission, boldly declaring in favor of the 4th command. They are regarded as able ministers of the New Testament. Will Br. Card give us their post office address, as we wish to send them the Register.—There is much excitement in different parts of the country on this subject, and all that is needed to bring multitudes to the observance of God's Holy Sabbath, is for those who hold the truth to let it shine. The Eastern Association have their Sabbath missionary in the field, and the Central Association will have as soon as the necessary funds can be raised. God has committed to us the labor of extending a knowledge of his Sabbath to them who do not observe it. Let the heralds continually blow the trumpet of truth, and the baseless walls of a papal first-day Sabbath, will tumble, as did the walls of Jericho.

Eastern Association.

We have received a copy of the Eastern Association Minutes, from which we make some extracts. During the past year several churches enjoyed precious revivals; about 160 have been added during the year. The following extracts from church letters show the state of feeling in the several churches:—

PISCATAWAY.—A time of peace, though not of special revival. Rejoicing in God that there are those in the church, who, like Gideon's army, though faint, are yet pursuing.

2d HOPKINTON.—Have enjoyed many blessings the past year, especially that of a precious revival of God's work, and some additions.

PLAINFIELD, N. J.—Still in the enjoyment of that fellowship known only in the bands of the Gospel, yet occasion to mourn that there is not more action in the cause of the Redeemer.

1st HOPKINTON.—Blessing God for the union enjoyed in the church, and for the wonderful work He has wrought in causing the showers of divine grace to descend, awakening backsliders, and reclaiming sinners.

WATERFORD.—Some mercy drops have been felt, and additions made to this branch of Zion. Still a disposition to persevere, and an anxiety for the salvation of souls.

SALEM.—Many trials, but determined to exercise patience in following the example of Christ. Favored with some additions and not forsaken of the Lord.

WESTERLY.—Rejoicing that God has visited us in mercy, causing a number to be hopefully converted, and gathered into the Church, and having enlisted in the cause of the Redeemer, are determined through Christ to win Heaven.

PAWCATUCK.—Having enjoyed a season of merciful visitations, and a happy state of christian union, and spiritual prosperity during the past year.

"In perusing the letters of the several churches, we are sensibly affected with mingled emotions at the gracious dealings of God with his people.

"In view of our own condition we feel to humble ourselves before God, and rejoice in his goodness with a firm reliance in Him for our future success."

The following resolutions were presented by a committee on resolutions, and discussed by several brethren and adopted:—

Resolved, That Sabbath Schools for the instruction of children in the truths of the bible, should be fostered and sustained by all the churches, and all the members thereof, especially ministers, deacons, fathers, mothers and guardians.

Resolved, That we will open a correspondence with those Christians of Asia, who, it is believed, do now observe the Sabbath of the fourth commandment, and have continued to do so ever since the days of the Apostles.

Resolved, That we will afford the General Agent of the Tract Society, our contributions, to enable him to publish the series of Sabbath Tracts now in preparation, being convinced that they will be highly useful, not only in general, but particularly so in connection with the mission above mentioned.

Resolved, That it is indispensible that our representation in the General Conference, should be enlarged for the more efficient transaction of the business of that body, and of the Missionary, Tract, and other general Societies.

Resolved, That the cause of education claims our especial attention, both as it relates to our prosperity at home, and in view of a foreign mission together with mission to the Hebrews.

A good degree of Missionary zeal was manifest, as will appear from the following report, which was adopted. We ardently hope that the new zeal which shows itself in different parts will be fostered, and increase till our whole denomination shall possess that expansive benevolence which characterized primitive Christians.

"First, that the A. S. D. B. Missionary Society has high and sacred claims upon us as a people professedly devoted to the cause of God. In order to the accomplishment of the great object which this Society is designed to promote, it is important that we should be alive to the subject, and put forth every possible effort to increase the funds of the Society, and bestow such attention to ALL ITS INTERESTS, as will create confidence, and enlist the energies of the friends of Missions. The members of the Society cannot be too deeply sensible of their obligation to attend its meetings as far as practicable.—Full and faithful reports from all its Agents should be made, that the true state of the Society may be known. Your Committee are of the opinion that more time should be allowed for the transaction of the business of the Society on its anniversary seasons; and that the want of prompt attention to the meetings of the Society, on the part of its members, and the want of sufficient time during the more seasonable periods of our anniversary conventions, are among the principal embarrassments that have limited its operations heretofore. The cheering intelligence from Br. Scott, the Society's present Missionary, and from Br. Griswold, the Society's present traveling Agent, together with the apparent increase of the Missionary spirit among us, are encouraging indications. Action, efficient action, is what is wanted. There is an increasing demand for Missionary labors.—The Macedonian cry comes to us from every quarter. Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Wiskonsan, and the far west, are stretching out their hands to us, and shall they plead in vain? Let the friends of Missions frame an answer.

"We would also commend to the churches of, and in the bounds of the Association, the claims of the Sabbath Mission recently entered upon by the churches in Rhode Island. This mission appears to have been intimately connected with the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon these churches. If God favor the enterprise it must succeed. If not, it will come to nought.

"From various sources of information we are led to believe that there are communities of Christians in Asia who observe the Sabbath of the Bible. We would suggest the propriety of opening a correspondence with them, with the view of ascertaining more definitely their numbers, locality, doctrinal views, &c. &c."

For the Register.

MR. EDITOR,—I believe it is the practice of some of our Churches to admit the sisters to participate in the discipline of the Church, thus vesting them with authority over the man. It is also the practice of other of our churches to deny them this privilege; one or the other practice must be wrong, and believing that no one of our Churches would willingly practice error, and as the scriptures of truth are the only guide in this matter, but to direct us in our behavior in the house of God; it would have a tendency to advance the cause of truth if one or more of our Brethren would give their views on this subject through the columns of your valuable paper, (the Register,) that light and truth may spread far and wide.

A SEVENTH DAY BAPTIST.

We were not aware that but very few of our Churches admitted the sisters to participate in the discipline of the church.—This practice is commonly discarded as unscriptural. 1 Cor. xiv. 34, 35, is supposed to refer to this matter. Will not some of our Disciplinarians give us, as requested, the scriptural view of the subject.—ED.

For the Register.

BR. BAILEY,—Allow me to express, through your paper, to Br. N. V. Hull, and the friends of the Sabbath generally, the satisfaction I felt in noticing the prompt resolution of the Clarence Church in response to my "appeal to the friends of the Sabbath," and the more so, as by the dolorous reports from all points, of "Hard Times," "No Money," and consequent inability to meet obligations already incurred. I had been almost led to believe that our brethren of the west would not feel it a duty to contribute ought in their penury to sustain what may be called by us, who are unused to such things, an extraordinary effort to bring before the church of Christ one of the plainest and most conservative truths of the Bible—one, too, the ignorance of which causes Christians generally to cast a stigma upon us as narrow-minded sectaries, scismatics, etc.—one whose general perversion taxes us as a community, by its restrictions, thousands of dollars annually, circumscribes the usefulness of our ministry, and does more to sustain papacy, make antinomians, and delay the conversion of the Jews, and its kindred evils, than, perhaps, every thing else combined—an evil whose effects in the moral world are but little exagerated in the famous fable of Pandora's box—the very thing, doubtless, to which the prophet Daniel, (vii. 25,) alludes in his description of anti-Christ as THE VERY CONSUMMATION OF WICKEDNESS, "He shall attempt to change the [the holy] times and [moral] laws"—an act without which they never could have attained an existence, and without the support of which they must cease to exist.

This is the first response from the churches at the west, and coming in the right spirit as it does, it encourages me in the belief that our Brethren can not be so lost by any pecuniary embarrassment as to entirely neglect the best interests of the gospel—that which in this dark hour seems to give us the only ray of light and encouragement for the future. Our brethren can not complain very generally, I believe, of the amount of [illegible] which they have paid for the defence and promulgation of our views through the aid of the press. We have judged, and not without much cause, that the ear of the Christian world was shut to our views, and we have, therefore, remained in silence, while wild and extravagant scisms have taken deep root and become formidable.

The Seventh-Day Baptists have existed in this country at least 175 years, and in England from a time "when the memory of man runneth not to the contrary," and yet how few have been the appeals to the PRESS to vindicate the truths committed to our keeping! In England, two treatises by the Bampfields, a volume of Tracts by Cornthwait, the treatise of Carlow, and the late work of Burnside, comprise the whole catalogue, I believe, and each of these a whole generation apart, occupying about 200 years in the whole, and but a single Edition of each! And in this country, a reprint of two of them, with some half dozen pamphlets, and a volume of magazines, circulated principally, if not entirely among our own people, fill up one catalogue until the establishment of the Sentinel Press some 10 or 12 years ago; and yet, because the advocates of the papal Sabbath have been able to withstand such a formidable attack, we have retreated to the mountains and bye places, contenting ourselves in far too many instances with an informal observance of the day of the holy Sabbath, or in defending it before our own people by the perishable word of an humble minister.

Would we be respected ourselves, or have our distinguishing truths regarded, we must be known; and in this period of the 19th century, as possessing, at least, a moderate share of evangelical enterprise, we have too long remained inactive, and are feeling its withering influence continually in the apostacy of our Brethren, in the desertion of our friends and relatives, and in the prejudice others have formed against us in consequence of it. Let us, then, at once come from our mountains and hiding places, and, as our Brethren of the Eastern Association say, at their last anniversary, "Let us descend into the valley united, and there let us conquer or die."

I know that many in this season of general embarrassment and distress, will be unable to contribute sufficient to meet their own desires; but we have brethren who might without difficulty give sums from $25 to $100, and doubtless even then make it a matter of pecuniary advantage. If we would but act up to our faith, and yield to God the first fruits of our increase—strive to build up Zion as our first and principal duty, and let the cares for to-morrow come with to-morrow, as our Lord directed—("sufficient for the day is the evil thereof")—we might count upon many such Brethren. We should see not only the "tenth," which was formerly demanded for the Lord by law, yielded in love, but like one of olden time learn that there is "a giving that doth not impoverish," and "a withholding that doth not enrich."

If there ever was a time when the "signs of the times" encouraged us to an effort to defend the LAW of our God, it is the present; and I trust that there are but few of our Brethren or Sisters that have it in their heart to withhold the small pittance that it would require from each to make the sum proposed, but that they are only waiting for some one to lead in the enterprise; meanwhile, Time is winging its onward flight, and will soon be offering to others the duties, and their blessings which he now offers to us.

But I am trespassing upon your patience. I will only say, that in consequence of the urgent demand for some of the Tracts, I have determined to put No. 1 in press immediately, and from the want of funds, I fear I shall be obliged to deviate some from the course proposed in the Appeal; nevertheless, I hope to be able to have the Series all published before Conference, but that will depend much upon the prompt action of the friends of the Society.

Affectionately yours in the gospel,
PAUL STILLMAN, Ag't. T. Soc.
New York, June 19.

"Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God."

Missionary Department.

For the Register.

DEAR BROTHER—My last closed with my arrival at Waterford, Conn.

May 1. During the first part of this week I called upon the brethren of this church, and received of them their very liberal donations for the cause of missions. Although few in numbers, yet they appear strong in faith, being cemented by love to God and to each other. This church enjoyed a precious revival last winter.

4. Called upon our brethren in New London. Found them steadfast in the faith, boldly endeavoring to keep the banner of truth floating on the breeze, which was manifested by their liberality. By the politeness of our brethren visited Fort Griswold, opposite New London, which was the scene of that cold blooded massacre perpetrated by that inhuman traitor, Benedict Arnold.—A monument is erected on the spot in memory of those who fell in defense of their liberty. Fell, did I say? Murdered, butchered, by demons incarnate! This monument is built of granite, being 123 feet high, 26 feet square at the base, and 12 at the top, having a flight of 168 steps to ascend.—From one of the survivors, I learned that after the battle, 70 corpses were laid side by side, all having been entirely stripped of their clothing. In the whole 84 persons were murdered. Liberty, what hast thou cost? Blood, even the blood of the noblest work of God. Yet the liberty of heaven cost the blood of the Son of God.

5. Journeyed to Mystic, a beautiful village on a river of the same name. Here I found several families of our denomination, keeping the Sabbath. Being ship-carpenters, I enquired whether they did not suffer pecuniary loss in consequence of their keeping the Sabbath. None at all, was their reply; but the reverse. The brethren are elegantly situated on the bank of the Mystic, and are in opulent circumstances. Also, they are piously devoted to the cause of religion, which was manifested by their very liberal contributions. Here is a fine location for our brethren to settle.

6. Arrived at Pawcatuck, R. I., and put up at Dea. Wm. Stillman's.

7. Sabbath; preached at our church there twice, and presented my Agency.—Preached again on third day evening, and made a collection for the mission. Much interest appears here in the cause of truth.

13. Sixth day; preached at the 4th church in Hopkinton, situated at Yawghgough, it being a quarterly meeting of our churches in R. I. After sermon held a covenant meeting, when every brother and every sister spoke their feelings. A blessed time. I wish that those of our brethren who never speak for Christ at such seasons would come to Yawghgough, and hear these dear saints speak of the goodness of God. The Lord remove not this candlestick.

14. Sabbath; preached at the same place, and was followed by Elder Coon, after which the churches participated in the communion.

15. Meeting being continued, I preached, preceded by Elder Coon. Here is a field that ought to be occupied immediately.

17. Went to Providence to attend a Convention of Free-Will Baptists, hoping to get the subject of the Sabbath before that body, which we did. So much excitement on account of political trouble we thought best not to agitate the subject of the Sabbath.—On our return, called at Arnold's Bridge; found one or more converts to the Sabbath, being the result of Elder Lucius Crandall's Discourse on that subject there. It will be proper here to say, that the churches in Rhode-Island have held a Sabbath Convention, and it resulted in employing Elder Crandall and others to lecture on the subject of the Sabbath through the country.

19. Returned to Hopkinton, and put up at sister Stillman's, widow of Eld. Matthew Stillman, and was soon joined by Br. Crandall.

22. Sabbath; preached at the 2d Hopkinton church, followed by Br. Crandall.—Made known my business. Endeavored to collect funds during the week, but as the brethren are deeply engaged in sustaining their Sabbath Mission, I consequently did not meet with as much success as I otherwise should.

26. The Eastern Association of our churches convened at the 2d Hopkinton church. Introductory sermon by Eld. W. B. Gillett. During this and the next day the Association transacted their business.—Much harmony prevailed. During a recess of the Association, an adjourned meeting of the Sabbath Convention was held in which all took a deep interest. After hearing the report of Elders Campbell, Greene and Crandall, who had been employed, and who gave a very interesting account of their travels, the body took into consideration the propriety of continuing this mission; whereupon it was unanimously resolved, that, with the Divine blessing, the mission be prosecuted; when an Executive Committee was chosen to carry into effect the wishes of the Convention. May the Lord bless this effort, and open the eyes of the blind, and unstop the ears of the deaf. And shall not this example of our brethren here be followed by other churches? Brethren, let us pour the truth into the ears of the church until she will hear, and respond to the truth if she can. Zion is at ease, and will be, on this subject, until the war is carried into her camp. And shall this generation pass away, and this not be fulfilled?—God forbid. Br. Paul Stillman, Agent of the Tract Society, was also at the Association, earnestly beseeching his brethren not to forget his object. The brethren here think that the Tract cause should be sustained, and that the object of the Agent ought to be carried into immediate effect.—Brethren, shall we respond not only to the call of the Tract Agent, but shall it be said that Clarence, far away to the west, has given a challenge which none accepted?—No. Let Br. Hull blow the sabbatical trump from the shores of the Erie, and Br. Crandall sound the tocsin from the rising of the sun, while the reverberations are responded from each station along the line, and soon may we expect to see the citadel of error tottering from its foundation, and its multiform colored flag hauled to the ground, while the white banner of truth triumphantly floats over the ruins.

31. On account of the brethren engaging in the Sabbath Mission it was thought not best for me to press my Agency farther here, although a great interest is taken in the Missionary cause, and the friends have done, and are doing much for the maintainance of their Sabbath enterprise.

Amount of funds collected the last month, is $73.19; viz., Waterford $2[illegible].77; New London $5; Mystic $10,12; Pawcatuck $12,50; Yawghghough $2,80; 2d Hopkinton $4; Edmund Randolph $12, of which $10 is for becoming a Life Member; $1 interest; from J. Maxson $1 donation; Thos. Potter $1; Henry Clark $2,40 interest.

S. S. GRISWOLD Agent.
Hartford, Ct., June 8, 1842.

FOREIGN NEWS.

Correspondence of the Eve Post.

LONDON, May 31, 1842.

Attempt to Assassinate the Queen—Parliamentary Proceedings—Miscellaneous, &c.—Another attempt has been made to assassinate Queen Victoria. The facts of the case, when fished out of the perfect deluge of penny-a-line eloquence, which has occupied the public prints and drowned common sense for a season, appear to be briefly as follows: Her Majesty, on Monday, May 30th, took her usual drive in the parks, accompanied by Prince Albert, in an open barouche, when, on passing the spot where Oxford made his attempt, she was fired at by a young man. The perpetrator of this atrocious act was immediately secured, and her Majesty, without stopping, proceeded onward to Buckingham Palace.

The excitement created was immense. A hearty and spontaneous burst of feeling, expressive of joy at the Queen's escape, and of abhorrence and indignation at the cowardly and atrocious act, manifested itself in all quarters, and amongst all classes. On the news reaching the Commons, the House broke up almost immediately, the members being unfitted, by excitement, from going on with public business, and at the different theatres and public places, "God save the Queen," was sung most heartily, if not most harmoniously, by actors and audience combined.

A privy council was summoned the same night, and the delinquent underwent an examination, which was resumed on the following day, but, as the proceedings were strictly private, the result only is known, viz: the committal of the culprit to Newgate, to take his trial for the offense. It is to be hoped, however, that further investigation will satisfactorily show that he is not a morally or legally accountable being. If, however, it should prove otherwise, the caitiff will meet with universal abhorrence. At all events, the act is regarded as emanating from an isolated individual, and not the remotest idea exists of the fellow having accomplices.

The Queen is truly popular, and (independent of the natural feeling in her favor, as one of the softer sex,) has, by her conduct since her accession, "won golden opinions from all sorts of people." On her visit to the Italian Opera-house, on the succeeding evening, the languid exclusives were (marvellous to relate,) guilty of a perfect tumult of enthusiasm, and had her Majesty driven through St. Giles, the same effect would have been produced upon its denizens.

The name of the would-be assassin is John Francis, and he is the son of a Covent Garden scene shifter. The descriptions of him by the penny-a-liners, present some discrepancies. One journal states that he is "a young man of a sallow complexion, and prepossessing appearance," (quite the orthodox description for a lover or assassin,) whilst another states (oh death to every romantic hypothesis!) that he is "rather inclined to corpulency, and has a peculiar cast of the eye," thereby, probably meaning a squint. It is to be hoped that he has a peculiar cast of the brain, or most assuredly he will catch a peculiar cast of the neck.

It appears that on the previous day, (Sunday,) when the Queen was taking her drive in the Park, that the same man was seen, by a youth named Pearson, to present a pistol at her Majesty, but the pistol did not go off. Want of presence of mind, combined with a serious impediment in his speech, prevented Pearson from seizing or calling upon others to seize the man, who immediately made good his retreat. Pearson, however, acquainted an elder brother with the circumstance, and the parties waited upon Sir James Graham, the Home Secretary. Sir James, of course, apprised her Majesty, but, in reply to entreaties that she would not expose herself on the Monday, she replied, "I will not be confined a prisoner in my palace." and gave orders for the usual drive. Determined, however, that if there were risks, others should not suffer by the exercise of her self-will, she most considerately dispensed with the usual attendance of her ladies. This little anecdote developes something of the Elizabethian spirit, combined with the gentler characteristics of the sex. It evinced much of kind feeling and consideration. Should any one be inclined to detract from those traits by the supposition that the Queen's apprehensions of danger was small, let them recollect that she had been fired at once before. The nerves of many a tall fierce whiskered fellow, have been disturbed on slighter ground of suspicion.

The day after this second attempt, her Majesty again took her old drive, and was received with tremendous cheering, waving hats, handkerchiefs, and other loyal ebullitions by the assembled crowds.

Francis will be tried according to the common law forms, at the Central Criminal Court, which sits every month. Daniel Good was the last criminal hero, and now John Francis will step into his shoes.

INDIA.

The Times of June 3d, contains the following intelligence, received by extraordinary express:

The Indian mail, which arrived at Marseilles on Wednesday night, brings, we lament to say, an account of the fall of Ghuznee. The palace capitulated and surrendered, on condition that the garrison be safely conducted to Cabul. On the other hand Col. Pollock had forced the Khyber pass, and taken possession of the forts commanding it, and would, no doubt, march to the relief of Jellalabad. Gen. Sale, in a sortie from that place, overthrew the insurgents.

A rumor prevailed that Akber Khan had been badly wounded.

General Knott had gained some advantage on the side of Kandahar, but General England had not yet joined him. It is reported that Shah Soojah had been poisoned.

The fall of Ghuznee comes unexpectedly upon us, for, according to the accounts hitherto received, the fortress was well provisioned, and the garrison in good spirits, and sanguine of being able to hold out until the arrival of the liberating army, and the strength of the walls such as to be deemed impregnable against any attack from a rudely disciplined army without, which, even if supplied with a heavy artillery train, could have no skilled engineer efficers to render it effective. It must, therefore, notwithstanding the previous reports of ample provisions, have been reduced to surrender by famine. Let us hope that the brave, but unfortunate garrison have not been sacrificed to Affghan treachery, like the hapless army of Cabul, but that the capitulation will be faithfully observed. In the meantime the hour of retribution is drawing nigh. Colonel Pollock had gallantly forced the Khyber pass, and was doubtless in full march to the relief of the courageous band in position at Jellalabad, under the orders of the intrepid Sale, who, nothing daunted by the disasters of Cabul, had again chastised the foes by whom surrounded.

News of the Day.

"Dead People Live Here."—In Mackenzie's "Second Campaign in China," he thus describes a remarkable suburb of Canton:

"One suburb of the city deserves particular mention; being, in the literal acceptation of the term, a city of the dead. It consisted of a well-built town, which was apparently not inhabited by living beings, but devoted entirely to the tenants of the tomb. The front of the houses was appropriated to the worship of Joss, while the back part was divided into several small chambers, each containing several coffins, arranged on elevated platforms, and surrounded with incense burners. The outside of these chambers was tastefully ornamented with beautiful creeping plants; while over the doorway were generally inscribed some Chinese characters. The coffins were very thick, and made of camphor wood; and, when opened, contained embalmed bodies in the highest preservation. Each "tenant of his narrow bed." being attired in his best clothes, presented no unpleasing image of our long sleep.—One coffin, in particular, contained a mandarin, dressed in full uniform, with rich satin robes and cap, and button, denoting the rank of the deceased; one hand held a fan, and the other a Chinese chop, perchance a letter to Charon; while some money was arranged on his breast, in the form of a cross, intended, no doubt, as a fee for the boatman. The Chinese are, I believe, very particular in paying respect to the memory of their ancestors, which may, in some degree, account for the extreme neatness of this immense mausoleum."

Gale on Lake Michigan.—We learn from Mr. Adams, of the Illinois, which left Chicago on Thursday last, that a furious gale prevailed upon Lake Michigan on Friday last, from which it is feared much damage has been sustained. The Illinois rode out the gale in safety at Milwaukie, but a gentleman who crossed the peninsula from Chicago, and took the Illinois at Detroit, says the new brig Richmond, Dorchester, master, and schr. Indiana, Capt. Dorr, went ashore somewhere between Michigan city and the former port. Both of these vessels have full cargoes of grain, and consigned here we believe.

The steamer Chesapeake was near Chicago when overtaken by the gale, and encountered the worst of it. On entering that port she ran foul of the pier, carrying away her wheel house, and injuring her wheels somewhat, but finally got in.

These are the only items we are able to gather. The next boat will probably bring us particulars.—Buffalo Commercial Advertiser, June 15.

Fatal Casualty.—A laboring man named William Link, met with a sudden and awful death at Valatie, on Monday night, by falling down the steep precipice between the bridge and Beaver Mill, a distance of about twenty feet, on the rocks beneath.—The deceased was of irregular habits, and it is supposed that he stumbled into eternity while in a state of intoxication.—Kinderhook Sentinel.

A Veteran Editor.—Mr. George Goodwin, of Hartford, (formerly one of the firm of Hudson and Goodwin, many years proprietors and publishers of the Connecticut Courant,) now ninety-four years of age, walks to the printing office daily, and sets his paragraphs in type, to gratify a long established habit.

The Australian Chronicle mentions the martyrdom of a Catholic Missionary, Father Chanel, by the natives of the Wallis Islands. He was barbarously murdered with spears and clubs, by a party of savage zealots, who were incensed that he had converted the King's son.

Business is so utterly prostrated in Mobile, that stores in the principal business street which cost $30,000, can be rented for the taxes.

The Cincinnati Republican states that one cultivator of strawberries in the vicinity of that city has sent to market during the present season, from two acres of ground, four hundred bushels of this delightful fruit, which paid him eight hundred dollars.

Charles Albert, King of Piedmont, a province of Sardinia, has ordered the expulsion of the Israelites from the city of Savonia, on three days notice, and the collecting of them in one of the dirtiest streets of Genoa. Charles is behind the age of enlightenment and liberality.

Col. Young, the Superintendent of Common Schools of New York, has issued an order that all library money in the hands of trustees of school districts must be expended on or before the first day of Sept. next; and after the present season, on or before the first day of July in each year.

The Grand Jury of Saratoga county, N. Y., came into court the other day, without having had a single complaint laid before them.

Two soldiers were recently drowned near Fort Gibson. They were swimming their horses, when one fell off, and his horse struck him with his fore foot. Another swam to his assistance, when the drowning man caught the other, and caused both to sink to the bottom.

Messrs. Catherwood and Stevens have returned from Central America, and have brought home with them quite a menagerie of mules, hogs spotted and streaked, monkeys, and several new species of birds.

There are now located at the Sandwich Islands, as many as six hundred Americans, which is more than the aggregate of all the foreigners. They are said to hold property to the amount of a million of dollars. Besides this, a large amount of American property is constantly at the Islands, connected with the whale fishery. In 1840, upwards of $4,000,000 of American property touched at Taheite, in the Society Islands.

The Oregon expedition, consisting of 56 men, 14 women, and 39 children, met at the place of rendezvous, near the boundary line of Missouri, on the 16th ult., and started out upon their perilous journey on the 17th. They expect to reach the Columbia river by the 1st of October.

A letter from Cairo states that the Pacha of Egypt, with a view of putting down the slave-trade, has laid a heavy tax upon the sale of slaves in his dominions, this being the only way in which he can attack the traffic, as it is tolerated by the Mahometan religion, and vindicated by the Ulemas.

Thirty-four new Temperance papers have been commenced within a few months past, and all abound with the cheering and glorious conquests of the Temperance Reformation now progressing in our world.

The Kingston, U. C., Chronicle says that a very extensive emigration has taken place this season from the U. States to Canada, of persons natives of Great Britain, but who had resided for some years in this country.

The N. E. Boundary Commissioners from Maine, Massachusetts, and New Brunswick have all arrived at Washington, and opened negotiations with Lord Ashburton.

The Episcopal church in this country numbers now 20 bishops, 1,200 clergymen, 1,000 churches, and over 600,000 members. The first Episcopal minister ordained in this country still survives, and is 91 years of age.

Smuggling has been carried on pretty extensively, of late, over the Canada lines. Entire packages of printed goods may be obtained at Troy at 20 per cent. less than cost of regular importations.

Catholics not past Hope.—While Professor Monod was on his late mission in the south of France, Catholics flocked together in crowds to attend his preaching. They went so far as to beg the Protestants, on more than one occasion, not to go to church themselves, but to leave to them their pews and benches, adding, "you can have your preacher every day, but we have never been told such things before." They present an immense field for the labors of evangelical ministers, and it is proposed to augment the numbers without delay.

Theological Seminaries.—According to the American Almanac for 1842, there are in the United States 39 Protestant Theological Seminaries, of which 5 are Congregational, 1 Unitarian, 8 Baptist, 3 Episcopal, 12 Presbyterian, 4 Lutheran, 1 Associate Reform, [Scotch Presbyterian,] 1 Dutch Reformed, 1 German Reformed, and 1 Associate Church, [a branch of the Presbyterian.] To this list might be added the Methodist Seminary at Newbury, Vt., which has a theological department, and the Free-Will Seminary at Parsonsfield, Maine.—About 1,400 students are in attendance upon the different seminaries enumerated in the Almanac.

From Buenos Ayres.—The following letter is from the correspondent of the N. York American;

BUENOS AYRES, 2d May.

I wrote to you very recently giving you an account of horrors which have been committed in this city within the last month.

The life of a human being here, if he have the misfortune to belong to the Unitarian party, is held to be of no more consequence than that of a dog; and so great is the hatred against them, that were it not for the fear of foreign interference, I verily believe the whole party would be annihilated by having those blood-hounds the Mazorquinas let loose upon them.

Since the 20th, the day after Gov. Rosas issued his order to put a stop to the assassinations, the city has been very quiet.—Several of those who took the liberty of assassinating their individual enemies—during the days of terror—have since been apprehended and shot within the hour they were taken.

One of these unauthorized assassins, by the name of Morcira, who boasted of having murdered at least half a dozen with his own hand, and of having stuck up the head of one of his victims in the public market place, decked out in blue ribbons, was last evening apprehended by the Chief of Police, and shot immediately by order of Gov. Rosas. He asked for two hours to settle his private affairs, and prepare for death; but the time was refused, and he was sent out of the world almost as expeditiously as he had sent so many of his victims before him. This wretch was adjutant of the 'Serenos,' or city guard, and thought his position would shield him from all responsibility, believing that a few murders, if they were only of 'Salvages Unitarios,' would be acceptable to Gov. Rosas; but as the Governor does not allow any thing of this kind to take place, except by his own order or authority, 'Senor Morcira' found himself hurried into another world, to account for sins he had just committed in this, more promptly than he anticipated.

Yesterday being a beautiful day, I rode out as far as the Quinta, where the Gov. spends his Sundays. I found him amusing himself with a mock trial of two country people, man and wife, both of whom had complained to the Governor; the husband that the wife had run away from him, and the wife that the husband had threatened to cut her throat. Advocates were appointed; one of the Governor's fools or jesters was appointed Judge, and the trial continued an hour or more, much to the amusement of the company; but the trembling pair thought it all serious.

They were finally sentenced to live together again, to love, honor, cherish and support each other, and the wife to obey her husband and take care of his children, &c.

When the Governor goes to his quinta, he throws off all official dignity, and amuses himself more like a boy than a man of his great power.

The United States sloop of war Decatur, Capt. Ogden, is here, to leave in a week for Montevideo and Rio Janeiro.

Every thing in the way of business is in the most depressed and gloomy condition. Governor Rosas appears now to be firmly settled in power, having overcome all his enemies. His last victory was over Lopez, who was completely defeated a week or ten days ago by Gen. Oribe, and almost all his army taken prisoners—Lopez himself escaped.

Notices.

NOTICE.

S. D. DELLAY takes this method of informing his friends and old customers that he has removed his stock of Goods to the Store of H. A. & F. C. DELLAY, where he is now able to offer them better inducements for trade, than he ever before has been, in terms of credit, prices, &c. &c. He would also say that he will be permanently there, and intends making De Ruyter a location for years in the mercantile business. He would further say that he has not failed as some of his friends have endeavored to convince the public. He will be glad to see his debtor as well as his creditor, being able and willing to satisfy each.

De Ruyter, March 28 1842. v3n5tf

PROPOSALS

For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead,) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

MARRIED.

In Verona, on the evening of the 24th ult., by Rev Charles M. Lewis, Mr. JACOB E. OVEROCKER, of New Hartford, and Miss SALLY B. PRATT, of Verona.

In Westerly, on the 19th inst., By Rev. Alex. Campbell, Mr. SAMUEL DAVIS, and Miss ELIZABETH A. WEST, all of Westerly.

DIED,

In this town, on the 24th inst., an infant son of Roswell W., and Caroline Richmond, aged 4 months.

In this town, on the 23d inst., Mrs. LYDIA, wife of Mr. Zenas Rider, aged 42 years.

In Berlin, on the 6th inst., Mrs. LUCINDA CARTWRIGHT, wife of Jonathan Cartwright.

In Berlin, on the 9th inst., Mr. LUKE G. HULL, in the 42d year of his age.

In the Berlin, on the 11th inst., Mrs. PALMYRA, wife of Abel J. Godfrey, and daughter of Wanton Greene aged 22 years.

In Preston, on the 12th inst., JEMIMA ROGERS, Widow of Jonathan Rogers, of Waterford Ct., in the 70th year of her age.

Sister Rogers was born in the State of Rhode Island, where, in early life she became a subject of grace and united with the 1st Seventh Day Baptist Church of Hopkinton, in said State. She removd to Preston, where she resided with her children, and became a member of the church. Her last illness, (which was consumption,) she bore with christian patience and resignation, giving to all a full evidence of the power of the gospel to sustain in an hour of affliction. She has left a large circle of relatives and friends to mourn her loss, and especially the church of Christ, who can realize that they have lost a sister whose precepts and examples we believe were in accordance with the principles of the gospel; yet fully believing that their loss is her eternal gain.

Even down to old age all my people shall prove,
Impartial, eternal, unchangeable love,
And when hoary hairs shall their temples adorn,
Like lambs they shall still in my bosom be born.

In Berlin, on the 21st of April last, after an illness of twenty days, Miss LOIS COON, aged 45 years.

Miss Coon was impressed with the importance of a personal interest in Christ in early life, but did not make a public profession of her faith until about 14 years since, at which time she was baptized and became a member of the S. D. B. Church in Petersburgh. She subsequently changed her membership to the first S. D. B. Church in Brookfield, of which church she remained a member until her death. During her professional life, she exhibited her faith in Jesus by her pious devotion to christian duties, and in her sickness, by her patience and resignation to her divine Master's will, she gave proof to all around her, that her treasure was laid up in heaven. Her surviving relatives have lost in her a friend much beloved, and the church a member who felt a deep interest in her prosperity.

LIST OF LETTERS.

W. P. Langworthy, O. H. Harris, (we do not discontinue papers till arrearages are paid.) Charles Card, Oran Vincent, "Mary." (next week.)

LIST OF RECEIPTS.

Of W. P. Langworthy, $2. cr. L. J. Coon, of Oran Vincent, $5, cr. Elijah Lewis, Nathan Greene, $2. each vol. 3 Silas Stillman, $1, vol. 3.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

PROSPECTUS OF THE FARM HOUSE OF THE XIX CENTURY, OR ENCYCLOPEDIA OF PRACTICAL AGRICULTURE, containing the best mode of culture adopted in France, England, Germany, and Flanders; full practical instructions to guide the small cultivator, the farmer, the director, and the large proprietor in the improvement of an estate; the general principle of agriculture, and the culture of all the useful plants; the training of domestic animals, and the veterinary art; the description of various arts relating to agriculture; rural implements and buildings; the management and improvement of vines, fruit trees, timber, and forests, tanks, etc.; the economy, organization, and direction of a rural establishment; and finally, legislation as applied to agriculture; closing with a table of contents alphabetically arranged; a list of figures, abbreviations, and authorities cited

An Elementary, Complete, and Methodical Course of Rural Economy, with more than Two Thousand Engravings, representing the various Implements, Machines, sets of Apparatus, Breeds of Animals, Trees, Shrubs, and Plants, Rural Buildings, etc. Digested and Revised by a Committee of Scientific and Practical Agriculturists, belonging to the Agricultural Society of France, under the direction of M. T. Bailey, Member of the Societies of Agriculture and Horticulture. Translated from the French, with Notes adapting it to the use of farmers in the United States of America, by Elizur Wright, jr., formerly Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in the Western Reserve College, Translator of La Fontaine's Fables, &c.

Agriculture is the foundation of all human arts—the art for which man was made, and the perfection of which is his chief happiness and glory as the lord temporal of this planet. Of this sublime art, all other arts and sciences are but satellites, their business being to wait on, enlighten, and adorn it with their moonshine. Consequently, no man more than the agriculturalist needs the full use of his brains, and a perfect command of all the treasures of human experience. So the farmer of the United States view the matter; and in presenting them with a translation of the celebrated Maison Rustique of the French, we have no doubt of their hearty support. It is the work of all works on practical agriculture; the most scientific, clear, and comprehensive. France has long excelled in profitable farming. This is the source of her wealth. England is rich by coals and commerce. Her agriculture is splendid, but sometimes costs more than it comes to. Those who have fortunes to spend may buy the vast works of Marshall, Dickson Arthor Young, Loudon, &c., but those who wish to get a fortune out of the soil will find the French writers better able to show them the way. The excellence of French elementary works is well known to all teachers. For centuries, the Maison Rustique has been, in France, the standard elementary work—the spelling book and grammar of farming. The present edition for "the nineteenth century," has been re-written and brought up with the "march of mind," by sixty of the ablest "agronomes" of France. It has all the light of the latest improvements, not only in France, but in all Europe.

William Cobbett, one of the most successful farmers both in England and America, who wrote the best English style and the best French grammar that ever was, valued the Maison Rustique, not only as an encyclopedia of farming, but as a means of educating his children. He was his own schoolmaster. In winter evenings his family resolved itself into a school, and he thus speaks of the use then made of this work:

"Our book of never failing resource was the French Maison Rustique, or Farm House, which, it is said, was the book that first tempted Dugnesnois (I think that was his name,) the famous physician in the reign of Louis XIV., to learn to read. Here are the four-legged animals, from the horse down to the mouse, portraits and all; all the birds, reptiles, insects; all the modes of rearing, managing, and using the tame ones, and destroying those that are mischievous; all the various traps, springs, nets; all the labors of the field and garden exhibited, as well as the rest, in plates; and there was I, in any leisure moments, to join this inquisitive group, to read the French, and tell them what it meaned in English, when the picture did not sufficiently explain itself. I never have been without a copy of this book for forty years, except during the time that I was fleeing from the dungeons of Castlereagh and Sidmouth, in 1817, and when I got to Long Island, the first book I bought was another Maison Rustique."—Advice to Young Men, Art. 129.

Of the qualifications of the translator, it may be said that he is a practical farmer, and in regard to his translation of La Fontaine, which has been reprinted in England, an English reviewer confesses that he "does not know the English writer who could have done it better."

TERMS.—The work will be published as a semi-monthly periodical, in numbers of 56 pages, octavo, each 25 cents, and when completed will contain forty numbers, at $10.

Five dollars paid in advance for the first 20 Numbers, shall entitle subscribers to the remaining 20 Numbers for four dollars.

Or, nine dollars in smaller sums, (if not less than $1.) regularly advanced during the course of publication, shall entitle the same reduction.

The 1st number will be issued on the 1st of July, 1842.

All orders and remittances should be addressed to S. S. HASKELL, Publisher, 138 Fulton-st. New York.

New York, June 1, 1842.

⁂ All editors who will give this prospectus fifteen insertions, and forward the papers containing them to the New York Watchman, shall be entitled to one copy of the work. 18w15

Notice.

ALL persons who are indebted to the subscriber, either in accounts or note, are requested to call and settle immediately and save cost.

De Ruyter, June 20, 1842.
JAMES M. LETTS.

FLOUR, PROVISIONS, GROCERIES, and six hundred other things, for sale by 11tf
May 11. HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

BOOTS! BOOTS! SHOES! SHOES!!!

AT the sign of the Mammoth Boot, manufactured invariably of leather tanned in "cold liquor." Please call.

NO IMPOSITION.

NO STATES PRISON WORK!

THOSE wishing to purchase BOOTS and SHOES of superior quality of custom work, will find just the place by calling at the sign of the MAMMOTH BOOT.

De Ruyter, May 20, 1842.

THE FARMER'S EXCHANGE is the place to buy Goods CHEAP. Oct. 20, 1841.
34tf S. G. WALKER.

L. W BLISS' Window Sash
" Bliss' & Co. " Blinds.
Holme's Sampson & Sailsbury Edged Tools consisting of Broad Axes, Hand Axes, Adzes an, Chisels, at Factory prices by J. N. ELMORE,
October 4. Manufacturers' Agent

BOOK BINDING.

THE subscriber having connected a BINDERY with his printing establishment, is now ready to execute all kinds of Binding in a neat and durable manner, on as reasonable terms as at any other establishment in this section of country.

JAMES BAILEY.

De Ruyter, June 8th 1841.

JOB PRINTING.

BOOKS, Pamphlets, Way, Hand-Bills, Cards Bills, &c. &c., neatly executed at this office.

☞IMPORTANT WORK!

NOW IN THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION,
A DICTIONARY OF
Arts, Manufactures, and Mines;
Containing a clear exposition of their
PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.
By ANDREW URE, M. D., F. R. S., M. G. S.,
M. A. S., Lond., Mem. Acad. N. S.
Philad., S. Ph. Soc N. Germ.
Hanov., Mulii, &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings

THIS is unquestionably the most popular work of the kind ever published, and a book most admirably adapted to the wants of all classes of the community. The following are the important objects which the learned author endeavors to accomplish:—

1st. To instruct the Manufacturer, Metallurgist, and Tradesman, in the principles of their respective processes, as to render them, in reality, the masters of their business; and, to emancipate them from a state of bondage to such as are too commonly governed by blind prejudice and a vicious routine.

2dly. To afford Merchants, Brokers, Drysalters, Druggists, and Officers of the Revenue, characteristic descriptions of the commodities which pass through their hands.

3dly. By exhibiting some of the finest developements of Chemistry and Physics, to lay open an excellent practical school to Students of these kindred sciences.

4thly. To teach Capitalists, who may be desirous of placing their funds in some productive branch of industry, to select, judiciously, among plausible claimants.

5thly. To enable gentlemen of the Law to become well acquainted with the nature of those patent schemes which are so apt to give rise to litigation.

6thly. To present to Legislators such a clear exposition of the staple manufactures as may dissuade them from enacting laws, which obstruct industry, or cherish one branch of it, to the injury of many others.

And, lastly, to give the general reader, intent, chiefly, on Intellectual Cultivation, views of many of the noblest achievements of Science, in effecting those grand transformations of matter to which Great Britain and the United States owe their paramount wealth, rank, and power, among the nations of the earth.

The latest Statistics of every important object of Manufacture are given from the best, and usually, from official authority, at the end of each article.

The work will be printed from the 2d London Edition, which sells for $12 a copy. It will be put on good paper, in new brevier type, and will make about 1400 8vo. pages. It will be issued in twenty-one semi-monthly numbers, (in covers,) at 25 cents each, payable on delivery.

☞To any person, sending us five dollars, at one time, in advance, we will forward the numbers, by mail, post paid, as soon as they come from the press.

To suitable Agents, this affords a rare opportunity as we can put the work to them on terms extraordinarily favorable. In every manufacturing town, and every village, throughout the United States and Canada, subscribers may be obtained with the greatest facility. Address, post paid, La Roy Sunderland, 126 Fulton street, New-York.

⁂ To every editor who gives this advertisement entire 12 insertions, we will forward, to order, one copy of the whole work, provided the papers containing this notice be sent to the New-York Watchman, New-York. 51t12

STOVES.

COLD WINTER IS COMING

ABRAM N. ANNAS,

LATE of the firm of "Elmore Annas & Ayer," has moved into the new building adjoining the Stone Store of John N. Elmore (La Fayette Block.) where he is receiving the largest and best assortment of STOVES ever before offered in this market, comprising every desirable pattern of Cooking, Hall, Box, Plate, and

Fancy Parlor Stoves,

Which he offers, Wholesale & Retail, on as favorable terms as can be purchased in this TOWN COUNTY or STATE Most kinds of Produce Old Cast-Iron, and CASH, even, will not be refused in payment for any article in his line of business.

The subscriber manufactures all kinds of Store Furniture, Pipe, Sheet Iron, Copper,

BRASS AND TIN WARE

Of every description, which he keeps constantly on hand, and offers at as

LOW PRICES

Either at wholesale or retail, as any other manufacturer in the State. All wares warranted, made of GOOD materials, and not LEAKY.

Eave Troughs

Made and put up to order. Also.

JUST RECEIVED

And for sale a full assortment of Westmoreland Climax Stoves and Cauldron Kettles.

JOB WORK

☞Done well, on short notice, and for reasonabl prices. N. B. Purchasers wishing to buy wil please Call at the Centre Store, La Fayette Block No 3 Cortland Street.

De Ruyter, Oct. 15, 1841. 34tf

REMOVAL.

JAMES M. LETTS, has removed his tailoring establishment to Eli A. Gage's hat store, 2 doors north of M. Spear's Hotel. April 6th 1842.

20 TONS Butter wanted at the
May 30. STONE STORE.

Not 25 or 50 per cent Reward.

S. G. WALKER

HAS received his NEW GOODS, which he is disposed and determined to sell as CHEAP, if not cheaper than can be bought at any other establishment in De Ruyter. Among his assortment may be found, Dry Goods, Dry Groceries, Crockery, Hardware, &c. Leghorn and Palm-Leaf hats and a variety of other things too numerous to mention.

Hear ye!! Hear ye!! all persons wishing to buy goods CHEAP will please call at the Farmer's Exchange, and examine the quality and prices of his goods before purchasing elsewhere, and, Hear ye again!! any one having a little "Safety Fund" and indebted to S. G. Walker, will please call and deposit.

De Ruyter, May 23, 1842.

"Hard times and money scarce,"

IS the general complaint, and economy is the object of every person.

SUTTON & QUINBY have just opened a large assortment of Dry Goods, Groceries, Crockery, Paints, Oils and Dye-Stuffs. Persons wishing to make purchases are invited to call, as we feel confident that our Low Prices and Good Goods must give general satisfaction.

May 24. SUTTON & QUINBY.

BOOKS & STATIONERY.

SCHOOL BOOKS, of all descriptions, Miscellaneous Books & Stationery, at the Book Store of HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

De Ruyter, May 11, 1842. 11v3tf

50 PIECES BROAD CLOTHS, CASSIMERES, SATINETTES, at reduced prices at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

POETRY.

From the Olive Branch.

The Hour of Christ.

THERE WAS AN HOUR—eventful hour—
When Christ was promised to the world;
Then sin had entered Eden's bower,
And guilty man from thence was hurled—
'Twas then the voice of God in mercy said,
'The woman's seed shall bruise the serpent's head.'

There was an hour—when Jesus came,
And types and shadows were withdrawn—
Then angels to the world proclaim
That Christ in Bethlehem is born;
The trembling shepherds hear the joyful cry,
'Good will to men—glory to God on high!'

There was an hour—when Jesus taught,
As never man on earth before;
His teaching was with mercy fraught—
His doctrine with Almighty power—
He spake; the sick were healed! the devils fled!
And by a word, he raised the sleeping dead!

There was an hour; when Christ rejoiced,
And thanked the Lord of heaven and earth,
That as his wise and holy choice,
He had respect to lowly birth;
That from the wise and prudent were concealed
The things which wondrous grace to babes revealed.

There was an hour; when Jesus wept;
His heart was touched; his soul was moved;
While at the grave where Laz'rus slept,
He saw the grief of those he loved;
He groaned; he prayed; then showed his power to save;
He cried 'come forth!' and Lazarus left the grave.

There was an hour; when Jesus bled;
With his warm blood the ground was wet,
When, in an agony, he shed
His blood, like falling drops of sweat;
He took the cup, from which, at first, he shrank,
And for our sins its bitterness he drank.

There was an hour; When Jesus died;
When of his death the world partook;
The temple's veil was parted wide,
And nature to her centre shook;
That death for all a full atonement made.
When on him then our load of guilt was laid!

There was an hour; when Jesus rose,
And from the death came forth again,
Triumphant over all his foes,
Receiving gifts for guilty men;
He rose from death that we might also rise,
And live and reign with him above the skies.

But there's an hour; when Christ will come,
To sit in judgment on our race;
Then he will fix the sinner's doom,
And crown the children of his grace;
O, may I then with all my sins forgiven,
Enjoy an endless hour with Christ in heaven.

S. L.

Miscellaneous Department.

GAMBLING.

Mr. Editor.—In reflecting on this subject, permit me to use great plainness of spech—to speak boldly, and truly.

Notwithstanding the many sympathies existing in the bosom of a certain class towards those who gamble lightly—say once a week, to while away a few idle hours, winning or losing, perchance, five or ten dollars,—I must pronounce this viscious, and leading to the most fearful consequences. A man does not become a professed gambler in a week, a month, or a year; but it is the work of years, and the result of first playing for amusement, risking small sums just to make the game interesting, &c.—Even the notorious Voltaire, has said—'Every professed gambler is—has been—or will be a robber.'—And I cannot help feeling that the man who makes this vice his vocation, is hardly worthy the appellation of 'human being!' It is one of the worst—indeed, I might say, and keep truth on my side—the worst of all practices. It is injurious to both body and mind. The excitement produced is unnatural and enervates the mind. The body of man wants exercise:—but sitting at the card-table night and day, is no exercise for either body or mind. A gambler is always an intemperate man, that is, he uses too freely the intoxicating cup. Reader, can you imagine anything more destructive to the whole man, than sitting day after day, night after night, under a constant excitement, from the interest taken in the game—and the operation of intoxicating liquid, without nature's necessary relaxation or exercise in the open air?

Permit me to remark, that in my judgment, there is no one thing so destructive to man's highest interest as gambling!—We say, parents look well to your children—merchants, have an eye on your clerks—masters watch the movements of your apprentices, when the shades of night are spread over your city, and round your habitations?—Oh! one and all, teach those under your charge to shun the gaming-table, as they would the most loathsome, disgusting reptile—the most destructive disease. Tell them not to learn games even for amusement—for many a promising youth has been ruined, by first learning to play for diversion.—There is no amusement in it—it is death, and all the horrors of a dark, wicked life.

Let the young man who has indulged in the practice of gambling visit our Southern cities, and then see if he would not view it—in all its features and shades—supremely wicked, and the bane of human happiness. Let him see those who make it their business to go from one city to another, from one steamboat to another, for the purpose of making money to clothe and feed themselves—and this, by indirect stealing!—which I could prove if my limits would allow.—Yes mark the emaciated countenances, the weary eye—quivering lip and hand!—hear their horrid imprecations—their menaces to each other!—behold the frequent stabbing—midnight murder!—and then see if that young man would not acknowledge gambling to be one of the worst of practices!

Allow me, Mr. Editor, to say, that the young men of the South and West, are more addicted to the vice of gambling, than those in our more Easterly States—And the reason why they are, is obvious.—Being sons generally of wealthy planters, and independent as appears to them, of work, of course they have a great deal of spare time:—in fact, it is all 'spare time,' with them—and they are left to idle it away;—but can they do it?—I think not. Man's mind must be employed:—God has so determined and we cannot alter his decrees.—Therefore, man must have business of some kind or other to occupy his mind. If profitable employment cannot be had, amusement of some kind, will take up his attention. Now this is exactly the case with the young men of the South:—it is want of some useful employment which has been their ruin in one sense, and, blasted all their earthly felicity! I do not mean to be understood, that there are no virtuous moral young men, among our Southern brethren, for it is not the case, there are many—and their numbers increase from year to year.

I will close by tracing the gambler's course very briefly.—In the first place, as I have before observed, for want of proper employment, he commences gaming for amusement:—and this not being sufficiently exciting, he ventures a picayune to create an interest—and then a 'bit,' and so on to one, three, or five dollars. After he becomes an adept in the art, (a black one, however,) as a matter of course, he seeks those places where his excited mind can be satiated:—night after night he visits the gambling house, and loses—wins, and loses again!—What must be done to arouse his drooping spirits?—What course must be resorted to?—Why, the bowl!—the well-filled bowl!—He drinks, and feels a better and a richer man. But how soon again, does his mind droop!—how soon require another draught! The little village and all its haunts, he is soon familiar with, he wants more excitement—he can bear more—his acquaintance is extended—he is acquainted with a gambler here, and another there—in this city and that;—and then the races are coming on—he must visit them, and there he has the infinite gratification of meeting his old friends from different parts of the country; he joins in gambling, wins, loses—calls for the antidote—drinks again and again. One month passes, and another.—He has become so habituated to the table and its scenes, that he cannot leave it. Thus he has made himself a finished gambler—a sot—a pest to honest men—a vagrant—ripe for any rash act, even though it be horrid murder; which, if committed and detected, seals his doom by the gallows! J. M. E.

Carver, Mass. 1842.

CONFECTIONARY POISONOUS.—The dealers in confectionary, for the purpose of making their vile trash more attractive, make it into many curious forms, and then to make the bait more attractive still, they color the ingredients or the articles with different pleasing colors. Many of these articles are made of the offal of starch works, mixed with plaster of Paris, pipe clay, chalk, &c., and as little sugar as will give them a palatable sweetness; and they are often colored with gamboge, verdegris, red lead and other mineral poisons. A writer in the Magazine of Popular Science, gives a frightful account of this business, and especially that which is sold about the streets and for the use of schools. A daily paper says, "We cannot believe that the manufacturers of confectionary in this city are so entirely depraved, as to mix up such compounds for children." If pains should be taken to analyze the confectionary sold in this city, it would be found that the same poisonous ingredients are used in its manufacture.—Boston Health Journal.

From the Morning Star.

N. YORK, May 22d, 1242.

Dear Brother Burr:—

I have just returned from two most interesting visits; and now sit down to give you a short description of them. My first was at the institution for instructing the Blind.

As I approached the door of a large stone building, built somewhat in the gothic form of architecture, my attention was arrested by a group of little boys, who tho' blind, were sporting and chasing each other with all imaginable glee; so regular were they in all their movements, that I could scarcely believe they were deprived of the power of vision till I had satisfied myself by a close examination.

I now entered the house, and fortunately found a lady who kindly volunteered to conduct me through the various apartments of the institution, a particular description of which I shall not attempt to give, but merely allude to some things which were of the greatest interest to me.

Two young ladies were walking, arm in arm, in the long hall that extends the whole length of the building and designed for a place of recreation. Similar to these were the bed-rooms of the boys and girls on the other side of the house, and a row of beds was arranged along each ceiling. In another aparment, two more were busily engaged in knitting, which I was told they could do as expeditiously as those who are blessed with sight.

Proceeding to another apartment, I was introduced to another young lady of very modest and unassuming countenance, who entertained me by reading a few verses from the New Testament, which she did with great readiness and accuracy. You are aware that the letters in the books of the blind are raised, and that they distinguish them by running the fingers of the right hand with great rapidity over the page. It is indeed astonishing to witness the acuteness of their feeling sense.

We were now attracted by music in the chapel apartment, where we found a young gentleman playing on an organ, and two young ladies' sitting room, which was neatly furnished, and soon about a dozen congregated who amused us highly by repeating their own poetical effusions, conversing, reading, singing and playing on the Pianoforte. One fine, intelligent lady, a Mrs. Crosby, appeared to possess more than ordinary poetical genius. The following is one of her compositions, selected from the report of the institution.

The Blind Girl's Lament.

Again the well remembered spot I tread,
The spot of all the earth most dear to me;
Ye scenes of childhood, now forever fled,
Fond memory brings you back with all their glee.
When morn's fair goddess wide her gates did ope,
I've wandered here to meet her early dawn;
When tuneful birds their melodies awoke,
I've heard thy murmurs lonely Horicon,
But on thy placid bosom now to gaze
These sightless orbs, alas! do strive in vain.
The golden sun sheds not for me its rays,
To light o'er once familiar scenes again.
O! what a sight; a gift I ne'er can know—
But let me never murmur or repine—
Why should these eyes with tears of grief o'erflow,
For that which never, never can be mine.
Here have I roamed at twilight's pensive hour,
When stars illumined the blue ethereal sky;
Here breathed the fragrance of each sleeping flower,
And heard the balmy zephyr's gentle sigh,
But where are those my bosom held so dear,
Who in my joys and sorrows shared a part,
Whose accents fell like music on mine ear?
How sacred is their memory to my heart!
Alas! their dwelling is the stranger's home,
I call, but echo's voice alone replies;
And as I wander o'er the spot, alone,
Unbidden tears of grief suffuse mine eyes.
When sorrow blights some fondly cherished flower,
We've nourished long and tendery caressed,
Is there a balm that in that cheerless hour,
Can soothe the anguish of the troubled breast?
O yes! Hope fondly whispers in mine ear,
That with those loved ones I shall meet again;
She from my cheek doth wipe the gushing tear,
And bids my anxious heart no more complain.

Understanding that I had recently come from Hindostan, she made many inquiries with respect to the country, and its inhabitants. Also, desired me to give a specimen of their language. They appeared highly gratified with the short account I gave; and when I spoke to them of the numerous throngs of blind and other unfortunate persons who used to congregate about my house to beg, their sympathies were so much excited that some expressed a desire to go and teach them the way of truth and happiness.

These young ladies all expressed their thankfulness that they were blind instead of being deaf and dumb. When I took my leave, they all gave me a hearty shake by the hand, uttering a most sympathetic petition for my success in laboring for the poor blind and wretched heathen.

At the present time, I understood there were 64 pupils receiving instruction in this noble institution. They are all taught to read and write, and some are even attending the sciences and classics. They are also taught to do various kinds of manual labor, such as making band-boxes and baskets, by which they will be able to obtain a livelihood.

This truly benevolent Institution was incorporated by the Legislature of New York on the 1st of April 1831, before which time efforts to impart the blessings of education to the blind, was regarded as a mere chimera. But the experiment has been tried and succeeded beyond the most ardent hopes of its patrons.

My next visit was at the Institutin for the instruction of the Deaf and Dumb.—Here were a cheerful band of boys and girls, 160 in number, conversing with all imaginable ease and reading with their hands.

Mr. Peet one of the tutors, very courteously received us, and called a number of young gentlemen and ladies into the school room, where he conversed with them by signs almost as readily as we could converse vocally. In answer to his signs, they would write any letter of the alphabet, word or sentence we pleased to utter. Mr. P. gave a short account of his method of instruction, which was first to teach to write the alphabet, then nouns, then adjectives, and after that verbs, when the pupils were prepared to begin upon sentences, introducing the connections &c. as required. I gave the teachers several accounts of the Hindoos, which after expressing in signs the pupils would all write down what I had said with incredible correctness. They all expressed great sympathy for the poor deaf and dumb in India of which I had told them there were many; and one young lady expressed her desire that when I returned to that country I would send them there to be educated.

I was told that when they first enter this institution they have some idea of a God, but that they have no correct ideas of his attributes. Indeed, the general impression of the uneducated deaf and dumb with respect to the Deity is, that he is a decidedly evil Being for causing so much misfortune and misery in the world. These experiments corroborate those I have made upon the heathen, and establish the point that man is dependent upon revelation for consistent ideas of a supreme Being.

At the tea table, Mr. Peet asked a blessing by making signs unaccompanied with a single word, and he also informed me that sermons were preached to them in this manner every Sabbath. I was further told by the venerabe gentleman, that many young men and women were now married and settled in life with good prospects, who had received their education at this Institution.

Both the blind and the deaf and dumb prefer their own lot to that of each other. Indeed, it would be hard to determine which is the most unfortunate, though I think I should prefer being deaf and dumb to being blind. The blind receive knowledge through the medium of speech.—The deaf and dumb being entirely deprived of those two powers receive knowledge through the medium of sight, and impart it through the medium of the arms. The blindcan give extemporaneous discourses; but cannot read written communications. The deaf and dumb can give written communications, but cannot give extemporaneous discourses. With the blessings of education, the lives of both are far from being a source of misery for I saw not a more happy and certainly not a more innocent class of people in N. York.

Yours &c.
E. NOYSE.

A CORRECT IDEA.—An editor's sanctum should be sacred. His papers should not be touched till after he has gleaned their contents to his satisfaction. Take up his "mail," and leave first this paper in folio, that in quarto, t'other crumbled up, and the whole in confusion, and though his bump of order be as large as a piece of chalk, he can never arrange them satisfactorily.—His ideas will become disarranged and out of sorts just from gazing at the disordered pile before him, and his paragraphs jagged and uneven as saw teeth. Let our papers alone, how smoothly we'll wade through them! No time is lost in looking for estrays. The sought for is full before our eyes—clipped out, and a neatly folded sheet placed aside, as a "thing of yesterday."—Boonville Observer.

Them's our sentiments, adzackly.—Bulletin.

And our'n too.—Register.

WRITING FOR THE PRESS.—Few men are willing to bestow attention upon their communications sufficient to make them legible except by experienced readers.—Thus, an article in this paper from a gentleman of education, and from whom we might expect better things, was written without capital letters at the beginning, or periods at the end of its sentences; no commas were to be found, but periods in abundance where commas should be, or where no pause was required; the letter e was usually dotted instead of i, and the letter t was crossed seldom.

Correspondents sometimes complain that errors occur in printing their communications; but if the printer followed the copy, the correspondent would often be mortified, and the reader confounded.—Verbum sat sapienti.—N. Y. Obs.

A FEW HINTS TO KEEP AWAY HARD TIMES.

Rise early in the morning, and be delighted during the day in attending to our business, and not worry ourselves about our neighbor's concerns.

Instead of following the fashions of Europeans, let us cultivate a spirit of independence, and decide for ourselves how our coats, hats, and boots, shall be made.

Keep out of the streets unless business calls us to transact that which we cannot do in our stores, shops, or dwellings.

By all means keep away from drinking and gambling houses.

When we buy an article of clothing, study commendable economy, at the same time get a good article, and when made, take particular care of it, and wear it out, regardless of any change of fashion.—Fashion is a great tyrant, and men are fools to be slaves to it.

Stay at home nights and improve yourselves by reading, writing, or instructive conversation, and retire at an early hour.

Be kind to our relations, obliging to our friends, and charitable to all.—Baltimore Clipper.

INDUSTRY OF WOMEN.—In the slave States, women of light complexion are ladies, and to them productive industry would be a disgrace. In Massachusetts, all are ladies, and nothing is more respectable than industry. In traveling through some towns, you may see the little boys and girls on their way to school, busily employed in braiding palm leaf for hats as they walk along the road. The universal signs of prosperity, the painted dwellings with green blinds, the handsome school-house, the embellished temples of worship in Westminster, Petersham, and many other places, show the result. It is estimated that upwards of four millions of dollars are annually earned by the labor of females in our State, and added yearly to the available wealth of the community.—How many bales of cotton would it take to yield four million in nett profits to South Carolina? The number of females thus employed is stated at 40,000.—Emancipator.

The celebrated Hannah More in some of her writings, introduces to her readers a devout and dignified personage, abounding most remarkably in general confessions of sinfulness, depravity, corruption, and worldly-mindedness. But the most intimate and honored among her friends could not hint to her, in the most delicate manner, that she had certain faults, which were specified, to be corrected without putting her on the defensive, and filling her mouth with loud complaints of ill treatment. By her confessions, she was the very chief of sinners. But, by her defenses, she was faultless—"a sinner in the gross, but a saint in detail,"—full of spiritual corruption, but without a moral blemish.

"Pa," said a fashionably educated farmer's daughter, "Pa, if I should marry a farmer what shall I do with my French?" "Call the chickens, Betsey, call the chickens."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

NO IMPOSITION.

NO STATES PRISON WORK!

THOSE wishing to purchase BOOTS and SHOES of superior quality of custom work, will find just the place by calling at the sign of the MAMMOTH BOOT.

De Ruyter, May 20, 1842.

NEW TAILORING ESTABLISHMENT.

J. M. LETTS,

WOULD return thanks for the patronage he has received from his numerous friends and customers. He would say to them that he has taken the room on the first floor, (recently occupied by Dr. Ira Spencer, as a Druggist Store,) together with those he occupied before, where he will be happy to wait on all those who will favor him with a call.—He will, as heretofore, WARRANT his work to be done in a superior manner.

N. B. Spring and Summer Fashions just received. No. 1 Farmers' Exchange

J. M. L. has engaged an experienced Journeyman who will pay particular attention to making up COATS, of every variety, in a neat and superior style De Ruyter, June 23, 1841

THE FARMER'S EXCHANGE is the place to buy Goods CHEAP. Oct 20, 1841.
34tf S. G. WALKER.

STOVES.

COLD WINTER IS COMING

[illegible] N. ANNAS,

LATE of the firm of "Elmore Annas & Ayer," has moved into the new building adjoining the Stone Store of John N. Elmore (La Fayette Block,) where he is receiving the largest and best assortment of STOVES ever before offered in this market, comprising every desirable pattern of Cooking, Hall, Box, Plate, and

Fancy Parlor Stoves,

Which he offers, Wholesale & Retail, on as favorable terms as can be purchased in this TOWN COUNTY or STATE. Most kinds of Produce Old Cast-Iron, and CASH, even, will not be refused in payment for any article in his line o business.

The subscriber manufactures all kinds of Stove Furniture, Pipe, Sheet Iron, Copper,

BRASS AND TIN WARE

Of every description, which he keeps constantly on hand, and offers at as

LOW PRICES

Either at wholesale or retail, as any other manufacturer in the State. All wares warranted, made of GOOD materials, and not LEAKY.

Eave Troughs

Made and put up to order. Also,

JUST RECEIVED

And for sale a full assortment of Westmoreland Climax Stoves and Cauldron Kettles.

JOB WORK

☞Done well, on short notice, and for reasonabl prices. N. B. Purchasers wishing to buy wil please Call at the Centre Store, La Fayette Block No 3 Cortland Street.

De Ruyter, Oct. 15, 1841. 34tf

L. W BLISS' Window Sash
Bliss' & Co. " Blinds.

Holme's Sampson & Sailsbury Edged Tools consisting of Broad Axes, Hand Axes, Adzes an, Chisels, at Factory prices by J. N. ELMORE,
October 4. Manufacturers' Agent

JOB PRINTING.

BOOKS, Pamphlets, Way, Hand-Bills, Cards Bills, &c. &c., neatly executed at this office.

---

50 PIECES BROAD CLOTHS, CASSIMERES, SATINETTES, at reduced prices at the NEW YORK CASH STORE

BOOK BINDING.

THE subscriber having connected a BINDERY with his printing establishment, is now ready to execute all kinds of Binding in a neat and durable manner, on as reasonable terms as at any other establishment in this section of country.

JAMES BAILEY.

De Ruyter, June 8th 1841.

REMOVAL.

JAMES M. LETTS, has removed his tailoring establishment to Eli A. Gage's hat store, 2 doors north of N. Spear's Hotel. April 6th 1842.

---

20 TONS Butter wanted at the
May 30. STONE STORE.

Not 25 or 50 per cent Reward.

S. G. WALKER

HAS received his NEW GOODS, which he is disposed and determined to sell as CHEAP, if not cheaper than can be bought at any other establishment in De Ruyter. Among his assortment may be found, Dry Goods, Dry Groceries, Crockery, Hardware, &c. Leghorn and Palm-Leaf hats and a variety of other things too numerous to mention.

Hear ye!! Hear ye!! all persons wishing to buy goods CHEAP will please call at the Farmer's Exchange, and examine the quality and prices of his goods before purchasing elsewhere, and, Hear ye again!! any one having a little "Safety Fund" and indebted to S. G. Walker, will please call and deposit.

De Ruyter, May 23, 1842.

"A nimble sixpence is better than a slow shilling."

SPRING GOODS! SPRING GOODS!

CHEAP! CHEAP!! CHEAP!!!

THE undersigned are receiving a large assortment of goods suitable for the spring and summer trade, and invite their friends and the public generally to call and examine them at the one price store.
SUTTON & QUINBY.

"Hard times and money scarce,"

IS the general complaint, and economy is the object of every person.

SUTTON & QUINBY have just opened a large assortment of Dry Goods, Groceries, Crockery, Paints, Oils and Dye-Stuffs. Persons wishing to make purchases are invited to call, as we feel confident that our Low Prices and Good Goods must give general satisfaction.

May 24 SUTTON & QUINBY.

BOOKS & STATIONERY.

SCHOOL BOOKS, of all descriptions, Miscellaneous Books & Stationery, at the Book Store of HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

De Ruyter, May 11, 1842. 11v3tf

LOTS OF HATS & CAPS on hand—Fashionable and Old Fashioned, Bell Crowned and Low Crowned; and, to crown all, and not be out of Fashion, Cash and most kinds of stuff received in payment, by HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

SILK! SILK!! SILK!!!

A BEAUTIFUL assortment of plain, figured and striped, just received and for sale very cheap at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

How to make money,

IS the study of mankind and of the Yankee Nation in particular. The easiest and most practicable plan for accomplishing the desired end in these times is to "Save Money," which can be done by purchasing NEW GOODS, instead of the trashy accumulations of many shops and many years. The place to do this, is at ELMORE'S, whose stock of NEW GOODS is nearly equal to all the rest received in this village and who is daily dispensing great bargains to "Fortune's Favorites."

May 30.

Of Drugs and Medicines,

THE subscriber keeps a much larger stock and sells much lower than those who adevrtise two columns.

May 30. J. N. ELMORE.

---

4 CASES, Superior quality, fashionable Hats, just received, and for sale low at the
May 30. STONE STORE.

---

500 PAIRS Boots and Shoes for sale at the
May 30. STONE STORE.

NEW TAILORING ESTABLISHMENT.

THE subscriber would inform the Citizens of De Ruyter and its vicinity, that he has opened a shop in the second story of S. G. Walker's store, Farmer's Exchange, where he may at all times be found, and where those who are pleased to favor him with a call may have their garments made as well as at any establishment west of New York City.

N. B. Garments cut and warranted if made by competent workmen. New York Spring and Summer Fashions just received by W. P. GUEST.

De Ruyter, April 25th, 1842.

FLOUR! FLOUR!! FLOUR!!!

SUPERFINE Flour for sale at the Farmers' Exchange, put up in good order in barrels and half barrels. Said Flour is made from the best of western wheat, at one of the best mills in the state.
S. G. WALKER.

De Ruyter, April 18th, 1842.

BLANKS! BLANKS!!

JUSTICES Blanks, Personal Mortgages, &c., just printed, and for sale at this office.
De Ruyter, April 20, 1842.

TEAS, SUGARS.

CALL and see how cheap they are selling them at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.
Oct 11.

AGENTS FOR THE REGISTER.

NEW-YORK.

Adams—Chas. Potter, H. H. Baker, Job Spencer.
Alfred—James B. Irish, Maxson Greene, Oran Vincent, Samuel Russell P. M.
Berlin—John Whitford.
Brookfield—Andrew Babcock, Silas Bailey, Adin Burdick, Samuel B. Crandall.
Belmar—Rowse Babcock, J. L. Scott.
Clarence—Nathan V. Hull.
Clear Creek—Abel Saunders.
Durhamville—Dea. Joseph Potter
Edmeston—Dea. Ephraim Maxson.
East Rodman—Chester Greene.
Friendship—Zuriel Campbell, Samuel E. Lanphear.
Genesee—W. P. Langworthy, Dea. E. P. Crandall, Sheffield B. Maine, H. P. Greene.
Hounsfield—Charles West.
Independence—John P. Livermore
Lincklaen.—Sebeus M. Burdick, Dea. Wm. G. Crandall.
Leonardsville—Dennis Hardin.
New York City—Paul Stillman.
Newport—Daniel Truman.
New London—Charles M. Lewis.
Otselic—Dea. Silas Church
Petersburgh—George Crandall.
Preston—Dea. Clark Rogers.
Persia—Dea. Hosea Whitford
Pitcairn, St. Laurence Co.—Geo P. Burdick.
Sacket's Harbor—Joel Greene.
Scott—Ezekiel G. Potter, James Hubbard, Hiram Babcock.
Schenectady—Abel Ward.
South Branch—Rowland T. Greene.
Truxton—Russel G. Burdick.
Unadilla Forks—Welcome Stillman, William B. Maxson.
Verona—Oscar Williams.
Watson—Ezra Whitford.
West Clarksville—Clarke Saunders.

RHODE-ISLAND.

Westerly.—Alexander Campbell.
Hopkinton—Joseph Spicer jr., Jacob D. Babcock.

CONNECTICUT.

Waterford—Lester T. Rogers, Wm. Maxson.
Mystic Bridge—T. S. Greenman.

NEW-JERSEY.

Plainfield—Thomas S. Albert.
New Market—W. B. Gillett.
Shiloh—Isaac D. Titsworth, Azor Estee.
Salem—David Clawson.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Crossingville—Thos. B. Brown
[illegible]—Dea. Lewis Dunham.
New Geneva—B. F. Bond.
Coudersport—L. G. Maxson.
[illegible]—[illegible] Burdick.
Sutton Centre—Isaac W. Jones.

VIRGINIA.

Lost Creek—Levi H. Bond.
Elk Creek—Thos. B. Bond
New Salem—Jeptnah F. Randolph.
Lowsport—Joseph Jeffrey
Lowther's Run—Asa Bee

OHIO.

Bloomfield—Charles Clarke.
Northampton—Simeon Babcock, B. C. Church.
Port Jefferson—Lewis A. Davis
Jackson—Davis Loofbourrow.
Bellerville—G. N. Swinney.
Kingsville—Julius M. Todd.

MICHIGAN.

Oporto—Job Tyler.
Tallmadge—Bethuel Church.

WISKONSAN.

Milton, Rock Co.—Joseph Goodrich, P. M. Stillman Coon.

IOWA.

Burlington, Des Moines Co.—S. B. Brown.

The Seventh-day Baptist Register

IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY,

AT DE RUYTER, MADISON CO., N. Y.,

BY

JAMES BAILEY.

TERMS.—To village subscribers who have the paper left at their doors, $2 25, in advance, or $2 50, at the expiration of the year.

☞To office and mail subscribers, $2 in ADVANCE.

Each communication, involving facts and intended for insertion in the paper, must be accompanied by a responsible name.

No subscription received for a less term than six months.

☞All subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, will be considered as wishing to continue their subscription, and their paper will be sent to them accordingly. No paper will be discontinued till all arrearages are paid except at the discretion of the publisher.

☞Advertisements inserted on the most reasonable terms.

☞All letters and communications to ensure attention should be addressed to the publisher free of postage.

S. J. Rogers 2d

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.

VOL. III.—NO 19.] JAMES BAILEY, Editor and Proprietor.——A. H. BURDICK, Printer. [WHOLE NO. 123.

Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,——The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.—Commandment.——If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments.—Jesus Christ.

Two dollars in advance.] DE RUYTER, N. Y., FOURTH-DAY, JULY 6, 1842. [Published weekly.

Original Papers.

For the Register.

MUSINGS.--NO, VI.

BY MARY.

"Death is beautiful—not as the end of man, not as the extinction of a noble and wonderful being, not as the final result and close of existence, but beautiful in its time as the momentary passage to a fairer land; the extrication of the soul from its temporary dwelling place; the resting of the no longer needed body; the free ascent of the delivered spirit to its new abode."

'Tis Saturday night. The week, with its varied duties and its cares, its hopes and disappointments, has passed from the earth away. It has been an eventful week—and where is the period of equal length, since the morning stars chanted their hymn of rejoicing over a newly created world, of which the same may not be said? Where the week since the tempter entered Eden, that has not left its traces in sorrow's own characters upon the living, feeling tablet of the human heart. The close of the week, is it not one of those little stopping places in which the thoughtful feel that

"'Tis vastly wise to talk with their past hours
And ask them what report they've born to Heaven,
And how they might have borne more welcome
news?"

In reviewing the one whose last night has gathered in darkness around us, an unwonted sadness hovers around the spirit.—The destroyer has been in our midst. The week has been almost his own. In its early dawn, Sunday, amid the tears of the bereft, was borne to her last earthly home, an aged one who had long been drinking from life's mingled cup. As the mourners were slowly wending their way homeward, the solemn notes of a tolling bell again feel upon the ear. Would you mingle in the group but just called to mourn the departure of a loved one? Go with me to De Ruyter Institute—a place where death's silent footsteps have till now left no trace behind—as if 'twould leave to life and its enjoyments the loved retreat where the mind may glean food for eternity. But the young, the talented and lovely is surprised amid her books. She lays them reluctantly aside, for she loves them. An unwonted paleness gathers upon her once healthful countenance, and she follows the aged one into the spirit-land. Though comparatively among strangers, she dies among her kindred. By the bed-side stands a fond father, whose yearning affections, whose medical skill could not bid the destroyer go companionless away.—There too are sisters, and a brother. Their loved circle is invaded. The youngest of the group lies before them in the stillness, the repose of death. The sigh and tear that will not be repressed, speak more forcibly than language can, how closely was that sister's heart bound to their own—how like the severing of their own life-strings was the yielding up of the loved one who had shared with them life's almost every joy and sorrow. But she has gone—and on the morrow, as others resume their studies, she will return to the home she once helped to make glad—the home she left but a few weeks since to seek in the haunts of literature food for the mind that cannot die.—A few days more are numbered with the past, and tidings are again brought us of death's doings.—As if he loved the spot he still lingers with us—still discourses his own melancholy music from the tolling bell in notes so solemn that the most thoughtless are for a while arrested.—But where is this new call? It is upon the middle aged—upon a mother in the midst of her family—her little ones around her, to whose happiness and welfare she seems as necessary as the sun to the day. But her summons is a speedy one—she may not linger in the circle she loves. With scarcely a hurried farewell she departed, and to-day found a resting place 'neath the clods of the valley. While yet within the sacred enclosure, and the remains of the mother scarcely deposited in their last home, another funeral procession enters to bury their dead. Soon joining the newly arrived group of mourners, we learned that a little one, upon whom life had but just dawned, had passed away, leaving to others the enjoyment of "life's banquet."

Such is a brief record of the events of the week. Old age with its accumulated experience of life's weal and wo—middle age with its thick clustering cares, its pleasures and its duties—youth with its high aspirations, and infancy with its innocence, have been laid low. Are all classes thus exposed to the unerring shafts of the destroyer, and do we hope to escape? What changes does death affect upon the living, as well as those it takes away! With its icy hand it severs the cord binding the loved to life, while at the same time it unseals the fountains of sadness in the hearts of the living, and its bitter waters rush oft times wildly o'er the soul. Its tread, though silent, falls upon the heart, and affections blighted—hopes crushed, every where mark its pathway. It almost seems at times to take its beauty from the earth,—its charm from existence. With such attendants can it still be said, "Death is lovely?" Were earth an Eden, with its thornless flowers, its innocence and happiness, did the eye of faith discover no "better land"; or were death commissioned to extinguish the God-lighted spark of existence—could it lay its paralyzing hand upon the faculties of the mind, and lay them like the body powerless in the grave, then would the King of Terrors be in very deed but another name for death. But no sooner does he touch the body, than the spirit, having no affinity for death and corruption, wings its way to the God who gave it. The casket may be shattered, but the gem is secure. Death does not then enter the temple of life and rob it of its priceless treasure. Leaving its every faculty unimpaired, it but ushers the soul into a new, a wider sphere of action. While here, hope and fear, joy and grief hold over us a divided reign. The eye is dimmed with tears, and the heart oft times wrung with anguish. Wherever we may look, similar in their outlines are the scenes we witness. Yet hope survives—anticipation still paints the future in her own bright colors, and while yet adding new beauties, reality comes along and the flowers wither as if chilled by an untimely frost. A cloud rests upon the once beautiful picture, and its shadow falls upon the heart. Then comes Death, with his ministers, pain and anguish, and when they have done his every bidding, he lays his cold hand upon the heart, and its throbbings cease.—And thus 'twill ever be on earth, till sin and its consequences are alike unknown. Yet the spirit lives, and its life is measured by the cycles of eternity. But the cup of life in the spirit-world is no longer a mingled one. 'Tis filled to overflowing with happiness as lasting as the soul itself, or equally filled with the dregs of bitterness. To us is left the choice of which we will partake, and even now are we collecting the ingredients of that cup. Will the elements form a sweet or bitter draught? Is death then necessarily unlovely? Can it be "a momentary passage to a fairer land," and yet the King of Terrors? Can it be the messenger bidding us to the feast of eternal life, where every desire is swallowed up in fruition, and yet be an unwelcome guest? Can it be "the resting of the no longer needed body"; "the free ascent of the delivered spirit to its new abode," and at the same time a fearful event? While reason proposes questions like these, feeling asks, Can one be so out of love with life as to relinquish without a struggle, the God-granted boon of earthly existence? Can the strong ties of friendship, and of kindred, which render an earthly home so lovely, be severed without a sigh? Can the thoughts rest upon the grave, its loneliness and corruption, and be untinged with aught like sadness? How often in the minds of the thoughtful is felt this seeming conflict of reason and feeling! While 'tis yet fresh in the memory, life's varied picture, with its light and shade, its beauty and deformity, its blighted buds and withered flowers, is again reviewed; and if the Christian's hope has been kindled in the heart, "I would not live alway" is the heart-prompted commentary upon that picture.—Then the eye of faith looks heavenward, and as it perceives the beauties of that "better land," where aught that can awaken the sigh or tear is unknown—where parted friends may meet to live and love forever, the chords binding him to earth are almost unconsciously loosened, and with a full heart he exclaims,

"To the heaven, the God-lighted day
I would be away."

MARY.

De Ruyter, June 25th, 1842.

Christ the Way.—Blessed Jesus!—thou art 'the way, the truth, and the life.' A way without aberration, the truth without a cloud, and life without end. Thou hast shown me the way, taught me the truth, promised me the life; thou hast been my way in evils, and my truth in counsel, and shalt be my life eternal.

Religious Department.

The following very pleasant reflections we find in the Oberlin Evangelist. There is only one thing that we regret in reading them, and that is, that the writer is every week guilty of an open violation of that law that the Psalmist loves so much. The Psalmist's "conduct was proof of his sincerity;" but how can a man be sincere in making such expressions when his conduct agrees not therewith? There is sincerity in error, but how can a man be justified in the practice of error when the truth is before him in plainest characters? If he of the Evangelist wishes to keep company with the Psalmist, with the Apostles of Jesus Christ, and be a consistent follower of Christ, and a lover and obeyer of God's law, he must change his conduct in one respect, viz: lay aside his first day keeping, and observe the Sabbath of the commandment.—Ed. Reg.

From the Oberlin Evangelist.

"HOW LOVE I THY LAW."

Thus said the pious Psalmist in a solemn appeal to the heart-searching God. It was no mistake, no effort of hypocrisy. His conduct was proof of his sincerity, for he adds immediately, "It is my meditation all the day." The law—the law of love—it seemed to be written on his heart, to be the spring of all his actions, to be woven into his very existence. It was uppermost in his heart, was often expressed in his words, so that this Psalm (119) has in every verse some reference to his confidence and delight in the law of God. "Thy law is my delight." "Thy law is in my heart." "I love thy commandments above gold, yea above fine gold." "O how love I thy law." These, and similar words, frequently repeated, are proofs of a heart deeply in communion and love with the law of God. Indeed the Christian experience of David was love for the Bible. It was a Bible experience. And none but a spiritual mind can understand or appreciate what he says. Though he was engaged, at the direction of God, in many wars, though he had the government of the kingdom on his hands, yet the house of God and the law of God were his great delight.

The great promise of the New Covenant is, "I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts," the living law, the transcript of the heart of God. O what a work is this! He does not leave the heart a blank. He does not leave it to become a sink of pollution. He shines into it, and fills it with light, and love, and joy, and gladness, and purity. He penetrates its inmost recesses, and searches out, and expels all that is wrong, and gives vigor and health to all its actions. It is blessed thus to give up the heart to God.—Who would not have the law of love, the law of heaven, enshrined in his very heart? Who would not fix his eye on the new Covenant of mercy, and keep it there till he knows it is written in his heart? All else, all short of this covenant is vain and useless. This fills up the full measure of the heart, leaving no aching void. Love,—not mere emotion, but a choice, a fixed purpose of soul—love, is the life of the believer's soul, the element in which he lives. Its object always is, and always is to be, the God of love. It can be satisfied with his fulness. It seeks not conformity to this world. It seeks not its pleasure here. It is neither flattered with the honors of the world, nor disturbed at its frowns. It suffers long from ill usage and contempt, and still is kind. It seeks not its own, so much as the good of others. It sees another with greater gifts, and graces, and comforts, and it rejoices, not envies. If it does not this, it has not the new covenant, the law of love, in the heart.

The life of our Savior is a perfect exemplification of this law. He came not to do his own will, but the will of the Father who sent Him. "How is it ye sought me," said He to his sorrowing mother. "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business." "I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened until it be accomplished." "I live by the Father." His eye was always single to the glory of his Father. And because it pleased his own, and the benevolent heart of his Father, He went about doing good.—Here He found a man blind and He restored his sight; there a sick man and He healed him. Here a leper and He cleansed him; there a dead man and He restored him to life. Here a sorrowing heart and comforted it; there a soul diseased with sin and made it whole. The ignorance and waywardness of his disciples He bore patiently, and endeavored to instruct them. The persecution of his enemies, He meekly endured, even praying for them, and suffering more on their account than on account of his own severe pains. "Weep not for me," says He, "but weep for yourselves," &c. The temptations of the devil He resisted, and baffled him in all his machinations. And in his last great conflict with "the powers of darkness," after praying to be saved, He added with the most perfect resignation, "O my Father, if this cup may not pass from me except I drink it, thy will be done." Thus did He live and die, seeking not his own but the will of God. And thus is his life an example of the spirit of the law of love—an exemplification of that writing the new covenant in the heart, which we all need. His precept and his example unite in teaching us what is love to the law of God.

Christian brother and sister, let us heed the precepts and follow the example of the blessed Jesus. Let us be "strangers and pilgrims on earth," showing in our lives that we "seek a city which hath foundation, whose builder and maker is God." Let us delight in his precepts and his example.—Thus shall we ever abide in his love, and have his law written on our heart. Thus shall we realize in our own experience the New Covenant of mercy. And thus can we say, as sincerely as the pious Psalmist, "How love I thy law, it is my meditation all the day." "How sweet are thy words to my taste; yea sweeter than honey to my mouth."

From the Watchman of the Valley.

MINISTERIAL FIDELITY.

The following incident contains a rare instance of ministerial fidelity, and one which we doubt not will be interesting to our readers.

The Rev. Wm. Cravers who has been dead for some years, was among the early Methodists in Rockingham county, Va.—He owned a number of slaves when he embraced religion, but he let the oppressed go free, and from that time to the day of his death, bore a faithful and decided testimony against the crying sins of slavery and intemperance. So constant was his testimony against these abominations, that it became a common saying among the people, that Father Cravens (the name he was familiarly called,) could not preach a sermon without having a negro and a bottle of whiskey in it. He had a wealthy and respectable neighbor by the name of Henry Miller, who was a professed Deist. Miller died with the consumption. Some short time before his death he sent for Father Cravens. The old servant of God went immediately, and when he came into Mr. M's. room, said to him, "Well Harry, (the name Mr. M. was familiarly called in the neighborhood,) did you send for me?" He answered, "I did Mr. Cravens."—"And what do you want with me, Harry?" "I find, Mr. Cravens, that I must soon leave this world, and I find I am not prepared to die, I want you to pray for me, and give me some instructions how I may prepare to stand before that Savior whom I have so long slighted." Mr. C. replied, "I always thought it would come to this," alluding to Mr. M's. profession of Deism, "but what have you done with your negroes?" Mr. M. informed him that he had made his will, and settled all his worldly business; that he had divided his slaves among his heirs. To which the preacher replied, "I can't pray for you, Harry. I would as soon pray for the Devil as to pray for you, you are about to rivet the chains of bondage on your fellow man with your dying breath—to take from these unfortunate creatures, and their unborn posterity, the rights which their God and your God, the God who is no respecter of persons, gave them. It is not possible that God can have mercy upon you. If you expect mercy of a righteous God, you must at least do justice to your fellow man, and this you cannot do unless you let the oppressed go free. Good day, Harry," and thus left the sick man. It was not long before the preacher was again sent for, when he again asked, "what have you done with your negroes?" But a very different answer was given. Miller informed him that he had seriously considered what the preacher had said at their first interview—that he had seen the injustice of slavery, and made a new will, and set all his slaves free. Br. C. exclaimed, "I will pray for you now, Harry, and I am sure God will have mercy on you too." He prayed, and conversed with the sick man frequently, visited him often, and, as far as it can be known in the world, the Lord was entreated, Mr. M. obtained mercy, and died in peace.

It was a maxim with Mr. Cravens, that he was a witness for the Lord, and as a witness he was not to be influenced by a consideration of the effect of his testimony would have on the suit in hand: all he had to do was to tell the truth, and leave the consequences to his Great Master. O, how will the redeemed and saved deistical slaveholder magnify the grace—the grace by which he was truly dead to the world.

We were intimately acquainted with the Rev. Wm. Cravens, and are in possession of many other interesting anecdotes of that good man, which have never been made known to the community. We think of giving some occasionally.

ESTIMATE OF CHRISTIAN CHARACTER.

We are prone—alas! too prone, to estimate Christian character by some shining quality or action, which strikes the senses, instead of seeking it in the more retired and uniform performance of duty, which, after all, is the safest, and indeed the only safe method of arriving at a correct estimate of character in others. But any one who has paid the least attention to what passes around him, knows full well, that the former and not the latter, is the standard by which Christian character is generally estimated.

Here is a private Christian. You hear him offer up a most fervent prayer in the social meeting, and you place him at once among the number of those, of whom the world is not worthy. Now it is certainly right, that charity should always hope the best of another, that it is possible to expect under the circumstances. And yet it is likely, that you form an unfavorable opinion of another and more exemplary Christian, merely because he has less eloquence, and it may be, less apparent zeal. And very frequently, were you more fully acquainted with the active life of the former, you would so completely change your opinion, as to doubt whether there were any Christian principle there at all, and that, although he were found to be very good at a prayer, he were universally known to be very hard at a bargain, and with whom you would not wish to have a great deal to do.

Here is a minister of the gospel. Perhaps he is a stranger, except that trumpet-tongued fame has gone before, and proclaimed him to be a very extraordinary preacher; whose labors had every where excited no inconsiderable share of interest. The congregation is electrified, or startled at his bold, out-of-the-way strokes against sinners and saints. And you compare him with the humble, devoted pastor, or some other godly minister around you, who by his whole life of steady and increasing piety, has preached to all around him even more eloquently than by his lips, and yet you overlook all this, and form an unfavorable estimate of him, whilst you exalt and idolize, with the crowd around you, the stranger, who, for aught you know, may be nothing more than a cloud without water, or a burning and blazing comet, who shines with borrowed light; who kindles a flame of his own, and who thus brings "false fire upon God's holy altar."

Or you see or hear of an individual, who gives or bequeaths his thousands to some benevolent object. Now although it is most certainly our duty to rejoice at every noble deed performed by others, and to be willing to believe them actuated by pure motives; yet, it would be manifestly wrong to consider an action of this kind, however splendid in appearance, as of itself decisive evidence of Christian character. This, and much more, might be, and often is done by him, who has no other motive than vanity or self-complacency to gratify, and who would never think of forgiving an injury to his fellow-man; or of giving even "a cup of cold water" (from disinterested motives,) to a disciple of Christ.

How necessary, therefore, to be cautious in undervaluing real living piety, which does not draw upon itself the admiration of others by occasional lurid flashes; but by continuance in well-doing, stands forth in symmetrical harmony and loveliness, and is in the scripture beautifully compared to the dawning, which shineth "more and more unto perfect day." It is this kind of piety, after all, which alone has the approbation of God, and which does any real good in the world.—Weekly Messenger.

Freeness of Salvation.—When, by our believing in Christ, we have obtained power and grace to repent of our sins, then we may and ought to trust in him also for the pardon of those sins which we have thus repented of, steadfastly believing that, how many and great soever our former sins have been, yet that now, upon our hearty and sincere repentance of them, God hath absolved us from them all for Christ's sake, and hath accepted of that death and punishment which his own Son underwent in our nature, as if it had been undergone by us in our own persons; so as to be now perfectly reconciled to us as if he had never been offended at all with us: yea, that he doth not only pardon and forgive us what is past, but he reckons us in the number of righteous persons, and accepts of us as such in his beloved Son, who, knowing no sin in himself, "was made sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him." And not only our persons, but that our actions also—even our sincere, though imperfect, duties and good works—all are acceptable to God through Jesus Christ our Lord; and that being thus justified by him in time, we shall be glorified by him for evermore. Consider this, and tell me what you think of a Savior—one who can save you from your sins, and from the wrath of God that is due unto you for them—one that can reconcile Almighty God to you, and you to him—one who can alter your estate and disposition too, so as to make you equal to the holy angels themselves both in grace and glory? How happy would the fiends of hell account themselves if they had such a Savior!—how earnestly would they flock after him, and strive which should embrace and love him most, which should serve and please him best, that so they might be restored by him to their former estate again! Yet this is a happiness which they can never hope for; it being designed only for mankind in general. But all may not only hope for it, but may have it, if they will; nay, it is God's pleasure and command you should: for he would have all men to be saved, and, by consequence, you among the rest. And, therefore, if any of you be not, the only reason is because "ye will not," as Christ said, "come to me, that ye might have life;" and no wonder then if you be not saved, when ye will not come to him who alone can do it. Christ was weary, that we might rest; he hungered, that we might eat the bread of life; and thirsted that we might drink the water of life. He grieved, that we might rejoice; and became miserable to make us happy. He was apprehended, that we might escape; accused that we might be acquitted; and condemned, that we might be absolved. He died, that we might live; and was crucified by men, that we might be justified before God. In brief, "he was made sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him."—Bp. Beveridge.

Children's Department.

From the N. Y. Observer.

SKETCHES IN THE HOLY LAND.

SILOAM.

"By cool Siloam's shady rill
How sweet the lily grows!
How sweet the breath beneath the hill
Of Sharon's dewy rose.

Lo! such the child whose early feet
The paths of peace have trod;
Whose secret heart with influence sweet,
Is upward drawn to God."

There is a fountain and a pool of Siloam. They are on the east side of Mount Zion, at the foot of the hill, or rather under the hill, as the water gushes out from the rock some twenty feet below the surface of the earth. From this fountain the water flows under the ground for a considerable distance, when it enters the Pool of Siloam. From the pool the waters flow gently down into the lower part of the valley of Jehoshaphat, which was anciently called "the king's dale," where they water a few gardens of cucumbers, which are cultivated by the poor people who inhabit the village of Siloam on the opposite side of the valley. The waters of Siloam are sweet and pleasant, though not very cool.

This is unquestionably the same place to which our Savior sent the poor blind man that he might wash and be healed.—You will recollect the interesting story.—The man had been blind from his birth.—As Jesus was passing through the streets upon a certain day with his disciples, he saw him, and his disciples supposing that he had been made blind in consequence of some sin, asked whether it was because he had sinned, or his parents, that this great evil had come upon him. The Savior replied that it was not because of any particular sin which either he or his parents had committed, that he was born blind, but that the wonderful power and mercy of God might be shown to men. He then immediately made a clay upon the ground with which he anointed the eyes of the blind man, and sent him to the Pool of Siloam to wash.

Having done as the Savior commanded, he received his sight and came into the city, seeing all things as clearly as if he had never been blind. How happy must he have been at that moment! How strange and beautiful every thing must have appeared! And his father and mother whom he had never seen, with what delight must he have looked upon their faces for the first time! And all this because he obeyed the command of the blessed Saviour. If the blind man had said, when Jesus told him to go to the Pool of Siloam and wash, that some other place was just as good, or that it was a long and difficult walk for a blind man to go down into the deep valley, he would not have been healed. But instead of this he did just the very thing which Jesus told him to do, and thus received the precious blessing of sight, and what was worth much more, the forgiveness of all his sins. And now let me tell you of another fountain which is far more interesting and important to you than that of Siloam. It is that fountain

"Filled with blood, Drawn from Immanuel's veins."

To that fountain all are directed to go and wash. The blind, the lame, the sick, the well, the rich, the poor, the bond, the free, the old, the young, the king on his throne, and the beggar upon a dung-hill.—There is room enough for all. It has been opened for sin and uncleanness, and whosoever will, may wash therein and be healed. The Savior is now passing by.—His eye rests upon you and he sees you blind and ruined in sin. With gentle voice he says, "go sinful child, go to the fountain, wash and be healed. Wash in my blood which has been shed for you.—Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow, though they be dyed like crimson, they shall be as wool." Yes, go. Listen to his sacred voice, and obey his commands. His promise shall not be vain. Wash in his blood and joys of forgiven sin shall be yours, joys which no wealth, or honor, or earthly pleasure can give, or take away.

When the Savior directed the blind man to go to Siloam, he went immediately. A single day, a single hour's delay, and Jesus might have passed on his way to do good to others, and his blindness remained forever. Do thou likewise. Go now.—Youth is the time to serve the Lord. The present moment is within your reach, and you may embrace the Savior. The gushing fountain flows most freely to-day,—to-morrow—who shall tell what will be on the morrow?

"By cool Siloam's shady rill
The lily must decay;
The rose that blooms beneath the hill,
Must shortly fade away.

And soon, too soon the wintry hour
Of man's maturer age,
Will shake the soul with sorrow's power,
And death complete the stage."

Conscience.—Nothing can pacify an offended conscience, but that which satisfies an offended God.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, July 5, 1842.

An Apology.

☞Printers, you know, must have a holiday occasionally as well as others.—You will, therefore, pardon our printers for having this once left the office to celebrate the Nation's birth-day. We expect to regain, very soon, the time thus lost, and have our paper off in season.

"Let no man, therefore, judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of a holy day, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath days, which are a shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ." Col. ii. 16, 17.

The above passage is quoted by non-sabbatists, as proof that the Sabbath of the commandment is not now binding on man. Let us see if this is so:—

1. Meats, drinks, holy-days, new moons, and Sabbath days, were institutions belonging to the Jews, and not to others. Some of the Jewish ceremonies were typical of things to come, viz: of Christ and his kingdom; others were given to commemorate things that had taken place; others, still, were given to them as a nation to govern them in their national capacity. The things enumerated in the text above quoted, were peculiar to them as a nation, as may be seen by reference to the Jewish ritual, and also Ezekiel xlv. 17. "And it shall be the princes part to give burnt offerings, and meat offerings, and drink offerings in the feasts, and in the new moons, and in the Sabbaths, in all the solemnities of the house of Israel." But the Sabbath of the commandment was not peculiar to the Jews. It was instituted at creation, confirmed and enforced at Mt. Sinai, and by Jesus Christ, and incorporated in that code of laws engraven on stone by the finger of God, to endure and bind men throughout all time. Since, therefore, the Sabbath days mentioned in the text with the other rites associated, were a shadow of things to come, and were done away in the perfect establishment of the gospel dispensation, we must, of necessity, conclude that the passage here has no application whatever to the Sabbath of the commandment.

The weekly Sabbath, when instituted, was not limited to any time; it must, therefore, remain till abrogated. The form of expression, and its association, are an incontrovertible argument for its perpetual obligation. God says the seventh-day is the Sabbath. When was this is the Sabbath changed to was the Sabbath? The word of God gives no account of such a change. The command of Jehovah then stands to this day, "the seventh-day is the Sabbath," and when ages more have rolled away, unless God shall reveal otherwise, the command will be as to-day. With God the word is, embraces all time. The past and future with God, are as the present. Therefore, he says of the Sabbath that was instituted at creation, that it is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God. The Sabbatic law being associated with the other moral precepts which are founded in man's relation to God, and his fellow man, it must remain with them till man's relation to his God, and his fellows, alters. This has not yet taken place, neither can it so long as time is.

2. In the context, the Apostle declares the fact that Christ had blotted out the hand writing of ordinances that were against us, &c. The ordinances that were against us, were the precise things enumerated in the text. The Sabbath of the commandment is not against us. Jesus Christ himself declares that the Sabbath was made for man. It is most assuredly designed for the benefit of man, and in no sense whatever can be against him. The argument is, therefore, conclusive that the sabbath days mentioned, is not the weekly Sabbath, but the sabbaths peculiar to the Jewish economy.

The Sabbath of the commandment is written in the singular number. In the text it is plural. In the original the word here rendered is Sabbatoon, (plural,) and not Sabbaton, (singular.)

Adam Clarke in his comments on this passage, says: "It is not clear that the Apostle refers at all to the Sabbath in this place, whether Jewish or Christian; his toon Sabbatoon, of Sabbaths, or weeks, most probably refers to their feast of weeks."

In nearly every passage which speaks of the weekly Sabbath, the term is singular unless a numeral is prefixed. The Festival Sabbaths of the Jews are placed in the plural number.

We offer one other passage to show that the sabbaths of the text were ritual, and belonged to the Jews, and not the Sabbath of the commandment. Hosea ii. 2. "I will also cause all her mirth to cease, her feast days, her new moons, and her sabbaths, and all her solemn feasts." We, therefore, conclude that the Apostle to the Collossians has shown that this prophecy was fulfilled, nor can we, without wresting scripture from its obvious meaning, conclude that the Sabbath of the commandment has ceased to exist.

Thus we have it that the word of Jehovah remains in all its force till now, which says that the seventh-day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.

THE DUTY OF THE CHURCH TO PRAY FOR EDITORS.—The Editor of a Religious Journal occupies a position of tremendous responsibility. He may be the instrument of much good or of much evil; how much, eternity alone can reveal. We sometimes wonder, we, or any man, acquainted with the infirmities of human nature, and the errors to which the heart of man is liable, should consent to undertake a work which may not only seal the destinies of thousands of the present age, but propagate an incalculable amount of good or evil to future generations. If any man needs the spirit of the Lord, it is the Editor; if any man ought to be clothed with righteousness as with a garment, it is he.

While in view of his own weakness and unworthiness, the Editor may cry, "who is sufficient for these things?" he may take encouragement from the assurance of the Lord, "My grace is sufficient for thee." God hears and answers prayer. He gives grace to the humble. Christians love to pray. It is their duty to pray for all men; and they cannot deny the request of those who crave an interest in their prayers. "I will, therefore, that men pray every where," is the Apostle's injunction. We say to the church in the language of the same Apostle, "Brethren pray for us."—N. Y. Evangelist.

The above very just sentiments we place in our own department. Every one who is conscious of the influence of the press, must be aware of the immense responsibilities of Editors. There are some possessing great critical acumen, who are ever finding fault with Editors, and if his Editorials do not furnish them sufficient material for criticism, they turn proof-readers and see how many typographical errors they can find. In either case, if the Editor is faulty, such persons have enough to do and say to expose his faults, and unless he is perfectly infallible, thus busy bodies will destroy his influence so far as theirs extends. Now, we do not wish our faults to be covered up, but we wish our friends to point out to us our faults, and suggest how we may correct them, and if we refuse to submit to good advice, we will abdicate the chair Editorial. If our readers can see any consistency in the above article, then we make the request for ourself. We are to some extent aware of our responsibilities; if our readers are aware of it, then we shall expect their wise council and fervent prayers.

Churches Organized.

A Seventh-Day Baptist Church was organized by Br. J. L. Scott, at Cuba, Fulton Co., Ill., May 13, of five members. 10 more were added.

Also at Fredonia, Louisa Co., Iowa, on the 31st of May, of four members. Some others were added. Eld. Rolen McReynolds, formerly a First-day Baptist, united with the church.

Thanks to some of our Agents for the additions they are making to our subscription list. Let others do likewise.

Veto Message of President Tyler.

We publish to-day the "Veto Message" of John Tyler, returning with his objections the "Temporary Tariff Bill."

TWO MORE FOOLS.—"Hon." Thos. F. Marshall, of Ky., and James Watson Webb.

Extract of a Letter from Br. N. V. Hull, dated,

CLARENCE, JUNE 24, 1842.

DEAR BROTHER,—I write you this note to inform you of my safe arrival at my home, &c. It pleased God to give me strength and success, so that on sixth-day after I left De Ruyter, I arrived in safety, though much fatigued, at my residence in Clarence.

* * * * * *

We were last evening favored in our village with a lecture from the Rev. Mr. Parker, of Ithaca, N. Y., who in 1835, 6, and 7, was upon an exploring expedition west of the Rocky Mountains, for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of establishing Missionary operations among the nations of those regions. In many respects the lecture was truly interesting and profitable. There were some circumstances, however, to me truly painful. It appeared from his account, that many of the natives in the simplicity of their hearts, earnestly desired to know the right way to worship the true God, and when informed by him that some who had been among them had taught them a false mode of worship, they seemed deeply affected, and asked for teachers that would instruct them in the right way. He then gave us to understand that they had great confidence in his instruction. All of these things, as you may be aware, were very interesting and pleasing, but now for the painful transition. He informed us that upon a certain Friday, being in the vicinity of a great number of Indians, it was proposed to him to stay with them over Sabbath, (Sunday,) which he consented to do. The painful, (and shall I say disgusting, perhaps it is too strong,) circumstance of the reverence he taught them to have for the first-day of the week as the Christian Sabbath; thus, as a matter of course, teaching them that this is the doctrine of the Christian's bible! I confess that I was deeply affected, and I remain so yet. A deep gloom rests upon my mind, and my prayer is, O, Lord! is there no way to save thy word from this misrepresentation, and thy religion from this reproach? Never did I feel more deeply the importance of giving to the Pagan the word of God, stripped from the dogmas of the church. Would that my brethren would arise in the strength of God, and go about this blessed work. O that all who know not God and his religion, might know him and it, just as revealed in his blessed word, and may the Lord have mercy on benighted Pagans, and deluded Christians!

Missionary Department.

For the Register.

May 7. Sabbath; spoke to an interesting congregation, and had a happy season.

8. Preached in Centreville to a large concourse of people, upon the subject of the Sabbath. Much interest was manifested by the listening audience. We were also favored with the presence of about fifteen ministers, of different denominations. After the exercises of this day, many said, they would search the Bible upon this subject, with a determination to keep a Bible Sabbath.

13. Met to organize a Church. For a season gloom hung over the prospects.—Finally, five gave each other the hand, and we proceeded to dedicate them; after which two joined, one by letter, and the other by the ordinance of laying on of hands. It may not be amiss to notice that this Church was constituted in the room where Elder Hull departed this life, and four years from the day of his interment. This was a favor which he often, with unshaken confidence, assured his friends would be conferred upon them. From the apartment where we were, we could look through the window, and on a little mound survey the tomb,

Where his once suffering form, sweet reposing,
Slumbers in the arms of death.
But his Spirit, Ah, whither has it fled!
For lo! 'tis not among the regions of the dead.
Yonder, the eye of faith descries him stand,
Vieing with angels on Immanuel's happy land.
With seraph high he sweetly tunes his lyre,
His soul reanimated with celestial fire,
No more to toil while suffering here below,
With Jesus reigns; his perfect love to know.
His loss we're deploring, altho' in his room
The heaven-born Church has reared her form.
The Church, the special object of his care,
Is planted there, his Father's love to share,
His prayers long offered, with blessings come,
And there the exiles find a welcome home,
Until released, to dwell with Christ above,
And bask eternal in one unbounded sea of love.

Sabbath and first day, held meeting.—Two more united with the Church.

19. Attended meeting in Harkney's Grove.

20. Called at Br. James Dunham's, on the way to sister Ellis's.

21. Sabbath; with other exercises, received six into the Church; two by letter, and four by that pleasing ordinance still retained in the Church. The Lord appeared to sanction it, by a special outpouring of his Spirit. The prospects are flattering for more additions. These friends are located in Fulton and Peoria counties, where there are Prairies and woodlands enough, to be obtained at government price. The land is mostly rolling, and the prairies especially are very beautifully undulating. These counties are very well watered, and they have mills and woodlands in abundance.—As far as we could ascertain, it is healthy, excepting on the rivers. For the benefit of those who may travel to that region, we will add, as they pass up the Illinois River, to visit these brethren, they may land at the mouth of Spoon River, Copperas Creek, or Peoria. Their locations are at, or near, Lewistown, Canton, or Trivolia. The Church may be communicated with by addressing James Dunham, Trivolia, Peoria co., Ill., or O. H. Perry Hull, Cuba, Fulton co., Ill.

With regard to our labors in Illinois, we think it not necessary to give them a daily detail. We found enough to occupy all of our time, and had to reject many calls.—There were bright prospects for a special work in different neighborhoods; but the calls were too numerous, and time too short to confine our labors to one place. Much might be effected there by immediate action. The public are far from being prejudiced against us as a denomination of Christians. Eld. Dunham, a very popular Moravian Minister, has recently embraced the Bible Sabbath, but his being absent on ministerial business prevented our having an interview with him.

Parting scenes are too heart-rending for us to attempt a description, any farther than to say, that such sob-stifled adieus, are too much for nature to endure. But though painful, we are often compelled to rend ourselves from those whom, as Christians, we dearly love.

23. Left for Iowa Territory, and in Farmington called on Harry Porter. With him the weary traveler finds a hearty welcome, and a sweet repose. From that, we passed on through Knoxville, and Monmouth.

24. Crossed the Mississippi River, and spent the night in Burlington.

25. Passed through Columbus city, and crossed the Iowa River, just below the junction of the Cedar and Iowa, and on its bank in Fredonia, put up with Dr. Enoch Maxson, happy to be in another field of labor. In this village we also found sister S. B. Bowen, a lady from New-Jersey.

26. Attended two meetings in town.—The good spirit was bountifully bestowed upon the people.

27. Preached again. The unconverted requested prayers.

28. Sabbath; meeting still interesting.

29. Entered a canoe in company with Capt. Wheelock and lady. Passed down the river from Hillsborough, to Fredonia. This day the people gathered from far and near. Felt much of the spirit of religion, while endeavoring to persuade the people to become reconciled to God.

30. Visited Br. Richard B. Davis, and found him still aiming for glory.

31. After considering all circumstances, complied with the request of the friends, and constituted a Church of four members. This was as happy a season as we have enjoyed for many months. Eld. Rolen Mc Reynolds, formerly a minister of the "Regular Baptists," requested admission with the number. After learning his doctrinal views, and reasons for embracing the Seventh-day Sabbath, he was welcomed. His lady also joined. His residence is about sixteen miles from this, and the ill health of his family prohibits his engaging with us.

June 4. Sabbath; interest still increasing. One more united with the Church. Many sinners, with streaming eyes, approached the mercy-seat. The fatigues of the journey, constant preaching, visiting from house to house, answering objections, contending with Infidels, and exposure to the stormy blasts, &c., have almost worn us out. We often feel at the close of the exercises, that we cannot endure any longer. Nature is sinking. But when we see the gathering multitudes crowd the house to overflowing, their wants nerve us up, & in the strength of Elijah's God, we make one more effort.—The unconverted, and those who have been stubborn and rebellious, are weeping all around us. The waters are troubled, and some have stepped in and are now singing the convert's song. Others are waiting for help that they may prove the efficacy of Redeeming grace.

5. The house was thronged with listening probationers; and we made one more effort to point them to the "Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world."—The number of seekers was this day increased. The sobs and groans of the spiritually wounded plainly declared that the word of God had its desired effect. But in the midst of this glorious work, we are obliged to desist. How gladly would we hail a fellow-laborer in this important crisis!—But we look in vain for such aid! May God have mercy upon the people in this wilderness land.

6. Received one candidate into this little Church. We are somewhat aware of our responsibility while endeavoring to lay before the denomination the condition of these people, together with the prospects for the Society to expend some of its means in this western country. Many are the calls for help in those regions where our denomination is most flourishing; but their wants will hardly compare with the destitute condition of the people scattered through the great western valley. Gladly would we portray the necessity of immediate action, also the deplorable effect of procrastination but nothing short of a real knowledge can be effectual.

Yours, &c.
J. L. SCOTT.
Fredonia, Louisa co., I. T., June 6, 1842.

Congressional News.

From the New-York Observer.

IN SENATE.

June 21.—The Army Appropriation bill was passed.

The Temporary Tariff.

June 22.—This bill being amended so as to postpone the distribution until the first of August was passed. Yeas 24. Nays 19.

Death of Mr. Southard.

June 27.—The death of the honorable SAMUEL SOUTHARD, Senator from the State of New Jersey, and late President pro. tem. of the Senate, was announced in the Senate this morning, as soon as that body met.

Mr. Miller, of New Jersey, announced the decease of his colleague in affecting and feeling terms. Judge Southard was born at Basking Ridge, New Jersey, in 1787; and died yesterday at 10 P. M., at Fredericksburg, Virginia.

Mr. King followed, and added his tribute to the virtues, talents, and services of the deceased, and moved the appropriate resolutions.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The Temporary Tariff.

June 25.—The temporary Tariff bill was taken up in regular order of business, and the amendment of the Senate was concurred in: yeas 104; nays 96;—and thus the bill having passed both Houses, awaits only the signature of the President to become a law.

The President has signed the Apportionment Bill; accompanied with reasons that are filed in the State Department.

Death of Mr. Hastings.

June 27.—After the Journal had been read, Mr. John Q. Adams rose in his place, and announced with great feeling the death of Wm. S. Hastings, a member of this House, who departed this life at the Red Sulphur Springs, Va., on the 17th of the present month.

He concluded his remarks by offering the customary resolutions of respect, when the House adjourned.

VETO OF THE PRESIDENT.

To the House of Representatives:

I return the bill which originated in the House of Representatives, entitled, "An act to extend, for a limited period, the present laws for laying and collecting duties on imports," with the following objections:—

It suspends—in other words, abrogates for the time—the provision of the act of 1833, commonly called the "compromise act." The only ground on which this departure from the solemn adjustment of a great and agitating question, seems to have been regarded as expedient, is the alleged necessity of establishing, by legislative enactments, rules and regulations for assessing the duties to be levied on imports, after the 30th of June, according to the home valuation; and yet the bill expressly provides that, "if, before the 1st of August, there be no further legislation upon the subject, the laws for laying and collecting duties shall be the same as though this act had not been passed." In other words, the act of 1833, imperfect as it is considered, shall in that case continue to be, and to be executed, under such rules and regulations as previous statutes had prescribed, or had enabled the Executive Department to provide for that purpose, leaving the supposed chasm in the revenue laws such as it was before.

I am certainly far from being disposed to deny that additional legislation upon the subject is very desirable; on the contrary, the necessity, as well as difficulties, of establishing uniformity in the appraisements to be made in conformity with the true intention of that act, was brought to the notice of Congress in my message to Congress at the opening of its present session. But however sensible I may be of the embarrassments to which the Executive, in the absence of all aid from the superior wisdom of the Legislature, will be liable, in the enforcement of the existing laws, I have not, with the sincerest wish to acquiesce in its expressed will, been able to persuade myself that the exigency of the occasion is so great as to justify me in signing the bill in question with my present views of its character and effects. The existing laws, as I am advised, are sufficient to authorize and enable the collecting officers, under the directions of the Secretary of the Treasury, to levy the duties imposed by the act of 1833.

That act was passed under peculiar circumstances, to which it is not necessary that I should do more than barely allude. What may be, in theory, its character, I have always regarded it as imparting the highest moral obligation. It has now existed nine years, unchanged in any essential particular, with as general acquiescence, it is believed, of the whole country, as that country has ever manifested for any of her wisely established institutions. It has insured to it the repose which always flows from timely, wise, and moderate counsels—a repose the more striking, because of the long and angry agitations which preceded it. This salutary law proclaims, in express terms, the principle which, while it led to the abandonment of a scheme of indirect taxation, founded on a false basis, and pushed to dangerous excess, justifies any enlargement of duties that may be called for the real exigences of the public service. It provides "that duties shall be laid for the purpose of raising such revenue as may be necessary to an economical administration of the Government." It is therefore in the power of Congress to lay duties as high as its discretion may dictate, for the necessary uses of the Government, without infringing upon the objects of the act of 1833. I do not doubt that the exigences of the Government do require an increase of the tariff of duties above 20 per cent.; and I as little doubt that Congress may, above as well as below that rate, so discriminate as to give incidental protection to manufacturing industry—thus to make the burdens which it is compelled to impose upon the people, for the purposes of government, productive of a double benefit. This, most of the reasonable opponents of protective duties seem willing to concede; and if we may judge from the manifestations of public opinion in all quarters, this is all that the manufacturing interests really require. I am happy in the persuasion that this double object can be most easily and effectually accomplished, at the present juncture, without any departure from the spirit & principle of the statute in question. The manufacturing classes have now an opportunity which may never occur again, of permanently identifying their interests with those of the whole country, and making them, in the highest sense of the term, a national concern. The moment is propitious to the interests of the whole country, in the introduction of harmony among all its parts, and all its several interests. The same rate of imposts, and no more, as will most surely re-establish the public credit, will secure to the manufacturer all the protection he ought to desire, with every prospect of permanence and stability which the hearty acquiescence of the whole country, on a reasonable system, can hold out to him.

But of this universal acquiescence, and the harmony and confidence, and the many other benefits that will certainly result from it, I regard the suspension of the law for distributing the proceeds of the sales of the public lands as an indispensable condition. The measure is, in my judgment, called for by a large number, if not a great majority of the people of the United States; by the state of the public credit and finances; by the critical posture of our various foreign relations; and, above all, by that most sacred of all duties—public faith.—The act of September last, which provides for the distribution, couples it inseparably with the condition, that it shall cease—first, in case of war; second, as soon and so long as the rate of duties shall, for any reason whatever, be raised above 20 per cent. Nothing can be more clear, express, or imperative, than this language. It is in vain to allege that a deficit in the treasury was known to exist; and that means were taken to supply this deficit by loan when the act was passed. It is true that a loan was authorized at the same session during which the distribution law was passed; but the most sanguine of the friends of the two measures, entertained no doubt but that the loan would be eagerly sought after and taken up by capitalists, and speedily reimbursed by a country destined, as they hoped, soon to enjoy an overflowing prosperity.—The very terms of the loan, making it redeemable in three years, demonstrates this beyond all cavil. Who, at the time, foresaw or imagined the possibility of the present real state of things, when a nation that has paid off her whole debt since the last peace, while all the other great powers have been increasing theirs, and whose resources, already so great, are yet but in the infancy of their development, should be compelled to haggle in the money-market for a paltry sum not equal to one year's revenue upon her economical system? If the distribution law is too indefinitely suspended, according not only to its own terms, but by universal consent, in the case of war, wherein are the actual exigencies of the country, or the moral obligation to provide for them, less under present circumstances, than they could be were we actually engaged in war? It appears to me to be the indispensable duty of all concerned in the administration of public affairs to see that a state of things so humiliating and so perilous, should not last a moment longer than is absolutely unavoidable.

Much less excusable should we be in parting with any portion of our available means, at least until the demands of the treasury are fully supplied. But, besides the urgency of such considerations, the fact is undeniable, that the distribution act could not have become a law without the guaranty in the proviso of the act itself.

This connexion, thus meant to be inseparable, is severed by the bill presented to me. The bill violates the principle of the acts of 1833, and September, 1841, by suspending the first, and rendering, for a time, the last inoperative. Duties above 20 per cent. are proposed to be levied, and yet the proviso in the distribution act is disregarded; the proceeds of the sales are to be distributed on the 1st of August, so that while the duties proposed to be enacted exceed 20 per cent., no suspension of the distribution to the States is permitted to take place. To abandon the principle for a month, opens the way to its total abandonment. If such is meant, why postpone at all? Why not let the distribution take place on the first of July, if the law so directs?—which, however, is regarded as questionable. But why not have limited the provision to that effect? Is it for the accommodation of the Treasury? I see no reason to believe that the Treasury will be in better condition to meet the payment on the 1st of August than on the 1st of July.

The bill assumes that a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands is, by existing laws, to be made on the 1st of July, 1842, notwithstanding there has been an imposition of duties on imports exceeding 30 per cent. up to that day, and directs it to be made on the 1st of August next. It seems to me very clear that this construction is equally erroneous and dangerous, as it would divert from the treasury a fund sacredly pledged for the general purposes of the Government, in the event of a rate of duty above 20 per cent. being found necessary for an economical administration of the Government.

The bill under consideration is designed as only a temporary measure, and thus a temporary measure passed merely for the convenience of Congress is made to affect the vital principle of an important act. If the proviso of the act of September, 1841, can be suspended for a whole period of a temporary law, why not for the whole period of a permanent law? A doubt may be well entertained, in fact, according to strict legal rules, whether the condition having been thus expressly suspended by this bill, and rendered inapplicable to the case where it would otherwise have clearly applied, will not be considered as ever after satisfied and gone. Without expressing any decided opinion on this point, I see enough to justify me in adhering to the law as it stands, in preference to subjecting a condition so vitally affecting the peace of the country, and so solemnly enacted at a momentous crisis, and so steadfastly adhered to ever since, and so replete, if adhered to, with good to every interest of the country, to doubtful or captious interpretation.

In discharging the high duty thus imposed on me by the Constitution, I repeat to the House my entire willingness to co-operate in all financial measures of a Constitutional character, which, in its wisdom, it may judge necessary and proper to re-establish the credit of the Government.—I believe that the proceeds of the sales of the public lands being restored to the Treasury, or more properly to speak, the proviso of the act of September, 1841, being permitted to remain in full force, a Tariff of duties may easily be adjusted, which, while it will yield a revenue sufficient to maintain the Government in vigor by restoring its credit, will afford ample protection, and infuse a new life into all our manufacturing establishments. The condition of the country calls for such legislation, and it will afford me the most sincere pleasure to co-operate in it.

JOHN TYLER.

Washington, June 29, 1842.

News of the Day.

THE RHODE ISLAND REBELLION.

Affairs have recently assumed a menacing aspect in Rhode Island. It appears that Dorr, the sham Governor, not satisfied with the complete defeat of his previous attempt to overthrow the government and laws of the State, has opened another campaign. By the aid of sympathizers in various States, he has rallied together a desperate force of about 700 men, composed chiefly of those who are not citizens of the State, and who have no interest in its actions, and encamped at a little village called Chepatchet containing some 700 inhabitants, about six miles from the Connecticut line of the State. In this dangerous state of things, the friends of law and order had but one thing to do, to defend their rights and suppress by force the wretched rebellion.

Accordingly the legislature passed an act on the 25th inst., proclaiming martial law throughout the State, which has been rigidly enforced. On the 26th, extensive military preparations were made in Providence and in other parts of the State, and about 3000 men under arms were despatched to the quarters of the insurgents. They took possession of Acot's Hill, an elevation not far from Chepatchet, and commanding the road leading to it.

Dorr issued a proclamation convening the Constitutional Legislature at Gloucester, on the 4th of July, and another calling upon the people of the State to defend the Constitution.

Gov. King has also issued a proclamation warning all persons against holding any intercourse or communication "with the traitor Thomas Wilson Dorr, or his deluded adherents, assembled in arms against the government of the State," and calling upon him and his adherents to lay down their arms, and disperse in peace and order.

David Parmenter, a notorious insurgent, was arrested on Saturday, on a charge of treason, ordered to find sureties in the sum of $2,000, and in the meantime, committed to prison. Other arrests have been made. O. Holmes, owner of the brewery where Dorr's legislature convened, William Hidden, Nicholas Power, C. Williams of Cranston, and his son, F. Potter, and a number of others.

Dr. Wayland has dismissed the students of Brown University. The college rooms have been ordered to the government for barracks.

William Gibbs McNeil, well known as an engineer, has been appointed by Gov. King as Commander-in-chief of the forces of Rhode Island and Providence plantations, and assumed the command.

The Assembly adjourned to re-assemble on Thursday at 3 o'clock in the afternoon. One of the members moved to meet at Chepachet, but he was overruled. The Providence Journal says: "It was understood that the members would arm themselves and proceed in a company to the scene of conflict, and they remained together after the final adjournment to make arrangements for that purpose."

A great many suffrage men, among them Dutee J. Pearce, Daniel Brown, and others who have been looked upon as leaders, have come out and published statements of their determination to give no further support, but to abide by the action of the charter government. They exhort their political friends to do the same.

The forces of the friends of the government are assembled in great numbers from all parts of the State, and are gradually closing up their lines around Gov. Dorr's encampment. The company of Sea Fencibles have a heavy Paixhan gun, which was drawn to the scene of action by six horses.

Chepachet taken.—At a quarter before ten on Tuesday the battalion of the State forces commanded by Col. Brown marched upon Chepachet, and succeeded in taking the town with the loss of only two men. Dorr's men, when they saw the immense force marching against them, after showing some little resistance, laid down their arms and fled. Dr. Nichols, a Senator of Dorr's legislature, was taken.

Dorr about this time wrote a letter to a Mr. Burgess, stating that having been convinced that the majority of his party were opposed to his movements, and were favorable to the law passed by the Assembly, therefore he should advise his friends to disband. But this did not arrest the progress of things.

Dorr fled again.—It was reported on Tuesday at 4 o'clock, that Dorr had fled into Connecticut with about 50 or sixty of his men. He went away without the knowledge of the majority of his men, who were much incensed with him, and declared that they would take his life if they found him.

Attempt at Murder—Devotedness of a Wife.—The Cincinnati Gazette states that a most daring and horrid attempt to commit murder was recently made upon the person of Mr. James Henry, living about one mile above Cumminsville, by three or four men. Mr. Henry was in Cincinnati the day before, and sold a horse, receiving in payment some money. About midnight his house was broken open, the desks and drawers rummaged, but nothing taken. Mr. H. himself was awakened by a blow from a dirk or knife, which cut him severely upon the forehead. He sprang up, but was instantly stabbed by another of the gang, low in the side—cutting a terrible gash, which laid open the cavity of the body for some six inches. Mrs. Henry here threw herself between the murderers and their intended victim, imploring them with a woman's devoted affection, to spare his life. She offered them any money or valuables about the house, if they would desist. To effect this object, she gave them a large English gold watch, with a heavy guard also of gold, the links quite long, and some thirty-five dollars in money—all she had. The villains then decamped.

From the Aurora.

BUNKER HILL MONUMENT.

The Top Stone.—Considerable interest has been manifested, and many questions asked, with respect to the manner of placing the top stone on Bunker Hill Monument. The block is four feet and nine inches square at the base, while the four sides will be hammered from the apex to an edge, forming a flattened four-sided cone. It constitutes of itself the apex of the monument, and it has been supposed by some that it would be a very difficult matter to place it in its intended position. But the difficulties are easily obviated, by the arrangement proposed by Mr. Savage. For the purpose of raising the stone, (as the derrick at present used must come down,) a pair of shears will be raised directly over the Monument, one leg at each side, resting upon timbers projecting from the openings. The shears will be sloped towards the city, and the block will be raised on the front side of the Monument. The difficulty of attaching the fall to the block, (for no holes can be drilled into it, as in the other blocks,) will be obviated by leaving projections on two sides of its surface—like ears—to which the rope will be fastened. These will be hewn off after the stone has been placed in its position.

Dimensions of the Top Stone.

Square at the base, 4 feet 9 inches.

Thicknes through the centre, 3ft. 6 inches.

Weight of the block, about 2 1-2 tons.

It is believed that the following mountains may be seen, in clear weather, from the top of Bunker Hill monument, viz: Wachusett, at Princeton, distant about 50 miles; Monadnock, at Jeffrey, N. H., distant about 75 miles; Ascutney, at Weathersfield, N. H., distant about 110 miles; Kearsarge, at Newbury, N. H., distant nearly 80 miles. Another mountain, the name of which we do not know, is also to be seen.

Violent Hail Storm.—On Sabbath last, between 2 and 3 P. M., there was a violent hail storm about five miles north of this village. It took a range of a mile and a quarter in width, and (so far as heard,) about twenty miles in length. From Montezuma, through Sennet, the scene is represented as one of complete desolation.—All the grain, fruit, and garden produce are destroyed. The window glass for the whole range, is said to be broken—in some cases with window blinds and shutters.—Several farmers have lost from $500 to $1,000 each. Much injury of the above description was done—although we have heard of only one case in which a human being received any injury. The hail stones were some of them as large as 5 and even 6 inches in circumference—and we have been assured by those who witnessed it, that in the corners of the fences, &c., these stones were to be seen exceeding two feet in depth. More than 20 hours after the storm, we were shown some of the stones, which were even then of unusual size. At the same time this village was visited by a heavy storm of wind and rain; but we believe it was not accompanied with hail.—Auburn Journal.

Affair of Honor.—We have just heard the particulars of a meeting which took place on Six Mile Island, on Tuesday, between two young bloods of our city. Samuel Thruston, aged 15, and William Huie, aged 13 years. They were attended by young gentlemen of the same age. The weapons used on the occasion were a couple of Dickson's best rifles—distance thirty yards. They took one fire without any damage being sustained by either party, except the ball of Thruston's gun passing through the crown of Huie's beaver hat. Through the intercession of the board of honor, a corporation well known in this city, the challenge was withdrawn, and the difficulty amicably adjusted.

Both parties behaved with the most perfect coolness and courage on the occasion. The difficulty, we have heard, originated in an affaire du cœur.—Louisville, Ky., Sun.

If the "board of honor" had administered a sound flogging, to masters Thruston and Huie respectively, we think their "intercession" would have had a most excellent effect.

The Mohawk and Hudson Railroad Company have reduced the fare between Albany and Schenectady to 50 cents.

Mechanics Employed and Dismissed from the Navy Yard.—The number of mechanics dismissed from the five great Navy Yards, from May 1st to June 10th, are as follows:

From Portsmouth, N. H.,	89
" Boston,	216
" New-York,	353
" Philadelphia,	444
" Norfolk,	429
	1528

The reason given by the Secretary in a document laid before Congress, is "a want of work caused by the launching of the several vessels being stopped, and the discontinuance of the work on the medium steamers."

Three hundred and eighty able bodied sailors have been, within a short time, enlisted at New Orleans, into the service of the United States.

The Legislature of Rhode Island have appointed a Committee of two from each county, on the subject of Suffrage and the calling of a Convention to frame a Constitution. This Committee consists of Messrs. Cranston, Durfee, Clarke, Randall, Updike, Potter, Whipple, Remington, Blake, and Bosworth.

A general council of the Cherokees have passed a law, that all spiritous liquors found at any time in their nation, shall be poured out on the ground.

The Ohio Anti-Slavery Convention met at Mount Vernon recently. While Judge King, the candidate for Governor, was addressing the Convention, the church in which they were assembled was assailed by a mob.

The wife, son, and daughter of Mr. Jesse Hulse, of Blooming Grove, N. Y., each sustained the injury of a broken leg, while proceeding to church on the 19th inst. The horse took fright in consequence of some oversight in harnessing, and the wagon was upset, causing the accident.

The Mormons have nominated a full ticket for county officers of their own religious denomination, in the county of Hancock, Illinois. They intend either to rule or ruin.

James Wood, of Rochester, who was last seen alive by one of his sons, holding on to a tree by the bank of the river, in a state of intoxication, was on the 24th inst., found a corpse in a mill-dam.

An Escape from Captivity.—A New York paper announces the arrival in that city of James Gammel, one of the Patriots who were taken in Canada, and condemned to death, but had their sentence commuted to transportation to Van Dieman's Land. The account says:

Gammel and eleven others were sent out from England, in the ship Canton, to Hobart's Town, on the 22d of September, 1839, and reached there January 16th, 1840. They were all sent one hundred miles into the interior to work on the great road leading across the island from Hobart Town to Launceston. Here they worked in irons for two years. After that Lord John Russell sent out orders to mitigate their condition. They then received each a "ticket of leave," and were allowed to work at their respective trades, on their own account, but still to be kept confined to the interior, and never to go to any seaport on the island.

Gammell, however, was allowed a pass by the magistrate of the district to go to Hobart Town, to get a model for a stump machine; and by the assistance of some American sailors then at Hobart Town, made his escape on board an American whale ship, and reached this city in fine health and spirits last Wednesday, being the first of the American prisoners who has made his escape from Van Dieman's land.

He wishes us to state that the following American prisoners have died since he went out:

Peter Williams, of United States; Alex. M'Leod, Gerard Van Camp, Canada; John James M'Miller, do.; Mr. Priest, Jefferson co. N. Y.; and Mr. Curtis.

Duelling.—A duel was fought on Saturday morning, of last week, between James Watson Webb, editor of the Courier and Enquirer of this city, and Mr. Marshall, a representative of Kentucky in Congress.—They fought with pistols at ten paces, and at the second fire Col. Webb was wounded in the knee, which terminated the affair.

We have not heard any one express regret that one of the parties was wounded, but many are of opinion that if both had been disfigured for life, the effect upon the practice of duelling would have been salutary. Mr. Marshall had just begun to rise in public estimation by his eloquent appeals in behalf of temperance; but this duel must forever condemn his name to infamy among all men who abhor the murderer.—Baptist Advocate.

Emigration from Germany.—Whole villages, including the rich as well as the poor, are emigrating, says a letter from Mentz, from Germany to North America. Three of those in Upper Hesse have, within these few months, been entirely abandoned, and several in Rhenish Prussia are preparing to follow the example. A short time ago the whole population of one of these villages passed through Mentz on its way to America, accompanied by its pastor and its schoolmaster.—Galignani.

Roman Catholic Missionary Murdered.—The Australian Chronicle mentions the killing of a Roman Catholic missionary, Rev. Father Chanel, by the natives of the Wallis Islands. He was barbarously murdered with spears and clubs, by a party of savage zealots, who were incensed that he had converted the king's son.

The Erie.—Capt. TAYLOR, with his associate explorers, returned in the Star last evening, after ten unsuccessful efforts to discover the Erie. The location pointed out by some of the survivors has been carefully explored and the bottom of the lake surveyed, but the hull of the vessel or any part of the machinery is as yet undiscovered. Capt. T. however, does not return disheartened, but merely to refit and gain farther and more accurate information as to the locale of the wreck. The persons who towed the burning vessel towards shore have not been consulted on this point.

During the cruisings of the Star she went in search of the schooner Helen Mar, lost with all on board some months ago in a gale, near the Canadian shore, a short distance from this city. The vessel was found in 78 feet of water, some 10 miles S. by W. from Point Abino, in a tolerable state of preservation. Some of lower bulwarks are carried away, her hatches are off, and nearly all the wheat has been washed from the hold. Capt. T. is of the opinion she can be raised without much difficulty.—Buffalo Daily Journal.

The Wheat.—The Prospects of the wheat harvests were never better, if ever before as good, in the Genesee Valley, renowned as this valley is for its excellent wheat. The uncommon coolness of the season is just right for wheat, though it causes some grumbling about othbr matters.

The accounts from all quarters concur in giving similar promise of an immense wheat harvest—west and south, as well as north. If there is starvation this fall, it won't be for scarcity of flour.—Western New Yorker.

The James Bank has again resumed business. Its notes are redeemed at the Albany Exchange Bank at 1-2 per cent.—The account of this Bank with the comptroller is as follows: circulating notes $32,350; secured by good bonds and mortgages, $57,000—Michigan University stock, $18,000. The authorities of Michigan acknowledge the validity of this emission of their stock; hence it appears that the circulating notes of the Bank are amply secured.

Tiger Hunt—The Javasche Courant of of Java states that two tigers having seized on an unfortunate inhabitant of Tjikadokan, to the east of Batavia, whilst cutting wood, and killed him before his son and some of his friends could lend assistance, the inhabitants determined to undertake a grand hunt and revenge his death. Having discovered where the animals were, they formed a circle, and gradually closed in upon their prey. At last the female made an attempt to clear the living hedge, but was met by a brother of the deceased, named Bapa Kira, who struck her violently on the head, with his knife, and, when the animal turned round, wounded her behind. When the tigress became more furious, rushed a second time forward, he seized her by the ear, and, holding her at arm's length, repeated wound on wound. Three other brothers having come to his assistance, the animal was quickly despatched and carried in triumph to their cottage.

An African Sceptere.—His Hajesty, Pahkotroo, King of one of the barbarous tribes back of the Liberian coast, uses the tail of an elephant for a sceptre. He lately sent in one of these emblems of power to the editor of the Luminary, with a commission as follows:

"King say you must send em white men country, and put all him hand (handle) for silber, (silver,) and and put king name dare, all same King Boson before. I be King now, I want do King fash. Any money he ketch I can pay you."

The tail was to be forwarded to England, to be mounted and inscribed and then returned to the royal hand.—Alb. Eve. Jour.

Notices.

NOTICE.

S. D. DELLAY takes this method of informing his friends and old customers that he has removed his stock of Goods to the Store of H. A. & F. C. DELLAY, where he is now able to offer them better inducements for trade than he ever before has been, in terms of credit, prices, &c. &c. He would also say that he will be permanently there, and intends making De Ruyter a location for years in the mercantile business. He would further say that he has not failed as some of his friends have endeavored to convince the public. He will be glad to see his debtor as well as his creditor, being able and willing to satisfy each.

De Ruyter, March 28 1842. v3n5tf

PROPOSALS

For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in [illegible] session on this subject are request[illegible] mit them as soon as convenient [illegible] respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead,) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

MARRIED,

In Plainfield, on the 3d inst., by Rev. Wm. B. Maxson, H. SAUNDERS CRANDALL M. D., of Leonardsville, and Miss F. ABIGAIL, daughter of Joshua C. Sisson, Esq., of the former place.

In Van Buren, Onondaga Co., on the 15th ult., by Truman Skinner, Esq., Mr. JOHN MC QUEEN, and Miss ALMEDA BENJAMIN, both of De Ruyter.

DIED,

In Stillwater, Saratoga Co., N. Y., June 19., Mrs. EMELINE, wife of Gorham Denison, late of Berlin, Renselaer Co., N. Y., and daughter of Jairus and Desire Maxson, in the 35th year of her age.

It is due to the memory of the deceased to say that for a number of years she was a member of the Baptist church in Berlin, and at the time of her death, a member of the Baptist Church in Stillwater. She possessed a strong mind, a vivid imagination, and a benevolent heart.

In the death of Mrs. Denison, the church has lost a worthy member, society one of its brightest ornaments, and the domestic circle, one of its most agreeable companions; yet, what is their irreparable loss, is her eternal gain. Suffice it to say that she was respected by all who knew her, and her virtues will be long remembered by those who had the pleasure of her acquaintance.

With her mind thoroughly grounded in the faith, and her heart deeply imbued with the spirit of her Savior; manifesting her love to Him by her christian walk and conversation; she experienced sustaining grace and the blessed prospect of eternal rest in the last and awful moments of death. She was ready and willing to die. Though her family and friends were entwined around her heart, yet after giving the faithful and dying advice of a mother, she calmly and cheerfully resigned herself into the arms of death, and her joyful spirit winged its way on the breezes of a delightful sabbath morning to enjoy an eternal sabbath of rest in heaven.

She has left a husband and six children to deplore her loss. May God in infinite wisdom sanctify this bereavement to the good of every branch of the family, and may they hear the still small voice of God in this dispensation of his providence saying to each of them 'Be still and know that I am God.'

Z. R.

LIST OF LETTERS.

J. H. Lupton, Benjamin Clark, Obadiah Lippencott, (thank you.) N. V. Hull. Warren Wellman, (we cannot, these "Hard Times," stop papers till they are paid for.) Z. Richards, B. Wiles.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

LIST OF LETTERS

REMAINING in the Post Office at De Ruyter June 30, 1842.

Allen Britton	Haskins Leander
Bentley E. A. Mrs.	Johnson Abira
Baker Sally A. Miss	Kinney Nathan
Barnard Daniel	Lewis L. E. Mrs.
Bogardus Isaac R.	Snow Harvey
Babcock Thos. E.	Seyman Benjamin
Curtis Lurana Mrs.	Sherwood Adah E.
Carr Thomas	Squares Ethan
Derbashire James	Shaver Harvey
Griswold Sherman S.	Terney John
Hagan Jane	Winons Stephen
Holmes Arza	Wooley Peter R.

M. SPEAR, P. M.

Economy is the road to Wealth.

JAMES M. LETTS, would inform his friends and customers, and the public generally that he has removed his Tailoring Establishment, to the building occupied by Eli A. Gage as a Hat Store, where he will be ready at all times to attend to cutting and making all manner of clothing as cheap as can be done in the village or county. Military work done in the latest and most approved fashion. Ladies Habits, and Coat Dresses Cut to order, at short notice. All work done at this establishment, shall be warranted to fit.

De Ruyter, July 1st 1842.

Notice.

ALL persons who are indebted to the subscriber, either in accounts or note, are requested to call and settle immediately and save cost.

De Ruyter, June 20, 1842.

JAMES M. LETTS.

FLOUR, PROVISIONS, GROCERIES, and six hundred other things, for sale by 11tf

May 11. HART, ACKLEY, & CO

BOOTS! BOOTS! SHOES! SHOES!!!

AT the sign of the Mammoth Boot, manufactured invariably of leather tanned in "cold liquor." Please call.

THE FARMER'S EXCHANGE is the place to buy Goods CHEAP. Oct. 20, 1841.

34tf S. G. WALKER.

BOOK BINDING.

THE subscriber having connected a BINDERY with his printing establishment, is now ready to execute all kinds of Binding in a neat and durable manner, on as reasonable terms as at any other establishment in this section of country.

JAMES BAILEY.

De Ruyter, June 8th 1841.

ORTANT WORK!

THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION,

A DICTIONARY OF

Arts, Manufactures, and Mines,

Containing a clear exposition of their

PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.

BY ANDREW URE, M. D., F. R. S., M. G. S.,
M. A. S. Lond., Mem. Acad. N. S.
Philad., S. Ph. Soc. N. Germ.
Hanov., Mulii, &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings

THIS is unquestionably the most popular work of the kind ever published, and a book most admirably adapted to the wants of all classes of the community. The following are the important objects which the learned author endeavors to accomplish:—

1st. To instruct the Manufacturer, Metallurgist, and Tradesman, in the principles of their respective processes, as to render them, in reality, the masters of their business; and, to emancipate them from a state of bondage to such as are too commonly governed by blind prejudice and a vicious routine.

2dly. To afford Merchants, Brokers, Drysalters, Druggists, and Officers of the Revenue, characteristic descriptions of the commodities which pass through their hands.

3dly. By exhibiting some of the finest developements of Chemistry and Physics, to lay open an excellent practical school to Students of these kindred sciences.

4thly. To teach Capitalists, who may be desirous of placing their funds in some productive branch of industry, to select, judiciously, among plausible claimants.

5thly. To enable gentlemen of the Law to become well acquainted with the nature of those patent schemes which are so apt to give rise to litigation.

6thly. To present to Legislators such a clear exposition of the staple manufactures as may dissuade them from enacting laws, which obstruct industry, or cherish one branch of it, to the injury of many others.

And, lastly, to give the general reader, intent, chiefly, on Intellectual Cultivation, views of many of the noblest achievements of Science, in effecting those grand transformations of matter to which Great Britain and the United States owe their paramount wealth, rank, and power, among the nations of the earth.

The latest Statistics of every important object of Manufacture are given from the best, and usually, from official authority, at the end of each article.

The work will be printed from the 2d London Edition, which sells for $12 a copy. It will be put on good paper, in new brevier type, and will make about 1400 8vo. pages. It will be issued in twenty-one semi-monthly numbers, (in covers,) at 25 cents each, payable on delivery.

☞ To any person, sending us five dollars, at one time, in advance, we will forward the numbers, by mail, post paid, as soon as they come from the press.

To suitable Agents, this affords a rare opportunity as we can put the work to them on terms extraordinarily favorable. In every manufacturing town, and every village, throughout the United States and Canada, subscribers may be obtained with the greatest facility. Address, post paid, La Roy Sunderland, 126 Fulton street, New-York.

⁂ To every editor who gives this advertisement entire 12 insertions, we will forward, to order, one copy of the whole work, provided the papers containing this notice be sent to the New-York Watchman, New-York. 31:12

STOVES.

COLD WINTER IS COMING

ABIJAH N. ANNAS,

LATE of the firm of "Elmore Annas & Ayer," has moved into the new building adjoining the Stone Store of John N. Elmore (La Fayette Block,) where he is receiving the largest and best assortment of STOVES ever before offered in this market, comprising every desirable pattern of Cooking, Hall, Box, Plate, and

Fancy Parlor Stoves,

Which he offers, Wholesale & Retail, on as favorable terms as can be purchased in this TOWN COUNTY or STATE. Most kinds of Produce Old Cast-Iron, and CASH, even, will not be refused in payment for any article in his line of business.

The subscriber manufactures all kinds of Stove Furniture, Pipe, Sheet Iron, Copper,

BRASS AND TIN WARE

Of every description, which he keeps constantly on hand, and offers at as

LOW PRICES

Either at wholesale or retail, as any other manufacturer in the State. All ware warranted, made of GOOD materials, and not LEAKY.

Eave Troughs

Made and put up to order. Also,

JUST RECEIVED

And for sale a full assortment of Westmoreland Climax Stoves and Cauldron Kettles.

JOB WORK

☞ Done well, on short notice, and for reasonable prices. N. B. Purchasers wishing to buy will please Call at the Centre Store, La Fayette Block No 3 Cortland Street.

De Ruyter, Oct. 15, 1841. 34tf

REMOVAL

JAMES M. LETTS, has removed his tailoring establishment to Eli A. Gage's hat store, 2 doors north of M. Spear's Hotel. April 6th 1842.

20 TONS Butter wanted at the
May 30. STONE STORE.

Not 25 or 50 per cent Reward.

S. G. WALKER

HAS received his NEW GOODS, which he is disposed and determined to sell as CHEAP, if not cheaper than can be bought at any other establishment in De Ruyter. Among his assortment may be found, Dry Goods, Dry Groceries, Crockery, Hardware, &c. Leghorn and Palm-Leaf hats and a variety of other things too numerous to mention.

Hear ye!! Hear ye!!! all persons wishing to buy goods CHEAP will please call at the Farmer's Exchange, and examine the quality and prices of his goods before purchasing elsewhere, and, Hear ye again!! any one having a little "Safety Fund" and indebted to S. G. Walker, will please call and deposit.

De Ruyter, May 23, 1842.

"Hard times and money scarce,"

IS the general complaint, and economy is the object of every person.

SUTTON & QUINBY have just opened a large assortment of Dry Goods, Groceries, Crockery, Paints, Oils and Dye-Stuffs. Persons wishing to make purchases are invited to call, as we feel confident that our Low Prices and Good Goods must give general satisfaction.

May 24 SUTTON & QUINBY.

BOOKS & STATIONERY.

SCHOOL BOOKS, of all descriptions, Miscellaneous Books & Stationery, at the Book Store of HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

De Ruyter, May 11, 1842. 11v3tf

50 PIECES BROAD CLOTHS, CASSIMERES, SATINETTES, at reduced prices at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

POETRY.

From the Morning Star.

Br. Burr:—Having been frequently solicited I send you the following hymn for publication.

A. Turner.

While angels strike their golden strings,
And veil their faces with their wings,
And join to praise the King of kings,
Each saint on earth to Jesus sings,
Who save their souls from ruin.

But sinners, fond of earthly toys,
Mock and deride while saints rejoice,
And close their ears to Jesus voice,
And make the world and sin their choice,
And crowd the way to ruin,

God's servants warn them night and day,
And for them Christians weep and pray;
When sinners loathe and turn away,
And join the wicked, lewd and gay,
And throng the road to ruin.

Sometimes by preaching sinners see
They're doomed to hell and misery,
And with the lord they then agree;
But soon their wicked company
Entice their souls to ruin.

Sometimes by visions of the night,
God doth their guilty souls affright,
They tremble at the awful sight,
But early with the morning light,
Return again to ruin.

Sometimes, when nothing else will do,
Afflictions do their danger show,
Which brings the haughty sinner low;
They then repent, and pray, and vow,
Yet turn again to ruin.

When every man is tried in vain,
The spirit strives no more with them;
Death strikes the blow—the sinner's slain!
They sink in guilt and endless shame,
And thus go down to ruin.

O sinner! turn, long time you've stood,
Opposed to truth and all that's good;
You may be sav'd through Jesus' blood,
Throw down your arms submit to God,
And thus be saved from ruin.

Dear sinner, neighbor, friend or foe,
The terrors of the Lord we know;
Tell us, O friends! what will ye do?
We'll ne'er consent to let you go
Down to eternal ruin.

Miscellaneous Department.

From the N. Y. Tribune.

PROF. BUSH'S SECOND LECTURE.

The Second Lecture of Prof. Bush, delivered at the Chapel of the University last Sabbath evening, was upon the predicted Return of the Jews to Palestine. No reader of history, he said, could fail to be struck by the most remarkable preservation and isolation of the Jews as a people. Their city has twice been destroyed, their royal line is extinct, and every bond which could hold them in political union has been sundered; and yet the Jew—in whatever part of the Earth he may be found—is a Jew still, marked by the same peculiarities of character as when he followed the cloudy pillar in his long march through the wilderness. No intermingling with the people of other Countries has been able to merge his nationality or to destroy those features by which he is distinguished in every portion of the Earth. This fact certainly signifies some special purposes of Divinity in his preservation. It is certainly important as proving the truth of recorded prophecy; but it goes farther than this, and in connection with that prophecy it clearly shows that the Jews—as a nation—will still be kept distinct; even after they shall have been converted to Christianity.

In examining their history and destiny it becomes most important to learn what intimations are to be found in the Scriptures that the Jews will be literally restored to Palestine. Prof. Bush cited from Ezekiel the passage which is believed to foretell, in unequivocal terms, the fulfillment of this event, and proceeded to adduce some reasons why he gave it a literal and not a figurative interpretation. The general analogy of Scriptural predictions, in the first place, made this necessary. Even in those cases in which we should pronounce the prophecies of Scripture least likely to be literally fulfilled we find them accomplished with nice exactness—as, for example, in those passages which foretell the miraculous conception of Jesus, his entry into the city riding on an ass's colt, and the division of his garments among those who crucified him. If, as we know, these predictions were literally fulfilled, what reason have we to suppose that a different accomplishment will be given to those concerning the Jews? So far as the prophecies concerning them have received their fulfillment, it has been in accordance with their letter. They have been literally cast out from the land of their fathers, they have become a hissing and a bye word among the nations, and have been loaded with ignominy and reproach. All these predictions have been fulfilled to the minutest particulars. Yet we find it written with equal minuteness and in terms as little capable of mistake that they shall at some future time be restored to their ancient land. By any other interpretation than this we deprive ourselves of the only argument in favor of Christianity which can successfully be addressed to a Jew.—They tell us that the prediction of their dispersion was literally fulfilled, and so must be that of their in-gathering.

It is frequently urged as an objection to this opinion that the literal restoration of the Jews is contrary to the spirit and tendencies of the Gospel dispensations, which repel the idea of isolation and distinction. What, It may be asked, is the use of this, and what means the inspired declaration that 'there is no difference between the Jew and the Gentile, but that they are all one in Christ,' if this belief of their return to Palestine be well founded? But surely our inability to see all the purposes of the divine will cannot countervail the evidence of the fact; and the passage cited evidently implies that all are by nature in the same state of depravity, and equally entitled to the benefits of the Gospel. It may be remarked that the writers of the New Testament say very little of this restoration; but it was because the Jews were at that time one nation, and since the great body of them rejected the Gospel, it was very natural that these writers should frequently speak of their dispersion.

But apart from the declarations of Scripture, there are many circumstances which give form or force to this belief. The Jews themselves expect this restoration; from age to age and from land to land it may be traced among them as a hope, sometimes stifled, but renewing its force and pointing to this as their final destiny. In this city, Professor Bush said he could never learn that the Jews as a body cherished any such hope. Their condition is so much better than that of those in Europe that the proposal strikes them as something repulsive; still it must be borne in mind that these are but a handful in comparison with the whole body. The Jews of Asia, of Europe and of Africa, all cherish the the same hope and live in the same confident expectation. This hope will revive and gain power as the Scriptures are studied by the Jews. The Talmud is now the book of authority among them, but one of the most cheering signs of the times is, that this in high places has already been laid aside, and its authority disputed, and the Christian Bible adopted in its stead.—The Jews moreover are every where sojourners rather than denizens; they form no attachment to the soil, no political alliances where they reside. They stand like their ancestors preparing for the feast—with their loins girded, their shoes upon their feet and their staff in their hands.—What does this indicate, so far as it has any signification, but that they are destined to return to the land of their father?

The whole course of events in modern times in relation to the Jews is prolific of hope. Every where a more respectful feeling is engendered toward them; they are no longer wholly rejected and despised, but are elevated to high and important stations; while the financial destiny of Europe is controlled by a Jewish banking house it is not easy to hold his race in contempt. A great national contest is more quickly settled by the gold of Rothschild than by diplomacy; and though the claims of Turkey and Egypt to the land of Palestine, are settled for the present, yet they are not decided. Each is held by a superior power. Russia and England now hold the contest in abeyance, and may not the question be working its way into the cabinets of European Kings—whether the surrender of this country to is inheritors is not required as a matter of right? The anomalous position of Syria, in reference to the return of the Jews, is certainly striking and full of interest.

Prof. Bush concluded his lecture by saying that the Return of the Jews would probably commence in a spirit of commercial enterprise; already we see the land extolled by Jewish writers as the destined centre of trade and commerce for the whole world. The movement thither thus once begun the great body of the Jewish people will share it, and the predictions of Scripture thus be ultimately fulfilled.

From the N. Y. Tribune.

THE JEWS.

Messrs. Editors:—In your notice of Professor Bush's last Lecture on the return of the Jews, you fall into some errors as well as the learned Professor himself, which it may be well enough to correct, particularly at this time, when deep interest is felt in relation to the advent of the Jews. It is not necessary here, to examine the various prophecies respecting the dispersions and ingatherings of the Jews, their sufferings, privations and banishments, nor to examine the causes, why for centuries, they have been cast out of the land of their fathers. It is generally supposed, that these calamities resulted from their acts—their sins their stiff neckedness. You, who are politicians and philosophers, know how to attribute results to natural causes. The Greeks—The Romans, the Medes and Persians, each kept united in their several countries, and were cut off.—The Jewish nation, with whom the Covenant of preservation was made, were dispersed, and are here at this day,—dispersed it is true, but more numerous, rich and powerful, than they were in the days of Solomon. It is useless to talk of collateral prophecies, here is the great one—the living one. The oath which God took, that he would protect Israel though all the nations of the earth were destroyed, were fulfilled. He dispersed them, to protect them not to punish them; the Jews are the only nation on earth, who never divided the attibutes of the Lord with a mortal, and the Lord has ever marked them as his people, and all the nations who have scoffed and insulted and despised the Jew, will in fulfillment of the prophecies "take hold of the skirts of him that is a Jew, saying I will go with you, for God is with you."

How could Professor Bush fall into such an error as to believe, that the Jews of this city cherished no hope of the restoration of their nation, and that the "proposal strikes them as something repulsive?"

There is not a shadow of ground for this supposition. The Jews throughout the world, one and all, hope and expect and pray, for the restoration of the nation. On this point there is not a shadow of difference of opinion, Professor Bush says: "The Talmud is now the only book of authority among them, but one of the most cheering signs of the times is, that this in high places has already been laid aside, its authority disputed, and the Christian Bible adopted in its stead." How could my learned and worthy friend, advance such an opinion, without the authority of a single fact to support it? [Our condensed notice of Prof. Bush's Lecture has led our esteemed correspondent into an error.—Prof. B. did cite the authority of a fact to support his statement—though the mistake in the assertion that the Christian Bible—including the Gospels have been adopted in place of the Talmud, was his own.—The Old Testament alone was meant.—This instance cited by Prof. B. is mentioned in a work called 'Lights and Shadows of London Life.' That author says that a great number of Jews, at the head of whom is Sir Isaac Lyons Goldsmid, have seceded from the general body, in consequence of the latter placing Rabbinical writings on the same footing with the five books of Moses. They denounce the Talmud as a mass of outrageous absurdities, and are to adhere exclusively to the authority of Moses in all religious matters.]

Ed. Tribune.

The Talmud of Jerusalem, and the Gemara or Talmud of Babylon, containing the traditions and canons of the Jewish Law, valued by Christians as well as Jews for its antiquity and great learning, continues to be held in high estimation by learned Jews throughout the world. Modern Jews not familiar with the Hebrew language, are imperfectly acquainted with these works, but their authority has never been disputed. The sect of Caradite Jews in Russia and Poland, alone respect the traditions, and adhere to the Law and the Prophets. As to the "Christian Bible," meaning the New Testament being adopted by Jews in the place of the Talmud as Professor Bush above says, there is no truth in it, immediately or prospectively; there is not the least ground for the assertion, and reflecting, sensible Christians, should never indulge the hope, that the Law and the Prophets will ever be rejected by the Jews for any substitute.

You are probably aware of the experiment recently made in Jerusalem, of appointing a converted Jew as a Christian Bishop, and reading the New Testament in a synagogue; adopting Jewish forms and ceremonies, but teaching Christianity. The Boshop and his congregation were destroyed by Christians in Jerusalem, not Jews. The Jews remained tranquil and depended upon a higher power for protection. There is no hope of the conversion of the Jews to any other faith. No good Christian should desire it; they heave been preserved for great purposes, and men should not attempt to change their character, or interfere with the will of God, in relation to their future destinies. Let peace and good will prevail among Jew and Gentile, without reference to religious matters. You have never probably read the thirteen articles of the Jewish Creed, as thrown into form by Maimonides at the close of the eleventh century, and originally adopted by the Jews as a Confession of Faith immediately after their dispersion. Here they are.

1. I believe with a firm and perfect faith that God is the Creator of all things.—That he guides and supports all creatures: that he has done every thing; that he still acts and shall act during the whole eternity.
2. God is one. There is no unity like his. He alone hath been, is, and shall be eternally our God.
3. God is not corporeal. He cannot have any natural properties; and no corporeal issue can be compared with him.
4. God is the beginning and ending of all things, and shall eternally subsist.
5. God ought to be worshipped, and none but him ought to be adored.
6. Whatever has been taught by the prophets is true.
7. The doctrine and prophecy of Moses are true. He is the father of all Doctors that lived before or after, or shall live after him.
8. The law that we have was given by Moses.
9. This law shall never be altered, and God will give no other.
10. God knows all the thoughts and actions of men.
11. God will regard all those who have performed what he commands, and punish those who have transgressed his laws.
12. The Messiah is to come; and although he stays a long time, I will wait till he comes.
13. The resurrection of the dead shall happen when God shall think fit. Blessed and Glorified eternally be the name of the Creator. Amen.

Here we have all the mystery of the Jewish religion, and the faith and confession of Israel; who will take the responsibility of asking the Jews to change their faith? And what are the "cheering signs" to which my friend, Professor Bush, refers when he talks of throwing aside the Talmud for what he calls the "Christian Bible?" Who among Christians will refuse to adopt the foregoing confessions of faith of the Jews? Christ adopted them in extenso. These were his Catechism. Why should any signs be deemed "cheering" which would change them? Bishop Hobart once said to me, "I am against converting the Jews." Why so, Bishop?" "Because," said he, "they are the living witnesses of the truth of the Christian religion." He spoke like a man who had faith, A layman and a philosopher would have said, "Can we give them a purer, a more rational religion?" Professor Bush is probably right in supposing that the return of the Jews to the Holy Land would commence in a spirit of commercial enterprize. He means that the repossession of Palestine will result from purchase, not conquest; that the purse-strings, not the sword, will prove the efficient agent. Every thing now has that tendency. Moses, the most practical political leader of the Jewish or any democracy ever had, told the Jews never to borrow money, but always to be lenders. The result of this counsel is, that all the monarchies of the world are indebted to the Jews. They hold in pledge their crown and scepters. The Sultan depends upon them for loans. Mehemet looks to them for succor. The Affghanistans strike at British power in India with the gold which they procure from them. Russia has her Jewish Bankers.—England is in their hands in a great measure, and as they cannot, like the younger partners in the great American family, repudiate, they must liquidate. England, Russia, Turkey and Egypt, will agree to restore Palestine, and thus expunge a few millions of their respective debts; and a highly intelligent, powerful, enterprising people, will tranquilly make the Holy Land more prosperous than it ever was in the "golden days of its commercial prosperity." Christians will rejoice in the fulfillment of the prophecies—good, liberal Christians will be overjoyed at seeing the promises of God fulfilled to the descendants of Abraham. I have no doubt that Jerusalem at a future day will be the richest city in the world, because all the Jews will go there who have made fortunes in other countries. They will gather the fruits of their toil, and go to Jerusalem to be buried in the valley of Jehoshaphat.—Professor Bush believes in their restoration—conscientiously believes in it. He knows that to fulfil the prophecies—to redeem the great promises—they must return as Jews. How can they return as such if converted? Nil admirari. We live in wonderful times, strange revolutions are taking place daily, and I hope my learned friend, the Professor, may live to see the fine steam-ship Judas Maccabeus sailing out of the East River under the Hebrew flag direct for Jaffa in Palestine, a passage only of 22 days, and I hope I may be there to hand him ashore, and when he sees the broad banner of Judah floating on the turrets of that ancient city, he will call to mind the "cheering signs" to which he referred when he once spoke of the Jews rejecting their Bible, their law, and their sacred faith. N.

From the Boston Transcript.

RUNNING IN DEBT.

One who has a good name and a good credit can easily run in debt; but to escape from the toils of such a snare, is often found a most perplexing business. No devices which young men have invented to involve themselves in difficulties and ruin, are more frequent than that of incurring a debt at a very early age, without any real necessity. No sooner is the aspiring youth emancipated from school, than he becomes, in his own idea, a man; and not only so, but a man of consequence, whom it behooves to dress and make a figure. To accomplish this purpose of making a figure, some expensive vices are to be affected or practised. But as the stipends of young men just entering into life are usually inconsiderable, it is necessary to borrow on the most disadvantageous terms, or purchase the various requisites of a pleasurable life on credit. The debt soon accumulates from small beginnings to a great sum. The young adventurer continues, while his credit is good, in the same wild career; but adieu to real pleasure, to improvement, to honest industry, and to a quiet mind. His peace is wounded. A perpetual load seems to weigh him down, and though his feelings may, by length of time and habit, become too callous to be affected by the misery of his situation, yet he is lost to all sincere enjoyment; and if he fall not a victim to despair, survives only to gain a precarious subsistence at the gaming table, to deceive the unwary, and to elude the researches of creditors. Even if he be enabled, by the death of his parents or rich relations, to pay the debts which his youthful folly has contracted yet has he suffered long and much, and lost the beginning of life, the season of rational delight and solid improvement, in distress and fears, in fabricating excuses and pretences, and in flying from the eager pursuit of duns and sheriffs.

But the habit of incurring, though in the earlier periods of life it may originate in thoughtlessness, often leads to crime most atrocious in itself, and injurious to society. He who prayed against poverty, lest he should be poor and steal, understood human nature. Difficulties and distress have a natural tendency to lessen the restraints of conscience.

The profligacy, the vanity, the unceasing pursuit of pleasure, and the passion for external appearance, which characterize the present age, are necessarily productive of expense; expenses occasion distress, where principles are deficient, dishonesty. No wonder, then, that in no age have sharpers, swindlers, insolvent contractors of debt, so much abounded. There is scarcely any mode of public life in which you can be engaged without having your property exposed to the depredations of villains, who have made cheating a profession, and reduced the art of robbery to a system. Many of the persons who live on the substance of others, by borrowing, purchasing, or employing, without intending, and without being able to pay, make a splendid figure, and pass for gentlemen of honor. But, however, they may felicitate themselves on their success, and in the gratification of their pride and vanity, they are more criminal and detestable than highwaymen and house-breakers, because in the crime of theft there is no breach of generous confidence.

A Bit of Advice.—The following we take from the New Orleans Picayune, and many of our be-chained and be-ringed fops would do well to profit by it.—"Young men make a very wrong estimate of public opinion when they think to be thought well of and respected for a dandified exterior.

Dandy dress and dandy manners are things more envied by the simple than desired or respected by the intelligent and worthy of either sex. The lad who has arrived at the age of self-importance, may be assured that the little foppish trinkets which he regards as conferring upon his person consequence and commanding respect, are in fact the symbols of his folly in the eyes of those for whom he assumes them."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

LOTS OF HATS & CAPS on hand—Fashionable and Old Fashioned, Bell Crowned and Low Crowned; and, to crown all, and not be out of Fashion, Cash and most kinds of stuff received in payment, by HART, ACKLEY, & CO

SILK! SILK!! SILK!!!

A BEAUTIFUL assortment of plain, figured and striped, just received and for sale [illegible] cheap at the NEW YORK CASH STORE

"A nimble sixpence is better than a slow shilling."

SPRING GOODS! SPRING GOODS!

CHEAP! CHEAP!! CHEAP!!!

THE undersigned are receiving a large assortment of goods suitable for the spring and summer trade, and invite their friends and the public generally to call and examine them at the one price store. SUTTON & QUINBY

PROSPECTUS OF THE FARM HOUSE OF THE XIX CENTURY, OR ENCYCLOPEDIA OF PRACTICAL AGRICULTURE, containing the best mode of culture adopted in France, England, Germany, and Flanders; full practical instructions to guide the small cultivator, the farmer, the director, and the large proprietor in the improvement of an estate; the general principles of agriculture, and the culture of all the useful plants; the training of domestic animals, and the veterinary art; the description of various arts relating to agriculture; rural implements and buildings; the management and improvement of vines, fruit trees, timber and forests, tanks, etc; the economy, organization, and direction of a rural establishment; and finally legislation as applied to agriculture, closing with a table of contents alphabetically arranged, a list of figures, abbreviations, and authorities cited.

An Elementary, Complete, and Methodical Course of Rural Economy, with more than Two Thousand Engravings, representing the various Implements, Machines, sets of Apparatus, Breeds of Animals, Trees, Shrubs, and Plants, Rural Buildings, etc. Digested and Revised by a Committee of Scientific and Practical Agriculturists, belonging to the Agricultural Society of France, under the direction of M. T. Bailey, Member of the Societies of Agriculture and Horticulture. Translated from the French, with Notes adapting it to the use of farmers in the United States of America, by Elizur Wright, jr., formerly Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in the Western Reserve College. Translator of La Fontaine's Fables, &c.

Agriculture is the foundation of all human arts—the art for which man was made, and the perfection of which is his chief happiness and glory as the lord temporal of this planet. [illegible] other arts and sciences are but satellites [illegible] business being to wait on, enlighten, and [illegible] their moonshine. Consequently, no man more than the agriculturist needs the fullest [illegible], and a perfect command of all the [illegible] human experience. So the farmers of the United States view the matter; and in presenting them with a translation of the celebrated Maison Rustique of the French, we have no doubt of their hearty support. It is the work of all works on practical agriculture, the most scientific, clear and comprehensive. France has long excelled in profitable farming. This is the source of her wealth. England is rich by coals and commerce. Her agriculture is splendid, but sometimes costs more than it comes to. Those who have fortunes to spend may buy the vast works of Marshall, Dickson, Arthur Young, Loudon, &c., but those who wish to get a fortune out of the soil will find the French writers better able to show them the way. The excellence of French elementary works is well known to all teachers. For centuries, the Maison Rustique has been, in France, the standard elementary work—the spelling book and grammar of farming. The present edition for "the nineteenth century," has been re-written and brought up with the "march of mind," by sixty of the ablest "agronomes" of France. It has all the light of the latest improvements, not only in France, but in all Europe.

William Cobbett, one of the most successful farmers both in England and America, who wrote the best English style and the best French grammar that ever was, valued the Maison Rustique, not only as an encyclopedia of farming, but [illegible] of educating his children. He was his own schoolmaster. In winter evenings he [illegible] himself into a school, and he thus speaks of the use then made of this work.

"Our book of never failing resort was the French Maison Rustique, or Farm House, which, it is said, was the book that first tempted [illegible] (I think that was his name) [illegible] in the reign of Louis XIV. [illegible] Here are the four-legged animals, from the horse down to the mouse, portraits and all; all the birds, reptiles, insects; all the modes of taking, managing, and using the tame ones, and destroying those that are mischievous; all the various [illegible] springs, nets, all the [illegible] exhibited, as well as the rest [illegible] was [illegible] to read the French, and tell [illegible] what it meant in English, when the picture did not sufficiently explain itself. I never have been without a copy of this book for forty years, except during the time that I was fleeing from the dungeons of Castlereagh and Sidmouth in 1817, and when I got to Long Island, the first book I bought was another Maison Rustique."—Advice to Young Men. [illegible] 129

Of the qualifications of the translator, it may be said that he is a practical farmer, and in regard to his translation of La Fontaine, which has been reprinted in England, an English reviewer confesses that he "does not know the English writer who could have done it better."

Terms.—The work will be published as a semi-monthly periodical, in numbers of 56 pages, octavo, each 25 cents, and when completed will contain forty numbers, at $10.

Five dollars paid in advance for the first 20 Numbers, shall entitle subscribers to the remaining 20 Numbers for four dollars.

Or, nine dollars in smaller sums, (if not less than $1,) regularly advanced during the course of publication, shall entitle the same reduction.

The 1st number will be issued on the 1st of July, 1842.

All orders and remittances should be addressed to S. S. HASKELL, Publisher, 138 Fulton-st. New York.

New York, June 1, 1842.

 All editors who will give this prospectus fifteen insertions, and forward the papers containing them to the New York Watchman, shall be entitled to one copy of the work. 18w15

NO IMPOSITION.

NO STATES PRISON WORK!

THOSE wishing to purchase BOOTS and SHOES of superior quality of custom work, will find just the place by calling at the sign of the MAMMOTH BOOT.

De Ruyter, May 29, 1842.

How to make money,

IS the study of mankind and of the Yankee Nation in particular. The easiest and most practicable plan for accomplishing the desired end in these times is to "Save Money," which can be done by purchasing NEW GOODS, instead of the trashy accumulations of many shops and many years. The place to do this, is at ELMORE'S, whose stock of NEW GOODS is nearly equal to all the rest received in this village and who is daily dispensing great bargains to "Fortune's Favorites."

May 30.

Of Drugs and Medicines,

THE subscriber keeps a much larger stock and sells much lower than those who advertise two columns.

May 30. J. N. ELMORE

4 CASES, Superior quality, fashionable Hats; just received, and for sale low at the

May 30. STONE STORE.

500 PAIRS Boots and Shoes for sale at the

May 30 STONE STORE.

NEW TAILORING ESTABLISHMENT

THE subscriber would inform the Citizens of De Ruyter and its vicinity, that he has opened a shop in the second story of S. G. Walker's store, Farmer's Exchange, where he may at all times be found, and where those who are pleased to favor him with a call may have their garments made as well as at any establishment west of New York City.

N. B. [illegible] cut and warranted if made by competent workmen. New York Spring and Summer Fashions just received by W. P. GUEST

De Ruyter, April 25th, 1842

FLOUR! FLOUR!! FLOUR!!!

SUPERFINE Flour for sale at the Farmers' Exchange, [illegible] in good order in barrels and half barrels. Said Flour is made from the best of western wheat at one of the best mills in the state.

S. G. WALKER.

De Ruyter, April 18th, 1842

BLANKS! BLANKS!!

JUSTICES' Blanks, Personal Mortgages, &c., just printed and for sale at this office

De Ruyter, Apr. 20, 1842.

TEAS, SUGARS.

CALL and see how cheap they are selling them at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

Oct 11

AGENTS FOR THE REGISTER.

NEW-YORK.

Adams—[illegible] Potter, H. H. Baker, Job Spencer.
Alfred—James R. Irish, Maxson Greene, Oran Vincent, Samuel Russell P. M.
Berlin—John Whitford.
Brookfield—Andrew Babcock, Silas Bailey, Adin Burdick, Samuel B. Crandall.
[illegible]—[illegible] Babcock, J. L. Scott.
[illegible]—Nathan V. Hull.
[illegible]—[illegible] Saunders.
[illegible]—Dea. Joseph Potter.
[illegible]—Dea. Ephraim Maxson.
[illegible]—[illegible] Greene.
[illegible]—[illegible] Campbell, Samuel E. [illegible]
[illegible]—W. P. Langworthy, Dea. E. P. Crandall, [illegible] B. Maxson, H. P. Greene.
[illegible]—[illegible] West.
[illegible]—John P. Livermore.
[illegible]—[illegible] Burdick, [illegible]
[illegible]—[illegible]
New York City—[illegible] Stillman.
[illegible]—[illegible]
[illegible]—Charles M. Lewis.
[illegible]—[illegible]
[illegible]—George Crandall.
[illegible]—[illegible] Rogers.
[illegible]—[illegible] Whitford.
[illegible]—Geo. P. Burdick.
[illegible]—[illegible]
[illegible]—[illegible] Potter, James Hubbard, [illegible]
[illegible]—[illegible] West.
[illegible]—[illegible] Greene.
[illegible]—[illegible]
[illegible]—[illegible] William B. Maxson.
[illegible]—[illegible]
[illegible]—[illegible]
[illegible]—[illegible] Saunders.

RHODE-ISLAND.

[illegible]—[illegible]
[illegible]—[illegible]

CONNECTICUT.

[illegible]—[illegible] Rogers, [illegible]
[illegible]—[illegible]

NEW-JERSEY.

[illegible]—Thomas S. [illegible]
[illegible]—W. B. Gillett.
[illegible]—[illegible]
[illegible]—[illegible]

PENNSYLVANIA.

[illegible]—[illegible]

VIRGINIA.

[illegible]—[illegible]

OHIO.

[illegible]—[illegible] Babcock, [illegible]
[illegible]—[illegible] Davis.
[illegible]—[illegible]

MICHIGAN.

[illegible]—[illegible]

WISKONSAN.

Milton, [illegible]—Joseph Goodrich, [illegible]

IOWA.

[illegible]—S. B. Brown.

The Seventh-day Baptist Register
IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY,
AT DE RUYTER, MADISON CO., N. Y.
BY
JAMES BAILEY.

TERMS.—To village subscribers who have the paper left at their doors, $2 25, in advance, or $2 50, at the expiration of the year.

☞ To office and mail subscribers, $2 IN ADVANCE.

Each communication, involving facts and intended for insertion in the paper, must be accompanied by a responsible name.

No subscription received for a less term than six months.

☞ All subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, will be considered as wishing to continue their subscription, and their paper will be sent to them accordingly. No paper will be discontinued till all arrearages are paid except at the discretion of the publisher.

☞ Advertisements inserted on the most reasonable terms.

☞ All letters and communications to ensure attention should be addressed to the publisher free of postage.

J. T. Rog

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.

VOL. III.---NO 20.] JAMES BAILEY, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.—A. H. BURDICK, PRINTER. [WHOLE NO. 124

Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,——The SEVENTH DAY *is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.—*COMMANDMENT.——If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments.—JESUS CHRIST.

TWO DOLLARS IN ADVANCE.] DE RUYTER, N. Y., FOURTH-DAY, JULY 13, 1842. [PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Original Papers.

For the Register.

WINDS.

Winds are currents of air, produced by the rarefaction or condensation of particular portions of the atmosphere, by heat, cold, lightning, etc.

The sun, the great source of light and heat, is the principal agent in regulating winds, though its effects are so modified, on almost every portion of the globe, by local causes, that notwithstanding the general principles involved in the phenomena of winds are few and simple, yet it is often quite difficult to ascertain all the secondary or modifying causes concerned in the production of a particular wind, and we can only say, "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth."

Were the earth uniform, that is, equally under the sun's influence, it is obvious that the wind would always blow from east to west. But as this is the case only near the equator, and there only on the oceans, the other parts of the earth must be subject to variable winds, for an alternation of heat or cold happening in any portion of the atmosphere, the air in that portion will either become rarefied or condensed, and the adjacent atmosphere will be put in motion by the tendency of the air to an equilibrium, which tendency always manifests itself by the ascending of the heated air, and the rushing of the cold circumjacent air towards the partial vacuum thus formed.

For the purpose of convenience, winds may be divided into three kinds: 1. Trade winds. 2. Monsoons. 3. Variable winds.

1. The Trade winds derive their name from their convenience in trade; they prevail in the Torrid Zone, and a little beyond it, extending to about 30 degrees on both sides of the Equator. When not affected by local causes, they blow constantly at the same place, in one and the same direction. Their general course is from north-east to south-west on the north side of the Equator, and from south-east to north-west on the south side of the Equator. They are produced by the combined agency of two causes, namely, heat, and the revolution of the earth on its axis. The sun, being always directly over the Torrid Zone, heats the atmosphere in that region much more than in the Temperate or Frigid Zones; the heat renders the atmosphere lighter, and, consequently, it rises, while that of the north and south makes its way towards the vacuum which is forming, and thus produces on the north side of the Equator a wind from the north, and on the south side of the Equator a wind from the south.

2. The air over the Torrid Zone being, as before stated, lighter than that either north or south of it, and the velocity of the earth being greater in this region than in any other, the air does not move so fast as the earth, and, consequently, there is a wind from east to west. Now this wind meeting the wind from the north, produces on the north side of the Equator a wind to the south-west, or from the north-east, and meeting the wind from the south, produces on the south side of the Equator a wind towards the north-west, or from the south-east. The direction of the trade winds is variously modified in different parts of the world, but always in such a manner that their general direction is as stated above. On the continents of America and Africa, the trade winds are interrupted by the high mountains that lie in the direction of north and south, particularly by the Andes in America, the mountains of the Moon, Kong, and Lupata, in Africa.

2. The Monsoons, or, (as in Arabic, and Mallay,) mausons, are periodical winds which blow six months in one direction, and six months in the contrary. They prevail chiefly in the Red Sea, the Arabian Sea, in the northern part of the Indian Ocean, and in the Chinese Sea. The monsoons are neither the same with respect to the points on which wind blows, nor are the times of their changing the same. The changing is not the work of a moment, but is sometimes several weeks in being brought about, during which time there will occasionally be calms, variable winds, violent storms, and even hurricanes; these tempests are called by the sailors the breaking up of the monsoons. On the west side of the Arabian Sea, they commence about the first of September blowing from the north-east towards the south-west, and continue blowing in this direction until about the first of April, when they change and blow from the south-west during the remainder of the year. To account for this apparently strange phenomenon, we have only to consider the relative situation of Asia, Africa, and the Indian Ocean. When the sun is returning from the north, and approaches the Equator in September, and thence till he, having performed the circuit to the south, and returns, reaching Asia, which will be about the first of April, the Indian Ocean, and the Equatorial parts of Africa are warmer than the southern parts of Asia, consequently, during this period of time the wind blows from Asia towards the southern portions of Africa, making, as before stated, a north-east wind. During the remainder of the year, or from April to September, the south of Asia, particularly Arabia and Hindoostan, being warmer than that part of Africa which lies south-west of them, especially the mountains of the Moon, the wind blows from the south-west. These winds are also more or less modified by the revolution of the earth on its axis.

East of Sumatra and Malacca, on the north of the Equator, and along the coast of Cambodia and China, through the Philippines, as far as Japan, the monsoons blow north one part of the year, and south the remaining part; the wind from the north commencing about the first of May. These winds probably owe their origin to the relative situation of China, the vast island of New Holland, and the waters lying between them. They are more variable and less affected by the east wind, arising from the revolution of the earth on its axis, than those of the Arabian Sea, owing to the modifying influence of the numerous islands, and especially of the large island of Borneo, which lies between China and New Holland.

3. Variable winds are those that blow in no fixed direction, but sometimes change to every point of the compass in a few hours. These winds prevail chiefly in the Temperate and Frigid Zones of both hemispheres. In England, the principal points from which the wind blows, are N. E. about five months, S. W. about six months, and the remaining month from every point of the compass. In the United States, the wind generally blows from all the cardinal and intermediate points of the compass, during each month of the year. According to the report made to the Regents of the University of N. Y., the wind at Albany during the past year, was from the N. 70 1-2 days, N. E. 36 1-2, E. 6 1-2, S. E. 10, S. 75, S. W. 35 1-2, W. 13 1-2, N. W. 97 1-2. At Washington, it was from the N. 41 days, N. E. 89, E. 4, S. E. 37 1-2, S. 54 1-2, S. W. 79 1-2, W. 27 1-2, N. W. 32.

In islands and places near the sea, in warm climates, the wind blows from the sea during the day, and from the land during the night, producing what are called, land and sea breezes. In the Mediterranean Sea, the West Indies, &c., the land breeze begins at 6 or 7 o'clock in the evening, and blows till 8 in the morning, when the breeze from the sea commences, increasing till noon, and gradually dying away in the afternoon, until it reaches a perfect calm before the next breeze from the land begins. These winds are accounted for by the well known fact that during the day, the sea absorbs more of the suns heat, and, consequently, reflects less into the atmosphere than the earth does; hence, during the day, the atmosphere over the land is warmer, more rarefied, and rises, while that over the sea makes its way towards the land. During the night, the sea emits the heat that it absorbed during the day, its atmosphere is rarefied, rises, and that from the land restores the equilibrium, thus producing the breeze from the land.

Hurricanes, are violent storms occurring in hot countries, as South America, West Indies, &c., in which the wind changes in a short time to every point of compass, and blows with a violence which scarcely any thing can resist. They are attended with great swelling of the sea, and sometimes with earthquakes. They occur in the rainy season, principally in August, destroying all the productions of the earth, tearing up trees, blowing down buildings, and inundating large tracts of country. The trade winds are interrupted during their continuance.

Whirlwinds are formed by opposite winds meeting, and moving round swiftly in a circle, raising sand and other light bodies into the air. In the deserts of Africa they sometimes draw up sand into a moving pillar, which buries all in their way. When they occur on the ocean, they draw up water producing water-spouts.

The quantity of winds is effected by the countries over which they pass; and they are sometimes rendered pestilential by the heat of deserts, or the putrid exhalations of marshes and lakes. From the deserts of Africa, Arabia, and the adjacent countries, a hot wind blows, called the Simoon, or Saniel, which is very unwholesome and sometimes produces instant death. The Harmattan, which blows from the Sahara upon the western coasts of Africa, produces a dryness, which is said by travelers to be almost insupportable, and it is also so hot as to scorch like the blasts of a furnace.

The Sirocco, which blows from Africa upon Spain and Italy, is warm and unpleasant. It occasions great uneasiness in the human frame, irritating the nervous system, and checking perspiration; and although its temperature does not exceed 75 degrees, yet it produces such a dry, feverish heat, and such debility in the body, that exertion is said to be very painful. This wind rarely lasts three days, and frequently only a few hours. During its continuance, however, the inhabitants usually shut themselves up in their houses to avoid its influence.

The velocity of winds is variable. The trade winds, according to Lalande, move from 5 to 6 miles an hour; a brisk gale from 12 to 15; high winds from 30 to 40; and storms and hurricanes from 50 to 100.

Winds have a powerful effect in purifying and rendering salubrious the air on all parts of the globe, and, indeed, were it not for their genial influence in removing effluvia, and nauseous gasses, which arise from combustion, decomposition of animal and vegetable substances, etc., animal life, in many parts of the globe, could not continue a single day; so that in the subject, cause, and operation of winds, as well as in every other department of nature, we see the wisdom, and benevolence of Him, "who rideth on the wings of the wind," and careth for all the creatures of His power.

G. M. L.

Religious Department.

From the N. Y. Observer.

ENTERTAINING ANGELS UNAWARES.

Once we entertained an angel. It happened on this wise. My father was a country minister, and his parish lay in a lovely region of country, west of the Green Mountains, on the high road from the Eastern States to the Springs. Often would ministers drive up to the door in their Yankee gigs, having previously ascertained by enquiry where the parish pastor lived, and calling to us boys at the door, would say, "does Mr. —— live here?" On being answered in the affirmative, they would ask again, "Does he keep minister's tavern?"—that is, does he entertain ministers for nothing—and being again answered in the same way, they would add, "Well, take my horse and give him four quarts of oats to-night, and four in the morning, and don't water him till he gets cool." With these laconic intimations that they felt quite at home, they would walk in to enjoy the entertainment kept for the "man," while we took care of the "beast."

Now all this seemed sufficiently cool, not to say presuming, on the part of entire strangers, but it was the custom, and I guess no one ever went away without an invitation, and a strong resolution, to call again if he ever passed that way.

But about the angel. He was not traveling to the Springs, but was an angel of the churches, a messenger sent by some one of the benevolent institutions of the day to receive the alms of God's people. Some called him a beggar; others an agent; I have called him an angel; which title he deserved, as the sequel will show. It was in winter; and about the middle of the week when he arrived; we had sickness in the family, and he came to stay through the week, and over the Sabbath; and would it have been strange if we had felt that his room was more desirable than his company under such circumstances? Would it have been uncivil or unkind to have told him that it was very inconvenient for us to have him staying at our house, and we would prefer to quarter him among the people? However that may be, we preferred to keep him, and make him as comfortable as we could.

He stayed. One after another of the family was taken sick; the parents were confined to the bed; the children were down; the help gave out and went to bed, and the traveling minister, the stranger who had turned in to tarry with us, was the only well person in the house. And what did he do? Did he call in some of the neighbors, and then look out for more convenient quarters? Not at all. He nursed the sick, as if nursing was his business; he went to the barn, and took care of the "cattle," as if he had been brought up at the stable; he split and brought in the fuel, as if he had lived in the woods; he was at hand when he was wanted, and out of the way when he was not; he was active, clever, cheerful, as much at home as if he were among his own children, and not with strangers whom he had never seen before, and whom he might never see again.

He stayed over the Sabbath, preached for my father who was still not able to be out; and having seen us in a good degree convalescent, he went on his way rejoicing. His name is remembered with delight by the members of that household to this day, though many years have since fled, and that family has been scattered widely; some are as far apart as earth and heaven.

Our folks always kept open doors for the Lord's ministers, and they never had reason to regret it. Some of us have been thrown far from home and among strangers, and some of our number have sickened and died among strangers, and the Lord has always surrounded them with kind friends whose sympathy has proved that our Father in heaven is faithful and true, when he says, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, ye have done it unto me." He has provided friends for us among strangers, and we love to befriend strangers at our gate.

It was an injunction of divine wisdom that we should not be forgetful to entertain strangers, for some had thereby entertained angels unawares. And those who are most "given to hospitality," find real enjoyment in obeying this precept.

There is a vast difference among people on the subject of entertaining strangers. As a plain country minister, I have had frequent opportunities of making comparisons, and the result is this:—

When we go to Presbytery or Synod, or to a religious convention of any sort in some places, the good people seem to vie with each other in seeing who will most freely and handsomely entertain the strangers.—Every house is open; every heart is warm; every face is pleasant; and while we stay we are treated as welcome guests; and when we go, it is with repeated and pressing invitations to come again, and never to pass through the place without favoring the family with a call.

On the hand, I have sometimes gone to other places on such errands, and it has been with extreme difficulty that we could find lodgings, through the ability of Christians to entertain strangers, far exceeded that of the people before described. And it is no unusual thing for ministers who have been invited by public notices to attend religious meetings in certain places, with the assurance that entertainment would be provided for them, to find on their arrival that they must seek their entertainment at a public house, and pay for it at the rate of one or two dollars a day. Now if ministers render themselves so disagreeable by the use of tobacco, or any other vile practice, that their company is not desired, I have not one word to say. I once heard a minister apologize for his people's reluctance to accommodate guests, by saying that "angels do not chew tobacco, and therefore they were sure of not entertaining angels when they asked the brethren to their houses." I know such men are a great annoyance to neat housekeepers. And ministers, who desire hospitality, ought to abandon those habits that render their society unpleasant.

But this objection is often merely an excuse. Hospitality is a Christian duty, and those who would in the last great day, hear the Savior saying unto them, "I was a stranger and ye took me in" must love to entertain Christ's friends, whether they come with the homely garb of the country, or the polished exterior of city life.

RUSTICUS.

FEMALE PROPHETS OF UNIVERSALISM.

Mrs. P——, is a very brisk old lady, and a very noisy propagator of Universalism. One day a neighbor of hers, to whom she had been holding forth the doctrine some time, replied thus:

Neighbor. Well, aunt P——, I will tell you what the Bible says about Universalists.

Mrs. P.—What does it say?

N. Here it is, in the 23d of Jeremiah, "I have seen also in the prophets of Jerusalem a horrible thing; they walk in lies, they strengthen also the hands of evil-doers, that none doth return from his wickedness; they are all of them unto me, as Sodom." "Thus saith the Lord of Hosts, hearken not unto the words of the prophets that prophesy unto you; they speak a vision of their own heart, and not out of the mouth of the Lord."

Mrs. P. Well, does that mean Universalists?

N. You shall see by the doctrine, verse 17, "They say unto men that despise me, the Lord hath said, ye shall have peace;—and they say unto every one that walketh after the imagination of his own heart, no evil shall come upon you."

Now see what the Lord says of the Universalist preachers, verse 21: "I have not sent these prophets, yet they ran; I have not spoken to them, yet they prophesied; but if they had stood in my counsel, and caused the people to hear my words, then they should have turned them from their evil way, and from the evil of their doings." But you see Universalist preachers never turn the people from "their evil way, and from the evil of their doings."—The Bible says, and so says experience, that "they strengthen the hands of evil doers, that none doth return from his wickedness."

Now, see what the Lord says shall become of the preachers, verse 15: "Therefore, thus saith the Lord of Hosts concerning the prophets, behold I will feed them with wormwood, and make them drink the water of gall; for from the prophets of Jerusalem is profaneness gone forth into all the land."

And now Mrs P——, let me show you what the Bible says concerning the women who go about preaching Universalism.

Mrs. P. Well, what does it say?

N. Here it is, in the 13th of Ezekiel, 17th verse, "Likewise, thou son of man, set thy face against the daughters of thy people, which prophesy out of their own heart, and prophesy thou against them, and say, thus saith the Lord God, wo to the women that sew pillows to our arm holes, and make kerchiefs upon the head of every stature to hunt souls. And will ye pollute me among my people, to slay the souls that should not live, by your lying to my people, that hear your lies."

Mrs. P. Well, does that mean preachers of Universalism?

N. You shall see by the doctrine, verse 22: "Because with lies ye have made the heart of the righteous sad, whom I have not made sad; and strengthened the hands of the wicked, that he should not return from his wicked way, by promising him life."

BIBLES.—No books are sold so cheap, and yet thousands of families in this State are without one. No book is more important, and yet many read fifty pages of other writings where they read one chapter in the Bible. No books are printed on fairer paper or fairer type, and yet in many families you find poor paper, poor print, poor binding, and I have sometimes thought that if Satan were to become a book publisher, he would publish just such editions of the Bible as get scattered among the people—because he would know they would not be read.

No book looks better in the parlor, the kitchen, the dining room, or the chamber, and no frequented apartment of a building should be without one.

No book looks better in a pew, and yet how few are found in our churches.

I read the Bible through as it lay upon a desk where I wrote in an account book, the articles sold on credit—and I advise all boys and young men to read the Bible. It will greatly improve their worth in the estimation of all sensible people, and the Lord may bless the words which they read, and save their souls.—Baptist Record.

Never exult over the misfortunes of others, not even your enemies. Rejoice in the triumphs of justice, but retain your pity for the meanest sinner. Is he not a man, and still susceptible of reformation? Does not God bear with him? And why should not we?

It matters not what a man loses, if he save his soul; but if he lose his soul, it matters not what he saves.

Children's Department.

From the N. Y. Observer.

SKETCHES IN THE HOLY LAND.

Absalom's Pillar.

"The eye that mocketh at his father
And despiseth to obey his mother,
The ravens of the valley shall pick it out,
And the young eagles shall eat it."

This monument stands in the valley of Jehoshaphat, east of Jerusalem, a short distance over the valley of the Cedron. The foundation or base is about twenty feet square, and the same in height. Upon it rests a large column, with a spire-shaped cap, the whole of which is about sixty feet high. It is ornamented with four pillars on each side, and a finished cornice over them. It is thought that the base, which was cut from the solid rock, was made by Absalom, and the ornaments since added by that class of persons to whom our Savior alludes as being fond of garnishing sepulchres.

Absalom had no sons who would bear his name after his death, and as he was ambitious to have his fame go down to other generations, he built this large pillar, and called it after himself. And he has been remembered; nor will he be forgotten while the world stands. When Absalom was building this pillar, he thought that when he was dead, men would look upon it with wonder, and respect his name. He was probably very fond of the praise of his fellow men, and he could not bear the thought that after he had been placed in the grave by them, they would think no more about him. We will now see what kind of fame he has gathered to his name, and how much benefit this pillar has been in giving him a glory among men.

Absalom was an undutiful and rebellious son. Instead of honoring and obeying his father as God commands, he refused to obey him, disgraced him in the sight of all the people, and deliberately sought to take away his life. How affecting to see the aged king, as he passes over Cedron and ascends the Mount of Olives, barefoot, and with his head covered for shame and grief, weeping aloud as he goes, over the folly and crime of his poor son Absalom! He is flying from his home, the ark and temple of God, where he had seen the displays of his glory, but he flies not from an enemy. It is before the fury of his unnatural son, his son Absalom, whom he had loved and reared. You can hear him as he goes, crying out in the fullness of his breaking heart, "Oh, Absalom! Absalom, my son! my son Absalom!"

The unhappy son pursues his father, intent only upon destroying his life, but God, who has pronounced a dreadful curse upon the eye that mocketh at his father, turned the sword into his own bosom, and he died in shame and disgrace. All Christians and Jews who now pass this pillar, cast a stone upon it in scorn. They first ask—"What monument is this?" And when told that it is the pillar which Absalom raised to perpetuate his name, they instantly manifest their displeasure at his conduct by throwing a stone at the pillar. And this is his name and glory. Perhaps my young reader, too, feels much as Absalom did and wishes to do something that shall cause his name to be remembered after he shall be dead.

Let me then tell you what to do. Be an humble, praying Christian. Devote your life to the service of the Redeemer who died for you, and spend your days in doing good to your fellow men. If you do this, you will raise up a pillar which shall be more beautiful and more enduring than that of Absalom. You shall get to yourself a name that shall live when you are dead, for it shall be graven upon the hearts of men, and written in the Lamb's Book of Life.

[illegible] I have [illegible] to thee,
And spend my days for thee,
A faithful [illegible]
And servant of my God.

I ask not [illegible] monument [illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible] thy glorious name
[illegible] my [illegible] heart.

PERSEVERANCE REWARDED.

Children are very often discouraged when [illegible] of perseverance [illegible] attempting to do good, and consequently relax their efforts, when if they would only [illegible] they might see their wishes accomplished. If we try nineteen times to do a thing and fail, we cannot be certain that the twentieth will not perfect the object. We [illegible] a story that shows [illegible] what a little girl can effect.

Mary, who was only about eight years old, took a temperance paper at a temperance meeting to see how many she could get to sign. The next morning she presented it to her father, who had been in a drunken frolic for a fortnight, and came home drunk while his daughter was at the temperance meeting the night before. The cruel father raised his hand and struck his child a blow which levelled her on the floor, and said,

"I'll learn you to be saucy to your parents."

The little girl got up and picked up the constitution, which had fallen when she received the blow. She took it with her to school that day, and got the teacher and most of the scholars to sign it. When she had leisure, she would ask her mother if she might go to such a neighbor's, and see how many could be obtained to join the temperance society.

Her father could not but see what was doing in the neighborhood. For two weeks he remained at home, and did not use a drop of intoxicating liquor, a thing he had not done for years before. At the end of that period he said to his daughter,

"Mary, how many names have you on your temperance constitution?"

"[illegible]," she replied.

As her father was counting the names, she stood between his knees, and when he had looked them over he said,

"You have [illegible] hundred and fifty."

Mary [illegible] on his knee, threw her little arms around her father's neck, and [illegible] a sweet kiss on his cheek, and said,

"[illegible] father, and then there will be one hundred and fifty-one."

The [illegible] drunkard's heart was melted—his bosom heaved—his bloated, haggard face was wet with tears of contrition—he [illegible] his Mary to his heart and said,

"I will sign it," and at once affixed his name to the constitution and pledge.

JUVENILE BENEVOLENCE.

There was a widow of straitened circumstances in a village of New Jersey, who was left with two little boys and a girl dependant on her for support. She had one winter just provided the elder with a new pair of shoes, by which he had been very much gratified, when, one cold morning a very poor little boy came in to ask for charity. He was cold and shivering, and his naked feet appealed to the sympathy of little Daniel. His mother went out of the room to get some of her little store of provision for the needy one, and having given it to him, he with many thanks left the house. When she came back to the fire, she observed Daniel sitting in an awkward position, with his feet tucked under him on a chair.

'Why do you sit so, my child?' she inquired with surprise.

The child blushed, but did not place his feet in their natural position until he had received a second command. The secret was now explained. His feet were bare—he had given his new shoes to the barefooted boy. For a moment the woman felt half angry, and said, somewhat quickly, 'Why did you do so, Daniel? I cannot afford to buy you new shoes.'

'I know it, mother,' he answered; but I can wear my old ones for a whole year longer, even if they have holes.'

Touched by the disinterested feelings of her beloved boy, she could only kiss him and fold him to her heart in a fond embrace.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, July 13, 1842.

"To obey, is better than sacrifice."

A few days since, we heard a —— Minister remark, that he did not doubt but the scriptures required the observance of the seventh-day as Sabbath, 'but I do not keep it, because I can do more good by not keeping it.' The same remark is often made. Let us see how it comports with the Christian character.

The scriptures teach this doctrine, viz: that obedience to God is the only certain evidence of acceptance with him. Jesus says, "If ye love me, keep my commandments," and, "he that loveth me not, keepeth not my sayings." "He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me." God frequently manifested his displeasure at disobedience, or deviation from his command. His language to Moses, which is a fair specimen of all his dealings, was, "See that ye make all things according to the pattern shown you in the mount." The punishment of Saul for sparing alive, to offer in sacrifice to God, what he was commanded to destroy, and of Annanias and Sapphira for lying to God, are further evidences of God's determination to vindicate his law. With these facts before us, we must judge of those who propose to do more good by disobedience, that they are blind leaders of the blind, and understand not the character of that Being whose minister they profess to be.

There are but few things that operate so powerfully against the purity and ultimate triumph of the church, as the introduction and inculcation of this latitudinariánism.

Infidelity, with all its pale hosts, does not so effectually hinder the truth in its progress to the heart. This system of worldly conformity, and of convert making, casts a mock security around multitudes of souls, who can never after be brought to love God and his government. The delusion is fastened upon them, and in vain does the faithful herald of God warn, and reprove, and rebuke.

This convenience doctrine accuses God of folly in establishing laws that are injudicious and unnecesary to be observed.—God says, do them. This doctrine says no, I can honor God more some other way. God said to Saul, destroy Amalek both man and beast. Saul said, I will save the best to offer in sacrifice to God. God replied, to obey is better than sacrifice, and inasmuch as you have rejected God, he has rejected you from being king. If God has given any laws or institutions to men, of any kind, however arbitrary, or unwise, or hard to be obeyed in the eyes of men, yet obedience to them, both in spirit and letter, is better than substitution or caviling by men. In keeping God's law there is great reward, and men will not be losers by obedience, though it be unpopular and at apparently self-denial. Let all men blow upon, and despise God's holy commandments, (not excepting the fourth,) and all or any of the institutions of the gospel of Jesus, yet that one man who loves, and from the heart obeys them, is richer, happier, and more honorable than all. God loves him, but loves not the disobedient.

The True Issue.

The following remarks by Br. Wyckoff, of the Baptist Advocate, are pertinent, and bring the question of the Sabbath and Romanism to a true issue. It is a painful fact, as he asserts, that man is disposed to usurp the prerogative of Jehovah! What is plainer than the usurpation of man in regard to "holy" time? While Br. W. himself makes the tacit acknowledgment, he is every week taking from the commands of God, and adding thereto, in consonance with the dogmas of the "Mother Church!" And while he is doing this, Romanists laugh at the deceptive game they have been playing upon Protestants by substituting the first day of the week as Sabbath, instead of the seventh. And while Protestants are thus endeavoring, as he of the Advocate remarks, to enforce the dogmas of the Church of Rome, "with the utmost sternness and rigidity," in violation of the word of God, can they clear their skirts of guilt in the matter? Let conscience answer the question.

"But man is always disposed to usurp the prerogatives of Jehovah. Not satisfied with what God has commanded, he would add thereto, and, according to this native arrogance, thinking more of his own doings than of his Maker's, he endeavors to enforce the former with the utmost sternness and rigidity. The Pharisees of old, exacted more inexorably a compliance with their traditions, than with the laws to which these were added. The same characteristic has always distinguished Antichrist, and the same separates between the Puseyites and the truly pious or evangelical party in the Episcopal Church.

"We talk sometimes of the progress of vital piety in the present generation, but occurrences of this kind would lead to the inference, that a regard for man's judgment still prevails above a respect for the Bible—that the relics of Romanism retained by Protestant Churches, are cherished more than the vital principles of the gospel—that the religious world is really, as De Tocqueville asserts of all denominations in this country, ripening for a return into the bosom of "Mother Church," the mother of harlots."

The following letter is an answer to one addressed to the Secretary of the American Tract Society, by order of the S. D. Baptist General Conference. We lay it before our readers now, that the subject may be well matured for action at the next session of the Conference. The sixth article of the Constitution of the American Tract Society, provides that the officers and directors shall be elected from different denominations, and that the Publishing Committee shall contain no two members from the same ecclesiastical connection; and no Tract shall be published to which any member of that Committee shall object. The Publishing Committee, per Constitution, shall consist of not less than three, nor more than six.

NEW YORK, JUNE 29, 1842.

MY DEAR BRO.,—Our Committee have been gratified in receiving your kind favor of the 22d ult., inquiring whether the Seventh Day Baptist denomination will be received on the same terms as any other denomination, into the American Tract Society. Properly speaking, there is no denomination which is received as such into this Society. It rather consists of such individuals from various denominations, as are pleased to co-operate in the circulation of Tracts and volumes. There are none, whom others engaged in the Society, would more cordially welcome, than the Seventh-Day Baptists—to whom Tracts would be more cheerfully granted for distribution to the destitute, or to whom they would be sold on more favorable terms. Excepting the few publications which discuss the question of the Sabbath, I know not why all the rest should not be acceptable and useful to your denomination. We ask no question what denomination those making applications for grants, &c., belong to—the object being not to promote the interest of any denomination, as such, but to warn sinners of their danger, and build up Christians in their most holy faith. We believe God is blessing the work. The above document shows how widely providence is opening the fields of usefulness, both in our own, and in foreign lands; we wish, while Providence calls us to labor in this service, to do what we can, and beg from all who love the Lord Jesus Christ, their prayers for the Divine blessing, and all that co-operation, in every respect, which they shall see it to be their duty and privilege to give. I send a copy of our Annual Report, just issued, which contains the Constitution, Officers, &c. &c.

Wishing the richest blessings of the Holy Spirit to rest on you, and all who labor to advance on earth the cause and kingdom of our common Lord.

I am, your affectionate Bro. in Christ,
WM. A. HALLOCK, Cor. Sec'y.
To JAMES BAILEY, Cor. Sec'y of the S. D. B. Gen. Conference.

☞We give our correspondents much space in our paper this week, and ourself but little. We are happy to receive their help.

"For the grace of God, that bringeth salvation, hath appeared to all men," &c. Titus xi. 11.

By a wrong construction of the above text, an argument is brought against the word of God. It is at once denied that the gospel of Jesus Christ has appeared to all men, and we have every reason to believe that the gospel was not then known by all men. Some Christians have likewise erred in this matter, when they have given this a literal construction. We recollect once to have heard of a Minister who so construed the text as to include idolators, and ascribed glory to God because the grace of God caused some men to worship the Sun, Moon, Animals, &c.

An examination of the original Greek has forced this conclusion upon us, viz: that the grace of God, capable of bringing salvation to all men, hath appeared. This rendering of the text makes it harmonize with other passages. The Sooterios of the text, properly rendered preservative, capable of saving, or bringing salvation, is in the original, and should be in the translation, followed by the phrase, "all men." This we believe to be strictly according to the grammatical construction of the language. Tyndale, in his translation of the New Testament, published in 1526, gives it the following translation:—For the grace of God that bryngeth health vnto all men, hath apered, &c.

For the Register.

A CARD.

The undersigned begs leave thus for himself and family to present his heart-felt acknowledgments for the very kind, efficient and persevering attentions rendered by the Ladies of De Ruyter Institute, and its vicinity, to his daughters during their late dangerous illness; attentions which, in the hand of a merciful Providence, have contributed so largely to the rapid convalescence of those who recovered, and the evident mitigation of suffering in the case of her whom God, in his unsearchable righteousness, was pleased to take from us.

In the gay saloon—on the blooming parterres of health and prosperity, we yield unaffected admiration to the beauty, the grace, the intelligence and accomplishments of enlightened females; but it is in the apartment of sickness, and at the couch of suffering, that we reserve the tribute of a deeper sentiment for those qualities, which tho' less sparkling, are more attractive—though dazzling less, yet shine with a clearer and more grateful light.

In the course of my professional pursuits I have been led through many scenes of varied experience, and it is no more than an act of justice to add, that, compared with this Institute and village, I never knew a place where the female character has appeared more to abound in the simple desire of beneficence, and in those traits which render woman at once the solace of affliction, the ornament of her sex, and the delight of society. J. L. C. CAZIER.

De Ruyter, July 8, 1842.

For the Register.

BR. BAILEY;—In the Register, June 22, I find an article copied from the Oberlin Evangelist, over the signature "T," entitled "The Germ of a new Sect," wherein the writer states an incident which gave him a clue to the fact that a new sect might arise out of the question, whether the subject of Temperance ought to be touched, or referred to in a gospel sermon or not? "Nor," says he, "would this be a very extreme case. There are sects whose origin may be traced to circumstances not a whit more important. There is one based upon the exclusive use in public worship of a particular version of the Psalms; another based upon the seventh day of the week instead of the first, for the Sabbath; another based upon the performance of an ordinance." The remarks you made upon the occasion, I fully concur in, but I think it should be further noticed. The writer of that article evidently had three objects in view. First, to stigmatize the seventh day and immersion.—Second, to cast obloquy upon those who observe them; and Third, to quench the spirit of inquiry. The manner in which he has introduced the subject, fully justifies this position. That there are grievous divisions in the church of Christ, is not to be denied, and that churches, and the church often divide upon matters unimportant and insufficient, is not pretended. But it by no means follows, that because there are some cases of this kind, that the ones he has mentioned are such, especially the ones touching the Sabbath and Baptism.

I presume the writer would not pretend to say, that there might no case occur wherein division might not be proper, and even necessary; for although the scripture warns us against division, yet it religiously imposes upon us the duty of separating us from those that cause division, and trifle with the word of God. But Mr. T. has presumed to say that these are trifling subjects. This is in effect saying, that the commands of Jehovah are unimportant, and that it is no unchristian act to violate them, and that it is a mark of a weak and superstitious mind to object to these violations. But I ask, does he not know that God hath said, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy," and again, the seventh-day is the Sabbath? Does not the Almighty know the difference between the seventh-day and the first, and did he not distinguish the seventh from each of the other days of the week in giving the command? Most certainly, and now shall man, "whose breath is in his nostrils," say there is no difference where God has made a difference? When a command is given in the midst of thunderings and lightning, written by the finger of God, is it trifling? I shudder for that species of religious (!) blasphemy that dare declare it. Mr. T., God has blessed that day, dare you reproach it! The same may be said of Baptism, and I pity the man, who, though his Lord was immersed, is ashamed to go and do likewise. If, then, God has required the observance of the Sabbath, wherein consists the wickedness of this law? In what sense is it a violation of christian character? The stubbornness (!) of Sabbatarians in this matter, seems to be very grievous. But in what does their stubbornness consist? Why, simply in this. They refuse to surrender a command of God, and receive in its place a law of the church. But I ask again, who is the sinner in this case, the man who keeps the law, or the man who breaks it? It is said, however, that this is a little thing, a small matter; but I ask Mr. T., how it is he can say this? by what authority? Will he tell us where it is taught in the scripture, that it is a small matter whether we keep the commandments as they were delivered to us, or not? If not, has he humility enough to recall his words? But the difficulty in his case, by no means ends here. He charges those who would "keep the word of God," with the sin of causing the divisions in the church. He calls it an abomination, and likens it to children's (!) quarrels! miserable siboleths, &c.—But I ask, is it those that would retain the land-marks in their place, or those that remove them, that cause the divisions? surely, the latter, and not the former. As well might the Pharisees charge the Savior with causing divisions, because he would not follow the traditions, or Paul, because he withstood Peter in a case where he was to be blamed. It is rank injustice to accuse those with the heinous sin of raising divisions in the church, whose only sin has been that of esteeming the commandments of God "better than fine gold," and in the midst of every taunt and reproach of a fallen church, and an ungodly world, have dared to stand by, and defend a despised and neglected law of God! It would seem that those who have led in these divisions, consider themselves a sort of pillar of cloud by day, and of fire by night, and that portion of the church that cannot follow them in their wanderings, are stigmatized with such epithets as bigots, selfish, consequential, and the such like, and it would seem that by such pious castigations, that we are either to be hushed into silence, or lashed into submission, and when this is effected, no doubt we shall be applauded for our christian meekness!

It may appear to some that these remarks are sharp, but let it be remembered that we have long and repeatedly been the subjects of these abuses. There are those who seem to think it a part of their religious duty, by such unjust imputations, to prejudice public sentiment against us. But thanks to God, the time, I trust, is not far distant, when the truth in this matter shall be fully known, and abused integrity shall receive its just reward. The wounds that have been given to the Sabbath and those that keep it, are many, and they are deep. As strange as it may appear, the greater portion of the church consider it inconsistent with christian character to obey the fourth commandment as it stands in the word of God! and many have lost their standing by doing it! We say, Mr. T., you have no right to turn from the "holy commandment delivered unto you," nor have you any right to require us to follow you, and certainly you have no right to accuse us of unchristian conduct, because we cannot do it. But you profess to desire union, and would insinuate that we oppose it. Come, then, let us test each other upon this question. Now, sir, we pledge ourselves that in every case where there exists a difference between us in our christian practice, upon which, as christians and churches, we are divided, if we cannot produce a "thus saith the Lord" for those we practice, we will give them up, and if you can produce a "thus saith the Lord" for yours, will embrace them, and vice versa. I conclude, as to the fairness of this, there can be no objection, for it treats us both alike, and I conclude that neither of us ought to be afraid of the word of God.

N. V. HULL.

Clarence, July 2, 1842.

Missionary Department.

For the Register.

Br. Griswold's Journal.

June 1. Having finished my Agency in Rhode-Island, I took leave of friends whom I never saw before, yet hope to see again, "when the storm of life is fled." My next place of labor being in Rensselaer county, I took Waterford in my route, and on the Sabbath preached twice there. Being delayed by the printing of the minutes of the Eastern Association, I gave a lecture on temperance, on the evening of the second day, at Waterford meeting-house. Our friends here as well as elsewhere, are firm cold water men, except a few. The banner of Tee-totalism waves over the village, while new recruits are oft enlisting during the war.

7. Took leave of my family, and may the God of missions be ever watchful of them during my perigrinations up and down this vale of tears. Passed through New London on to Salem. Passed through the towns of Colchester, noted for an Academy, M[illegible] [illegible] a large [illegible] Factory, and Glastenbury, lying on the east bank of the beautiful Connecticut, [illegible] which is sprung a [illegible] and [illegible]dious covered bridge. Tarried [illegible] of Hartford over night. Hartford [illegible] the head of sloop navigation of the Connecticut river, is a handsome and neat city. It is famous as being the place where stands the "Charter Oak," whose concavity once contained all that was dear to the cause of freedom. Ever may the "Oak" of [illegible] civil and religious right flourish in the bosom of America.

8. Left early [illegible] ride through a delightful country beautifully diversified with hills and dales. Distant about 10 miles from Hartford, the traveler, emerging from a dark grove of stately woods, finds himself on the brink of a mountain with one of the most beautiful valleys in the form of the [illegible] of the heavens inverted lying before him, with the neat and [illegible] village of A[illegible] in its centre. The scenery is truly fascinating. On the eastern summit of the mountain's brow stands the majestic Tower [illegible] Wadsworth. Leaving this delightful [illegible] I passed through Canton, New Hartford, Winsted, Clifton, Norfolk to Canaan, [illegible] finding a Temperance House, I [illegible] the night. This house is worthy [illegible] patronage.

9. [illegible] tempests of [illegible] the weary traveler will [illegible] rest in an "house not made with hands." The brightness of the sun again appearing, I took my departure. Passed through Sheffield, Great Barrington [illegible] Some of the most fertile farms [illegible] the Housatonic valley. [illegible] to West Stockbridge [illegible] Marble Quarries and [illegible] a half miles [illegible] the Providence and Hudson Rail Road [illegible] the Housatonic [illegible] Canaan, in New York, which is a [illegible] Rosemary."

10. My route lay through the Shaker Village, which is a very neat place, with a large meeting-house [illegible] covered with [illegible] famous for its Springs, and arrived at Br. Joshua Maxson's in Stephentown.

11. Sabbath; preached at Br. [illegible] Carpenter's. [illegible] Found that [illegible] large house [illegible]

12. Visited [illegible] willing to [illegible] of the gospel [illegible]—May the Lord [illegible]

14. Left for Brookfield [illegible] giving away Tracts. Passed through Albany, after [illegible] the east side of which [illegible] posing appearance. It is [illegible] what irregularly laid out.

15. [illegible] very interesting talk with a Methodist [illegible] was converted [illegible] ever saw a [illegible] or heard of a Sabbatarian. Introduced the Sabbath to his notice, and although our landlord was a Dutchman, without religion, yet he asked me to implore a blessing on the food. I felt more the importance of [illegible]ting our conversation [illegible] gospel. Passed through Duanesburgh, Esperance, Carlisle, Sharon, to Leesville, where I again rested for the night.

16. Arrived at Eld. Wm. B. Maxson's about sunset, whom I found absent. The next day I called upon the friends; conversed about the cause of religion, and was grieved to find so much disunion here.

18. Sabbath; preached at the first Brookfield church, laid before them my Agency. At the request of brethren I spent the week in endeavoring to reconcile the disaffected. Where are the Jeremiahs, who will weep day and night for the slain of the daughters of this people? Brethren in the name of all that is sacred—in the name of the bleeding, dying Son of God—and by the joys of heaven and agonies of hell, I beseech you be ye reconciled to God and to one another. Heaven mourns, hell rejoices, while poor sinners are being hardened through the malign influence of the church. Will you—oh, will you not listen to the voice of wisdom?

25. Sabbath; by request preached in the first Brookfield church upon Church Discipline. If ever I felt the solemnities of my station it was here. May the God of peace rule and reign here and elsewhere. In the afternoon preached at Unadilla Forks—Having just heard of the death of a young lady in De Ruyter Institute, together with the narrow escape from death which a brother and sister experienced by the fright of their horse returning from service in the [illegible] meeting, I felt unusually solemn, and earnestly [illegible] my audience to prepare to [illegible] their God, and that they were wise [illegible] would consider their latter end.

[illegible] a Committee for the adjustment of the difficulties existing here. How easily can all breaches be healed with the spirit of the gospel. The state of religion, I fear, is low here, and must so remain unless the church will arise and let her light shine, illuminating the surrounding darkness.

[illegible] at the second Brookfield church, and put up with Dea. Bailey.

30. Attended a meeting of the Moral Reform Society at that place. A blessed cause. May it prevail until every thing that is opposed to the purity of the gospel shall be purged from the community.—The Lord [illegible] bless those women that are thus laboring in the Lord. Beloved sisters, let me exhort you [illegible] the face of opposition. If it comes, it comes from unsanctified [illegible]. No christian can or will oppose [illegible] profession be what it [illegible] For he that [illegible] and does not [illegible] is not what he professed [illegible] professing to be a christian. [illegible] the last month, I have secured [illegible]

[illegible] Whether the [illegible] funds [illegible] given any [illegible] money and what is [illegible] the above will be [illegible] Society can know [illegible] The cause of truth demands that all the light possible should be thrown upon the interest of our Missionary operations.

It is a disgrace even to humanity, not to say christianity, to have so much dissatisfaction [illegible] If there has been cause of complaint, let the cause be removed; and if no cause, then let murmurings cease.—Brethren, the hosts of God's elect are in the field—the command is, 'go forward,' and wo to the Achan that shall trouble Israel!" SHERMAN S. GRISWOLD,
Missionary Agent.
Brookfield, June 30th, 1842.

[illegible] for a Seventh-day Baptist [illegible] to baptize one whom he knows will not observe the Sabbath [illegible] one with whom he would not commune [illegible] or one whom he knows will not [illegible] himself to any particular church [illegible] S. S.

FOREIGN NEWS.

[illegible]

[illegible] OF THE CALEDONIA.

[illegible]

[illegible]

Conviction of Francis.

[illegible] shooting at the Queen [illegible] tried on Friday, in the Central Criminal Court, London. He was found guilty on the second and [illegible] counts of the indictment, charging him with having fired a pistol, which was loaded with some destructive substance, at her Majesty, the jury having a doubt that it contained a bullet, but believing that it was loaded with something else besides wadding and powder. The prisoner, who was dreadfully affected, was sentenced in the usual form, to be hung, drawn, and quartered.

North Eastern Boundary.

The most satisfactory feeling is entertained in England on the favorable issue which seemingly awaits the long agitated question of the North Eastern Boundary. It seems to be the wish of all parties, having the well-being of either country at heart, that every amicable feeling should continue, and that both should go on in mutual subserviency for the good of each other.

The whole of Lord Ashburton's homestead, situated at Clapham, a romantic village about two miles distant from Bedford, together with twelve horses in the village, were recently totally destroyed by fire.

It is rumored that the session of Parliament will close in July, and that there will be no further discussion on any important question. Of course the exact time of the adjournment of the house is not known, as that will depend upon the state of public business.

The only question of any interest now to be discussed is the New Poor Law Bill, and that has been commenced in the House of Commons.

Up to the 31st of May, the amount of contributions for the sufferers at Hamburgh, was about $1,943,000.

The Marquis of Waterford was recently married to the accomplished Miss Stuart, daughter to Lord Stuart de Rothsay.

Ireland—Dreadful Riots.

Distress to a most fearful extent prevails throughout Ireland. From every part of that unhappy country there are accounts of the prevalence of famine among the peasantry. This has attained such a height, that all regard for the right of property is fast disappearing, and the people assemble in hundreds openly to violate the laws.

The Dublin Pilot states, that an alarming excitement existed in Galway, on account of the high price of provisions. On the 14th of June, the town was perambulated the whole day by large bodies of fishermen, laborers, women, and boys, and all the stores containing any provisions, were broken open. Stones and missiles were thrown, and the lives of citizens put in jeopardy. The military were obliged to be called out.

In Ennis, also, a mob, consisting of some thousands of persons, attacked and destroyed a corn store and mill, for the purpose of taking out their contents. The police was called out, and it was rumored that some eighteen persons had been shot in the affray.

France.

The approaching election for a new Chambers, engrosses the public attention at present. It is generally thought that the majority for the present ministry will be decidedly large.

China.

The news is perfectly unimportant, and amounts to little more than that the plenipotentiary remained at Hongkong, and had not made known the time of his departure for the North. The forts along the Canton river were nearly finished, and part of them had been unmasked. Hongkong and Chusan are to remain in the possession of England till all her demands are complied with by the Emperor; and that they shall be considered free ports, equally open to the ships of all nations. No hostile movement towards Canton was looked for for some time to come.

Overland Mail from India.

The India mail brings tidings of a chequered nature, of triumphs in the North, being the forcing of the Khyber Pass, the relief of Sale, and the gallant vengeance taken by that brave commander on Ukhbar Khan.

In the South of the Affghan country the picture is different. Ghuznee has fallen with its regiment of Sepoys. Col. Palmer, their commander, has been forced to capitulate. Gen. Nott, at Candahar, had hitherto gallantly resisted all attack, and defeated the plans of the insurgents.

Algiers.

A Toulon paper states that by the last packets from Algeria, intelligence has been received of the re-appearance of Abdel-en-Kaker in the province of Algiers. The active and enterprising Emir having left the bulk of his army, and put himself at the head of 200 cavalry, with the intention of attacking the French in the East. He is said to have already arrived at Fondoak.

Russia.

According to last accounts from Russia, the Council of War called together by the Emperor Nicholas, had decided upon a plan of operations upon a very large scale against the hostile Circassian tribes.

News of the Day.

The Philadelphia U. States Gazette thus announces a murder: "Rum and a man named Levitt, killed a woman in Scituate, (Mass.) last week. The man was arrested, but rum was suffered to run at large."

A most appalling storm of thunder and rain visited Philadelphia on the 1st inst., raging with unabated violence over three hours, inundating the streets and flooding cellars, destroying a considerable amount of property.

The Hail Storm of last Sunday in the western part of this State, which we have before noticed, extended its ravages at intervals from Onondaga to Erie county, indicating that its course was uninterrupted through that whole distance. The width of the trail is stated to have been a mile and a half, or a quarter. Fields of wheat, corn, &c., were as completely cut down as though the reaper had been through them. The hail stones were of an enormous size, in some places varying from that of a walnut to a common hen's egg.

The second expedition for exploring the Niger, arrived on the coast of Africa early last month, from London, in a steamer.

A letter from Naples says:—"The project of a rail road from this city to Rome has received the approbation of the Holy See. It is said that Naples is to undertake the work at her own expense, and that Rome will repay her share by annual payments. A rail road from Rome to Florence is spoken of as certain."

Two thousand six hundred passengers arrived at the quarantine ground on the 30th ult.—said to be the largest arrival in one day ever known.

A destructive kind of fire-works, called a serpent, has been used in the streets of New York. One of them was thrown on the 4th under the bonnet of a lady, and could not be removed until it had destroyed her bonnet, and entirely destroyed her hair and eyes, and burnt her hands almost to a crisp.

A boatman, named Felix, had his boat upset recently while sailing in the North river. Lord John Hay, of the Warspite, who had just stepped into his gig, immediately put off to his assistance, and having rescued him from his perilous situation, and righted the boat, deposited Felix in the bottom of his gig, and towed the boat ashore, where both man and boat were safely moored.

Upwards of 500 dogs have been already slaughtered in Philadelphia this summer.

An Indian Retort.—An Indian complained to a retailer that the price of liquor was too high. The latter, in justification, said that it cost as much to keep a hogshead of brandy, as to keep a cow. The Indian replied, "May be he drink as much water, but he no eat so much hay."

A Waterquake.—The last number of the Republican Register, published at Marion, Miss., relates the particulars of a singular freak which nature recently performed in Clark county. On the 7th of May, between the hours of 3 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon, the waters in several creeks, rivers, &c., were seized with a sudden commotion—undulating from side to side, receding from one bank and running up on the opposite one, forming, on the whole, a most strange if not unaccountable phenomenon. The waters were thrown up several feet against the perpendicular sides of the banks, and such was the violent agitation of the waters (in the Chickasawha river, if we mistake not,) that rafts and river craft were forced loose from their moorings. Some who were in the forest saw the trees shake, and others, who happened to be in the field, were astonished by the motion of the corn, and the hearing of that kind of whispering noise produced among the leaves of corn when shaken by a gentle wind—and this was when there was no wind.

The editor of the Register says that these occurrences were witnessed by many persons, in different water courses, and from this circumstance he calls it a waterquake. Singular enough; it happened on the very day of the great St. Domingo earthquake.

Another Editor Robbed!—The office of our neighbor of the Evening Gazette was broken open last night, and fifteen specie cents and the scissors (oh, scissors!) were stolen. Our worthy contemporary says the robber is welcome to the cash, if he will only return the scissors!—Boston Transcript.

Sugar from the Maple.—The quantity of sugar that may be made from the maple, when the trees are good, and the process well managed, is generally much underrated, Trees growing in open fields will produce more sugar than those in the forest; and the sap from trees tapped many years, is much richer than from those tapped but few times. We find in the papers some notices of this tree, and its products, worthy of record, as proving that the north has within its limits, the means, if desirable, of producing its own sugar.

Mr. Harriman, of Warner, N. H., tapped a sugar maple 2 1-2 feet in diameter, which in eighteen hours gave eighty quarts of sap, from which was made seven and a half pounds of sugar. A pail full of sap was sufficient for one pound of dry sugar.

A red maple, (Acer rubra,) has long been an object of interest at Osipe, N. H., on account of its size, and the quantity of sugar it produced. Its circumference near the surface was twenty-eight feet, and it continued near the same size for seventeen feet, when it parted into two branches, one of which was four feet in diameter, and the other of nearly the same size. This magnificent tree was lately blown down in a storm, taken to a saw-mill, and the products in inch boards is three thousand three hundred feet, besides nine cords of wood from the branches, &c. The owner has made forty pounds of sugar in a year from this single tree.

A man named Smith, who keeps a tavern of some kind at Richmond, Va., whipped his wife, a day or two since, in the most cruel and brutal manner, with a cow-hide, as we understand. He whipped her with such violence that portions of her flesh were cut out, and her body dreadfully bruised, he having given her some one hundred and fifty lashes.

Twenty-seven families are said to have removed from West Stockbridge, Mass., within a few years, for Nauvoo, the city of Jo Smith.

One of the Judges of the Philadelphia Sessions has been returned by one of the tax collectors of that city as a pauper, he being unable to pay his personal tax.

Samuel G. Goodrich, Esq., the original Peter Parley, went out in the last steam ship from Boston, as bearer of despatches to our Minister at the Court of St. James.

The amount of U. S. Treasury notes, outstanding on the 2nd inst., was $9,077,006.

The Cincinnati Gazette states that the three manufactories in that city for making lard oil, are unable to supply the demand for the article. Last week 2,000 gallons were shipped to New York, and a number of other eastern orders were then on hand, which could not be filled.

At Cincinnati, on the 29th ult., the steamboats Commodore, and Virginian, lying at the Fulen ship-yard, were both destroyed by fire. Insurance on the Commodore, $3,000; no insurance on the Virginian.

Not a single death occurred in the city of Buffalo for the week ending on the 20th ult. This fact indicates a most unusual state of health.

Some of the hail stones which fell in Mentz, Cayuga co., recently, measured eight inches in circumference; and large quantities of them lay on the ground more than 24 hours. The crops along the path of the storm, which fortunately was not wide, were nearly destroyed.

Bird, the murderer of his wife, is now on trial at Pittsburgh, Pa. It will be recollected that he fastened his wife to the chair and set fire to her clothes, injuries from which caused her death.

A fund of several hundred dollars, voluntarily raised by several gentlemen of Richmond, Va., for that purpose, has been presented to the Rev. Mr. Maffit.

During the present year, there will be nine thousand one hundred and thirty seven Military Commissions issued by the proper authorities in Pennsylvania.

The mail robbery trial last week at the U. S. Court in Canandaigua, with those held in a previous court developed some curious facts respecting the gang of robbers who have plundered passengers, as well as the mails on the Canal Main Route, east and west of Rochester, for several years.

Seven persons have been indicted from among those gangs—three of whom have been sent to the State Prison—two others are known, but uncaught as yet.

Gov. Pennington, of N. J., has tendered the appointment of U. S. Senator, having been officially informed of the death of Mr. Southard, to the Hon. William L. Dayton, and Judge Dayton has accepted the appointment.

Mandamus Case.—At the Court of Errors on Saturday morning last, the President of the Court inquired if any of the members wished to give written or oral opinions on the case before the Court. The Chancellor then read a long opinion on the case, and concluded by deciding in affirmance of the decision given on the question by the Supreme Court. Gen. Root next read his opinion on the case, and concluded by also voting in affirmance of the decision of the Supreme Court. Mr. Furman then read a long opinion in favor of the decision of the Supreme Court. Mr. Foster delivered an oral opinion, in which he dissented from some of the reasons given for granting the mandamus, but advocated an affirmance of the Supreme Court.

The Lieut. Governor then addressed the Court in affirmance of the decision of the Supreme Court, and the question was put to the vote, and the decision of the Supreme Court was unanimously affirmed.—By which decision the majority in the Common Council for the ensuing year is Whig.

The Erie.—Capt. Taylor, with his associate explorers, returned in the Star last evening, after ten unsuccessful efforts to discover the Erie. The location pointed out by some of the survivors, has been carefully explored, and the bottom of the lake surveyed, but the hull of the vessel, or any part of her machinery is as yet undiscovered. Capt. T., however, does not return disheartened, but merely to refit, and gain farther and more accurate information as to the locale of the wreck.—Buffalo Com. Adv.

Rev. Hemmingway J. Gaylord, was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian church in Union, Broome co, N. Y., May 26th. Invocation and reading of the scriptures by Rev. S. C. Wilcox, of Owego; sermon by Rev. S. W. Bush, of Binghamton; ordaining prayer by Rev. Mr. Clark, of Spencer; charge to the pastor by Rev. Mr. Morse, of Maine; charge to the people by Rev. Mr. Ford, of Newark; benediction by the pastor.

The number of Petitions in Bankruptcy filed in the Clerk's Office of Maine District, on which notices have been published, is 1453. In many of these cases two or more partners have united in one petition, making the whole number of persons in Maine who have already applied for the benefit of the Bankrupt act, over fifteen hundred.

A resolution has passed both branches of the Legislature of New Hampshire, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives of that State in Congress, to use their efforts to procure the passage of a bill to refund to Gen. Andrew Jackson the amount of the fine, with interest thereon, paid by him for an alleged contempt of Court in 1815.

The ship Angelique, from Amsterdam, which arrived on the 28th ult., passed at least 150 icebergs, from 15 to 100 feet high, and from 100 yards to 1 mile in length.

The whole force of the Globe Mills, at Kingston, Philadelphia, numbering about 150 hands, was discharged on the 30th ult.

From the Geneva Courier.

The Fourth—Melancholy Casualty.—It becomes our painful duty to record, in connexion with the festivities of the Fourth, one of the most melancholy accidents which has for many years befallen our village. In the evening after the usual ceremonies of the day were over, a large and dense assemblage was collected at the head of Seneca street, and in front of the Bank, extending themselves in both directions along Main street, in order to witness the fire works which, as report went, were to be of an unusual brilliant and effective character. Rockets had been provided, some of a very large kind; weighing, as was said, six pounds; as also, serpents and other exhibitions of the Pyrotechnic art, and the eager curiosity of the multitude drew them very closely around the staging erected for the purpose of exhibition. Not more than four or five of the rockets, however had been discharged, when a spark of fire, accidentally communicated with the box or basket containing the fire works; and the whole were in a moment in a blaze. The rockets lying in a horizontal position, flew of course in the same direction; and the staging was of such a height as to give them a direction the most destructive to human life. Such was their force that one of them, at a distance of forty rods, penetrated the siding of a house. Most of the injuries were inflicted by these missiles.—The following are the names of the persons injured:

Joseph D. Fulton killed;

John Easter, of the firm of Mooshier & Easter, rib broken, severe concussion of lungs and other organs. But feeble hopes are entertained of his recovery.

Mr. Easter's son, a lad, severe contusion of side and injury of eye and face:

George Hanford, penetrating wound of back part of arm, near the shoulder, some three inches deep; not dangerous;

Mrs. Scott, severe contusion of upper part of shoulder:

Mrs. Quackenbush, daughter of Mr. J. D. Fulton, concussion of brain from missile striking forehead;

Dimick, a lad, injury of side, and concussion of lungs;

Mrs. Fulton injury of back from fright and fall;

Mrs. Snelling, contusion of chest—[a corset board for once, proving the means, probably of saving life.]

Some 4 or five others were slightly injured.

Murder at Rahway.—An Englishman, named James Low, was brought to the county jail in this city this morning, charged with the murder of Isaac Winans, a bachelor of about 45 years of age, who resided entirely alone about one mile from Rahway. The murder is believed to have been committed on the previous evening at about six o'clock, as that time the discharge of a gun was distinctly heard by the neighbors.

The circumstances which led to the suspicion of murder are as follows:

Yesterday morning, Low went to the house of Mr. Houth, in the neighborhood, and asked him to go and milk Mr. Winans' cows, as Mr. W. had gone away. Mr. H. complied, and on the way, at Low's request, stopped for Mr. Leech, who went with them; while there Low told them they would never see Winans again; that he had bought the place of him for $1500, and given him his check for the amount, and that Winans had gone to New York to get it cashed; that he did not intend coming back, but was going west.

This improbable story gained no credit, and naturally excited suspicions. After they had parted, Mr. Leech examined the place and found blood in a cornfield, and tracking it for several hundred yards discovered the body buried about 4 inches deep, with the feet partly uncovered.

The deed is supposed to have been committed with a double barrelled gun, belonging to Mr. Leech—that the first shot took effect in the back near his shoulder and that he ran close to him and discharged the other barrel in the centre of his forehead, for the wound was only the size of a dollar, and the gun was loaded with shot. Low confessed on the examination that he had used the gun to shoot woodcock.

A warrant was issued for his apprehension, and he was found under a bed in Leech's house, and examined before Justice Silvers, who sent him to jail. A Coroners Inquest was called, and rendered a verdict of wilful murder against James Low.

The prisoner is about 23 years of age, and is a native of Lancashire, England.—It is said that his father keeps the Robin Hood House, N. York city, and is in easy circumstances.—Newark Daily Advertiser.

Notices.

NOTICE.

S. D. DELLAY takes this method of informing his friends and old customers that he has removed his stock of Goods to the Store of H. A. & F. C. DELLAY, where he is now able to offer them better inducements for trade than he ever before has been, in terms of credit, prices, &c. &c. He would also say that he will be permanently there, and intends making De Ruyter a location for years in the mercantile business. He would further say that he has not failed as some of his friends have endeavored to convince the public. He will be glad to see his debtor as well as his creditor, being able and willing to satisfy each.

De Ruyter, March 28 1842. v3n5tf

PROPOSALS

For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, [if dead;] number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

MARRIED.

In P[illegible] June 11, by Rev. W. B. G[illegible] Mr JOEL C. DUNN, and JOANNA, daughter of Dea. D. F. Randolph.

In Verona, on the morning of the 4th [illegible] by Eld. C. M. Lewis, Mr JOSEPH H. HAZZARD, and Miss SUSAN C. KING, [illegible] of the above place.

In Hamilton, on the 6th [illegible] W. B. Maxson, Dr CHARLES H. STILLMAN, of [illegible]field N. J., and Miss MARY E., daughter of M. Albertus Stam, of the former place.

In Truxton, on the 21 [illegible] by Eld. [illegible] Burdick, Mr ROBERT LANGWORTHY of De Ruyter, and Miss ELIZA [illegible] of the former place.

At Unadilla Forks [illegible] W. B. Maxson, Mr BENNETT [illegible] Miss HARRIET PENNY.

DIED.

In [illegible] Mr ICHABOD [illegible] He was taken [illegible] the valley of the shadow [illegible] He was a member of the [illegible] Hopkinton.

In [illegible] BETSEY [illegible] S. D. B. Church [illegible] the will of Jesus.

In Petersburg [illegible] RANDALL, wife of [illegible] S. D. B. Church in Berlin, and afterwards with the Church in Petersburg. [illegible] now rejoices in Heaven.

In Plainfield [illegible] RANDOLPH OLIVER, son of the [illegible]

In Pompey [illegible] Mr JOHN S. KENYON, [illegible]

LIST OF LETTERS.

[illegible] Brown, [illegible] H. C[illegible], [illegible] West, [illegible] the papers from [illegible] on or before the [illegible]. W. B. Gillett, Charles Marson, we will write you soon. [illegible] E. Maxson, the money you mention was not put into the office, therefore it is not credited. [illegible] Greene, the minutes will be sent as soon as opportunity presents or by mail—[illegible] the other matters, I can not encourage now. F. Williams, P. M. (receipts forwarded.)

LIST OF RECEIPTS.

Of Jason B. Wells, $4, cr [illegible] P. Babcock, Ezra Stillman, $2, each, vol 3, of B. West, $2, vol 3, of W. B. Gillet, $10, cr [illegible] Dunham, Jeremiah Dunham, Lewis Titsworth, J. Dunn, R. F. Randolph, $2, each, $2, formerly credited [illegible] Dunn is now credited. [illegible] R. Dunham, of F. Williams, $4, cr B. F. Langworthy, [illegible] Greene, $2 [illegible] vol 3.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

LIST OF LETTERS

REMAINING in the Post Office at De Ruyter June 30, 1842.

Allen Britton
Bentley E. A. Mrs.
Baker Sally A. Miss
Barnard Daniel
Bogardus Isaac R.
Babcock Thos. E.
Curtis Lurana Mrs.
Carr Thomas
Derbashire James
Griswold Sherman S.
Hagan Jane
Holmes Arza
Haskins Leander
Johnson Abira
Kinney Nathan
Lewis L. E. Mrs.
Snow Hervey
Seymour Benjamin
Sherwood Adah F.
Squares Ethan
Shaver Harvey
Terney John
Winons Stephen
Wooley Peter B.

M. SPEAR, P. M.

Economy is the road to Wealth.

JAMES M. LETTS would inform his friends and customers, and the public generally, that he has removed his Tailoring Establishment, to the building occupied by Eli A. Gage as a Hat Store, where he will be ready at all times to attend to cutting and making all manner of clothing as cheap as can be done in the village or county. Military work done in the latest and most approved fashion. Ladies Habits, and Coat Dresses Cut to order, at short notice. All work done at this establishment shall be warranted to fit.

De Ruyter, July 1st 1842.

FLOUR, PROVISIONS, GROCERIES, and six hundred other things, for sale by [illegible]
May 11. HART, ACKLEY, & CO

BOOTS! BOOTS! SHOES! SHOES!!!

AT the sign of the Mammoth Boot, manufactured invariably of leather tanned in "cold liquor." Please call.

THE FARMER'S EXCHANGE is the place to buy Goods CHEAP. Oct. 20, 1841.
34tf S. G. WALKER.

BOOK BINDING.

THE subscriber having connected a BINDERY with his printing establishment, is now ready to execute all kinds of Binding in a neat and durable manner, on as reasonable terms as at any other establishment in this section of country.
JAMES BAILEY.
De Ruyter, June 9th 1841.

IMPORTANT WORK!

[illegible]

A DICTIONARY OF

Arts, Manufactures, and Mines,

Containing a clear exposition of their principles and practice.

By ANDREW URE, M. D., F. R. S., M. G. S., M. A. S. Lond., Mem. Acad. N. S. Philad., S. Ph. Soc. N. Germ. Hanov. Mulii, &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings.

THIS [illegible] the most popular work [illegible] ever published and a book most [illegible] wants of all classes of the [illegible]. The following are the important objects [illegible]

[illegible] Manufacturer, Metallurgist, [illegible] Tradesman, in the principles of their respective [illegible]

[illegible] Merchants, Brokers, Drysalters, [illegible] Officers of the Revenue, [illegible]

[illegible] New-York, [illegible] New-York. 5tf12

STOVES.

COLD WINTER IS COMING

[illegible]

L[illegible] De Ruyter [illegible] the largest and best [illegible]

Fancy Parlor Stoves,

[illegible] TOWN COUNTY STATE [illegible]

BRASS AND TIN WARE

[illegible] on hand, and offers at as

LOW PRICES

[illegible] LEAKY.

Eave Troughs

[illegible]

JUST RECEIVED

[illegible] Stoves [illegible]

JOB WORK

[illegible] Fayette Block No. 3 [illegible]
De Ruyter, Oct. 13, 1841. 54tf

REMOVAL.

JAMES M. LETTS [illegible] E. A. Gage [illegible] 2 doors north of M. Spear's [illegible] 1842.

20 TONS Butter wanted [illegible]
May 2 [illegible] STONE STORE.

Not 25 or 50 per cent Reward.

S. G. WALKER

HAS [illegible] NEW GOODS which [illegible] CHEAP [illegible] Dry Goods, Dye Groceries, Crockery, Hardware, [illegible] Palm Leaf hats and [illegible]

[illegible] Farmer's Exchange [illegible]

De Ruyter, May 2d, 1842.

"Hard times and money scarce,"

IS the general complaint, and economy is the object of every person.

SUTTON & QUINBY have just opened a large assortment of Dry Goods, Groceries, Crockery, Paints, Oils and Dye-Stuffs. Persons wishing to make purchases are invited to call, as we feel confident that our Low Prices and Good Goods must give general satisfaction.

May 24 SUTTON & QUINBY.

BOOKS & STATIONERY.

SCHOOL BOOKS, of all descriptions, Miscellaneous Books & Stationery, at the Book Store of HART, ACKLEY & CO.
De Ruyter, May 13, 1842. 11v3tf

50 PIECES BROAD CLOTHS, CASSIMERES, SATINETTES, at reduced prices at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

POETRY.

Clerical Oppressors.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

Just God!—and these are they
Who minister at thine altar, God of Right!
Men who their hands with prayers and blessings lay
On Israel's Ark of light!

What! preach, and kidnap men!
Give thanks—and rob thine own afflicted poor!
Talk of thy glorious liberty, and then
Bolt hard the captive's door.

What! servants of thine own
Merciful Son, who came to seek and save
The homeless the outcast, fettering down
The tasked and plundered slave!

Pilate and Herod friends!
Chief priests and rulers, as of old, combine!
Just God and holy! is that church which lends
Strength to the spoiler Thine!

Baid hypocrites, who turn
Judgment aside, and rob thy Holy Book
Of those high words of truth which search, and burn
In warning and rebuke.

Feed fat—ye locusts, feed!
And in your tasselled pulpits. thank the Lord
That, from the toiling bondmans utter need
Ye pile your own full boards

How long, O Lord, how long
Shall such a priesthood barter truth away,
And in thy name, for robbery and wrong,
At thy own altars pray!

Is not thy hand stretch'd forth
Visibly in the heavens to awe and smite!
Shall not the living God of all the earth
And heaven above do right!

Woe, then, to all who grind
Their brethren of a Common Father down!
To all who plunder from th'immortal mind
Its bright and glorious crown!

Woe to the priesthood! woe
To those whose hire is with the price of blood,
Perverting, darkening, changing as they go,
The searching truths of God.

Their glory and their might
Shall perish; and their very names shall be
Vile before all the people; in the light
OF A WORLD'S LIBERTY.

Oh! speed the moment on,
When wrong shall cease—and Liberty and Love.
And Truth and Right, throughont the earth be known,
As in their home above.

Miscellaneous Department.

THE HOUR-GLASS.

The perfection to which our modern mechanics have carried the art of watch and clock-making, with the abundance and comparative cheapness of those useful auxiliaries, has rendered the simple and once popular hour-glass quite a rarity among us.—Perhaps its scarceness is one recommendation; for over-proud and impatient spirits, ever athirst for something new and strange, spurn at what is abundant and common.—One of my earliest recollections leads me to the modest dwelling of a worthy old spinster, who followed the employment of a bonnet-maker, occasionally repairing and re-modeling chintz dressess of a fabric too valuable to be thrown away, and of a fashion too antique to suit the then modern taste. I remember her, a tall spare figure, seated in fashion as upright as the high back of her wooden chair, and exercising despotic rule over two young damsels apprenticed to learn the mystery of her calling. A well-boarded floor, strewed with dry yellow sand, a small square bit of carpet laid precisely in front of the white hearth-stone, a little round table placed before the mistress, and just within arm's length of the girls, and a demure tabby-cat, purring on a low three-legged stool—these are all the particulars that I can avouch for at this distance of time; save and except an hour-glass of capacious dimensions. standing on the broad edge of an old-fashioned casement, near the left hand, of its owner, who, with quick, careful glance failed not to detect the last sand in the act of escaping, and to reverse, in the twinkling of an eye, the silent monitor. I was, even at an infantine age, somewhat given to thought; and happy was the day to me when I could obtain leave to go and ask our civil neighbor for a few snippings of her many-colored materials, to eke out the wardrobe of a two-penny doll. She was no loser by it, for I was often permitted to carry a basket of fruit or choice vegetables from our spacious garden, to regale the old lady, and I took care so to time my visits, as to insure being present at that adroit and interesting operation, the turning of her hour-glass.

Many years have passed since then,
Many changes have I seen;

and from this early recollection being deeply impressed, I cannot now cast my eyes on an old-fashioned hour-glass but it becomes identified with that of the good sempstress. I seem to view it through the long chequered vista that lies between me and the scenes of careless childhood; and as a rapid glance scans that intervening space, the hour-glass becomes a memento more touching than any classical association could render it.

There is surely something more suitable to the stealthy lapse of time in the noiseless and almost imperceptible fall of the sands, than in the ticking of chronometers, more practically useful. The deepening vacancy above, the rising heaps beneath, and the falling away, from time to time, of that miniature mountain which gathers below—all have a meaning. I observe that the sand in the upper division of the glass, running from the centre, often leaves a hollow, producing deception as to the quantity actually subtracted. Clinging yet to the sides, it makes the vacancy look less; just as we love to deceive ourselves as to the proportion of our numbered days that has escaped. The pyramidical appearance of the sand below, as the last particles that fall produce an eminence, until, displaced by following grains, they sink into the common level, vividly represents the undue importance assumed by events while yet very recent; although, by dwelling on their magnitude, we all know that displaced by other things, they will soon be mingled with the common mass of recollections.

It were easy to moralize at great length on the subject, but I would rather spiritualize, and read the lesson in its highest, holiest sense. "So teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom." The days remaining to us we cannot number, for we know not but that our last sand is escaping which we try to compute; but the days that are gone—O! what a testimony do they bear against us! We may have applied our time and faculties to the acquirement of wisdom, according to the general sense of the word among us; but our hearts—our most secret desires and ardent affections—how far have they been centred in the wisdom that is from above, and in "Christ the wisdom of God?"

An honest answer to this question would send the greater number of us to the throne of grace, with the confidence that we still have to be taught this application of heart to the purposes designed by our Heavenly Father. Solomon trod the whole round of carnal and intellectual enjoyments, having his fill of all wisdom; yet how late in his long and prosperous life did he sit down to write "vanity of vanities" upon it all, and apply his heart to the God from whom, through the abuse of his abundant gifts, the favored king had so deeply revolted. Let me number the days that are gone; and seeing how God has hitherto been robbed by me, let me strive to redeem the few that remain.

Curious Facts.—The mite makes 500 steps in a second, or 30,000 in a minute. Allowing the horse to move at equal ratio, he would perform 1022 miles an hour. The journey from London to Birmingham would then occupy but six minutes and a fraction There is another insect which may, in some measure, rival the above in the celerity of his motion, and is itself unrivalled in strength in proportion to its size. Although it is generally disliked, and has not a very fair reputation, yet to the eye of the naturalist, it is rather a pleasing and interesting object. All its motions indicate agility and sprightliness, and its muscular power is so extraordinary, as justly to excite our astonishment; indeed we know no other animal whose strength can be put in competition with (its name must come out at last) that of a common flea; for on a moderate computation, it can leap to a distance at 200 times the length of its own body. A flea will drag after it a chain 100 times heavier than itself, and will eat ten times its own weight of provisions in a day. Mr. Boverich, an ingenious watchmaker, who, some years ago, lived in the Strand, London, exhibited to the public a little ivory chaise with four wheels and all its proper apparatus, and a man sitting on the box, all of which were drawn by a single flea. He made a small landau which opened and shut by springs, with six horses harnessed to it, a coachman sitting on the box, and a dog sitting between his legs, four persons in the carriage, two footmen behind it, and a postilion riding on one of the fore horses, which was also drawn easily along by a flea. He likewise had a chain of brass, about two inches long, containing 200 links, with a hook at one end and a padlock and key at the other, which the flea drew very nimbly along. Something of the same kind is now exhibiting in London.—Edinburgh Encyclopoedia.

The Hebrew.—Who can describe the stately, and giant built Hebrew? the most simple, the most philosophical and most ancient of written tongues; with letters like blocks of marble, with words like king's palaces, with sentences like cities walled up to heaven; though robed in the beauties of holiness, yet rugged as the mountains about Jerusalem; unchangeable in its structure, unvarying and solemn in its tone, from generation to generation, the language of rigor and of Judgment, of adoration and obedience; spoken first in the Garden of Eden, or by the builders of Babel, written first on tables of stone by the finger of Jehovah; forever preserving its awful dignity, whether sung by Seraphim above, or by the choirs of the temple, whether carried to the highest heavens of sublimity by Isaiah, or brought down to play among the roses of Sharon and the lillies of the valley of Solomon, and destitute alike of the elasticity of the Greek, and the natural prowess of the Latin. unable to soar with the one or change with the other; but ever marching with the slow and measured pace of an ancient army of elephants.

Three languages contain all the treasures of the ancient world; Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, once reconciled at the cross, and brought into mysterious union around the head of the dying Son of God, have from that day to this formed the united repositories of classical and theological learning; the mines out of which has been dug all the jewels of truth and beauty which adorn every language of Christendom.

Patience under Trials.—I have seen a well born young lady, whom the reverses of her family had plunged into indigence, after having been reduced for subsistence to the labor of their hands, attacked by a cancer. She suffered acute pains. Everything failed her. She had not even linnen, with which to dress her wounds. She had not even a bed to repose upon in her agony. She saw her malady increase, from day to day; and she felt that her strength was declining.—She had no other prospect of relief, than the tomb open to receive her. But not a complaint escaped her lips. Her countenance was serene and gentle, her calmness was not impaired a single moment, till the hour of release.

I have seen a mother of six children, extended, night and day, upon a little straw in a garret, with a fatal ulcer, which was destroying her, and not able to give bread to those poor little beings, who were weeping around her. In her own husband, too, who ought to have been her consolation and support, she had an additional subject of cutting sorrow; and she was thus supporting, at the same time, the sufferings of body and soul. But she supported them with an unalterable sweetness, pardoning even the unworthy husband, who aggravated her woes, instead of relieving them; and who abused the succors destined for her, and consumed them himself, in drunkenness. I have seen aged, infirm, and forsaken widows occupying a nook so low and narrow, that one could scarce enter it, and having no other light than what came from the staircase, and there waiting the immense favor of entering into a hospital; (for such is the object of the wishes of a greater number.) And alas!—how many desire it in vain, and cannot obtain it! I have seen miseries which pass all belief, and physical tortures united with the most pressing wants and painful privations; and all these endured by martyrs of patience, without aid, hope, or witness; submitting to the Divine will. Where are crowns worthy of such triumph? What tenderness mingles with our respect, when we think, that the beings called to display such courage are feeble women, and old men already exhausted by long trials!—Baron Degerando.

Discovery of Mummies at Durango, Mexico.—A million of mummies, it is stated, have lately been discovered in the environs of Durango, in Mexico. They are in a sitting posture, but have the same wrappings, bands and ornaments as the Egyptian. Among them was found a poniard of flint, with a sculptured handle, chaplets, ncklaces, &c., of alternately colored beads, fragments of bone polished like ivory, fine worked elastic tissues, (probably our modern Indian rubber cloth) moccasins worked like those of our Indians of to-day, bones of vipers, &c. It remains to continue these interesting researches, and America will become another Egypt to antiquarians, and her ruins will go back to the oldest periods of the world, showing doubtless that the ancestors of the Montezumas lived on the Nile, and that their luxurious civilization was broken up and overpowered by the hardy hordes of Asiatic Tartars, who came down Behering's Straits and the Rocky Mountains. The scenes of Atilla and Alaric in Rome and Greece, were rehearsed at an earlier day on the shores of California and the plains of Mexico. It is unknown of the mummies above mentioned what kind of embalmment was used, or whether it was nitrous depositions in the caves where they were found. A fact of importance is stated, that the shells of the necklace are of a marine shell found at Zacatecas, on their forefathers probably therefore landed from the Malas, Hindoostan or Chinese coast or from the islands in the Indian ocean.—Texas Star.

Pressure of the Atmosphere.—The weight of the atmosphere is near fifteen pounds on every square inch, so that if we could entirely squeeze out the air between our two hands, they would cling together with a force equal to the pressure of double this weight, because the air would press upon both hands; and if we could contrive to suck or squeeze out the air between one hand and the wall, the hand would stick fast to the wall, being pressed on it with the weight of above two hundred pounds, near fifteen pounds on every square inch of the hand! Now, by a late most curious discovery of Sir Everard Home, the distinguished anatomist, it is found that this is the very process by which flies and other insects of a similar description are enabled to walk upon perpendicular surfaces, however smooth, as the sides of walls and panes of glass in windows and to walk as easily along the ceiling of rooms with their bodies downward and their feet overhead. Their feet, when examined by a microscope, are found to have flat skins or flaps, like the feet of web footed animals, as ducks and geese; and they have, by means of strong folds, the power of drawing the flap close down upon the glass or wall the fly walks on, and thus squeezing out the air completely, so as to make a vacuum between the foot and the glass or wall. The consequence of this is, that the air presses the foot on the wall with a very considerable force compared to the weight of the fly; for if its feet are to its body in the same proportion as ours are to our bodys, since we could support by a single hand on the ceiling of the room (provided it made a vacuum) more than our whole weight, namely a weight of over two hundred pounds, the fly can easily move on four feet, in the same manner by help of the vacuum made under its feet.—And it has been likewise been found that some of the larger sea animals are, by the same construction, enabled to climb the perpendicular and smooth surfaces of the ice hills among which they live. Some kinds of lizards have the same power of climbing and creeping with their bodies downwards along the ceiling of the room, and the means by which they are enabled to do so are the same. And in the large feet of those animals the contrivance is easily observed, of the toes and muscle, by which the skin of the foot is pinned down and the air excluded in the act of walking or climbing, but it is the very same, only upon a larger scale, with the mechanism of a fly's or a butterfly's foot; and both operations, the climbing of the sea-horse on the ice, and the creeping of the fly on the window or the ceiling, are performed exactly by the same power to stand in the weather glass, the wind to whistle through a key-hole, and the piston to descend in an old steam engine.—Brougham.

Philosophy of Law.—Law—is like fire, and those who meddle with it may chance to "burn their fingers."

Law—is like a pocket with a hole in it; and those who therein risk their money are very like to lose it.

Law—is like a lancet, dangerous in the hands of the ignorant; doubtful even in the hands of an adept.

Law—is like a sieve. you may see through it; but you will be considerably reduced before you can get through it.

Law—is to the litigant what the poulterer is to the goose; it plucks and it draws him; but here the simile ends, for the litigant, unlike the goose, never gets trust, [trussed,] although he may be roasted and dished.

Law—is like an ignis fatuus, or Jack o' Lantern: those who follow the delusive guide too often find themselves inextricably involved in a bog or a quagmire.

Law—is like prussic acid, a dangerous remedy, and the smallest dose is generally sufficient.

Law—is like justice, even as copper gilt is like gold, and the comparative worth of the two is about the same.

Law—is like an eel-trap, very easy to get into but very difficult to get out of.

Law—is like a razor, which requires a "strong back," keenness, and an excellent temper.

N. B. Many of those who get once "shaved with ease and expedition," seldom risk a second operation.

Law—is like a flight of rockets; there is a great expense of "powder;" the cases are usually well "got up;" the reports are excellent, but, after all, the sticks (q. d. the clients,) are sure to come to the ground.

Law—is like a window of stained glass, giving its own peculiar tint and hue to the bright rays of truth which shine through it.

A Witness against Intemperance.—A distinguished lecturer on temperance says:

While lecturing in the eastern section of Massachusetts, I met a man in the road one day, who had been one of my audience the day before; and though an entire stranger, he accosted me with the question—Did you say, sir, yesterday, that ardent spirits are injurious to the human system? I did say so, I replied. Well! our doctor says he thinks they are beneficial, when not taken to excess. But where was your doctor when he said so? Why sir, he was down at Coomb's; it's our tavern down there, about half a mile. And what was your doctor doing when he said so? He was talking, sir; in the bar-room. Had he nothing in his hand? He had nothing, sir, but a glass of brandy sling!

The Good Old Times of the Puritans.—In 1627, there were but thirty-seven ploughs in Massachusetts, and the use of these agricultural implements was not familiar to all the planters. From the annals of Salem it appears, in that year, it was agreed by town to grant Richardson Hutchinson twenty acres of land in addition to his share on condition "he get up ploughing."

1639. A sumptuary act of the General Court prohibited short sleeves, and required the garment to be lengthened so as to cover the arms to the wrists, and required reformation "in immoderate great breeches, knots of ribbon, broad shoulder bands and tayles, silk rases, double cuffs and ruffs."

1639. "For preventing the miscarriage of letters, it is ordered that notice be given, that Richard Fairbank, his house in Boston, is the place appointed for all letters, which are brought from beyond the sea are to be sent thither, are to be brought unto him, and he is allowed for every such letter 1*d*, and must answer all miscarriages through his own neglect in this kind, provided that no man shall be obliged to bring his letters thither, unless he please."

1643. The Court order, that in the election of assistants, Indian beans should be used instead of paper, the white to be affirmative and the black negative.

1647. The Court order, that if any young man attempt to address a young woman, without the consent of her parents, in case of their absence, of the County Court, he shall be fined 5*l*. for the first offence. 10*l*. for the second, and be imprisoned for the third.

1649. Matthew Stanley, was tried for drawing the affections of John Tarbox's daughter without the consent of parents, convicted and fined 5*l*. fees 2s. 6d. Three married women were fined 5s. each for scolding.

1653. Jonas Fairbanks was tried for wearing great boots, but was acquitted.—National Ægis.

Afraid to Learn.—It is related that Galileo, who invented the telescope with which he observed the satelites of Jupiter, who invited a man, who was opposed to him to look through it, that he might observe Jupiter's moon's. The man positively refused—saying, "If I should see them how could I maintain my opinions which I have advanced against your philosophy!" This is the case with many. They will not look at the truth. They will not hear it, for fear that the arguments which they have framed will be destroyed, and they may be obliged to give up their vicious indulgencies.

In nine cases out of ten, the wisest course is, if a man cheats you, to quit dealing with him; if he be abusive, quit his company; if he slanders you, take care to live so that nobody will believe him.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

PROSPECTUS OF THE FARM HOUSE OF THE XIX CENTURY, OR ENCYCLOPEDIA OF PRACTICAL AGRICULTURE, containing the best mode of culture adopted in France, England, Germany, and Flanders; full practical instructions to guide the small cultivator, the farmer, the director, and the large proprietor in the improvement of an estate; the general principle of agriculture, and the culture of all the useful plants; the training of domestic animals, and the veterinary art; the description of various arts relating to agriculture; rural implements and buildings; the management and improvement of vines, fruit trees, timber, and forests, tanks, etc., the economy, organization, and direction of a rural establishment; and finally, legislation as applied to agriculture: closing with a table of contents alphabetically arranged, a list of figures, abbreviations, and authorities cited.

An Elementary, Complete, and Methodical Course of Rural Economy, with more than Two Thousand Engravings, representing the various Implements, Machines, sets of Apparatus, Breeds of Animals, Trees, Shrubs, and Plants, Rural Buildings, etc. Digested and Revised by a Committee of Scientific and Practical Agriculturists, belonging to the Agricultural Society of France, under the direction of M. T. Bailey, Member of the Societies of Agriculture and Horticulture. Translated from the French, with Notes adapting it to the use of farmers in the United States of America, by Elizur Wright, jr., formerly Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in the Western Reserve College, Translator of La Fontaine's Fables, &c.

Agriculture is the foundation of all human arts—the art for which man was made, and the perfection of which is his chief happiness and glory as the lord temporal of this planet. Of this sublime art, all other arts and sciences are but satellites, their business being to wait on, enlighten, and adorn it with their moonshine. Consequently, no man more than the agriculturalist needs the full use of his [illegible], and a perfect command of all the treasures of human experience. So the farmer of the United States view the matter; and in presenting them with a translation of the celebrated Maison Rustique of the French, we have no doubt of their hearty support. It is the work of all works on practical agriculture; the most scientific, clear, and comprehensive. France has long excelled in profitable farming. This is the source of her wealth. England is rich by coals and commerce. Her agriculture is splendid, but sometimes costs more than it comes to. Those who have fortunes to spend may buy the vast works of [illegible] Arthor Young, Loudon, &c., but those who wish to get a fortune out of the soil [illegible] the French writers better able to show them the way. The excellence of French elementary works is well known to all teachers. For centuries, the Maison Rustique has been, in France, the standard elementary work—the spelling book and grammar of farming. The present edition for "the nineteenth century," has been re-written and brought up with the "march of mind," by sixty of the ablest "agronomes" of France. It has all the light of the latest improvements, not only in France, but in all Europe.

William Cobbett, one of the most successful farmers both in England and America, who wrote the best English style and the best [illegible] that ever was, [illegible] the Maison Rustique not only as an [illegible] of farming, but as a means of educating his children. He was his own schoolmaster. [illegible] self into a school, and the [illegible] then made of this work.

"Our book of never failing resource [illegible] French Maison Rustique, or Farm House [illegible] it is said, was the book that first tempted [illegible] nos (I think that was his name) [illegible] clamen the reign of Louis XIV, to learn to read. Here are the four-legged animals, from the horse down to the mouse, portraits and all; all the birds, reptiles, insects; all the modes of treating [illegible] aging, and using the tame ones, and [illegible] those that are mischievous; all the [illegible] springs, nets; all the labors of the field and garden exhibited, as well as the rest, in plates; and there was I, in my leisure moments, to [illegible] tive group, to read the French and tell them what it meaned in English, when the picture did not sufficiently explain itself. I never have been without a copy of this book for forty years, except during the time that I was fleeing from the dungeons of Castlereagh and Sidmouth in 1817; and when I got to Long Island, the first book I bought was another Maison Rustique."—Advice to Young Men, Art. 129.

Of the qualifications of the translator it may be said that he is a practical farmer, and in regard to his translation of La Fontaine, which has been reprinted in England, an English reviewer confesses that he "does not know the English writer who could have done it better."

Terms.—The work will be published as a semi-monthly periodical, in numbers of 56 pages octavo, each 25 cents, and when completed will contain forty numbers, at $10.

Five dollars paid in advance for [illegible] 21 Numbers, shall entitle subscribers to the remaining 20 Numbers for four dollars.

[illegible] smaller sums, [illegible] less than $1, [illegible] the same [illegible]

The 1st number will be issued [illegible] 1842.

All orders and remittances [illegible] to S. S. HASKELL, [illegible] New York.

New York, June 1, 1842.

 All editors who will give the above [illegible] insertions, and forward [illegible] them to the New York Watchman [illegible] to one copy of the work.

NO IMPOSITION.

NO STATES PRISON WORK

THOSE [illegible] BOOTS [illegible] SHOES [illegible] will find just the place by [illegible]
MAMMOTH [illegible]

De Ruyter, May 20, 1842.

JOB PRINTING.

BOOKS, Pamphlets, Way [illegible] Bills, &c &c neatly [illegible]

L. W BLISS' Window Sash [illegible] Bliss' & Co [illegible] Bands [illegible] Holme's Sampson & [illegible] consisting of Broad Axes, Hand [illegible] Chisels, at Factory prices by [illegible]
October 4.

LOTS OF HATS & CAPS [illegible]—Fashionable and Old Fashioned, Bell Crowned and Low Crowned; and, to crown all, and not be out of Fashion, Cash and most kinds of [illegible] received in payment, by HART, ACKLEY, & CO

SILK! SILK!! SILK!!!

A BEAUTIFUL assortment of plain, figured and striped, just received and for sale very cheap at the NEW YORK CASH STORE

"A nimble sixpence is better than a slow shilling."

SPRING GOODS! SPRING GOODS!

CHEAP! CHEAP!! CHEAP!!!

THE undersigned are receiving a large assortment of goods suitable for the spring and summer trade, and invite their friends and the public generally to call and examine them at the one price store.
SUTTON & QUINBY.

Notice.

ALL persons who are indebted to the subscriber, either in accounts or note, are requested to call and settle immediately and save cost.
De Ruyter, June 20, 1842.
JAMES M. [illegible]

How to make money,

IS the study of mankind and of the Yankee Nation in particular. The easiest and most practicable plan for accomplishing the desired end in these times is to "Save Money," which can be done by purchasing NEW GOODS, instead of the trashy accumulations of many shops and many years. The place to do this, is at ELMORE'S, whose stock of NEW GOODS is nearly equal to all the rest received in this village and who is daily dispensing great bargains to "Fortune's Favorites."
May 30.

Of Drugs and Medicines.

THE subscriber keeps a much larger stock and sells much lower than those who advertise two columns.
May 30. [illegible] N. ELMORE.

4 CASES, [illegible] fashionable Hats [illegible] and for sale low at the
May 30. STONE STORE

NEW TAILORING ESTABLISHMENT.

THE subscriber would inform the Citizens of De Ruyter [illegible] that he has opened a shop [illegible] Farmer's Exchange, where he may at all times be found [illegible] to favor him with a call [illegible] garments as well as [illegible] New York City.

N. B. Garments cut and warranted if made by competent workmen. New York Spring and Summer Fashions just received. W. P. GUEST.
De Ruyter, April 25th, 1842.

FLOUR! FLOUR!! FLOUR!!!

SUPERFINE Flour for sale at the Farmers' Exchange, put up in good order in barrels and half barrels. Said Flour is made from the best of western wheat, at one of the best mills in the state.
S. G. WALKER.
De Ruyter, April 19th, 1842.

BLANKS! BLANKS!!

JUSTICES' Blanks, Personal Mortgages, &c., just printed and for sale at this office.
De Ruyter, Apr. 20, 1842.

TEAS, SUGARS

CALL and see how cheap they are selling them at the NEW YORK CASH STORE
Oct 11

500 PAIRS Boots and Shoes for sale at the
May 30. STONE STORE.

AGENTS FOR THE REGISTER.

NEW-YORK

[illegible]

RHODE-ISLAND

[illegible]

CONNECTICUT

[illegible]

NEW-JERSEY

[illegible]

PENNSYLVANIA

[illegible]

VIRGINIA

[illegible]

OHIO

[illegible]

MICHIGAN

[illegible]

WISKONSAN

[illegible]

IOWA

[illegible] M. Whitford

ILLINOIS.

[illegible] James Dunham

The Seventh-day Baptist Register
IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY,
AT DE RUYTER, MADISON CO., N. Y.,
BY
JAMES BAILEY.

TERMS.—To village subscribers who have the paper left at their doors, $2 25, in advance, or $2 50, at the expiration of the year.

☞To office and mail subscribers, $2 in ADVANCE.

Each communication, involving facts and intended for insertion in the paper, must be accompanied by a responsible name.

No subscription received for a less term than six months.

☞All subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, will be considered as wishing to continue their subscription, and their paper will be sent to them accordingly. No paper will be discontinued till all arrearages are paid except at the discretion of the publisher.

☞Advertisements inserted on the most reasonable terms.

☞All letters and communications to ensure attention should be addressed to the publisher, free of postage.

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.

VOL. III.—NO. 21.] JAMES BAILEY, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.—A. H. BURDICK, PRINTER. WHOLE NO. [illegible]

Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,——The SEVENTH DAY is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.—COMMANDMENT.——If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments.—Jesus Christ.

TWO DOLLARS IN ADVANCE.] DE RUYTER, N. Y., FOURTH-DAY, JULY 20, 1842. [PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Religious Department.

UNIVERSALISM.

The doctrines of Universalism are various, contradictory, and distrustful. With a strong predilection for free thinking, its advocates evidently combine some respect for the scriptures, though less than most other denominations entertain. It has been disputed whether they should be ranked as a Christian sect. The author of "Universalism as it is," thinks they should not.—Leaving this question to be settled as parties may agree, we shall direct the reader's attention to some of the principal features of the system, and try to show that they are unphilosophical as well as unscriptural. All the different shades of this doctrine from the restorationism of Winchester and Chauncey, down to the bare faced scepticism of Wittemore and Ballou, harmonize, in rejecting the idea of endless future punishment. When asked to define and systematize their views, they have generally refused for fear of consequences, and ended by saying, that they insisted on but a single point, the final happiness of all men. This opposition to the scriptural doctrine of endless punishment is a novelty in the world. Heathen antiquity maintained that the wicked were to be punished forever, and we do not now recollect of any system of religion, ancient or modern, but what inculcates the same sentiment. If Christianity is thus conformed to the natural opinions of mankind, its teachings can not be so abhorrent as Universalists suppose. We admit that false systems of religion afford no great help to the true interpretation of Christianity, but they will at least give some light upon human nature, and as the orthodox sentiment is charged with a want of humanity, it is but reasonable that judgment be suspended, until nature herself is either acquitted or condemned. Endless punishment is a fearful thing, and we wonder not that the guilty should look upon it as horrible. Sin blinds the mind and blunts the sensibilities, so that the sinner can neither know his guilt, nor realize the character of God. Hence, objections to this doctrine rarely occur except among the unconverted. Those who have felt the burden of their sins, and who know somewhat of spiritual life, will be able to assign the reason for their former unbelief, and to commiserate the condition of those who grope in moral blindness. But aside from the evidence derived from conversion, there seems to us more than sufficient reason for rejecting the Universalist theory. As God is an infinite being, we, of course, can not perfectly understand his nature nor his works. His promises and his threatenings are alike incomprehensible. There is mystery about heaven not less than about hell. It would be strange if the administration of punishment was not as dark and difficult to our minds as the other governmental acts of the same infinite being. We expect obscurity; "Who by searching can find out God?" "How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out?" Why it should be thought that human sagacity is equal to a discovery of the entire system of penal retribution, we are at a loss to determine. Or why greater interest should be felt on this than on all other points, is very singular and unintelligible. Yet such is the fact. Universalists find the same unfathomable depths in other matters as the orthodox. We do not say that they have as clear views, nor that they receive the remaining doctrines of the gospel; but we maintain that so far as they do hold with the scriptures, there is equal mystery in their creed. In this respect Christianity places all its professors on common ground; they hold the truth with its mystery, or not at all. Christians are safe in the perfections of the divine nature. God can not be unjust, and however unable mere man may be to see the propriety of his acts, there is the utmost certainty that nothing unwise or unkind will ever occur. Whatever eternal punishment may include, will have the same infinite propriety as other retributive dispensations. Another feature of the system, is its total disagreement with the actual circumstances of the world. Philosophy requires that the future shall be judged by the past. Here Universalism fails at once, as its principal hypothesis is inconsistent with either the past or present condition of the human race. If sin is permitted to afflict mankind through the whole of this life, where are the assurances that its consequences will not be protracted through a much longer existence in the world to come?

God was as able to prevent sin yesterday as he will be to-morrow; he was also as able to dispense with punishment, and to make his creatures happy as he will be in eternity. Still, suffering follows in the ratio of guilt, though with certain exceptions and circumstances, which indicate that perfect retribution is deferred to a future life. Revelation comes in, not to weaken, but to confirm this suspicion of after consequences to the transgressor. Heathenism judged correctly that the future must be analagous to the past. To avoid this conclusion, Universalists take a position at variance with both nature and revelation.—We envy them not either their safety or their consistency. The sceptical and licentious freedom with which they treat the sacred scriptures, ought to bring them into contempt as critics. It would be more decent to renounce a volume at once, than to disguise its meaning in such a shameless manner. Other denominations have done violence to portions of the text, but this has perverted both the spirit and the letter of the whole institution. It has no redeeming qualities.

ELEGANT EXTRACT.

After all, if the stern voice of truth will awaken us from our pleasing visions as to the sanctity of these peculiar spots—if the spell which attached us to the fancied Golgotha and the imagined place of our Lord's burial be broken—is there much lost to the devout Christian? If we would yield to the "sacer admonitus locorum;" if we would indulge the natural and indelible, and therefore assuredly to the severest puritanism, or the most refined spirituality, excusable affections of the human heart; if we strengthen our faith, and deepen our love by wandering over scenes which have witnessed events so inestimably important to our temporal and eternal happiness, this is the sole difference: instead of concentrating all our reverential feelings on some few particular and ill-authenticated spots, we diffuse them more equably throughout the whole region; instead of resting on impressions, liable to be disturbed by doubt and chilled by uncertainty, we draw them as it were from the whole soil of the holy city, we inhale them from the whole atmosphere. We can not point to the precise spots which were hallowed by the footsteps of the Redeemer; we know not the exact position of his cross; we have no distinct evidence "where they have laid him in his burial." But all Jerusalem and its adjacent fields are our Golgotha, one holy sepulchre; the presence of Christ is every where: one "via dolorosa" passes through and encircles all the city, every rock hewn sepulchre suggest the angelic assurance—"He is not here, he is risen." In the incidents, indeed, of our Lord's latter days, there appears to us that peculiarity which, if we may so speak, sets them above the aid of special local association; they are in themselves so real that they do not require that realization which strengthens our faith in the vaguer and more indistinct wonders, especially of the older scriptures. It is singular how totally regardless the evangelical narratives are of any thing which might lead to local reminiscence. These places or buildings which are accidentally mentioned, and which we may call historical, are presumed to be sufficiently known by their usual appellations, the high priest's house, the hall of Pilate. So we are simply told, that "they led him away to crucify him;" but whether to the east or the west, the north or the south, by what streets, or through what gate—there is not a single word. Whether Golgotha or Calvary was the ordinary place of execution, we can only conjecture by remote inference. It has been supposed to be on a hill, as the painful toil with which kneeling pilgrims wind up the Mount Calvary, near many Roman Catholic cities of Europe, may witness; but in the gospels there is no expression which intimates ascent.—The weight of the cross is not aggravated, nor the inability of our Lord to bear it, heightened by any allusion to the difficulty of the way. The only point descriptive of the sepulchre is, that it was near the place of crucifixion; yet with all this, how clear and distinct the whole scene lies before the imagination! It is not familiarity with paintings of the crucifixion, or of the angel standing before the rock-hewn tomb, which makes the whole live before us; it is the inbred truthfulness of the history itself in its unlabored simplicity; it is its own unassisted evidence which fixes it upon the heart and mind; it is the picture which arises out of the records themselves, which groups and harmonizes itself into form and variety. At all events, the student of the gospels, who is full of every minute incident of the narrative, would be disturbed rather than edified by any view of the localities of those scenes which would not accord with his well-grounded prepossessions; every incongruity would jar upon his high-wrought religious feeling; doubt wo'd creep over his ardent emotions, and he would find thus strongly exemplified that fatal but inevitable effect of pious fraud, or, if not of fraud, of long superstition; it may work its object with generations of believers, but the time must at length come, when it will injure, often most seriously, the cause which it wished to serve.—Extract from a Review of Robinson's Researches in the Holy Land.

From Zion's Advocate.

RELIGIOUS PROGRESS.

It is the glory of Christianity that it provides for the indefinite progress of man towards the perfection of his nature. No such provision is made by any other system of religion, or of philosophy. The purest and best of these can only hack at the branches of moral evil, while the rank principle of vitality remains untouched. Some of them, it is true, seem to tend towards external reformation: but they never, never spring the mine of corruption that lies concealed deep in every human bosom. The high priests that minister at their altars, are content with trying to heal over the wound which they deem but skin deep, without once suspecting that it extends to the very heart, where it rankles and festers, quite beyond the reach of their soothing appliances. They encourage the miserably deceived patient to hope that all is well, while he secretly wonders at the scorching fever which is preying upon his vitals, and sending the poisoned blood with fearful velocity to the farthest extremity of his system.

Quite to the reverse of this, is the genius of the gospel. Its divine philosophy aims a fatal blow at the very root of moral evil. It seeks to remove the cause, rather than conceal or palliate the effects of sin. It staunches the fountain, instead of making an abortive attempt to pen up its poisonous waters, after they have flowed forth in a thousand different directions. It aims not to destroy the enemy by an outward siege; but throws itself at once, into the citadel of the heart, where its antagonist feels, and dreads, and gradually shrinks away from before the omnipotence of its presence. It inspires the man upon whom it is doing its work, with something of the spirit of Bunyan's pilgrim, in his flight from the city of destruction, when putting his fingers in his ears, he rushed forward, shouting, "Life, life, eternal life!" It gives him an onward, and an upward impulse, and warns him not to tarry in all the plain, but to escape from the dreadful storm, whose low murmuring are already heard in the distance, and which shall surely come down upon all who heed not the friendly warning. Its first effort is to remodel the whole inner man, to change the current of the affections, and to create and keep up an incessant warfare against the rankling and death bearing evils of sin.—As a sanctifying agent, its action is progressive, and its work is never accomplished, until God reigns without a rival in the heart of his pardoned subject. If it essentially new-makes, it does not perfect the man at once. Its first work is to arrest him in his downward career, to reverse the order of his progress, and to point out the gaol to which he must aspire. The existence of this progressive element in the Christian religion, is every where recognized in the Bible. The individual who has just received Christ, has just commenced his spiritual existence—he is a babe in the spiritual world, and before he can become a full grown man, he must, of necessity, pass through the successive stages of childhood, of adolescence, and of youth. Possessing all the essential elements of his kind, he is yet a very infant in strength, in knowledge, and in ability to comprehend. As generically and really a Christian as the hardest veteran of the Cross, he is yet comparatively weak, and helpless, and unskilled in fighting the battles of the Lord.

But does the gospel abandon him to perpetual supineness and ignorance almost as soon as he has opened his eyes upon the spiritual creation, and before he is fully conscious of the change that has come over him? No; thanks be to God. It makes ample provision for his progress towards perfection, until he shall come to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ. And need it be said that he is guilty, if he do not avail himself of this provision?—How sublime is the object before him!—compared with it, how insignificant appears every worldly pursuit! The dangers he is to encounter, the difficulties he is to meet, the enemies he is to combat, the victory he is to win, the reward he is to receive, all point him out as one, whose thoughts should be much on heavenly, and little on worldly things. Yes: the Christian church ought to be made up of Baxters, and Bunyans, and Newtons, and Judsons, and Newells, and Harlan Pages. Why is it not?—Why?

From the Boston Recorder.

A STRANGE PRAYER.

"Give me neither poverty." That will do. Most that do, and all that do not pray, will agree in their opposition to poverty.—But the good man did not stop with the word poverty. He adds—"nor riches." Neither give me riches! Really this is strange. Wealth is the sun of the firmament to most men—the vital air—the all in all. Millions are struggling, panting, hoping, risking health, life, the soul's salvation even, for riches. All the things that are desired are not comparable to them.

But here is a man praying against them! He would not like to be rich. He is so much in earnest that he prays about the matter. People would stare at the offering of such a prayer now-a-days. Was the man sane that offered it?

1. He gave a reason for his prayer. Insane men do not reason much. Hear the reason—"lest I be full and deny thee, and say, Who is the Lord?" Hence he would not be rich. Now, if riches cause men to deny and disregard God—if they magnify temporal things so as to eclipse eternal—if they become a God in the place of the only living God, then there was a good reason for the strange prayer, and we think he must have been sane that could give so good a reason for his conduct.

2. If riches are often dangerous, then there is more proof that this praying man was not insane. Ahab wanted more riches, and his wicked wife helped him to imbrue his hands in innocent blood to obtain them, and they both perished miserably.—Judas wanted more money—betrayed Christ to get it, and it cost him his life.—Annanias and Sapphira wanted wealth, and lied to the Holy Ghost about a sum of money, and they both perished. This looks as though there was danger about riches. And it is as proper to pray for escape from this danger as any other.

3. The praying man agreed exactly in opinion with some of the ancient and best persons ever on earth, which insane men are not apt to do. Jesus Christ said, "How hardly shall they that have riches, enter the kingdom of God;" affirming also, "that the deceitfulness of riches choke the word." We add, he must have gold dust in his eyes, or dust of some kind if in reading the history of the world, he has not perceived there was danger to men's spiritual welfare, from the possession of riches. For a good man to pray for safety against such a danger, is not so great a mistake. We have looked sharply, but we do not perceive any insanity in it. Men do not pray much in this generation against being rich. They are so sure that they can guide the whirlwind, and control the storm of temptation, that they are not afraid of wealth. They acknowledge the vast increase of allurements to evil by it, and the vast increase of perplexity and care, but then the accumulation of power and honor, and perhaps of pleasure, carries the day.

And then, so much can be done by riches. This spreads a deceitful splendor over wealth so that even saints are beguiled.—They would spend every energy to gain property so that they may do good with it! And they will let spiritual riches tinkle into their coffers by the penny only, and these pence far between each other; while this world's wealth rolls in upon them "like a river." "We will do good with it!"—"Aye," says Satan, "strive for it; pant after it; peril every thing for it; get it, only get it, for that reason or any reason, and I will take care it shall be a mill-stone about your neck." So thousands have found it. And for that reason, God in kindness keeps most of his people from being rich. Some of them do not feel very well about it. But they will be wiser before the elements melt in fervent heat. And when they are, they will not think the prayer of Agur a strange prayer.

LIFE, A RACE.

Look upward and look onward!—Fix your regards habitually, not on what you are, but what you should be; not on the space you have already passed, but what remains to be run over; not on what man may think your excellencies, but what you know to be your defects; not on the nearer guide-posts only, which may seem to need but little effort to reach, but on the far-off splendors of the goal. That splendor is the blaze of full-orbed holiness. The prize you seek is but the consummation of the process you are carrying on in its pursuits. The happiness of heaven is just the holiness which is in the very course towards heaven we have been forming in us. Gaze thou on the holiness in its breadth and length, and god-like height. Meditate long and often on the rich variety of the qualities which make up the conception for which it stands. But where shall we behold this holiness so full, so vivid, as it is revealed to us in the face of Jesus Christ? Even inspired words cannot convey to us its perfect image. It is only the living practical manifestation of his living character. He is the great exemplar of what human nature, quickened by the Divine, can grow to; the only true and perfect flower which ever has unfolded itself out of the root and stalk of humanity! The man Christ Jesus is the model of the species. To study him is to study Truth and Life in one! To look at him is to behold identified the Ideal and the Actual; to see man verily existing, breathing, speaking, and acting in that image of God in which he was at first created—to see the second Adam, the Lord from heaven, restoring to us the bright model of all human excellence, which the first Adam broke into a thousand fragments. In Him concentre all the various rays of holiness; whatever things are true, and dignified, and pure, and lovely, and of good report—to form one pure white light of 'mildest, though intensest splendor.' Therefore it is by looking unto Jesus, as our Righteousness, our Peace, our Strength, our Model, and our Crown, that we must with "patience run the Race that is before us."

EVE AND MARY CONTRASTED.

The two most extraordinary women that ever appeared in the world, were, unquestionably, Eve, "the mother of all living," and Mary, "the mother of Jesus Christ." They occupied respectively, the highest and the most critical point of time, that ever fell to the lot of mortals, and they exhibit an instinctive contrast. Eve lived at the beginning, and Mary at "the fulness of time." Eve saw the glories of the new made world soon after creative wisdom had pronounced it all "very good," and before sin had tarnished its beauty, and disarranged its harmonies. Mary beheld it rising from the ruins of the fall, at the moment of its renovation, and at the dawn of its happiest days. Eve was placed in the most glorious and conspicuous situation, and fell into a state of meanness and degradation. Mary was of obscure origin, and lowly situation, but was raised by a single appointment of Providence, to the highest eminence. Eve was accessary to the ruin of man; Mary instrumental in the birth of Him, who came as the Restorer and Savior of mankind. Eve beheld the fatal curse first take effect, in overcasting the heavens with clouds, in withering the blossoms of Paradise, envenoming the spirit of the animal creation, disordering the human frame, and ultimately destroying it, and introducing all the nameless diversities of woe which fill up the tragedy of human life. Mary witnessed the beginning of that long series of blessings which divine love has for ages dispensed to man "through the redemption that is in Jesus Christ," which will eventually replenish the cup of existence with unmingled sweetness and perfect joy. Eve witnessed, with a trembling consciousness of guilt, the awful descent of these mighty "Cherubim, and a flaming sword which turneth every way, to keep the way of the tree of life," and which were placed at the east end of the garden of Eden. Mary, with feelings of ecstatic rapture, beheld the angel Gabriel standing before her with the smiles of heaven upon his countenance, heard his benediction and held communion sweet with the holy messenger.—[illegible]

BEAUTIFUL EXTRACT.—I have seen a lark rising from its bed of grass, and soaring upwards, singing as he rose, and in hopes to climb above the clouds, but the poor bird was beaten back by the loud sighing of an eastern wind, and his motion made irregular and inconstant, descending more at every breath of the tempest than all the vibration of his wings served to exalt him, till the little creature was forced to sit down and pant, and stay until the storm was overpast; then it made a prosperous flight, for it did rise and sing as if it had learned music and motion from some angel as he passed sometime through the air. So is the prayer of a man when agitated by any passion; he fain would speak to God, and his words are of this earth, earthly; he would look up to his Maker, but he could not help seeing also that which distracted him, and a tempest was raised, and the man over-ruled; his prayer was broken, and his thoughts were troubled; his words ascended to the clouds, but the wanderings of his imagination recalled them, and in all the fluctuating variety of passion, they are never likely to reach God at all. But when he sets him down, and sighs over his infirmities, and fixes his thoughts upon things above, forgetting all the little vain passages of this life, and his spirit is becalmed, and his soul is even still, then it softly and sweetly ascends to heaven, and is with God till it returns like the useful bee laden with a blessing and the dews of heaven.—J. Taylor.

Children's Department.

LEARNING TO FEEL.

There is not a more pleasing sight in the world than that of a happy family; and, perhaps, a more happy household than that of Mr. Railton's was not to be found. Mr. Railton had his losses and crosses; Mrs. Railton had her domestic cares and anxieties for her children; and William, Mary, George, Susan, and little Fanny, had all had the measles and the whooping cough, to say nothing of the tooth-ache, and other pains, which now and then paid them a visit; yet still a happier family could not be found; for the parents feared God, and trusted in him; the children were brought up to do the same; and they all dwelt together in affection and peace.

"And now," said Mr. Railton, when they were all once more met together that the young people might make progress in learning to feel—"now, children, we will say something about sympathy. You may not, perhaps, all of you exactly understand what I mean by the word, and as it would be throwing words away to talk about what you do not comprehend, I will explain it to you before I begin."

William. I know what it means. [illegible] you, Mary?

Mary. Let me see! [illegible] certain. I think it means pity.

W. Ah, that is it; but [illegible] guess [illegible] I knew what it was [illegible]

George. [illegible]

W. [illegible] tell you. I [illegible] sure that I am [illegible]

Mr. Railton. Nay, if you appeal [illegible] I must decide against you, for [illegible] two qualities are [illegible] the same.

G. There now, W[illegible] wrong, though you [illegible] sure that you were right.

W. Well, papa says that sympathy and pity are a good deal alike.

Mrs. Railton. But, my dear children, if you are to go on talking in this manner, your papa will never be able to proceed, and then your learning to feel will be out of the question.

M. Thank you mamma, we forgot [illegible] I will be as silent as a mouse, let William say what he will.

W. Please to go on, papa, and we will not talk together any more. It was my fault. Do please to go on now.

Mr. R. I was about to explain to you the difference between sympathy and pity. Pity is that tender compassion which we feel for any one in pain, or in affliction; but sympathy is fellow feeling, whereby we become interested in another's sorrow, success, welfare, or happiness.

W. We see the difference now.

Mr. R. This quality of sympathy is of very great value to mankind, binding them together; it should be cultivated with care by every Christian, for it enables us to enter into the feelings of all around us, so that we can, as it were, "rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep," Rom. xii. 15. There is a tender sympathy felt for one throughout the whole family of God's people. They know that they are fellow sinners, they worship the same God, they are journeying to the same glorious inheritance, they trust for salvation in the Savior who died on the cross, the just for the unjust, and they pray for the gracious influence of the same Holy Spirit to enlighten, sanctify, and guide them in all things. We should feel pity for, and some sympathy, perhaps, with Jews, Turks, and heathens, were any thing [illegible] greatly to affect their joys and sorrows, but we should feel much more sympathy for Christians in the same situation. In reading the Pilgrim's Progress, we sympathize with Christian and Hopeful whilst they [illegible]

W. Yes, [illegible] when Apollyon presses [illegible] as he lies on the ground, we are afraid it is all over with him.

Mr. R. And when Christian conquers [illegible] we [illegible] not feel [illegible] sympathy. How anxious we are [illegible] pilgrims get into the clutches [illegible] We feel angry with the giant and his wife for their cruelty, [illegible]

M. That is just what I felt, when mamma first read the story to me.

[illegible]

Christ, before he came into the world, felt pity for lost mankind; and when he had taken our nature into union with his own, felt sympathy also."

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, July 20, 1842.

Sabbath Discussion.

We have been absent from home about one week to attend a Sabbath discussion in Scott. The discussion was between Eld. R. G. Burdick and Mr. Crawford, of the Methodist Church. The discussion lasted three days. Our views were well presented by Eld. Burdick. Mr. Crawford took about the common ground against the Sabbath; but as he brought no new evidences, either in "positive proof," or otherwise, we shall not notice his arguments. We are willing to rest the arguments with every candid person present.

By the way we would just remark, that the subject of the Sabbath is exciting much interest in different parts. It is our part as Christians and observers of God's Law to agitate this subject, and God will send conviction and bring men to obedience. Our brethren are waking up to this subject.—The Eastern Association have their Sabbath Missionary. The Central Association are making arrangements for the same purpose. Br. Franklin Bond, of Fayette co., Pa., writes as follows: "I have had printed in Pamphlet form 500 copies of your father's [Rev. E. S. Bailey,] reply to Eld. Mattison, on the subject of the Sabbath, which I have been distributing where ever I had a hope of doing good," &c.

For the Register.

"DID NOT HE SAY BEANS?"

Two travelers put up for the night at a tavern. Early in the morning they absconded without reckoning with their host, also stealing from him a bag of beans. A few years after, they passed that road in company again. Again they asked for lodging at the same said inn. The identical landlord was yet at his post. In the evening the landlord was busy in one corner of the bar-room, talking in a suppressed voice with one of his neighbors, about a swarm of bees. His two dishonest guests were seated in another part of the room, and indistinctly hearing the talk about bees, one says to the other, "Did not he say Beans?" "I think he did," was the reply; and quickly they were missing.

This bean story is worth something.—When I hear a man scolding about the personalities of editorials—I cannot help thinking about the beans.

When the church-going man complains that the minister means him, this anecdote about the beans will pop into my mind. On ten thousand occasions, I notice people whose consciences are not easy, saying to each other, by various modes of communication, "Did not he say beans?" Though perhaps the writer or speaker was no nearer to the subject on which their minds were excited, than the sound of the word "bees," resembles that of "beans."

YOUNG HUMPHREY.

For the Register.

BROTHER BAILEY—Sir: Finding among my papers a Sermon preached by the Rev. Mr. Shenstone, of London, occasioned by the death of the Rev. Robert Burnside—(whose place he succeeded as Pastor,) I thought that an extract from it might be interesting to your readers. I therefore submit it.

W. B. GILLETT.

New-Market, N. J., June 29, 1842.

Psalms xxxix. 9,—I was dumb and opened not my mouth because thou didst it.

These words have been chosen for our meditation on this occasion, because they appeared to me to be peculiarly descriptive of the state of mind of my esteemed friend and brother, and your faithful and beloved Pastor, the late Rev. ROBERT BURNSIDE. I would also recommend them to your adoption, as applicable under the mournful providence which has deprived you of so valuable a minister.

* * *

But my chief object must be to impress upon your minds the greatest obligation you are under to God for giving you such a minister, and enabling him to labor among you for so great a length of time.

You, my respected friends, the present members of this Church, have, through a kind Providence, been exempted from many of the bitter and severe trials which some of its former members were called to endure. While with the Psalmist you have to sing of judgments and mercies, your judgments have been so few, and your mercies so numerous, that it surely becomes you under the painful dispensation with which you are afflicted, to be dumb, and not open your mouth, by way of complaint; because it has been done by the righteous and sovereign Ruler of the universe. Although your Church is not so old as that which meets in this place on the first day of the week, under the joint Pastoral care of Mr. Timothy Thomas, and Mr. Thomas Price; yet it has existed upwards of 150 years. It had its commencement in the Reign of Charles the Second, and appears by our Church Book, to have been formed on the first of March, 1675, and to have first assembled in this place, to which it returned a few years back, after having successively met at Pinner's Hall, Broad Street, Currien's Hall, Cripplegate, and Redcross Street. Its first Pastor was Mr. Francis Bamfield, a man of considerable ability and learning, originally of the English Church. He had a living at Sherbourne, in Dorsetshire, and was a prebend of Exeter Cathedral; from both of which benefices he was ejected by the act of uniformity in 1662. He suffered great persecution, being several times imprisoned, and at length died in New-Gate, in 1684, a martyr to the cause of non-conformity.*—The Church at this time being greatly harrassed by its persecutors, like the primitive Church at Jerusalem, was scattered abroad, and continued in a state of dispersion for the space of two years. It however united again in Oct. 1686, when Mr. Edward Stennett, of Willingford, became its Pastor, but who in March, 1690, resigned to his son, Mr. Joseph Stennett, who sustained the office for twenty-three years, till his death in 1713.

* * *

For the next fourteen years the Church appears to have been without a Pastor. In 1727 Mr. Edmund Townsend was chosen, who continued Pastor till his death, which was in 1763, being a period of thirty-six years. He was succeeded in 1767 by a Mr. Whitewood, who, it seems, preached afterwards but three times, and administered the Lord's Supper only once, when he was taken ill, and never recovered. Dr. Samuel Stennett, whose praise is in our Churches, preached regularly to the Church on the Seventh-day morning from that time till his resignation in favor of your lamented Pastor, who was ordained May 25, 1785.

It is a remarkable circumstance that the day of Mr. Burnside's interment, (the 25th of May,) was exactly forty-one years from the day of his Ordination. During this long period he labored assiduously to promote your spiritual improvement. Such was his attention to the performance of his sacred duties, that during these forty-one years I understand he was never once prevented, by illness or any other cause, from attending public worship on the Seventh-day, except the one immediately preceding his death.

* * *

On the sixth day of the present month he addressed us, from this place, for the last time, in the A. M., from Rom. i. 17, and in the P. M., from Psalms cxxx. 4. He preached for Mr. Knight, in the Burrough, on the afternoon of the following day, and in the evening he delivered the last sermon he preached at Mill-Yard Meeting; being the introductory discourse to thirteen lectures, which he purposed preaching on so many successive Sunday evenings, on the subject of the Seventh-day Weekly Sabbath. It appears that our dear friend was somewhat indisposed prior to his delivering these four lectures, and is supposed to have taken cold. On Thursday evening, the 11th inst., I received a note informing me of his illness, written by his desire, requesting me to see you on the following Seventh Day—and that I would beg Mr. Russell to preach for him at Mill-Yard, on Sunday evening, and give notice that his Lectures would be postponed until his recovery. I thought it right to visit him on Friday, and found him in truly grievous circumstances. He had been bled, and a blister had been applied to his side, which his medical attendant had been dressing. Having probably never before been visited with illness, or gone thro' any surgical operation, and being, as you are aware, very deaf, and nearly blind, he was like a helpless child. He expressed his concern for his dear people with tears, urging me to see you on the morrow, and to attend to his request relative to Mill-Yard. I need not inform you that I did my best to make his mind easy. I saw him again early on the Seventh-day morning, being anxious to know if any alteration had taken place, and also being desirous of meeting you, to give you the latest information of his state.

I visited him again on Monday, and found him considerable better; and this was our last visit on earth. I will not attempt to describe to you my feelings when on the following Seventh-day, A. M, I was informed that his spirit had taken its flight. On Friday evening, the 19th, he exchanged this world for one far better. Thus terminated the useful life of your beloved but now lamented Pastor, who was in the 67th year of his age.

* * *

Mr. Burnside appears to have given himself up in early life to the Lord, as he became a member of this Church prior to 1780, when he was called to the work of the Ministry, and chosen sole afternoon preacher in the room of four other ministers, who had resigned; and on Dr. Stennett's resignation he was ordained Pastor of the Church. Mr. Burnside was born in the Parish of Clarkinwell, but lived in Snow's Fields, Bermondsey, from about the second year of his age, in the same house in which he died.

He finished his studies in the University of Aberdeen, under Professor Campbell.—Mr. Burnside was a scholar of no ordinary degree. Hence he had access as a teacher of Languages into the families of many of the nobility of the first consequence, though he labored under great disadvantages from the defective state of his hearing and sight, yet his manners were truly polished. And though he was never married, no man could delight more in the company of accomplished Females, or be more attended to when in society. He was not only a man of extraordinary learning and highly polished manners; he was a sound reasoner, and a forcible writer. He was esteemed by all dissenting Ministers in and about the Metropolis. And his praise is not only in all our Churches, but in many of the Churches of America.

---

*Wilson's History of the dissenting churches.

For the Register.

Charlotte S. Cazier.

And art thou gone, thou gentle one, and is it thus we part!
Thy memory's seal has deeply press'd the tablet of the heart!
And shall we cease in yonder halls, thy silvery voice to hear,
That fell so oft in kindred beats on many a listening ear!

Oh! where's the silken dark brown tress, the tresses of thy hair,
That seemed the token of thy soul, so cultured, smooth and fair!
The gentle stream from feeling's fount, that rarely failed to move,
And where the eye, the moist blue eye, of sympathy and love!

Where is that slow and stately tread of strong unruffled thought;
And where the taste, that polished taste, that chastened fancy wrought!
Where is the lore, the searching lore, of learning's treasured mine?
Oh! where's the brow, that thoughtful brow, "that queenly brow of thine!"*

All have passed!—And thus will pass the brightest gems of earth,
Her treasured wealth of dust and mind, of low and princely birth!
The stamp of change is printed on each sad and sunny brow,
And all earth's wisdom, price and power thus end —Where are they now!

So fades the flower, and thus the grass shall wither on the plain,
And all the goodlines of earth return to earth again;—
But He whose ways are just and true, through ages shall endure;
His word will stand, forever stand, unchanged, unbroken, sure!†

July 12, 1842. Z.

---

* Her companions of the De Ruyter Institute have not forgotten the part she sustained some months since, as the intended nun, in the colloquial recitation of Mrs. Hemans' fine sketch of "The Sisters."

† Isa. xl, 6. 7 8.

Congressional News.

From the Albany Advertiser.

CONGRESS.

By this morning's boat we have the proceedings of Congress to 3 P. M. on Thursday. In the Senate, Mr. Tallmadge gave notice of his intention to move, on Monday next, to take up the bill from the select committee on the currency, of which he is chairman, regulating the finances through the medium of an Exchequer.

Mr. Archer reported two bills, one for the reorganization of the Navy, the other to provide for the employment of mathematical professors in the Navy; both bills were referred.

John Ross.—The resolution of Mr. Bagby, relative to this person's pay for removing the Georgia Cherokees West of the Mississippi, was had up and passed. [It is a resolution of inquiry merely, and it is intended to ascertain if Ross has been paid too much, and how much too much.]

The Admiralty Bill.—The bill, amendatory of the Judicial Court Bill of 1789, providing for the punishment and trial of seamen in certain cases, which has for some time occupied the attention of the Senate, was had up for final action, and was passed by a vote of 20 to 16.

The Calendar.—Several more bills, the principal portion of which were taken up on the third reading, and passed.

Remedial Justice.—The bill, to regulate the trials of such cases as that of McLeod, &c. &c., was then taken up, as the order of the day.

In the House, as soon as the Journal was read, Mr. Ingersoll offered a resolution to the effect that no motion of adjournment should be in order, pending this matter of the tariff, until 6 o'clock, P. M., of each and every day.

The proposition was not entertained by the House, who began forthwith to clamor for the orders of the day.

Mr. Fillmore then moved the House into Committee of the whole, and Mr. McKennan, of Pa., resumed the chair.

The Tariff.—The debate was continued, hour by hour, by Messrs. Mason of Maryland, Cost Johnson, Gamble, of Ga., and others.

News of the Day.

From the N. Y. Tribune.

DREADFUL STEAMBOAT EXPLOSION ON THE WESTERN WATERS.

BALTIMORE, July 12, 1842.

The Western Mail this morning brings us an account of an appaling disaster at the mouth of the Missouri River, on Sunday, the 3d inst. The following particulars of the disaster are furnished by Capt. Eaton, of the steamboat Iatan, which was lying near the place at the time.

The steamboat Edna collapsed both flues of her larboard boiler at a quarter past four o'clock on Sunday morning, 3d inst., at the mouth of the Missouri river.

The Edna landed at the mouth about 1 o'clock that morning. The Iatan was lying there, and the Edna landed on the outside of her, and laid in such a position that it was difficult for the Iatan to get away from the shore. However, after a little trouble, the Iatan got under weigh, and had run three or four hundred yards, when the Edna shoved out from the shore. Her bow could not have been more than one hundred feet from the shore when she collapsed her flues. Her engine had been working out of gear full half an hour, and had not been stopped more than ten minutes at the very outside.

I was looking at the Edna when the casualty happened, and had observed her some time before the accident. I did not think she had unusually high steam. I am of the opinion that some obstruction existed either in the supply pipe, or in the force pump, which prevented the usual quantity of water from going into the boilers.

The number of wounded is 63, mostly Germans. Some two or three were blown into the river and saved, and it is supposed that two or three others were lost. The cabins of the Edna and Iatan are filled with the wounded, and they are receiving every attention from the passengers and others that can be bestowed upon them.

As soon as the accident happened, the Iatan dropped along side the Edna and towed her to the Illinois shore, when the Annawan took her in tow, and the Iatan proceeded to St. Louis with the wounded.

N. J. EATON,
Master of the steamboat Iatan

From the Montreal Courier, 11th inst

THE STEAM-BOAT EXPLOSION—FIFTY-EIGHT LIVES LOST.

It becomes our painful duty to record one of the most distressing casualties which has occurred in this Province since the introduction of steam on the St. Lawrence. The high pressure steamer Shamrock, while between Lachine and Pointe Claire, on her way to Kingston, about 10 o'clock on Saturday morning, burst her boiler, and, her bows being blown out by the explosion, she went down head foremost. There were on board of her at the time about 120 persons, of whom 48 were taken up unhurt by three barges in tow, and 18 were conveyed to the Montreal General Hospital wounded,—54 remain to be accounted for. Of the 18 conveyed to the Hospital, one has died under the amputation of both legs.

The passengers were composed of English, Irish, and Scotch; of whom the English are supposed to have suffered most from being in the fore part of the boat.—The first engineer, who was saved, declares that he has no other consciousness of the transaction than that the explosion took place, and that he afterwards found himself on board one of the barges, the interval between those events being to his mind a perfect blank. Much money is said to have been lost, the emigrant's being of a superior description. Early yesterday morning, Mr. Jones, the coroner, repaired to the spot and proceeded to the wreck, which he found with the hind part of the stern alone above water. Suspecting that some bodies might be in the cabin, he caused it to be burst open, when the corpse of a female was drawn out.

After giving all the necessary directions, and performing the melancholy duty of ordering a number of coffins to be made at Lachaine, that officer returned to town yesterday, but is to repair to the spot today. We think it probable that this disastrous event will occasion some Legislative enactment against the use of high pressure engines. The Shamrock belonged to Messrs. Atkinson, Matthie & Co., of this city. Rumor, (according to her usual custom,) grossly exaggerated this calamity, declaring on Sunday evening that there had perished one hundred persons, and yesterday, augmenting the loss to one hundred and fifty. Such are the particulars we have been able to learn, in which, however, there may be, as usual on such occasions, some error; but we have most of them from an authentic source.

MELANCHOLY ACCIDENT AND DARING RESCUE.

We learn from the Cincinnati Enquirer, that on the 4th inst., as a two horse barouche, containing Miss Henrietta Smith, aged 15, grand-daughter of late Auditor Wallace, two other ladies, a little girl, and two gentlemen, one of them Mr. Butler, keeper of a livery stable in Walnut street, was about entering the Newport ferry boat, for the purpose of passing over the river to view the encampment at Newport, in consequence of a break in the floating wharf, the tongue of the barouch snapped, forcing the vehicle against the heels of the horses. Mr. Butler discovered his perilous situation, calling out to those on board the boat to seize the wheels of the barouche and pull it back from the horses, but no one offered assistance, and the horses becoming unmanageable and restive, pressed against the pole or guard, reaching across the passage way of the boat, which broke instantly, dashing horses, barouche, and passengers, headlong into the deep current.

For a moment they entirely disappeared under the surface. The females, with the exception of the unfortunate young lady who lost her life, very soon become disengaged from the barouche and plunging horses, but would have drowned immediately, had it not been for the prompt assistance and presence of mind of two young men, James Hudnell, and Clarkson Bateman, mechanics of Cincinnati, who witnessing the accident from Front street, rushed to the boat, a full square from where they stood, and breaking a passage through a crowd of stout men on board, who offered the sufferers no aid till all danger was passed, plunged into the river just in time to save the lives of the two ladies and child.—Miss Smith being unfortunately drowned.

The Enquirer says:

"When we take into account the fright of the horses, fretting and foaming in their harness, the risk run by these young men, it will be seen, was imminent, which very much enhances the credit due them. Mr Butler, the driver, made a very narrow escape. His foot caught in the rigging of the barouch, from which he escaped by tearing off the sole of his boot, which he accomplished but a moment before the barouche and horses went down the last time. Both horses were drowned. The body of Miss S. was found after the accident, and from several bruises upon it, it is believed that she was struck by the horses while under water. She did not rise to the surface, and was not seen alive after the barouche went overboard.

We are informed that this melancholy accident might have been prevented, but for the criminal neglect or rather cowardice of those on board the boat when it occurred, as the most trifling assistance would have prevented the barouche going overboard.

Case of the Child Murdered by its Mother.—The principal facts in this case were published in yesterday's Express. Some particulars, however, were elicited at the inquest held on the body yesterday, at the dead house in the Park, implicating others, of which the public should be informed.

Joseph and Elizabeth Strattan, the parents of the deceased child, which was three months old, occupied the lower story and basement of the house No. 133 Bedford-street, belonging to Samuel Cocks, who resides and keeps a feed store on the corner of Bedford and Grove streets.

Strattan, who is a baker, had, it appears, on Thursday of last week, been out serving his customers with bread, and on coming home, about 7 o'clock in the evening, was told by his wife that she had made way with the child, having thrown it into the privy, and begged of him not to expose her, which, it seems he was inclined to do; but on the following morning, after reflecting upon it, his conscience so smote him that he called on Mr. Cocks, and requested him to go with him to his house. Accordingly, Cocks went, where he was informed of what had taken place. He told the inhuman mother that she had committed a "wonderful act," and after proposing that she should be removed to Westchester village, promised to keep the "whole matter secret," and then went about his business with as much indifference as if he had been called to witness the drowning of a cat.

Strattan, agreeably to the advice of Cocks, on Friday [illegible] his wife to her brother's in Westchester village. On Sunday night, Strattan again called on Cocks, and told him he had made up his mind to make the matter known to the proper authorities. Cocks replied that he had reflected a good deal upon the matter, and on the whole, thought, perhaps, he might as well do so, as it was of no use to try to keep it a secret. Accordingly, on Monday morning Strattan went before the Coroner and made the case known, which, he says, he did at the instance of a physician in Westchester county. After being apprised of these facts, the Deputy Coroner proceeded to the premises in company with the wretched father, and found the child still in the sink. Strattan was held in custody, and officer Relyea and Mr Milliken started immediately for the apprehension of the mother, whom they found at his brother's, in Westchester, and brought to the city.

The Jury found that the deceased child came to her death by exposure in the sink, on the rear of lot No. 133 Bedford street, on the 7th inst., by the mother Elizabeth Strattan, and that Mr. Cocks and the father of the child were accessory after the fact.

They were all three committed for examination.

The Recorder admitted Mr. Cocks to bail last evening in the sum of $500, he having been brought before him on a writ of habeas corpus for that purpose.—Express.

Trouble in Pennsylvania.—The miners in and about Pottsville having struck, not exactly for higher wages, but for payment in money, and not orders, the trouble had arisen to such a height on Saturday, that the military were ordered out. About 2,000 of the operatives had left off work, and were taking measures to force others to follow their example.

The following are the latest particulars.

Mount Carbon, July 10

I have just arrived here, and find encamped, or garrisoned at the hotel, the two companies from Orwigsburg, and one company from Schuylkill Haven.

They are, at the present writing, resting on their arms, watching the movements of the enemy, who are mustered upon a hill a little above half a mile off. I have not yet had time to go amongst them, (the enemy,) or I might be enabled to give you further particulars.

I understand that a company of artillery are expected from Reading, and an independent company from Minersville. I may be enabled to make some farther communication to-morrow.

A Wounded Calf.—The Hon (?) Thomas Marshall, it appears, has shot James Watson Webb, Esq. in the calf. Couldn't shoot him elsewhere very well.—Tocsin of Liberty.

Capt. Schinley and Lady.—A late Jamaica Gazette says:—"Capt. Schinley, whose elopement and marriage with Miss Croghan, (the then richest heiress in America,) made such a noise a short time ago in New York, and other papers, we perceive has arrived here per the packet, and is on his way to Surinam—in which place he holds an official appointment. Capt. S. was accompanied by his lady.

Sugar from Corn Stalks.—John Greig, Esq., of Canandaigua, President of the Ontario Agricultural Society, to induce experiments in the manufacture of sugar from the stalks of Indian corn, has offered the liberal premiums of $30 and $20, for the greatest and next greatest quantity of sugar and molasses, made from an acre of land, to be awarded at the annual Fair of that Society to be held at Canandaigua, in October next.

A London letter of June 3d, states that upwards of 40,000 persons had already left England, Scotland, and Ireland, this season for Quebec. A still larger number, we presume, has sailed for the U. S.

The Lansingburgh Democrat gives the particulars of an outrage in that village on Sunday last, by a young villain named Wm. Morrall, upon a young lady who was on her way home from church, in the neighboring village of Brunswick. After a struggle of half an hour, she succeeded in getting away from the monster, who threatened her life, attempted to strangle her, and nearly succeeded in tying her with his suspenders. He was arrested, and though but eighteen years of age, was not long since imprisoned for a similar attempt.

The constant erection of new buildings, an increase of the rate of rents unknown within twenty years past, and a corresponding increase of good tenants, indicate that Boston is at present enjoying a high degree of prosperity.

The terms of tuition in the Michigan University are fixed $[illegible] for four years.—Board can be had at two shillings a week.

Emigration.—Upwards of seven hundred Dutch emigrants went up the Hudson river on the second day of this month, in the freight barge Erastus Corning, in tow of a steamer. This large party are on their way to the far West, and will become cultivators of the soil.

[illegible]—We noticed a few days since that the Hon. Thomas W. Veazey, formerly Governor of Maryland, was lying [illegible] We regret [illegible] that he died on [illegible] He was [illegible] greatly by the [illegible] his [illegible]

[illegible]—[illegible] the roof was burst and some of the [illegible] and gentlemen were [illegible] other individuals of the congregation were injured. Mr. B[illegible] soon recovered from the shock, but it was some time before Mr. B[illegible] exhibited any signs of life. He is now however doing well.

Phœnix like, the great book factory in Cliff street has risen from its ashes, purified, invigorated, and more capable than ever of supplying all the world with choice and excellent reading. We took Cliff street in our way home yesterday, and found the Brothers Harpers calm, pleasant, good-humored and ready for a joke with any body, as usual, but prompt and attentive withal to every detail of their extensive business. All traces of the fire had disappeared, and if it were not for a certain freshness of aspect, denoting the recent presence and agency of carpenters, masons, painters, glaziers, book-binders, and the like, one could discover no difference whatever. The presses were all going, compositors all busy, clerks packing up books by the gross, and in short the whole establishment was itself again.—N. Y. Com. Advertiser.

The Springs.—The warm and delightful weather for the last ten days, has brought large numbers of visitants to the place, which gives to our hotels a more brisk and lively appearance. There are nearly or quite as many people now in the village, as at any former season, so early in the month of July, and we have no doubt that within the next fortnight, every boarding house will be filled to overflowing. The whole number of strangers now in the village is about 2,000, and they are hourly increasing.—Daily Saratoga Sentinel.

Old P. M.—Deacon Abraham Haws, of Weston, Mass., has held the commission of Post Master since May 30, 1810, and has consequently been in office over thirty years—longer, it is said, than any other man in the country.—Massachusetts paper.

"Deacon Haws" is a mere sappling of a P. M. compared with Doct. Croswell, of Catskill, who was appointed P. M. for that village by Jefferson, and has held the office more than forty years.—Alb. Atlas.

Correspondence of the N. Y. Express.

WASHINGTON, July 12.

Confirmations by the Senate.

The Senate have made the following confirmation of nominations submitted by the President.

Levant B. Coates, P. M., at Batavia, N. Y.

Francis A. Bloodgood, P. M., at Ithaca, N. Y.

Amos S. Tyson, Collector of Customs, Niagara, N. Y. Ayes 20 to 15.

William Willard, Surveyor, Saybrook, Conn.

Hezekiah Hawley, Marshall, Florida.

Wm. Johnson, Surveyor General, Ohio, Michigan and Indiana,

J. T. Bradford, Register or Land Office, Lebanon, Alabama.

Mr. McKay, Navy Agent, Savannah, Georgia.

Western F. Birch, nominated for an office in Fayette, Mo., was rejected.

Mr. Churchill's confirmation as P. M. at St. Louis, you have before heard of. There are several nominations yet pending. All of these nominations have been acted on with a desire to harmonize with the Executive, and the rejection of Mr. Birch was more at the instance of Mr. Benton, and for reasons given by him than from any other cause.

Yours, E. B.

Col. Wm. L. Stone, Editor of the Commercial Advertiser, has been appointed by the Board of Supervisors in New York, Deputy Superintendent of Com. Schools, in the place of Fitz Greene Halleck, resigned.—Eve. Jour.

A Leaf from the Public Album kept at Niagara Falls.—The Falls are clever—quite so; but they do nôt hanser my hexpectatiens. I got thoroughly wetted by them, and lost my 'at. When the whether is 'ot, I prefer looking at a hengraving of them in the 'ouse. S. L. England.

Emigrants.—The Quebec Mercury of the 8th says, the streets have been crowded with emigrants for some days past, many of them are respectable in appearance, and several have brought money with them; others are poor, and have already added to the number of street beggars, no legal provision existing for the poor here. Those who are able, proceed up the river, and they get to Montreal for an English shilling. Generally we should say, there are three children for one grown person, and we fear that the fate of many next winter, will be worse than it could have been at home, where a compulsory provision is made for the poor, and there is great wealth to aid them by charitable contributions.

Thomas Bell was convicted in the Washington City Court, on three indictments for robbing the United States mail, and was sentenced to four years imprisonment in the Penitentiary.

It is said that General Bennett, recently excommunicated by Joe Smith and other Mormons, threatens to write a book for the purpose of exposing the rascality of the former.

The National Intelligencer says there is some mistake about the intelligence of the burning of Lord Ashburton's homestead at Clapham, which was brought by the arrival of the Caledonia. His Lordship owns no property there.

An emigrant, named Yalin, who had just arrived at Baltimore from Bremen, awakened in the night, and fancying that he was on board ship, tried to crawl through the attic window—thinking it the hatchway. He succeeded, and fell to the pavement and fractured his skull.

There is now residing, in the vicinity of Germantown, Pa., and has been for years, a highly respectable old gentleman who was present at the execution of Major Andre. He was then a surgeon in the French army, and was on a visit to this country with a view to offer his assistance to the heroic band then struggling for freedom.

James S. Schermerhorn, who embezzled the funds of the Ocean Insurance Company in New York, to the amount of $153,000, has been admitted to bail in the sum of $10,000.

London, according to a late authority, now measures 7 1-2 miles in length from east to west, by a breadth of 9 miles from north to south. Its circumference, allowing for various inequalities, is estimated at 30 miles, while the area of the ground it covers is considered to measure no less than 18 square miles.

Mr. Dundson, of Java, Wyoming county, N. Y., died suddenly, and was buried on Sunday, the 26th ult. His remains were subsequently disinterred, and an inquest held. After a post-mortem examination, the Jury returned a verdict of murder by poison. Suspicion resting upon his wife, she was arrested, and at the latest accounts was under examination. She is 20 years of age, her deceased husband 45.

Vessels are taking in dry goods as freight in England, for America, at six shillings per ton. Thirty shillings has been the customary price.

The Camden, (N. J.,) Mail states that a colored man residing about two miles from town, was killed on the night of the 28th ult., by George Green, also colored, in a drunken brawl. Both men were of dissolute habits, and at the time of the death were intoxicated, quarreling over the remains of a quart of poison.

The necessary arrangements have been made for holding a special meeting of the Regents of the University during the ensuing session of the Legislature, in August next.

The Columbus (O.) Republican says that upwards of 6,200 notices to creditors of bankrupts, were recently mailed in that city one day. Of these notices, 2,321 were charged with a postage of 25 cents each—575 with 18 1-2—2,380 with 12 1-2—600 with 10—118 with 6 cents. 219 of the whole number were for the Columbus delivery. The amount of postage charged on them was $1,053 24.

The National Hotel in Lockport, N. Y., kept by Mr. Cole, has been opened as a temperance house. Let it be remembered.

The city of Rochester now numbers 20,000 inhabitants. In 1817 its entire voting population consisted of 32, all told.

The pleasant village of Homer, Cort. co., N. Y., was visited by a destructive fire on the 30th ult., which destroyed the three story cabinet shop of Hitchcock & Stoker, with the dwelling house of Mr. E. Shirley, and one or two other small buildings. Loss not estimated.

William L. Dayton has been appointed by Gov. Pennington, of New Jersey, U. S. Senator, for the unexpired term of the late Samuel L. Southard.

It is stated that Mr. Marshall is not satisfied with the result of his attempt to shoot Col. Webb, and that he makes no secret of his vindictive thirst for his heart's blood, alleging that the injuries he has sustained are not repaired. How strange that such a spirit should be permitted to resume and retain a seat in the House!

Rhode Island.—Examinations of the numerous prisoners taken at Chepatchet in the late "war," have been vigorously carried, and a large share have been discharged. Many appear to be boys, or idle men, who had nothing to do, and were anxious for the excitement, or were seduced into their wrong doing by the hope of rewards.

Strenuous attempts appear to have been made by various papers to create political capital out of the difficulties; and to allege that great cruelties and excesses were committed by the regular forces. One paper states, that three men, imprisoned by the Charterists, died in prison on Wednesday at Providence, from the effects of the cruelty of their oppressors. It is also reported that a woman who attempted to prevent the arrest of her husband at Woonsocket, was stabbed in the breast, and died on Wednesday night of the wound. These and like statements are flatly contradicted, and there is no evidence whatever that they are true.

Mitchell the Forger.—The Baltimore Sun of the 9th inst., says: "We are informed that Mr. Coulson, an officer connected with the Albany Police, arrested Mitchell, the forger, in Zanesville, Ohio, on the 4th inst. Mr. Coulson passed through this city with his prisoner yesterday, en route to New York.

Stage Coach in the Desert—The London papers announce by advertisement, the establishment of a stage coach communication between Cairo and Suez! Here, says the London Athenium, is a march of civilization. But a few years since, it was supposed that camels or dromedaries, from their power of enduring thirst, could alone traverse those arid plains, and penetrate the solitude of the desert. Now we have hotels established at regular intervals, with relays of horses, and a coach running, which performs the journey regularly in about eighteen hours. The announcement at the close of the advertisement is amusing: "Refreshments and provisions supplied in the desert' at very moderate charges.—Boston Journal.

Patriotism.—The Rochester Democrat states that of late numerous thefts of guns, powder, and other munitions of war, have been very frequent in about that vicinity, and, indeed, all along the border generally; and that they are by common rumor attributed to preparations for another Canadian outbreak. A few nights since, one establishment in Rochester was burglariously robbed of a large number of guns and pistols; but through the alertness of the police they were recovered, and some discoveries made in connection with the theft, which have excited a considerable degree of agitation.

Temperance.—Interesting Facts.—It will doubtless be interesting to the friends of temperance, as well as of the public morals generally, to know that the criminal prosecutions for this year are less by more than half than they were in the same length of time last year. We have it on unquestionable authority that the criminal prosecutions in the town of New Haven, from the 1st of January, 1841, to the 1st of July, 1841, amounted to 175, while from the 1st of January, 1842, to the 1st of July, 1842, they amounted to only 76, and of these, 67 were caused by intoxicating drinks!—New Haven Palladium.

Blessings of Litigation.—The Poughkeepsie Eagle gives a few instances in which the blessings of litigation have recently been beautifully developed in that city. One of the cases was decided at a cost of not less than $200, in which the matter in dispute was 25 cents. A verdict of $400 was given in another case in this Court, because one man accused another of stealing a peck of potatoes. Another has been in Court four years, which is based upon a question whether or not a man took a large file, worth four shillings, when he paid for a small one worth no more than two.

University Hall, Cambridge, Blown Up.—The Boston Mail states that about 2 o'clock, Wednesday morning, July 6, the University Hall, which was nearly new, and the best of all the College buildings, was blown up.

The work of destruction was caused by carrying a large bomb-shell into the building, and setting fire to the fuse. The bomb-shell exploded with a tremendous noise carrying out most of the upper part of the building, and creating a work of destruction hardly to be conceived from even such a cause.

Fortunately no one was in the building, except a baker, who slept there to take charge of it, and he escaped serious injury.

The perpetrator of this outrage is not yet discovered; but the College Faculty and town authorities are making every effort to probe the matter to the bottom.

Florida.—The Tallahassee Sun of the 30th ult. says:—"We learn from South Florida that great numbers of emigrants are daily arriving, and settling down upon the beautiful and fertile lands of that delightful region. The country on the waters of Tampa bay has already acquired a very respectable population both in regard to numbers and character. Should Mr. Benton's armed occupation bill be carried into a law, it will not be long that Florida will require any other aid than her own citizens to vindicate her soil from Indian aggressions."

Century Plant.—A correspondent of the Commercial Advertiser states that this rare plant "may now be seen in the green-house of the Patroon, at Albany, in full bloom in a few days. Already they have unroofed part of the green-house to make room for the flower stem, which sometimes shoots to the height of twenty or thirty feet. By a letter from Albany to-day I am informed it has been in the family seventy-five years, and that it was a large plant when first set down on that venerated spot. The flower stem is now between five and six feet high."

The Last of the Natick Indians.—The last and only survivor of this tribe of Indians, is a girl of about 15 years of age.

"She is of pure Indian extraction, a native of Natick, and her ancestors were among the early inhabitants. She is large, well formed, and presents all the peculiarities of the Indian features. She has property under the charge of trustees, which she has inherited."

Historical Agency.—It is stated in the New York Express that Col. Broadhead, who is now in England as the Historical Agent of the State of New York, is prosecuting his duties with great success.—The aid derived from the kind offices of the American Ministers at London and Paris, and urbanity of Lord Aberdeen, have enabled him to proceed with every desirable advantage. Upwards of twenty thousand pages of Mss. of the most rare and precious character, relating to the early settlement of this country, are in process of being transcribed from the British archives alone.

The Wheat.—It is indeed a subject of rejoicing to the farmer that the late rains have generally been followed by cool weather—thus averting the dangers feared from rust—that terror of the wheat-farmer when his crop promises most luxuriantly.

A friend in Genesee county writes us that some rust is seen there—but we guess there is as yet little cause for complaint.—Where all promises so well let us not mar the prospect by premature grumbling.—Rochester Post.

Trouble among the Mormons.—We noticed a few days since the excommunication of Gen. Bennett, of the Nauvoo Legion of Latter Day Saints, we now have from the Burlington Hawk, his defiance of the prophet Joe.

NAUVOO, Ill., June 27, 1842.

MR. EDWARDS:—In your paper of the 23d, you allude to the "Trouble among the Mormons," and express a desire or hope that "the schism is incurable," and I assure you it is really so. The holy Joe fears the consequences of my disclosures, and has threatened to take my life, and has ordered some of his Danite band to effect the murder clandestinely—but he shall be exposed. If he murders me, others will avenge my blood, and expose him; if I live, I will do it to the entire satisfaction of all. Just suspend your judgment a few days, until you see my expose in the "Sangamo Journal" of next week, or the week following, over my name. In haste, yours respectfully.

JOHN C. BENNETT.

The Van Buren (Arkansas,) Intelligencer of the 17th ult., says:—

"We learn that Col. Karney, with the dragoons, paid his respects a few days ago to the Seminoles, who recently arrived from Florida, and who became refractory at Webber's Falls. Wild Cat and his party were also there. Col. Karney told them they had to leave for their own country.—They refused, and the troops forced them off. Some few of them, however, perhaps a hundred in all, broke away, and succeeded in concealing themselves in the woods, and yet remain in the Cherokee country; so says our informant."

A Strange Companion.—A barouche, drawn by six horses, was seen in the streets yesterday, and among a number of distinguished individuals who did the music, were seated Herr Driesback and his Brazilian tiger. Of course, a great many persons assembled around and gazed upon the tiger, which appeared to be in as good a humor as a pet monkey.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Patriot Movements.—Several papers have recently noticed the robbery of powder houses, &c., along the frontier. We place no confidence in the additional rumor, that there is any organization along the line, although a friend wrote us from Detroit the other day, that there had recently been a meeting in that city of some of the leaders in the old Canada rebellion. Several names are given; but their publication will do no good, as they are too well known to do much mischief.—Roch. Dem.

Rogue Escaped and Retaken.—A letter from Bristol, R. I., to the editor of the Providence Journal, states that James H. Dickerson, confined in jail in that town on a charge of robbing the tomb of the late Hon. James D'Wolf, made an attempt yesterday to escape from prison. The keeper entered his cell, with another person, when Dickerson presented two loaded pistols, and demanded his release. They retreated, and endeavored to close the outward door, but did not succeed, and he escaped. The alarm was immediately given, and he was pursued by a large body of men, on foot and on horseback, well armed, into a swamp about half a mile east of the jail, where he was taken. Finding his pursuers were gaining upon him, he discharged his pistol, but without effect. He was seized, and conveyed back to the prison, and safely secured in irons. It is supposed that the pistols were conveyed to him from the outside of the building.—Bos. Transcript.

Fixed at Last.—The Ex-Honorable Charles F. Mitchell, who has been convicted of forgery, was this morning sentenced to be confined for three years at the State Penitentiary.

Horseshoes are now manufactured at Troy, on a very extensive scale, by machinery. The Troy Whig says, that straight bars of iron are transformed into horseshoes, grooved and punched, at the rate of fifteen per minute. Mr. Henry Burden is the author of the invention.

Latest from the State Prison.—Yesterday afternoon, B. F. Emery, having served out the solitary period of his first sentence, was set to work at carving in a cabinet-maker's shop. He has behaved like a sensible and discreet man since his commitment.

Last evening Capt. W. H. Brittain whose punishment for the murder of Sarah Stevenson has been commuted, was brought down from Lowell. On account of his age and feebleness of body, he is to be set at work in the kitchen. He is unbounded in his expressions of gratitude toward those who took part in his defence, and exerted themselves to obtain the commutation of his sentence.—Boston Post.

Notices.

ALFRED ACADEMY,
AND
TEACHER'S SEMINARY.

W. C. Kenyon, Principal.
Miss Caroline B. Maxson, Preceptress.

LECTURERS.

On Phrenology and Phisiognomy.—Drs J. R. HARTSHORN, and E. RIDER.

On School Teaching.—LUKE G. MAXSON.

On Chemistry and Geology.—W. C. KENYON.

Lectures on other subjects as occasion may require.

This Institution is pleasantly located, in the county of Allegany, thirteen miles South-East of Angelica, and six miles South of Almond. From its retired and quiet situation, it presents a favorable opportunity to parents to place their sons and daughters under a moral influence that will not be counteracted by those with whom they may associate.

The patronage which it has hitherto enjoyed, has been so liberal as to warrant very considerable expenditures in rendering it still more worthy of a more extended patronage; and it is hoped that it will, under its present organization, be rendered inferior to no similar Institution in Western New York.

The qualification of Common School Teachers will receive particular attention, so as to render them thorough and practical instructors of youth.

The Academic Year.—Is divided into three terms of fifteen weeks each. 1st, Commencing Wednesday 17th August; 2d, 7th December; 3d, 4th April, 1843.

Vacations.—At the expiration of the first and second Terms, one week each, at the expiration of the 3d Term, five weeks.

Tuition.—Varying with Instruction, from $3,50 to $4.75 per term.

Board.—From $1 to $2, depending on accommodations. Rooms in the Institution, furnished with Cook Stoves, can be had at a moderate expense.

SAMUEL RUSSELL, Esq., Pres't.
Alfred, July, 1842.

TEMPERANCE HOUSE.

Mr. Asa C. Potter has opened a Temperance House at the State Bridge, in Verona, where he will be ready at all times to wait on those who give him a call, in good style, and on reasonable terms.

NOTICE.

S. D. DELLAY takes this method of informing his friends and old customers that he has removed his stock of Goods to the Store of H. A. & F. C. DELLAY, where he is now able to offer them better inducements for trade than he ever before has been, in terms of credit, prices, &c. &c. He would also say that he will be permanently there, and intends making De Ruyter a location for years in the mercantile business. He would further say that he has not failed as some of his friends have endeavored to convince the public. He will be glad to see his debtor as well as his creditor, being able and willing to satisfy each.

De Ruyter, March 28 1842. v3n51f

PROPOSALS

For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient, and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead,) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S D B Register, De Ruyter, N Y."

DIED,

In Genesee, on the 8th of June, Miss ALZINA BENTLEY, daughter of Hezekiah and Sylvia Bentley, of dropsy on the brain, aged 20 years.

Sister Bentley experienced religion in early life, and joined the S. D. Baptist church in Hebron, Pa., from thence she moved with her parents to Crawford county Pa., where she bore her membership until she died. Her hold on the affections of her friends was strong as was fully manifested by a numerous assemblage at her funeral, and her loss will be sensibly felt by her numerous companions and acquaintances.

"Truly in the midst of life we are in death."

Near Butlerville, Warren co. Ohio, on the 5th of May, of a short illness of Remitting Fever, Mr. JAMES HILL, in the 69th year of his age. Mr. Hill has been a professor of Religion ever from his youth. He united with the S. D. Baptist Church of Northampton Clarke co., Ohio. His community has sustained the loss of an affectionate husband, the children a kind father, the neighborhood a good citizen, and the church a worthy member.

The evening before he died, he expressed a desire to get well for the good of the people, but said to depart and be with Christ is far better. His funeral was attended by a large concourse of people, a sermon was preached from 2d Corinthians v. 2.

In Alfred, June 23d, Mrs. LOIS, wife of Benjamin Cottrell, jr.

Sister C. has long been a professor of the faith of Jesus, in which she died with the hope of reigning with him above. She has left two small children to solace her companion in his greatest earthly bereavement.

In Hornellsville, July 13, HENRY, son of Perry Potter, aged 20 years.

Brother Potter was a member of the 1st church in Alfred, and much beloved by his acquaintance of all denominations.

LIST OF LETTERS

Charles Card, S. Van Campen, John Sisson (letter money not received,) B. F. Bond, (we will write you,) A. Campbell.

LIST OF RECEIPTS

Of J. Sisson, $2, of R. S. Gere, of A Campbell $10, of J. M. Clark, D. Green, Jared Babcock, Silas Maxson, N. H. Langworthy, $2, each vol. 3, of J. Spicer jr., $12, of Joseph Spicer, N. Clark, T. Clark, J. D. Langworthy, T. R. Green, W. [illegible] E. Stillman $2, each, vol. 3, of J. R. Burdick, $4 25 Ezra Babcock $2, Mrs. A. Green $2, G. W. Maxson M. D., $2, vol. 3. Of Jason B. Wells $2, [illegible] Matthew Wells, vol. 3.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

LIST OF LETTERS

REMAINING in the Post Office at De Ruyter June 30, 1842.

Allen Britton
Bentley E. A. Mrs.
Baker Sally A. Miss
Barnard Daniel
Bogardus Isaac R.
Babcock Thos. E.
Curtis Lurana Mrs.
Carr Thomas
Derbashire James
Griswold Sherman S.
Hagan Jane
Holmes Arza
Hoskins Leander
Johnson Amra
Kinney Nathan
Lewis J. E. Mrs
Snow Harvey
Seyman Benjamin
Sherwood Adam E.
Squires Ethan
Shaver Harvey
Terney John
Wimons Stephen
Wooley Peter B.

M. SPEAR, P. M.

Economy is the road to Wealth.

JAMES M. LETTS, would inform his friends and customers, and the public generally, that he has removed his Tailoring Establishment, to the building occupied by Eli A. Gage as a Hat Store, where he will be ready at all times to attend to cutting and making all manner of clothing as cheap as can be done in the village or county. Military work done in the latest and most approved fashion. Ladies Habits, and Coat Dresses Cut to order, at short notice. All work done at this establishment, shall be warranted to fit.

De Ruyter, July 1st 1842.

FLOUR, PROVISIONS, GROCERIES, and six hundred other things, for sale by 11tf
May 11. HART, ACKLEY, & CO

BOOTS! BOOTS! SHOES! SHOES!!

AT the sign of the Mammoth Boot, manufactured invariably of leather tanned in "cold liquor." Please call.

THE FARMER'S EXCHANGE is the place to buy Goods CHEAP. Oct 20, 1841.
3tf S. G. WALKER.

IMPORTANT WORK
NOW IN THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION.
A DICTIONARY OF
Arts, Manufactures, and Mines,
Containing a clear exposition of their
PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE
By ANDREW URE, M. D., F. R. S., M. G. S.,
M. A. S., Lond.; Mem. Acad. N. S.
Philad.; S. Ph. Soc. N. Germ.
Hanov.; Mulii, &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings.

THIS is unquestionably the most popular work of the kind ever published, and a book most admirably adapted to the wants of all classes of the community. The following are the important objects which the learned author endeavors to accomplish:—

1st. To instruct the Manufacturer, Metallurgist, and Tradesman, in the principles of their respective processes, as to render them in reality the masters of their business; and, to emancipate them from a state of bondage to such as are too commonly governed by blind prejudice and a vicious routine.

2dly. To afford Merchants, Brokers, Drysalters, Druggists, and Officers of the Revenue, characteristic descriptions of the commodities which pass through their hands.

3dly. By exhibiting some of the finest developments of Chemistry and Physics, to lay open an excellent practical school to Students of these kindred sciences.

4thly. To teach Capitalists, who may be desirous of placing their funds in some productive branch of industry, to select, judiciously, among plausible claimants.

5thly. To enable gentlemen of the Law to become well acquainted with the nature of those patent schemes which are so apt to give rise to litigation.

6thly. To present to Legislators such a clear exposition of the staple manufactures, as may dissuade them from enacting laws, which obstruct industry, or cherish one branch of it, to the injury of many others.

And lastly, to give the general reader, intent chiefly on Intellectual Cultivation, views of many of the noblest achievements of Science, in effecting those grand transformations of matter to which Great Britain and the United States owe their paramount wealth, rank and power among the nations of the earth.

The latest Statistics of every important object of Manufacture are given from the best, and usually, from official authority, at the end of each article.

The work will be printed from the 2d London Edition, which sells for $12 a copy. It will be printed on good paper, in new brevier type, and will make about 1400 8vo. pages. It will be issued in twenty-one semi-monthly numbers, [illegible] at 25 cents each, payable on delivery.

☞ To any person sending [illegible] we will forward the numbers by mail, post paid, as soon as they come from the press.

To Country Agents, this affords a rare opportunity, as we can put the work to them on terms extremely favorable. [illegible] every town and every village throughout the United States and Canada [illegible] with the greatest facility. Address, post paid, La Roy Sunderland, 126 Fulton street, New-York.

 To every editor who will give this advertisement entire 12 insertions, we will forward to order one copy of the whole work, provided the papers containing the notice be sent to the New-York Watchman, New-York. [illegible]

STOVES.
COLD WINTER IS COMING
[illegible]

LATE of the firm of [illegible] has moved into the new building adjoining [illegible] Store [illegible] La Fayette Block, where he is receiving the largest and best assortment of STOVES ever before offered in this market, comprising every variety & pattern of Cooking, Hall, Box, Plate and

Fancy Parlor Stoves,

Which he offers, Wholesale & Retail as low as they can be purchased in this TOWN, COUNTY or STATE. Most kinds of Produce, Old Cast-Iron and CASH, [illegible] will not be refused in payment for any article in the line of business.

The subscriber manufactures all kinds of Stove Furniture, Pipe, Sheet Iron, Copper,

BRASS AND TIN WARE

Of every description, which he keeps constantly on hand, and offers it at as

LOW PRICES

[illegible] at wholesale or retail, as any other manufacturer in the State. All wares warranted, made of GOOD materials, and not LEAKY.

Eave Troughs

Made and put up [illegible]

JUST RECEIVED

[illegible]

JOB WORK

☞ Done [illegible] on short notice [illegible] reasonable prices. N. B. [illegible] Center Store, La Fayette Block, No. 3 Cortland Street.

De Ruyter, Oct. 15, 1841.

REMOVAL.

JAMES M. LETTS [illegible]

20 [illegible]

Not 25 or 50 per cent Reward.
S. G. WALKER

HAS received at NEW [illegible] determined to sell as CHEAP or cheaper than can be bought at any other establishment in De Ruyter. Among his assortment may be found Dry Goods, Groceries, Crockery, Hardware, [illegible] Leghorn and Palm Leaf hats, [illegible] a variety of other things too numerous to mention.

Hear ye! Hear ye! All persons wishing to buy goods CHEAP will please call at the Farmer's Exchange, and examine the quality and prices of the goods before purchasing elsewhere. [illegible] "Safety Fund" [illegible] indebted to S. G. Walker, will please call and [illegible]

De Ruyter, May 20, 1842.

"Hard times and money scarce,"

IS the general complaint, and economy is the object of every person.

SUTTON & QUINBY have just opened a large assortment of Dry Goods, Groceries, Crockery, Paints, Oils and Dye-Stuffs. Persons wishing to make purchases are invited to call, as we feel confident that our Low Prices and Good Goods must give general satisfaction.

May 24 SUTTON & QUINBY

BOOKS & STATIONERY.

SCHOOL BOOKS, of all descriptions, Miscellaneous Books & Stationery, at the Book Store of HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

De Ruyter, May 17, 1842. 11m3

50 PIECES BROAD CLOTHS, CASSIMERES, SATINETTES, [illegible] NEW YORK CASH STORE.

POETRY.

The Everlasting Grave-Digger.

BY SIR E. L. BULWER.

I stood in one vast burial-place,
  And saw his trade the sexton ply;
No life was in that bloodless face—
  No light was in that freezing eye.

"Whose grave, old Sexton, digg'st thou here?"
  As, up to-day, the laborer cast
The relics hid for many a year.—
  "Fool!—from the grave I dig the Past."

A skull lay ghastly at my feet,
  And by the skull a diadem;
Pale shreds of Beauty's winding-sheet,
  And Beauty's bones outwhitening them!

"And of the Past, are these alone
  The relics that thou canst disclose!
Bring back the Monarch to his throne,
  And give to Beauty's cheek the rose!"

"Stand from my path!" the Sexton said,
  "Thou ask'st what MEMORY cannot give—
I only can disturb the dead,
  And FAITH alone can bid them live!"

Miscellaneous Department.

SERPENT HUNTING.

AN ADVENTURE OF SOUTH AMERICA.

Business connected rather with pleasure than profit had kept me roaming for some months among the West India Islands, that land of magnificence and discomfort; and from all that I had heard there, and more particularly from what came under my own observation, I can truly affirm that to Europeans in general it is a land replete with novelty and interest, and to writers both of fiction and truth, a field in which they may reap an abundant harvest of reputation. I at length found myself at Barbadoes, without any fixed resolution either to return or proceed farther on in my wanderings.—In such a wavering and unsettled state of mind, a little matter will sometimes turn the scale. I had carried a letter to a gentleman of the Island, with whom I formed a most agreeable acquaintanceship; and in consequence of the description he gave me of the coast of South America I was induced to form the resolution of visiting at least a portion of that country before I should think of bending my course homewards. Being furnished with letters to one or two individuals who might be of service to me, I took a passage in a ship bound for Demerara, and after a voyage in no degree remarkable for shortness or novelty, I landed there in safety. I will not stop here to detail all I saw.—Suffice it to say, that having viewed all I considerd worthy of being noticed, I set off arcoss to the country to deliver one of the letters I carried with me to a gentleman from whose attention and knowledge I been assured I should obtain much information. After a journey of some days I reached the place; and considering that I had been previously an utter stranger, I was received with a degree of warmth and kindness I could scarcely have anticipated. The estate, or rather plantation, on which I had been so kindly invited to take up my residence for some time, and where I had resolved to spend a few weeks in examining the local scenery and curiosities, which lay upon the banks of a river that comes down from the mountains of Geiana. Mr. Heinvault (the proprietor,) although the superintendence of his estate occupied a great part of his time, contrived to devote no inconsiderable portion of it to my amusement. Accompanied by a couple of servants, and Cæsar, a shrewd and active negro who held the post of hunter, [a personage not only useful, but even necessary to those who reside on collonial estates distant from any town, as many of the delicacies of the table are furnished by him,] we made frequent excursions up the country, and committed occasionally sad havoc among the quadrupeds and feathered tribes with which that region abounds. At other times we manned a couple of canoes, and descending the river, we employed ourselves in fishing excursions, or in taking a shot at such birds as unfortunately for themselves came within range of our pieces. Those who are acquainted with the general appearance and topography of the northern coast of South America, know well that from the flatness of the country as it approaches the sea, many rivers of considerable magnitude divide themselves into numerous streams or canals, before mingling their waters with those of the ocean. The deltas or Islands fored by these streams are sometimes of great extent, consisting, like most of that coast, of marshy or savannah land, partly bare, and partly overrun by tall reeds and canes, or other aquatic plants. In the thick and almost impervious recesses of these, reptiles of various kinds often find a retreat, from which they occasionally emerge in search of their prey. The streams are in many places frequented by aquatic birds of the most variegated and beautiful plumage, and the waters afford several kinds of fish, which from their delicacy and flavor, amply repay the laborer employed in taking them.

I had been informed, both by Mr. Heinvault and Cæsar, that serpents of a great size had been frequently seen by them crossing the lagoons from one island to another, and that by great exertion, and not without difficulty, they had succeeded in destroying a few. I confess I had been for some time anxious to discover one of these reptiles; not that I wished a close connexion with it—far from it. The little I had seen of them had given me an aversion to them, and this feeling was much heightened by the numerous stories I had heard of their fearful powers of destruction and deglutition. I had no objections, however, to view one at a distance, "dragging its slow trembling length along."—But in all our excursions nothing of this kind was to be seen, and I had begun to conceive some latent suspicions that Mr. Heinvault and Cæsar had a little exaggerated the number and size of the reptiles they had seen and destroyed. But an adventure soon after this befel me, which however made me entirely change my opinion of their veracity, and convinced me that their account rather fell short of than exceeded the truth. Occasionally, when pressing business detained Mr. Heinvault at his plantation, or called him to a distance, and when I found time hang heavy upon my hands, Cæsar was always willing to volunteer his services as my guide and assistant in any rambles which I wished to undertake; and a clever and active fellow I indeed found him. He was a capital shot, and unequalled in the success with which he contrived to hook his fish when not one would look at the bait belonging to another.

One day, about two or three weeks after my arrival, Mr. Heinvault informed me that he was under the necessity of going to a plantation distant about ten miles, and as the way lay partly through the woods, and trackless savannahs, he was obliged to take Cæsar with him, he being the only one on the plantation who had thorough knowledge of the way, and who, from his dexterity and address, proved a useful and agreeable attendant. He added, that he should be back early in the afternoon, and that if I wished to take a stroll, or go on the water, any of the rest of his people should be at my disposal. After Mr. Heinvault had rode away, I strolled about the plantation an hour or two, looking at every thing to amuse myself; but getting terribly wearied with doing nothing, I told one of the people to get the lines ready, for it was my intention to go out a-fishing for some time, the day being rather warm and sultry for a shooting excursion. These being soon ready, I likewise sent for my gun, and declining the offer he made to attend me, I pushed out into the stream, and dropped slowly down the river. The current being slow, I was awhile reaching the place where the river branches off into a number of streams. I guided my canoe into one of those in which I had formerly been along with Cæsar, and where our sport had been very good. The stream in general was not above 18 or 20 feet, I "paddled my light canoe" up and down this trying to get a shot at some of the beautiful birds which often frequent these lagoons. But the birds were scarce and shy. Fatigued with this unsuccessful sport, I set the lines, and paddled about for some time, I drew them up; but whether they had not been baited as well as Cæsar used to do, or whether the fish were as shy as the birds, I cannot tell; but after a few trials I got tired of this sport likewise. Thinking I would be more successful elsewhere, I proceeded about a quarter of a mile farther down, and set the lines. By this time the day had become exceedingly sultry and oppressive. Seeing there was no prospect of a shot, I took off my stockings and shoes, and bathed my feet in the water, and, working my canoe to the other side, I laid my gun ready loaded for a shot upon the benches, and streched myself along side of it, waiting till it was time to draw the lines I had set. In this position I fell asleep, overcome, as I suppose, by the heat of the day, and the fatigue I had undergone.

I know not how long I may have slept; but I was roused from my slumber by a curious sensation, as if some animal were licking my foot. In that state of half stupor felt after immediately awaking from sleep, I cast my eyes downward, and never till my dying day shall I forget the thrill of horror that passed through my frame on perceiving the neck and head of a monstrous serpent covering my foot with saliva, preparatory, as immediately flashed upon my mind, to the process of swallowing it. I had faced death in many shapes—on the ocean—on the battle field—but never till that moment had I conceived he could approach me in a guise so terrible. For a moment, and but for a moment, I was fascinated. But recollection of my state soon came to my aid, and I quickly withdrew my foot from the monster, which was all the while glaring upon me with its basilisk eyes, and at the same moment I instinctively grasped my gun, which was lying loaded beside me. The reptile apparently disturbed by my motion (I conceive it had previous, from my inertness, taken me for a dead carcase,) drew its head below the level of the canoe. I had just sufficient time to raise myself half up, pointing the muzzle of my peace in the direction of the serpent, when its head and neck again appeared moving backwards and forwards, as if in search of the object it had lost. The muzzle of my gun was within a yard or two of it; my finger was on the trigger; I fired, and it received the shot in its head. Rearing up part of its body into the air with a horrible hiss which made my blood run cold—and, by its contortions, displaying to my sight a great part of its enormous bulk, which had hitherto escaped my notice—it seemed ready to throw itself upon me, and embrace me in its monstrous coils. Dropping my gun, by a single stroke of the paddles I made the canoe shoot up the stream out of his reach, Just as I was escaping, I could observe that the shot had taken effect; for blood was beginning to drop from its head. But the wound appeared rather to have enraged than subdued him. Unfortunately, all my shot was expended, otherwise I would most certainly, at a respectful distance, have given him a salutation of the same kind as I had just bestowed. All that I have described passed in a much shorter time than I have taken up in recounting it.

As I went up the stream with all the velocity I could impart to the canoe, I heard the reeds, among which the animal was apparently taking refuge, crashing under its weight. I never thought of the lines I had left, but hurrying as fast as the canoe would go through the water, I was not long in reaching the landing-place before Mr. Heinvault's house. Hastily mooring the canoe, I jumped ashore, and hurried up to the house, where I found Mr. Heinvault, who had just arrived. You may be certain I lost no time in communicating to him the almost miraculous escape I had made, and the wound I had inflicted on the animal.—'In that case,' said he, 'it cannot escape; we must immediately go in search of it;' and instantly summoning Cæsar, he told him to get the guns ready, and to bring two of his fellows with him. 'If you choose to assist us in finishing the adventure you have begun, and to have a second encounter with your novel antagonist, we shall show you some of the best and most dangerous sport our country affords.' I protested that nothing was farther from my intention than staying behind, and added, that had not my shot been expended, we should not have parted on so easy terms. 'In general,' said he, 'it is very dangerous to attack them at close quarters after being wounded, as they become extremely infuriated; and there are not wanting instances in which life has been sacrificed by doing so. But we now take such precaution in approaching them, that it is next to impossible that any accident can happen.' Just as he finished saying this, Cæsar reappeared, himself armed with a club, one of those who followed him carrying a weapon of the same kind, while the other was armed with a weapon similar to a bill-hook. This Mr. Heinvault told me was to clear a road among the reeds, if the animal should have retreated among them; the club being reckoned the best instrument for a close encounter. We were soon seated in the canoes, and glided down the stream as fast as a couple of pairs of brawny arms could urge us. In a short time we reached the spot where my adventure had happened. The small part of the bank not covered with reeds, bore, from its sanguine hue, evident proof that the wound the animal had received could not have been slight. Exactly opposed this the reeds were crushed and broken, and a sort of passage was formed among them so wide, that a man could with little difficulty enter. Mr. Heinvault commanded a halt, to see that the arms were in proper order. All being right, we listened attentively, in order to hear if there was any noise which might direct us to our enemy. No sound, however, was heard. One of the negroes entered first, clearing with his bill-hook whatever obstructed our way. He was followed by Mr. Heinvault and me, with our guns; while Cæsar and his fellw servants brought up the rear. The reeds in general were nearly double our height, and at the same time pretty close. However, we easily made our way through them, partly assisted by the track which the serpent had evidently made.

We had penetrated I should suppose, about thirty yards, when the fellow who was in advance gave the alarm that we were close upon the animal. Mr. Heinvault ordered him behind, and, advancing with me, we saw through the reeds part of the monster coiled up and part of it streched out; but owing to their thickness its head was invisible. Disturbed, and apparently irritated by our approach, it appeared from its movements, about to turn and assail us.

We had our guns ready, and just as we caught a glimpse of its head, we fired, both of us almost at the same moment. From the obstruction of the reeds, all our shot could not have taken effect; but what did take effect, seemed to be sufficient; for it fell, hissing, and rolling itself into a variety of contortions. Even yet it was dangerous to approach it. But Cæsar, who seemed to possess a great deal of coolness and audacity, motioning his master and me not to fire again in the direction of the animal, forced a way through the reeds at one side, and, making a kind of circuit, came in before it, and succeeded in hitting it a violent blow, which completely stunned it; and a few repetitions of this gave us the victory. We could now examine the creature with safety. We found that a good part of our shot had lodged about its head and neck, and would probably have proved fatal to it, even if we had left it to its fate. I confess it was not without a shudder that I handled and examined it, when I thought how nearly I had escaped from furnishing it with a meal.

We set ourselves to work, and not without difficulty did we succeed in dragging the huge carcase to the edge of the stream, and in embarking it in one of the canoes, to which it formed a pretty fair loading.—It was not far from sunset when the expedition landed on the bank near Mr. Heinvault's house. He soon got sufficient assistance in conveying the carcase up, and in depositing it in a place of safety. On measuring, we found it to be nearly forty feet in length, and of proportional thickness. Mr. Heinvault informed me that it was the largest he had seen killed, although he had often seen others under circumstances which convinced him that they must have been of a far greater size.

It was not until I was seated at a late dinner, that I felt myself a little overcome with the unusual exertion I had undergone on so sultry and oppressive a day. But as the evening wore on, I completely recovered; and never do I recollect spending a more agreeable one. The adventure, however, and the consciousness of my escape, must have been deeply impressed upon my mind; for during some months after, I often started from my sleep with the cold sweat upon my brow, imagining myself crushed and expired in the embraces of a horrid reptile.

ABUSE.—A gentle reply to scurrilous language is the most severe revenge.

A FACT.—A man in the town of M——, N. H., who had, while from home, earned about six dollars, returned the other day to his family with the cash. His wife told him that during his absence the family had suffered for food. He replied—I will go to a store and buy what is wanted, and then we shall have enough. He had refrained from drink for sometime; but on arriving at the grocery, it was found he had money, and was invited to drink first a little beer—then something stronger till he got drunk, spent all his money for rum, and returned to his half-starved family at 2 o'clock in the morning, penniless.

The poor wife was greatly distressed, and on the next evening ventured to go to the wife of the rumseller, told the story of her suffering family—of the manner in which her husband had been made a pauper, &c., whereupon the goodly lady filled a large basket with pork, bread, coffee, sugar, &c., and then calling her husband into the entry, in the presence of the drunkard's wife, said, last night you took from this poor woman's husband all his money for Rum; I have now filled a basket full of articles of food, and so long as you continue to sell liquor, get men drunk, and take from them their money, thereby making their families poor and miserable, I will deal out to them, from the house, all they may want to support them." This was more than the husband could stand; and the next morning he went to his store and emptied every cask, decanter, and bottle of liquor into the road, saying he would no longer sell liquid fire, but would keep a Temperance store. Would to heaven that the wife of every rumseller would follow the example of this good woman, and that the result might be the same.—Mercantile Journal.

ANIMALS TURNED AUTHORS.—If animals were to turn authors, the eagle would excel in epic and the sheep in pastoral poetry. The elephant would produce an excellent treatise on philosophy, the horse employ his genius in chivalry; the cow on agriculture, and the dog cut a figure in the drama. The writings of the monkey would excel in satire and burlesque; while the cat would be distinguished for the sarcasm, envy, and disingenuousness of his composition.

The style of the lion would be bold, abrupt and Pindaric; while the gander would be remarkable, for the extreme verbosity and diffuseness of his language. The badger would probably attempt a treatise on medical perfumes, the turkey a disquisition on the mock heroic.

The genius of the owl would exhibit itself in the composition of elegies, and solemn dirges; that of the bear in an essay on waltzing. As for the hog, he could never excel in political literature, but might favor the world with a critical analysis of the philosophy of Bacon. The peacock would make an excellent contributor to the Lady's Magazine and the annuals. The whale would write powerfully on the depopulating consequences of the Greenland fishery, and the pigeon on letter carrying. The goose would make blue stocking of the first glass, and would be famous for dealing in scandal.

The magpie would be a notorious plagiarist, cabbaging ideas at all hands. As for the parrot he would not indulge in written composition, but be fond of showing off as a public speaker. For composing political harangues, the ass would be unrivalled.

DRUNKARDS.—Bnedict Arnold, the traitor, was a rum-seller and a drunkard.—Three of the most important defeats of the American army, during the Revolution, were sustained by men who died drunkards. Had a sober crew been on board the Chesapeak, the brave Lawrence would never have said to his men, 'don't give up the ship!' Drunkards, and drunkard-makers neither gained nor preserved the liberty of this country. They trample its laws under foot, and destroy more of their fellow-citizens, and cause them to pay a heavier tax, and render our liberty more insecure than any foreign enemy can ever do.

BLUSHING.—We love to see the rosy hue mounting over the neck and face of a beautiful woman; it shadows forth, delicately and softly, the gentle feelings of her soul. It is the evidence of timidity, which is lovely in woman. Out upon your masculine mind—out upon your rough, sturdy genius: we prefer the reed to ash—ivy to oak.—Woman's natural element is retirement: her home, the domestic circle. Unfit by nature to buffet with the world's waves, or mingle in its strife, she lives dependent upon a stronger spirit, and repays in kindness and gentleness that which she receives in protection and support.

We cannot bear a woman who never blushes; the steady, cold, calm eye has no charm for us; there is a beauty and a gentleness in the downcast look, starting tear, and warm blush, that defies comparison, even with the loveliest of the haughty.—Those who endeavor to curb and restrain this feeling, thinking it a weakness, err strangely in their ideas; let it alone! there is no deformity in the indulgence.

TEA A POISON.—It is stated in some medical papers, that an eminent dentist in New York, in using a decoction of hyson tea to allay the sensibility of the nerves of decayed teeth, boiled one pound from a quart down to half a pint, ten drops of which given to a rabbit caused death. Eight drops killed a cat. An article containing so much poison is not fit for a beverage.—Morning Star.

There is no creature whose existence does not depend on other creatures. Their subsistence requires among themselves an incessant transfusion of their being. What is it to live? To receive. What is it to die? To give. The first condition of life is a sacrifice, a perpetual and universal communion.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

PROSPECTUS OF THE FARM HOUSE OF THE XIX CENTURY, or ENCYCLOPEDIA OF PRACTICAL AGRICULTURE, containing the best mode of culture adopted in France, England, Germany, and Flanders; [illegible]

[illegible]

Agriculture is the foundation of all other arts—the art for which man was made and the perfection of which is his chief happiness and glory in the first temporal of this planet. [illegible]

[illegible]

William Cobbett [illegible]

"Our [illegible] French Maison Rustique [illegible] Castlereagh and Sidmouth [illegible] 1817, [illegible] to Long Island [illegible] Maison Rustique."—[illegible] 129.

[illegible]

TERMS.—[illegible] forty numbers, at $10.

[illegible]

The 1st number will be issued on the 1st of [illegible] 1842.

[illegible] S. S. HASKELL, Publisher, 128 [illegible] New York.

New York, June 1, 1842.

. All editors [illegible] to one copy of the work [illegible] 1842.

NO IMPOSITION.

NO STATES PRISON WORK!

THOSE wishing to purchase BOOTS and SHOES of superior quality at cost, [illegible] will find just the place by calling at the sign of the MAMMOTH BOOT.

De Ruyter, May 20, 1842.

JOB PRINTING.

BOOKS, Pamphlets, Way, Hand-Bills, Cards, Bills, &c. &c. neatly executed at this office.

L. W. BLISS' Window Sash
. Bliss' & Co. " [illegible]

Holme's Sampson & Sedbury Edged Tools consisting of Broad Axes, Hand Axes, Adzes, [illegible] Chisels, at Factory prices by J. N. ELMORE.
October 4. Manufacturers' Agent.

LOTS OF HATS & CAPS on hand—Fashionable and Old Fashioned, Bell Crowned and Low Crowned; and, to crown all, and not to be out of Fashion, Cash and most kinds of stuff received in payment, by HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

SILK! SILK!! SILK!!!

A BEAUTIFUL assortment of plain, figured and striped, just received and for sale very cheap at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

"A nimble sixpence is better than a slow shilling."

SPRING GOODS! SPRING GOODS!

CHEAP! CHEAP!! CHEAP!!!

THE undersigned are receiving a large assortment of goods suitable for the spring and summer trade, and invite their friends and the public generally to call and examine them at the one price store. SUTTON & QUINBY.

Notice.

ALL persons who are indebted to the subscriber, either in accounts or note, are requested to call and settle immediately and save cost.
De Ruyter, June 20, 1842.
JAMES M. [illegible]

How to make money.

I[illegible] of the Yankee Nation [illegible] The easiest and most practicable [illegible] accomplishing the desired end in [illegible] "Save Money," which can be [illegible] NEW GOODS, instead of the [illegible] at ELMORE'S, [illegible] NEW GOODS is nearly equal to [illegible] in this village and who is daily [illegible] "Forbud's Fourmtes." [illegible]

Of Drugs and Medicines.

T[illegible] larger stock and [illegible] those who advertise [illegible]
J. N. ELMORE.

4[illegible] STONE STORE.

NEW [illegible] ESTABLISHMENT.

T[illegible] S. W. Walker's store, [illegible] New York City. [illegible] New York Spring and Summer Fashions just received. W. P. GUEST.
De Ruyter, April [illegible] 1842.

FLOUR! FLOUR!! FLOUR!!!

SUPERFINE Flour [illegible] Farmers' Exchange [illegible] barrels or half barrels. [illegible] from the best of western wheat at one of the best mills in the state.
S. W. WALKER.
De Ruyter, April 15th 1842.

BLANKS! BLANKS!

JUSTICES' Blanks, Personal Mortgages, &c. [illegible] for sale at this office.
[illegible] April [illegible] 1842.

TEAS, SUGARS.

C[illegible] NEW YORK CASH STORE.

---

300 [illegible] STONE STORE.

AGENTS FOR THE REGISTER.

NEW-YORK.

[illegible]

RHODE-ISLAND.

[illegible]

CONNECTICUT.

[illegible] Wm. Maxson.
[illegible]

NEW-JERSEY.

[illegible]

PENNSYLVANIA.

[illegible]

VIRGINIA.

Lost Creek—Levi H. Bond.
[illegible]
New Salem—Jephtha F. Randolph.
[illegible]

OHIO.

Bloomfield—Charles Clarke.
Northampton—Sanson Babcock, B. C. Church.
Port Jefferson—Lewis A. Davis.
Jackson—Davis Loofbourrow.
Bethlehem—G. N. Swinney.
Kingsville—John M. Todd.

MICHIGAN.

Oporto—Job Tyler.
Tallmadge—Bethel Church.

WISKONSAN.

Milton, Rock Co.—Joseph Goodrich, P. M. Stillman Coon.

IOWA.

Fredonia, Louisa Co.—M. Wheelock.

ILLINOIS.

Tremble, Peoria Co.—James Dunham.

The Seventh-day Baptist Register
IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY,
AT DE RUYTER, MADISON CO., N. Y.,
BY
JAMES BAILEY.

TERMS.—To village subscribers who have the paper left at their doors, $2 25, in advance, or $2 50, at the expiration of the year.

☞To office and mail subscribers, $2 in ADVANCE.

Each communication, involving facts and intended for insertion in the paper, must be accompanied by a responsible name.

No subscription received for a less term than six months.

☞All subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, will be considered as wishing to continue their subscription, and their paper will be sent to them accordingly. No paper will be discontinued till all arrearages are paid except at the discretion of the publisher.

☞Advertisements inserted on the most reasonable terms.

☞All letters and communications to insure attention should be addressed to the publisher free of postage.

L. J. Rogers 2

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.

VOL. III.—NO 22.] JAMES BAILEY, Editor and Proprietor. —— A. H. BURDICK, Printer. [WHOLE NO. 126.

Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,——The SEVENTH DAY is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.—COMMANDMENT.———If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments.—JESUS CHRIST

TWO DOLLARS IN ADVANCE.] DE RUYTER, N. Y., FOURTH-DAY, JULY 27, 1842. [PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Original Papers.

For the Register.

Serious Inquiry!

[Please read, publish, and circulate.]

As there are a number of ministers in the United States, and in other countries, (and their number with their congregations still increasing,) who preach that it is sin for men to disregard the seventh-day of the week as the Sabbath of the Lord; should we not do well to search the scriptures and ascertain whether this is sin or not?

1. What is sin in the light of the scriptures of truth? 1 John iii. 4. "Sin is the transgression of the law." Paul says, "By the law is the knowledge of sin." And again, "I had not known sin but by the law: for I had not known lust, except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet." Paul refers then to the law of God, the ten commandments, which says, "Thou shalt not covet." By this law, then, is the true knowledge of sin. James also speaks of some who "commit sin, and are convinced of the law as transgressors." And further, he that shall "offend in one point," [or in one command,] "is guilty of all:" as a transgressor of the law of God. "For he that said, Do not commit adultery, said also, Do not kill. Now if thou commit no adultery, yet, if thou kill, thou art become a transgressor of the law." James gives us a rule here, and says, to "offend in one point," which he explains to be in one command, makes a man guilty of all as a transgressor of the law. Here, then, are three chosen "witnesses," John, Paul, and James, which clearly prove, that to transgress any one of these ten commandments of God, is sin.

2. Does the law of God command the seventh-day in particular? Answer. It never said, "one whole day in seven," nor "one seventh part of time." If it had, then seven Sabbaths in each week could have been kept in one family. But it says, "The seventh-day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God." This particular day was set apart, blessed, and sanctified, and made a Sabbath, or rest-day in the beginning.—And Christ himself says, of this seventh-day Sabbath, that it "was made for man," and that he is Lord of the same, as an institution of his kingdom. The law of God never knew, nor ever can know any thing about the first-day of the week, or any other day of the week being the Sabbath, except the seventh. Because the same Almighty Creator, which said, Thou shalt not kill, said also, The seventh-day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God. And no other day can possibly answer here, except we make the words, "The seventh." to pass entirely from the law. And this cannot be, because Christ has said, "Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one title shall in no wise pass from the law." And this is the way the disciples of our Lord, the Apostles, and believing Jews and Gentiles understood and acted, they "rested the Sabbath day according to the commandment," after Christ was crucified; but did not rest on the first-day of the week, for some carried their spices, others traveled, &c. (See Luke xxiii. 56, Acts xiii. 14, 42, 44, and xvi. 13, and xvii. 2, and xviii. 4.) Here Luke, the writer of the Acts of the Apostles, says of Paul, about the year of our Lord 63, that Paul "reasoned in the synagogue every Sabbath, and persuaded the Jews and the Greeks." Now if "every Sabbath," that the writer of the Acts of the Apostles knew of, in the year A. D. 63,* was nothing more or less than every seventh-day, (as all will admit,) then it follows, that there could not have been any first-day Sabbath known at that time by the writer of the Acts of the Apostle; because "every Sabbath," every seventh-day, took up all of the Sabbaths that were then known!

3. By what law are men to be judged? We are informed in the second chapter of Paul's letter to the Romans, that "there is no respect of persons with God. For as many as have sinned without law," (not having the law,) "shall perish without law." Because they "are a law unto themselves," "and as many as have sinned in the law," (having the law,) "shall be judged by the law"—in the day when God shall judge the world by Jesus Christ. It is evident that Paul here alludes to the law of God; because he says, "Thou that preachest, A man should not steal, dost thou steal? Thou that sayest, A man should not commit adultery, dost thou commit adultery? We understand Paul, that those who have the law, and such as have been "instructed out of the law," that if such continue in sin, continue to transgress any of the known commandments in the law of God, that such shall be judged by the same law of God, in the day of judgment. Because "the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain." Neither can any be guiltless who continue in sin, that grace may abound. But those who "fulfill the royal law according to the scripture," may "So speak, and so do, as they that shall be judged by the law of liberty." That is, the law of grace, mercy, and forgiveness,—"the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus." This law of grace and mercy through Christ, delivers the repenting sinner, who turneth his feet to the truth, and who can then say with Paul, "I delight in the law of God after the inward man." This law of forgiveness, and mercy, this law of liberty, and the law of condemnation, are both, (if we may use the expression,) contained in the law of God. See Exod. xx. 6.

It is proved, then, by the Apostles of our Lord; First. That sin is the transgression of the law; that to have other gods; to worship idols; to take the name of the Lord our God in vain; to disregard the seventh-day as the Sabbath of the Lord; to dishonor parents; to kill, &c., is sin.—And that to transgress any one of these commandments, makes a man guilty of all as a transgressor of the law of God. Second. That the law of God cannot be altered, not one jot or tittle of it, to suit our convenience—that the seventh-day and that day only can answer to the law of God—that "the seventh-day" stands fair yet in the law of God, and will till the day of judgment—that according to Paul, and James, "all the law," "the whole law," "the righteousness of the law," is to be "fulfilled" by christians, according to its true intent and meaning. The first part, containing love to God; the second part, love to man. And though some of the Apostles "were assembled for fear of the Jews," in the evening of the first-day of the week, (John xx. 19.); And though the disciples at Troas had a meeting "to break bread," one evening, "where there were many lights in the upper chamber," when Paul was about to part from them, (Acts xx. 7, 8,) yet they did not regard that day as a Sabbath or rest-day, as it is never so called in the New Testament, while the seventh-day is mentioned as the Sabbath some fifty-five or sixty times in that book. But Constantine, Emperor of Rome, was the first which we have found to command the first-day of the week to be kept as a Christian Sabbath, which shows this to be nothing more or less than a commandment of man. And Christ has informed us in his word, that it is "vain worship," to lay aside one of the commandments of God, and teach for doctrine the commandments of men. (See Matt. xv. ch., Mark vii. ch.) Third. That those who have the law, and continue to transgress it, shall be judged by the same law in the day of judgment, ("for not the hearers of the law are just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified." (Rom. ii. 13.) Therefore, if there is no respect of persons with God, will he judge a part of men by his own law, and another part of men by a commandment of men? Judge ye!

And you that say, "There is no Sabbath under the gospel dispensation!" I would respectfully ask you to remember the words of Christ. He says, "The Sabbath was made for man." You say, There is no Sabbath. He says, "The Son of Man is Lord even of the Sabbath day." You say, There is no Sabbath day. He says, "It is lawful to do well on the Sabbath days." You say, There is no particular Sabbath days! Now hear him a little further. "He that rejecteth me, and receiveth not my words, hath one that judgeth him: the word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day!"

This falling away of the church; this departure from the faith; this turning away their ears from the truth; this changing of times and laws; this casting the truth to the ground; this breaking of the everlasting covenant; this violating God's law; and her priests hiding their eyes from the Lord's Sabbaths, as foretold by some of the prophets and apostles, has been fulfilled in thus changing the time of the Sabbath from the seventh to the first-day of the week.

In our serious inquiry into this very important subject, we have ascertained that according to the scriptures, it is sin to disregard the seventh-day as the Sabbath of the Lord. And if the evening and the morning commences some hours earlier in London than in New York; then the Sabbath commences some hours earlier in the former than in the latter place.

Darien, N. Y., 1842.

---

*The Acts of the Apostles is said to have been written A. D. 63.

Religious Department.

THE HARVEST PAST.

Who are they who shall hereafter take up this sad lament? Look at the profligate man. He says, it is no matter how I live in this world; all the punishment I have to fear, I shall receive here. This idea keeps him quiet and indifferent now; but in a dying hour, conscience bites like a serpent, and stings like an adder. He cannot silence its compunctious visitings. He writhes upon his bed in mental agony, shrinking from the awful presence of his Judge. He goes before the judgment seat, from the midst of his sins: and in the anguish of his despair he exclaims, "The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and I am not saved." Satan claims him as his own. Like Judas, he goes to his own place; "and the smoke of his torment forever ascended," as he exclaims, "I am not saved! I am not saved!"

Accompany me to the bedside of this dying youth. He has heard the pleadings of a father's prayers, and has witnessed a mother's tears for his salvation from his childhood. He has been affectionate in feeling, and amiable in life. He has always resolved that he would, at some future period, attend to the subject of religion. The Spirit has striven with him, and he has said, "go thy way for this time." To the urgency of pious friends, he has replied, "wait for a more convenient season." But look at him now. He is pale and emaciated with sickness. He is dying.

His quivering lip hangs feebly down,
His pulse is faint and slow.

Hark! he faintly speaks! what does he say? Listen! "The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and I am not saved." He speaks again—it is in the sad moanings of delirium. He raves of hell, and demons, and endless wo. Look at his distracted mother. Look at his broken-hearted father. Their son is lost, and they are weeping that he ever was born. He would not heed their prayers, he would not attend to their counsels.

Whose history is this that I am writing? Yours, my young friend. It is this young lady who is in danger of thus dying—it is this young man who is hastening to this appalling death-bed. Oh! the madness, the inconceivable madness of sin!

Do you see this man who looks so solemn and humble? His countenance is dejected and depressed. He walks as if heavy anxiety preyed upon his heart.—What is the matter? He is anxious for his soul. He is an inquirer for salvation. He goes to his pastor, and says, "I feel that I am a lost sinner. I have lived without prayer—I have neglected the Savior—oh! what shall I do to be saved?" His heart is full. The Holy Spirit has convinced him of sin, and now urges him to surrender himself to God. He hesitates. He loves the world;—and the struggle against sin is hard.

Look at him again. The Spirit is grieved away, he is thoughtless as ever. He has forgotten all his fears, and hardly thinks of heaven or of hell.

Follow now this man to his dying hour. The minister of God sits at his bed-side. "Have you any hopes of recovery?" he asks. "No sir," says the dying man; "the physician has told that I cannot live more than a day or two, at most." "Do you feel prepared to die?" "I know I am not a Christian, sir, but I have no feeling upon the subject?" "Have you never felt interested in the subject of religion?" "Yes, sir; some years ago, I felt very anxious, but I had not resolution to brave the ridicule of the world, and now it is too late for me to make any efforts." "No, my friend, it is never too late to repent." "Perhaps not, but I feel no disposition to think of the subject; at any rate, I am too weak now to entertain such agitating thoughts."

A few days pass away, and look at him again. He is pallid and lifeless; a stiffened corpse. The shroud is wrapped around him. He is in his coffin. Open the lid. Look at those thin lips, the sunken eye, the emaciated cheek, the cold brow. The day of probation is gone: The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and he is not saved.

"There are no acts of pardon passed
In the cold grave to which we haste;
But darkness, death, and long despair,
Reign in eternal silence there."

Fellow immortal, whose history is this? Whose name might be written under this biography? Reader, may it not be yours?

The doctrine of the law and the gospel are not repugnant, if they are rightly explained. The law threatens sinners with wrath, that in this manner men may learn to acknowledge their sins, and may be humbled before God. To them who are humbled the gospel promises grace through Christ, who made satisfaction for sin, and merited eternal life for all who believe in him, as he says, He that believeth in me shall not perish.

By preaching, lecturing, and writing, we assiduously and most diligently inculcate, enforce and impress the doctrine of faith.

The knowledge of all theology depends on a right knowledge of the law and the gospel.—Martin Luther.

"IT IS EVEN A VAPOR."

Another year of our short life, where is it? Gone forever. Gone are its joys and its sorrows; its hopes and its disappointments. Gone are its fifty Sabbaths, with their sermons and prayers—with their public opportunities and private instructions.—We have now one more year to account for, one year less to live, one less to prepare for our great change. How solemn the thought!

Gone too with the past year are millions of the human family;—shivering poverty and sumptuous affluence; sparkling wit and idolized beauty; the master and his slave; the tenant and his lord; smiling infancy, blooming youth and grey decrepitude; wisdom and folly; genius and stupidity; fading laurels and budding honors. Gone, alas! are friends and kindred—bone has been rent from bone, and flesh from flesh. The wife of our youth, the parent, the son of hopes and prayers, the daughter of beauty and loveliness, the babes sweetly smiling in death, and laid by the side of its unconscious mother. We shall go to them, but they will not return to us. How short it has been—spring, summer, autumn, winter—and then it is gone! Long before we are aware of it, the final day, the dark and dreadful day of destiny, will be upon us. Are we ready to meet the summons?

Aged father, art thou ready? See, but few more sands remain in the glass. Thy sun is just setting. How do the keepers of thy frail house tremble, and thy strong men bow themselves! If Christ is yours, all is well. If not, wilt thou not hasten, while yet a ray of hope glimmers upon thy mountain top?

Brother in the midst of life, is thy house in order? I see thy abundance, and hear thy self-gratulations. What if God should say, This night thy soul is required? Could you go in peace? Ah! think how brittle is thy thread, how frail thy tenure. To-morrow may dawn upon thy eternal ruin, and hear the first note of thy ceaseless wail. Thou hast no time to lose.

Thoughtless youth! Buoyant hopes, or bounding health cannot stay the destroyer. They will shivel under his icy touch. Go ask the tomb-stones, and they will tell you that the young may die—suddenly, hopelessly. O prepare, thou hast no time to lose—another year may howl thy requiem, and moan thy fearful doom. Do not delay, there's madness in it.—N. Y. Evangelist.

THE LOFTIEST CHRISTIAN.—Imagine to yourself a soul of refinement, who, though she weep and bleed ever so much at heart, ever seems the image of joy to men, and whom the storms of the world neither disturb nor terrify; where do you find the emblem of such an one? In the firmament. View yonder the rainbow; the clouds and winds that sport around cannot move it, but it continues to glitter in the sun, and reposes in the depths of heaven like the sparkling dew in the morning of a fair day.—Christian World.

PITY.—He that hath pity on another man's sorrow shall be free from it himself; but he that delighteth in, and scorneth the misery of another shall one time or another fall into it himself.—Sir W. Raleigh.

Children's Department.

From the Sabbath School Monitor.

A RURAL CELEBRATION OF THE FOURTH OF JULY, IN A COUNTRY VILLAGE.

Some ten or twelve years ago I witnessed, in a very small secluded village in New England, on the fourth of July, a little innocent and interesting scene, which I have never forgotten. Now it so happens, in the allotments of Providence, that this little country village, with all its peace, plenty, and patriotism, was entirely destitute of a single piece of ordnance, and therefore wholly disqualified for those noisy and national demonstrations of gratitude which a free, religious, and "peculiar people" have thought, for more than half a century, to be the most appropriate offering to Heaven, for its signal interposition in behalf of our beloved country. Nor was this their only deficiency in the cumbrous and customary machinery of an American jubilee; they had neither bell nor belfry to their little antique, board-colored meeting-house. They seemed to be grossly deficient in the means of designating, or desecrating the day, by any serious irruptions upon the peace and serenity of the earth and sky. And what still increased their inability to celebrate the great festival in accordance with the general taste, they had no tavern to generate that quota of spirit of patriotism, which has been thought so requisite to keep the day a-la-mode. But, notwithstanding all these disadvantages, which would have exposed them to the pity or ridicule of a more enlightened community, they seemed not at all disheartened or ashamed at the paucity of their resources for scaring the unsuspecting beasts of the field, with those hideous noises that usher in, with such an appropriate and peculiar grace, the Sabbath of our freedom.

But what was more remarkable then than it might be now, was, that it did not proceed from a want of property or patriotism, that they were thus constrained to spend the day in the unique character of an intelligent, sober, and temperate community. The hills that hemmed them in on all sides, were covered with the most lovely and luxuriant verdure even to their very summits; on which the sky seemed to rest like a great peristyle of silver. The valley, which composed the extent of their community, seemed the depot of all the treasures of Ceres. Every thing bespoke the fullest fruition of all that an honest heart could wish or enjoy. Nor were they chargeable with any reprehensible apathy with regard to the sacred associations of the day. There were still living among the patriarchs of the hamlet, several grey-headed veterans of the Revolution, who had carried their crutches ever since the battle of Bunker Hill, or the bloody day at Brandywine or Monmouth. Could the reminiscences of Seventy-Six be indifferent to men thus scarred and maimed in that glorious struggle for freedom? They had not forgotten the day, nor was it to pass unnoticed? They had not forgotten the day, nor was it to pass unnoticed.

As I rode up in sight of the green in front of their little meeting-house, I perceived a motley group of forms issuing from every door, and directing their way towards the house of God, the only public building in the village, except the school-house. There, a dozen children were dancing along before their parents, in all the unchecked buoyancy of their happy hearts; all fancifully bedecked with flowers of every tint, some gathered that morning from the meadow-lands, and some from their own little flower-beds beneath the windows of their cottages. In another direction, though all tending to the same place of concourse, a score of ruddy young farmers might be seen traversing the little green common, with their blooming wives leaning on their stalworth arms; all with hearts responsive to the touch of those soft influences which seemed diffused from the smiling heavens, as incense to sanctify their offering.

Excited by a motive, I fear, no better than sheer curiosity, I determined to see what such a handfull of villagers would make out of the great festal day of our nation. Putting spurs to my horse, I alighted in a few minutes, under the outspreading arms of a gigantic elm, that guarded the entrance of the sanctuary. The last of the patriarchs was just crossing the sacred threshold, when, after passing the reins of my bridle through an iron ring driven into the gnarled tree, I followed on behind him into the church. The presence of a stranger was no ordinary occurrence in that house; and half a dozen of those young farmers whom I have mentioned, arose simultaneously to offer me the best seat in their pews. I accepted that of the one nearest me, who had laid his hand upon my arm with such an expression of cordiality beaming upon his sunburnt countenance, that I should have opened his pew door if he had not asked me. A lovely young woman by his side reached me her hymn-book, with her finger upon the lines that were being read, with such a smile of welcome as made me forget that I was a stranger, and installed me into the privilege of participating in the character of an old acquaintance, in all the services and scenes which were to consecrate the day.

The hymn was read, a few notes were struck by way of preparation or prelude, when, rising with the congregation below, I perceived for the first time, the principal actors in all the joyous scenes of the day. Had the veil been lifted from some fairy scene, and all its dramatis personæ been ushered into my presence, I should not have been more deeply affected by surprise and admiration, than at the scene that met my eyes at that part of the gallery occupied by the choir. The whole eastern gallery from one wall to the other, was completely filled with about one hundred and fifty children, from sixteen down to six years of age. They were all arranged in the happiest order with regard to their stature, the tallest occupying the centre of each seat, from which a geometrical series of little fairy forms and bright faces was produced each way, until it terminated in the young flaxen-haired child of six summers, whose laughing eye could just be seen sparkling over the front of the seat.

There they stood, the treasure, pride, and the glory of the hamlet, presenting a scene of innocence, loveliness, and beauty that might delight an angel's eye. Every cottage of the village was represented by some rosy cheek and sparkling eye in that juvenile assemblage. Although my eye ranged along from seat to seat, and from face to face, I saw not a single cheek on which latent and insidious disease had left the sicklied lily's hue. The sunlight of heaven's blessedness was on their countenances, and its peace and purity in their young hearts. But if I was captivated by the lovely spectacle which they presented, I was more so by the first notes of the anthem that arose from their lips, in a volume of such melody, as I thought, would not make discord among the entrancing melodies of paradise. Nor was I alone thus affected by those heaven-like strains; the superintendent, with a noble and manly voice, had led the way "in the swelling base," accompanied by several others in the pews below; but as those infant voices arose clearer and clearer, and sweeter and sweeter, and swelled onward and upward, the fathers paused one by one to listen; the superintendent ceased at the end of the second strain, as if the music of those unsullied lips was too pure to go up in company with his into the ears of Him who listens, methinks, with as much complacency, to such infantile songs of praise, as to the mighty hallelujahs of his arch-angels.

There is a kind of fugitive spirituality in the influence of music, which diffuses in the soul a perception or sentiment of melody more lasting than the evanescent charm that enchains the ear. When the last strains of the anthem had died away, from the full chorus of such a multitude of youthful voices to a brief interim of eloquent silence, the young vocalists, shaking back from their beaming faces a profusion of sunny ringlets, looked down upon their parents for some expression of approbation, which they seemed to expect. Nor were they disappointed; they met a stedfast gaze of delight, in which was portrayed that intense absorption of soul, denoting that they were still listening, not for, but to those notes that had died away as softly and sweetly as the gentle transit of a spring-tide zephyr. What a moment! every one within those sacred walls, both young and old, remained standing, in the most affecting silence, for nearly two minutes; the proud and happy parents looking up to their children, with something glistening in their eyes more eloquent and impressive than any reiterated encore! though vociferated by a thousand tongues. That silent appeal was felt in every young and beating bosom; and again, as if it were involuntarily, the church was filled with the music of voices which might have accorded with the lyres of heaven.

E. B.

From the London Child's Companion.

ON LYING.

Anne Morris was, some time ago, sadly given to lying; she was, in other respects, a pretty good girl, although she had her faults; but if she committed one fault, she often tried to conceal it by a lie. It is a great mercy for Anne that she was not always able to conceal it; for she might then never have been cured of this evil; whereas, I trust now, that the many instructive warnings and punishments she has received, have been blessed to her, and that she has abandoned the wretched habit, and will grow up, if she is spared, to be a pious woman.

One morning, Anne took the can, as usual, and set off to a neighboring farm, about half a mile distant, for some milk. She walked quickly there, for it was very cold, and Anne was thinking of her pretty hymns and Scripture lessons, that she learnt at the Sunday-school; but as she returned, she had to pass a pond, on which a number of boys and girls were amusing themselves with slidings.

Anne had always been taught not to play when she was sent on an errand, and her first thought was, to hasten past them all; but when she reached the place, she saw some of her school-fellows, and she stood to see them slide once along—Only once, she thought to herself: then it was, Only once each way; and as they went briskly along, one behind the other, she watched them again and again, still persuading herself she would only stay to see them once more.

At length Fanny Reed called to her to join them; and as Anne felt very cold by standing, she thought it would warm her nicely; so she put her can down, and ventured on the pond. Yet Anne had little confidence; she knew she was doing wrong; and as she did not slide along as quickly as the other girls, the one behind her tripped her up, and poor Anne fell, and hurt herself very much.

Just at this moment, a boy went along with a team of horses, and seeing Anne's can, upset it, and all the nice new milk was soon lost in the snow.

Poor Anne cried sadly. "What shall I do? what shall I say? my mother will be so angry with me!" "Tell your mother you fell down," said Susan Tompkins; "sure enough you did; that will be no story."

"So I will," said Anne, "but if mother asks any of you, you must say too."

They all promised they would, and Anne hastened home, never once reflecting on the sin she was going to commit. Her mother, however, was not easily satisfied; and she asked Anne so many questions, as to where she was, and how she fell, that Anne was obliged to tell a good many more lies to conceal the first; but she was found out after all.

A lady, who lived near the pond, saw the whole affair, and fearing Anne might be much hurt by her fall, called on Mrs. Morris in the course of the day, to know if she could be in any way useful to her; she said she was surprised to see Anne on the pond at all with such rude girls, and hoped it would be a lesson to her. This led to an explanation, when Anne's wicked deceit was fully laid open.

Her mother wept much, when she found how wicked her little child had been; she told her how one crime always brings on another, and how, from disobeying her parents, she had been led into such a great sin. She prayed with her; and Anne shed many tears, as her kind mother besought the Lord, that for the sake of his beloved Son, he would pardon the sins of her little girl, and put his fear into her heart, that she might sin against him again. Anne and her mother mingled their tears together; and Anne felt it was indeed a blessing to have such a mother.

From that time, whenever she was tempted to tell a lie, she thought of her mother's prayers and tears, and prayed that God would put the evil thought far from her.

My dear children, it is better to be punished in this life for a fault, than to escape punishment by telling a lie, thus adding to your crime. Ever remember the wise man's proverb, "Bread of deceit is sweet to a man, but afterward his mouth shall be filled with gravel." Prov. xx. 17.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, July 27, 1842.

Eternity.

O Eternity! What art thou? and who shall comprehend thee? Thou hast no beginning—no middle—no end! The imagination is bewildered in its efforts to comprehend it. Words and phrases are altogether inadequate to describe it. O, the abyss, the duration of Eternity! The Holy three in one, alone is Eternal! "Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting thou art God!" Man has had a beginning, but he shall have no end. This life is the commencement of his existence; and death is the gate through which he will be ushered into eternity. "For thus saith the high and lofty one that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy." "And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt." "And these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal." The scriptures abound with other proof of an eternal state, and that the existence of man shall run commensurate with it.—In every age also, and in almost every country, the idea of a future state has prevailed. The scepticism of a few will by no means invalidate the arguments drawn from this fact. The universal dread of annihilation is further proof of an eternity afforded by human reason. The evidences of an eternity both natural and revealed are numerous and incontrovertible. It is true, O reader, that thy soul must exist as long as God, and to thy misery or happiness there shall be no end. A few days, perhaps hours, will settle thy destiny forever. Eternity is just at hand. "But truly, as the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth there is but a step between me and death." An inch of space, a moment of time, is all we can call our own, and yet none are sure of this! "But this I say brethren, the time is short."—"For what is your life? It is even a vapor that appears for a little time, and then vanisheth away."

"Eternity is just at hand!
And shall I waste my ebbing sand,
And careless view departing day,
And throw my inch of time away!"

No, reader! Throw not away the moments on which hang eternal interests.—The dying Infidel exclaimed, "Oh! Time! Time! it is fit thou shouldst thus strike thy murderer to the heart! How art thou fled forever! A month!—Oh, for a single week! I ask not for years! though an age were too little for the much I have to do."

There are two states in Eternity. "Marvel not at this, for the hour is coming in which all that are in the graves, shall hear his voice and shall come forth, they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, to the resurrection of damnation." One of these is evidently a state of happiness and perfect bliss. "And I heard a voice from heaven saying unto me, Write, blessed are the dead which die in the Lord, from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them." The Revelator, speaking of the New Jerusalem, says, "And there shall be no more curse; but the throne of God and the Lamb shall be in it; and his servants shall serve him. And they shall see his face; and his name shall be in their foreheads.—And there shall be no night there, and they need no candles, neither light of the sun, for the Lord God giveth them light, and they shall reign forever and ever." The Apostle says: "For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." When Christ was about to leave the earth, he told his disciples that he went to prepare a mansion for them, and assured them that he would come again and take them to himself, that they might be with him to behold his glory. The mansions that Christ has gone to prepare are eternal in the heavens. "For we know, that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." Christ said of his followers: "I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand." Thus it is evident from these, as from various other passages of scripture, that the followers of Christ shall enjoy eternal life, in the mansions in heaven, and be crowned with an eternal weight of glory, and dwell forever with the Lord.

The other is a state of endless misery.—"Even as Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities about them in like manner, giving themselves over to fornication, and going after strange flesh, are set forth an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire."—"These shall go away into everlasting punishment." "There is a sin unto death, I do not say that he shall pray for it." "The wages of sin is death." "The wicked is drawn away in his wickedness, but the righteous has hope in his death." Again, the Apostle speaking of the wicked says, "who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power." The Revelator says of the worshipers of the beast:—"The same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation, and he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb. And the smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever." The rich man is said to have lifted up his eyes in hell, being in torment. Thus it is evident that the wicked shall be turned into hell. Their portion shall be everlasting destruction, eternal punishment, the death that never dies, and eternal banishment from heaven and happiness. Their business will be wailing and gnashing of teeth, and ineffectual cries for a drop of water to cool their parched tongues. Their companions shall be devils and damned spirits, and their anticipations wrath to come.—O! let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his.

"Brethren, if you are in Error it is better to remain in IGNORANCE than make a DIVISION!"

Will any one blame us for saying the Church is corrupt, and Ministers are corrupt, when such language as the above is uttered in the pulpit by a Pastor to his Church? The sentiment of the above is, that union in sin is better than unity in truth! How far this is in accordance with the Gospel of Jesus we leave for our readers to determine.

We mention the above circumstance, so that those who labor to extend the truth of the religion of Jesus may be aware of the opposition they will meet. After the faithful herald has exhibited truth to men, and convinced their judgments, he has then to oppose those who (for reasons known to themselves,) would lull them again to sleep! It is harder to bring men to obedience after their consciences have been encased in the convenience-system of non-essentialism, than it is to awaken the unregenerate, or convince the scoffer. That spirit which inculcates error and advises ignorance, or teaches disobedience to the fundamental doctrines of religion, has no relationship whatever to the spirit of Christ. It throws a mock security around Christian professors, and opens wide the flood-gates of INFIDELITY! Well may it be said of such "teachers," that they are "blind leaders of the blind."

Not a part of religion should alone be taught; but the whole. The fundamental doctrines are as important as the practical duties of Christianity. They can not be separated without marring the beauty of the Church. We do not believe, as some slanderously report, that salvation is by the deeds of the law; but we believe that whatever God requires his children to do is essential to salvation; that is, he who refuses to do the will of God, as He has revealed it to him, cannot enjoy the favor of God.—Having such views, we feel called upon to oppose such doctrine as heads this article.

General Conference.

The S. D. B. General Conference will hold its next session with the Church in Berlin, Rensselaer co., N. Y., commencing on the first day of the week before the second Sabbath in September next, at 10 o'clock, A. M. Introductory discourse by Eld. W. B. Gillett, or N. V. Hull, substitute. JAMES BAILEY, Cor. Sec.

Remittances.

Agents or subscribers who wish to forward money for the Register may, if they please, forward it by the delegates to General Conference. This will save the risk and expense of sending by mail. Money has been sent three times, at least, by mail that never reached us. We trust those who are ready will make use of this means of remittance. The present vol. will by that time be over half completed.

Traveling Agents.

We wish to engage one or more efficient persons as Agents of the Register, to extend its circulation. Any person wishing to engage may communicate with us, by giving good references, if unknown to us.

THIEVING.—Five persons, residing in or near Truxton, were committed for trial, on 22d inst., by Z. T. Bentley, Esq., in this village, for committing sundry depredations on the property of individuals, to some considerable extent. Their principal traffic was in Wool, some 200 fleeces of which they had stolen and sold. One of the gang turned evidence, and exposed the rest.

Farm House of the 19th Century.

The first No. of this work has come to our table. Our anticipations are more than met. The practical farmer, we are sure, will be amply paid for paying the subscription and receiving the work in return. For particulars see prospectus in another column.

The Mighty Fallen.

Thomas F. Marshall, who figured so largely as a Washingtonian in New York a few weeks since, has been disowned by the Reformers since his fight with Webb. This is as it should be. He is not worthy of the name of Washingtonian.

The MSS. of the WESTERN ASSOCIATION MINUTES are received, and will be published this week.

For the Register.

Pencilled passages from a late work by James.

Oh, how strange and complicated is the web of God's will? How the smallest, the most pitiful, the most empty of things, by his great and wise volition, act their part in mighty changes! How a look, a tone, a sound, a pebble in our pathway, a grain of dust in our eyes, a head-ache, a fit of gloom a caprice, a desire may not only change the whole current of one man's existence, but affect the being of states and empires, and alter human destinies to the end of time! The present state of France, the whole mass of facts, circumstances, incidents, accidents, and events, which are going on, may all be owing to a lady whom I knew well, having splashed her stocking fifty years ago—Thus! She was going out of her house with a relation in the town of Douai, when carelessly putting her foot on a stone, she splashed her stocking. She went back to change it; the delay occupied a quarter of an hour. When she went on again she met at the corner of the Place, a man, since too famous in history, then scarcely known as any thing but a clever fop. His name was Francis Maximilian Robiespierre. Instead of going on, he turned with her and her relation, and walked up and down the Place with them for half an hour. In one of the houses hard by, a debating society was in the act of canvassing some political question. As they passed to and fro, Robiespierre listened at the door from time to time, and at length, pronouncing the debaters to be all fools together, he rushed in to set them right. From that moment he entered vehemently into all the fiery discussions which preceded the revolution in which he had never taken part before, and grasped at power, which opened the doors of the cage and let out the tiger in his heart.—Thus had the lady not splashed her stocking, she would not have met the future tyrant; he would have pursued his way and would not have turned back to the Place; he would never have heard the debate that first called him into action for he was going to quit Douai the next day, and who can say how that one fact, in the infinite number of its combinations with other things, might have affected the whole social world at present.

—

Man is but a species of chameleon, in general taking all his tints from the things that surround him; but when those fail—like the stalk of balsam plant—his external coloring is affected by that which passes within; and a man's fondness for particular hues, or sounds, or scents, is often no bad indication of the character of his mind. Let no one, however, venture to assert that even a brief half-hour's conversation with another man of strong mind can be a matter of mere indifference—indeed, I know not that it is ever so, with any one, wise or foolish, ugly or pretty, good or bad. We are all nothing but traders in this world, mere hucksters, traveling packmen, with a stock continually changing, increasing, diminishing. We go forth into the world carrying a little wallet of ideas and feelings; and with those with whom we speak for a moment we are trafficking in those commodities. If we meet with a man of wisdom and of virtue, sometimes he is liberal, and supplies us largely with high and noble thoughts, receiving only in return sweet feelings of inward satisfaction; sometimes, on the other hand, he will only trade on equal terms, and if we cannot give him wisdom for wisdom, shuts up his churlish shop and will deal with us no more. If we go to a bad man we are almost sure to be cheated in our traffic, to get evil or useless wares, and often those corrupted things which once admitted to our stock spread the mould and mildew to all around. Often, too often, too in our commerce with others do we pay for the poisons which we buy for antidotes, all that we possess of good, both in feeling and idea. But when we set down by beauty, and gentleness, and virtue, what a world of sweet images do we gain for the little that we can give in exchange! Aye, and even in passing a few light moments with a dear innocent child, how much of bright and pure do we carry away in sensation! how much of deep and high in thought! Oh no! it is no indifferent thing with whom we converse, if ideas be the riches of the spirit.

Congressional News.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

WASHINGTON, JULY 18, 1842.

That disgraceful plan of fraud on the public Treasury, the Armed Occupation of Florida,

has occupied the time of the House all this day. Cost Johnson has resisted this useless and iniquitous measure with an energy and perseverance worthy of success. But the bill passed in a very thin House. Its opposers succeeded in getting an adjournment, pending a motion to reconsider, and I am in hopes that this project of making the nation pay millions of dollars more to create another Slave State, will meet with its deserved reward, a decided defeat. Quite a number of the Northern Democrats were drawn in to vote for this measure, on the plea that it would diminish the public expenditures, and make a high tariff less necessary than before.

The Tariff again—Sugar, Tea, and Coffee

By the by, I omitted to say in its place, that tea and coffee, by the tariff bill, as it passed the House, pay twenty per cent. duty. I am afraid this Congress will not be popular with the ladies of a certain age, be they married or single, on this account. The duties on sugars, in conformity with the petitions of the planters, remain very high. But the corn stalk sugar, before 1850, will nearly drive the slave-grown cane sugar out of the market in the free States; as the yield is 100 quarters to the acre, and the expense of cultivation is much less. And it is rather a curious fact, that the first official publication of the new National Agricultural Society, which is controlled by slave-holders, should be a pamphlet written by an abolitionist, on this corn-sugar, which is destined to act an important part in rendering slavery a more complete bankrupt concern than it now is. I perceive in a New Orleans paper a statement, that in all probability, 600 of the 700 sugar planters of that State would become bankrupt, when the defunct banks wound up their affairs. The paper did not add the cause of this disastrous dependence on the banks, viz: the very large numbers of slaves bought by means of bank facilities, during the "prosperous times" prior to 1838. These debts have never been paid, and they never will be. They hang like an incubus upon the slave-growing and planting sections of the country.

Sundry small Bills,

nearly fifty in number, chiefly private, have passed the Senate. Among them are a bill to provide for the settlement of certain claims for losses in the Florida war! A bill to compromise with the sureties of Samuel Swartwout was also among the list. So also was a contested bill to provide for the publication of our code of U. S. laws in a revised form. It will be ably done, and is very necessary. A part of the Senators were in favor of a general revision of the laws, consolidating all laws relating to the same topic into one, but the majority thought otherwise.

Western Virginia

is deeply agitated with the question of a change in the Constitution of that State, or the creation of a new State in the western half of the old one. The majority of the white population is now west of the Blue Ridge. But the eastern a slave-holding section, under the Constitution of 1832, possesses about two-thirds of the Legislative power. This is very grievous to the more industrious and intelligent free laborers of the west. They are to hold a popular Convention to consider the subject of their wrongs, at Lewisburg, Greenbriar Co., August 1st. And though the question of slavery may not be directly named, it is easy to see that this lies at the foundation of the whole difficulty. And the freemen of western Virginia will not long submit to be ruled by the representatives of slave property.

"Happy and Contented."

Considerable excitement has prevailed in the city for a week past, in consequence of the escape of several very remarkable human cattle, who, "without any provocation," took it in their heads to think themselves MEN, and chose to assert their right to their own bodies and souls, time and earnings, by mysteriously departing without saying a word to their affectionate owners about leave! How strangely "perverse," to flee from their kind-hearted masters who love them so, and would so cheerfully keep them all their lives, free of charge! A Mr. Hayn, who claims one of them, professes $50 worth of love for his welfare—"if caught"—what a phrase for a kind master, in regard to his happy servant! "if caught" in any free State! Perhaps some of your readers may be able to assure the benevolent man of the welfare of his beloved servant; though they may not charge him $50 for the news! Slave property is rapidly losing its value, in the border States, from insecurity; and the late decision of the Supreme Court does not appear to add anything to the safety of their chattels: indeed, it diminishes the practical chance of recovery. The days of the system are numbered.

Yours truly, P. P.

News of the Day.

The Stage Case.—The Cincinnati Gazette of Monday last observes:—The case of Peck and wife vs. Neal, for an injury sustained by overturning the defendant's stage coach, while racing into Mariette last summer, was brought to a close yesterday, and the jury in about half an hour returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $500 damages.

The same paper of Tuesday last says;—The trial of the case of Wm. L. Peck vs. Wm. Neil, the second growing out of the upset of the stage near Marietta last summer, was concluded yesterday, by a verdict for the plaintiff for $3,000 damages. The two verdicts found for this one act of carelessness, amount to $3,500.

One of the good things in Theodore Hook's last, is where, speaking of railroads and steamboats, to both of which he frequently signifies his abhorrence, he says that they annihilate space and time, as the newspapers say, not to mention a multitude of passengers besides.

A dreadful stage accident occurred on the great road between Hancock and Cumberland, on Friday morning about half past 4 o'clock. In descending a very steep mountain called Ware Hill, about [illegible] miles east of Cumberland, the lever that locks the wheel broke, and the horses becoming frightened, ran away. The driver was thrown from his seat, or jumped off behind the coach. Left to themselves the horses ran like fury down the hill, dashing the coach against the mountain and doing great injury to the passengers. One of them, an old Quaker gentleman, was very much injured, and it was feared might not survive. Nine other passengers, and among them a young lady, very much injured, but all were doing well.—N. Y. Tribune.

Drowned.—A scow, in which were two men, a woman, and a horse, was accidentally tipped over in the Hudson, near Ft. Edward, on Tuesday last; and one of the party, Mr. John Morgan, of Moreau, Saratoga county, drowned. Mr. Morgan was a good swimmer, but probably lost his life in rendering assistance to the female—he was a respectable farmer, and formerly well known to the traveling community, as the keeper of a hotel at Lake George.—Sandy Hill Herald.

The Last Victim.—The last case of legal tyranny under the imprisonment for debt law in this county, and probably in this State, occurred on Saturday night the 23d inst. A New Jersey creditor, assuming the appearance of friendship for his intended victim, a resident of New York, gave him a most kind invitation to come over on that day, and remain during the next, (Sunday,) to "eat cherries," and partake of other hospitable entertainment, such as a generous and honest host would be likely to provide for an invited guest. The debtor, accordingly, not expecting of course, to meet with treatment which would disgrace an Arab, for an Arab respects the rites of hospitality, visited his "friend" on Saturday, and lo! found not only his host, but a guest besides himself, in the person of a constable with a writ for his arrest! The writ was served, and the latter brought to the prison and lodged in the dungeon at about 11 o'clock at night, within an hour of the period when the law emancipating debtors from the [illegible] unprincipled Sh[illegible]

We are gratified to [illegible] to say, however, that he was released at the first practicable moment [illegible] there is [illegible] doubt that the Court [illegible] when his case comes up for hearing [illegible] him wholly, such having [illegible] in several other cases, where persons were [illegible] and kidnapped, as he had been. The creditor will, therefore, we trust, be deprived of all the fruit of his most inexpressibly mean and [illegible] and be subjected besides to all the expenses attending it.—Jersey City Ad.

Alligator Hunt.—A party of gentlemen, many of them members of the Savannah Rifle Club, went on an excursion through St. Augustine Creek in the steamer Santee yesterday, and the day being fine for such a purpose, they were successful, killing thirty alligators and wounding fifteen. They brought three to town, the largest of which measured 7 feet 7 inches, and another 7 feet three inches long.—Savannah Republican.

Whale in the Harbor.—We learn from Capt. Tewksbury, that a whale has been playing off the harbor for two or three days past, and has been seen by many persons, some of whom have been very near him. He was just off Pettick's Island this morning. He has been seen also by passengers in the General Lincoln on her regular trips to Hingham. We recommend his whaleship to the particular attention of the Mammoth Cod Association, who are down to-day, and trust they will not consider a whale too small a fish to bob for.—Boston Trans.

Canal Steam-Boat.—We saw yesterday at the dock on Exchange st., a canal-boat fitted up with a steam-boiler. We were informed by the persons on board that she had made several trips between this city and Holley, and that she attained with ease a speed of five miles an hour. To prevent washing the banks, the boat is constructed upon two buoys, shaped like canoes, which run on each side along the whole length of the vessel, leaving the middle vacant. The swell made by the wheel passes through this vacant space, and thus obviates the great objection to the employment of steam on the canals. The boat we understand is to run between this place and Albion. She is called the "Siamese Twins."—Rochester Democrat.

The Wheat Harvest.—From Avon, Mendon, Perrinton, and other towns, we hear that some wheat has been cut. Though there may be some slight loss by rust, we confidently predict that the wheat crop will far exceed any harvest ever before realized in this Genesee Valley.—Rochester Eve. Post.

Creosote in Whiskey.—The recent instance of the sudden death of the police constable in Holborn, has brought to light an adulteration practised, particularly by illicit distillers and venders of whiskey, in the introduction of the creosote, to give the celebrated peat-reek flavor to common spirit. This adulteration, which is of the most noxious nature, is to be feared, is very extensively practised, and should command the utmost vigilance of the excise. Sudden death would be a certain result of its being taken in any quantity, particularly in an excited state of the system.—London paper.

A SINGULAR STORY.

The Concord, (N. H.) Statesman of Friday publishes a most singular deposition, taken before a justice of the peace at Grafton in that state. Hazen Whitcher and David M. Norris depose that on the night of June [illegible], they were watching at the death bed of their neighbor Samuel Mann, of North Benton, in a small room, the situation of which is thus described.

The bed was on the north side, the fire place on the south side, the door way to the kitchen on the east, and a door leading into a bed room on the west end of the room, and a set of drawers on the east side of the room near the foot of the bed, and a window by the foot on the north side.—The window was raised from four to six inches. The door into the kitchen was open, and Mr. George W. Mann slept there in the south east corner of it. The door into the bed room was shut, and Mrs. Peter Howe and Mrs. Mann slept there.

The man with whom they were watching had been in a dying state for several days, but appeared to have perfect possession of his senses. After the house was still on Sunday night, the deposition goes on to say:—

Mr. Whitcher was standing by the foot of the bed, close to the open window, and Mr. Norris was sitting south of the same four or five paces from the head on the west side of the room. The candle was standing on the mantel, over the fire place when we both distinctly heard a groan.—We are both positive it could not come from the sick man, nor the bed whereon he was, nor from another room. It was a deep, lengthened groan, and startled us both.

Mr. Whitcher stepped to the fire place to get the light, to see what the noise came from or what caused it. As he took the light and turned around toward the bed, we both saw the room lighted up all at once with an unearthly crimson colored light.—It almost extinguished the light of the candle, so that the light was very feeble, apparently almost out—and immediately we both saw a strange looking man standing between us and the bed, looking apparently at Mr. Mann—his dress we cannot describe—his whole face we did not see—[illegible] were dark, but we cannot give the fashion of [illegible], nor say whether he had on boots, or shoes or hat, or not.

We were both transfixed—both stood there side by side, as Norris had risen up, Whitcher still holding the candle in his [illegible] and no fire in the fire-place, at least [illegible] any light but [illegible] the strange [illegible] his back towards us, [illegible] Mr. Mann. Mr. Mann [illegible] threw his arms about [illegible] and appeared [illegible] apparition, and [illegible]

[illegible] then declared [illegible] assisted [illegible] man and making away with [illegible]. He mentioned [illegible] in what connection [illegible]. The affidavit then goes on:

He called the other [illegible], and we may be mistaken in this name, but we think we are not. He then sunk down, after turning over once or twice, and throwing his arms about, groaned and died. We know we were frightened and could not speak, or [illegible] the stranger, and as soon as Mann had finished confessing and was dying away, he (the stranger,) was gone.—How he got in or out we know not; one door was open, but we did not see him come in or go out, nor can we believe that he did.

The Editor of the Statesman in connection with the affidavit tells the following story:

About forty, or forty-five years since, (we tell the story as told to us by individuals in the vicinity,) a man by the name of Hodgdon was working in Landaff, N. H., as a joiner. The last season he was there, he finished off a house for Jonathan Noyes, and made his home with Mr. Noyes during the time. He lent Noyes some two or three hundred dollars in money, so that when the house was finished Noyes was indebted to him about four hundred dollars, for labor and money. When Noyes's house was completed, he went to work upon a house for Mr. John Gross, in the vicinity, his clothes and part of his tools still remaining at Noyes's house.

He left Gross's house one evening to go up to Mr. Noyes's—was never seen after that time. Some little excitement existed there, (as the old people say,) at the time, respecting his mysterious disappearance, but as he was a stranger, in a measure, it was said he has absconded, and Noyes soon after pretended to have received a letter from somewhere in New York, requesting him (Noyes,) to sell his (Hodgdon's,) tools, and other things, and send the money on to him, which he accordingly did, but whether the proceeds of the sale went to New York or any where is not known.—The excitement soon died away, and nothing more said or thought about it, until the death-bed confession which we publish below brought the hidden mystery to light.

Noyes died a few days since, and on his death bed, intimated that he had something to disclose before he could die in peace, but Mann went a day or two before his death, and spent a whole day with him, and after that nothing was said about divulging any thing, and he expired, apparently in the greatest mental agony, and under horrible remorse of conscience, frequently exclaiming, O God! forgive me that one sin. The Edwards to whom it is supposed he, (Mann,) referred, and who, many now suppose was accessory to the murder, is now living, and has been partially deranged at times ever since, as well as Mann.

The Philadelphia Gazette states that thousands of dollars worth of silver plate have lately been sent to the Mint in that city to be converted into money. It adds—"It is nothing rare to see gold and silver goblets and other silver plate, taken from the side-board to the mint, thence to the owner's pocket, in the shape of substantial money."

Margaret Dunden, of Java, Erie Co., was committed to prison on the 27th ult., to be tried for administering arsenic to her husband, in consequence of which he died.—He was buried, disinterred, and a post mortem examination held, by which previous suspicions were confirmed.

There has been a great freshet in several of the rivers of Virginia, carrying away bridges, and doing a great deal of other damage. In James River it came in with such a rush that it swept away the clothing of some boys who were bathing, before they could rescue it; and the lads themselves narrowly escaped accompanying their clothes towards the Chesapeake.

The highest point of land in North America, east of the Rocky Mountains, is Mount Mitchell, a peak of the Black Mountain in Buncombe county, North Carolina. It is 6476 feet high by actual measurement. Mount Washington, the highest peak of the White Hills, N. H., is 6428 feet above the level of the sea.

A writer in the Genesee Farmer, advises those who are in the habit of destroying snakes, to let them alone, as they are early risers, and at work in the field by the break of day, picking up those little depredators, the corn worm, which infest corn fields.

Colt's Conviction Confirmed.—The Supreme Court, sitting at Utica, have been employed in hearing the arguments in Colt's case, by Messrs. Morrell and Selden on the part of the prisoner, the District Attorney not being heard. The Court decided that the judgment of Oyer and Terminer be affirmed, and ordered that they proceed to sentence the prisoner. We understand that the case will be carried before the Court of Errors, which meet the last Monday in August, in the city of Albany.

Remedy against Laudanum.—The Cayuga Tocsin, of the 13th inst., states that a lady in Auburn, in a fit of lunacy, took an ounce, or eight hundred drops of the strongest laudanum. Drs. Pitney and W. P. Smith, immediately resorted to the operation of injecting cold water into the stomach, and extracting it, which was repeated until he was satisfied that the whole of the laudanum was extracted. The operation occupied from twenty to thirty minutes. The approaching stupor soon left her, and she immediately recovered, and has not since experienced the slightest effect from the fatal draught.

The Steamer Edna, the explosion of which has been noticed, was loaded chiefly with German emigrants. Thirty-eight of these are known to be wounded, twelve Americans, one French, one Mexican, and two colored people—making sixty-five.

Of these, thirty-six are already dead, and of the rest it is feared that not more than ten or fifteen can recover. The Coroner's jury have given a verdict imputing the disaster to the culpable negligence or bad management of Charles Conner, the second engineer, who was killed by the explosion.

Marriage by Dissenters.—It will be recollected that considerable consternation was not very long since produced in Ireland, by an informal decision that marriages solemnized by clergymen not of the Establishment, were illegal. The case was soon carried to the Queen's Bench of Ireland, where the four judges are equally divided. One of the judges who was in favor of the legality of these marriages, gave way in order that the case might be carried to the House of Lords.

Another Bishop.—The London Christian Ladies' Magazine says:—"The Pope is sending a new Bishop to the East, to oppose the work of God in that quarter.—This is nothing marvelous; but what will our readers think, when they hear the title chosen for this emissary of Rome. The Bishop of Jerusalem, sent from the Church of England, has his diocese marked out, comprising Syria, Chaldea, Egypt, and Abyssinia. None of these titles are applied to the missionary from the seven-hilled city; we find, from the Tablet, the official organ of Romanism in England, that he is styled the Bishop of BABYLON. If he who runs cannot read such a sign as this, he must be blindfolded with no little skill."

Broken Banks and the Safety Fund.—Comptroller Flagg has issued a statement furnishing valuable information respecting the broken banks and the present condition of the Safety Fund.

The contributions on account of the Safety Fund, to 1st of April, 1842, amount to $1,069,142 48. There has been paid, for the redemption of circulating notes of insolvent banks, $918,949—leaving a balance of $150,194 48: notes in circulation of banks against which injunctions have been issued, $1,111,447.

The annual payments to the Safety Fund of half per cent., will produce $127,017; which amount will not be sufficient to redeem the notes of the following banks until after certain periods, as follows: the Commercial Bank of Buffalo, January, 1845; Commercial Bank of Oswego, January, 1847; Watervliet, January, 1848; Clinton County, January, 1849; Lewis County, January, 1849 and '50.

A correspondent of the Kentucky Yeoman gives the following definition of a new court of justice in that section:—

"Reader, the institution known as the Socket Court may not be known to you all, therefore we will give the following explanation. Probably you have heard of a section of country where the people lived by skinning strangers, and when no strangers pass that way, they skin each other. This is done by a decree of the Socket Court. The business of a standing witness is, when a criminal is arraigned before said Court, to testify, by taking in his right hand the tail of an opossum, and tell the truth, the whole truth, and as much more as he can."

Execution of Hardenberg.—The penalty of the law was inflicted upon this miserable man on Wednesday last, at Monticello. His manner exhibited perfect indifference, and he went to the gallows unshrinking and unrepenting, and said he had no secrets or mysteries to disclose.

After the drop fell he hung motionless for about 10 minutes, when a slight shrugging of the shoulders was apparent, but there was no fearful struggle for life, no seeming reluctance, no dread, no fear. He went to the gallows the same in appearance, the same in conversation, the same in manner, that he had been for some time past.

There is now exhibited at the Bowery Amphitheatre under the name of Sea Devil, an enormous specimen of the Ray species of Fish, which was captured last April in the harbor of Charleston, S. C. It weighs 3,780 lbs.; measures 16 feet 6 inches from the mouth to the end of the tail, and 18 feet between the extremities of the pectoral fins, and a mouth 2 feet 10 inches in width. It is certainly a most extraordinary Fish, and is well deserving of a visit, from all those who are curious in natural history. A young one is also exhibited, which is said to have been born after the capture of this monster of the deep.

A splendid building is to be erected by Yale College, at a cost of thirty thousand dollars. It is to contain the different libraries of the college. Both the interior and exterior will be finished in Gothic style, with numerous pinnacles, and made fire-proof. It will be one story high, and consist of a main building and two wings, and to be built of free stone.

On Sunday afternoon, 10th inst., the Congregational Church in New-Canaan, Conn., was struck by lightning. The Sabbath school, of about 150 children and teachers, was then in the house, and six or eight were prostrated by the shock. Only two or three were seriously injured, and none of them dangerously.

Independence.—"Ache away," said the man to the tooth; "you hurt yourself a great deal more than you do me."

From the Abolitionist.

SLAVERY IN THE CAPITAL.—NO. I.

* * * I will begin with a fact of very recent occurrence. It illustrates the working of the slave system in a very common case, so far as the principles involved are concerned. The atrocious result is rather accidental than designed by any of the parties concerned.

GEORGE was a bright "yellow" boy, of perhaps 25 years of age, the property of a young married lady in this city, left to her by will. He was a faithful and trusted servant, to whom his mistress and her family professed, and I will not say they did not feel, all the warm attachment that slaveholders so constantly speak of, as existing between them and good slaves: that is to say, slaves that work hard, ask for little money to spend, and never try to run away, or get their freedom in other forms. George was a kind hearted, affectionate lad, very much respected and loved by the mess who board at his mistress' house; and in all respects his amiable character deserved the regard they felt for him.

One day, this summer, he was missing from the house, and the inquiries and wonderment of the boarders met with looks of confession on the faces of the family, and with half explanations, whispered from ear to ear that George was in prison.

"In prison! For what? We never knew a better boy. What has he done?" was the comments and queries of all. And truly he had done nothing. He was thrust into the Washington city, old jail, not for any crime committed, or suspected; not even for desiring to be free. As he was a slave, he could owe no debts, and, of course, was not liable to that barbarity, imprisonment for being poor! Why was it?

A few words will explain it. The father of his mistress' husband owed a debt to a man named Sims, which he could not conveniently pay. Under the real or pretended impression that George was the old man's slave, Sims seized upon George, under a distress warrant, for the debt, and thrust him into prison till it should be paid, or George sold for the satisfaction of the claim and the jail fees!

N. B. In the District of Columbia, in the city of Washington, a man, nay, women and children, are liable to be thrown into prison, confined at will in a dungeon, on coarse fare, and finally, sold at auction to the highest bidder, not for any crime committed, or debt owed, but for other people's debts, which they had no interest or agency in contracting, and the very existence of which they may never know till they are placed on the auctioneer's table for sale.—Here's republican justice and humanity for you! Here's "progress," "march of mind," and "civilization," for you, that would make the "cannibal Goterah," so heroically murdered by Zion Harris and Rev. George Brown, at the Missionary station of Haddington, in Liberia, blush to own himself a man! But I am wandering from my story. Poor George!

Why did not the tender-hearted woman, his mistress, or her humane husband replevin their human property, and take this attached and faithful servant they loved so, out of jail? Why suffer him to languish in a fetid cell, in the month of June, to the manifest danger of his health, if not his life? They might have done so, by giving a simple replevin bond for the debt.

Two possible reasons exist to show why they did not: one of which, sheer selfish wishes to be free from the expense of him, or the poor vengeance of making Sims pay for his keeping, are hardly supposable. Besides, in the course of a month or so, they did procure from the Prince George's Co. Court the evidence that he was the goods and chattels of the young lady, and of course, not liable for the old man's debts in any case. The only other reason I can think of was, that the jail doors kept him from running away, (if any such ungrateful thought entered his brain,) while the creditor and owner were disputing the question of law, whether he should be sold under the hammer or no! He was kept safe, and at the creditors expense! Ah, there's the secret, if any there be, in so plain a case.

So poor George lay in the jail, closely confined, parched with the burning heat, without any comforts, none to care for his fevered pulse and aching pain, while white people, all very humane and kind hearted, contended whether he should be sold at auction for their debts! All this, of course, was strictly legal, and, therefore, in most people's eyes, perfectly right.

A month rolled away, and George was released from the filthy jail, a weak, emaciated, spiritless boy, too feeble to labor, too lifeless for hope. For two or three days some light services only were required of him, which were slowly and painfully performed. And when he was sent half a mile to the President's house, on an errand, his exhausted frame could not endure it. He was really sick. The humane mistress now proposed to allow him to spend some days with his friends to recruit, but did not perceive that he was not able to walk the mile or two between her house and his mother's humble cottage; and he had no means to pay for a hack, owing to her very benevolent care over all his earnings?

With anguish and lingering steps the sufferer made out to reach the place, and there laid down and died! In three days his mistress learned that the pestilential jail had done its work, and the poor boy was no longer liable for the white man's debts, or the white man's crimes.

It may be a week since the body of George was consigned to its humble resting place, followed by his fellow sufferers in this city of humane slavery, where slavery wears its mildest form, and speaks in its most winning accents!

Who slew him? Who sanction, who sustain the laws, under which GEORGE was judicially MURDERED? Say not that the hard-hearted creditor, or the mistress are to blame alone. True, they might have saved him. Had it been a horse, a writ of replevin would have restored him to good pastures, and a faithful groom. Horses having no souls, and not being "contented and happy," no, nor "kindly treated" as slaves are, would not think of running away! As it is only a colored man, no body here thinks of putting into the papers any thing about the humanity or justice of imprisoning, or even killing one man for another's faults. If he had been WHITE it would have been brought before Congress, and discussed with zeal untiring, and eloquence that might wake the echoes of the tomb. But he was only a colored man! "HOW LONG, O LORD, HOW LONG!"

Yours faithfully, P. P.

A Choral Hymn.—A fine trait of the Germans was recently manifested. Just at sunrise a fleet of canal boats arrived, loaded with several hundreds of German immigrants. As they got into the city, near the packet boat landing, the whole struck up one of their national anthems—the voices of hoary age, vigorous manhood, and tender infancy, floating with those of woman in the glorious harmony. The effect, in the calm dewy morning, and the spires and domes of a silent city just touched with the golden beams of a July sun was almost sublime.—Buffalo Com.

Slavery in New Jersey.—The inhabitants of this State are not, many of them, aware that they live in a slave State. But in point of fact, the principle is as fully recognized in New Jersey as in Georgia.—The laws as they now exist, allow persons removing here to bring all their slaves with them in servitude. They also make the children slaves, born since 1804, servants for life, and secure to persons removing from the State the right to take with them their slaves unmolested. They further require negroes traveling through or in the State, to have certificates of freedom from the clerks of the county courts, and prohibit any person from extending to such as have not such certificate, any acts of hospitality. It is the repeal of these laws that the petitions which have been presented to our legislature pray, so that slavery in every form may cease to be recognized within our borders. The census of 1840, shows the number of slaves in the State to be 658.—Jersey city Gazette.

Silk Business.—In 1840, Pennsylvania paid $101.69 in the form of bounties on silk grown in the state that year. In 1841, the increased production of silk by her citizens was such that the bounties amounted to $4,414,55. In Delaware co., one person cleared upwards of $300 by a single crop of worms. Miss Rapp, of Economy, raised nearly 400 pounds, and drew $1700 from the State Treasury for bounty, a sum which must have more than paid all her expenses.

In Tennessee, the business is making rapid strides. At the last session of the Legislature of that State, a bounty law was passed, allowing a dollar and a half per pound on silk raised and reeled in the State by the same person. Great crops were produced last season. The Rev. Frederick A. Ross, of Hawkins co., made last season 300 lbs. of reeled silk, which sold promptly for $5 per pound. A number of persons have commenced the business this season, and a great product is expected.

Sagacity of a Dog.—On Tuesday last, a young man about [illegible] years of age, residing near Topley's Brook, in Danvers, left his father's house in the morning, with his dog, gun, &c. for the purpose of shooting. At noon the dog entered the house, and appeared in a state of extraordinary agitation, making many motions which were afterward understood to be invitations to follow him, but which at the time occasioned some apprehensions that he was about to suffer an attack of the hydrophobia. Finding that no attention was paid to his wishes, he finally left the house, and was not seen for several hours, when he again entered and recommenced his attempts to induce the family to follow him.

A person then in the house, but who was not there at the dog's previous visit, observing his strange conduct, and learning that it was similar to what had been exhibited before, concluded that there was sufficient "method in his madness" to constitute him a safe companion, and accordingly followed him out to see what would come of it. At first, in his eagerness, the dog ran out of sight of the man who followed him, but being recalled by a whistle, kept himself afterwards only a short distance in advance. The man followed "through brake and through brier," but was rather daunted when the dog plunged into the recess of a swamp. Determined to see it out, however, he went in after him, and there discovered the young man lying upon the ground insensible, and with his face dreadfully shattered by the discharge of his gun. He was taken home immediately, the dog following in triumph, and although, as we learn, still insensible yesterday morning, was not considered in a hopeless condition.—Salem Gazette.

Impeachment.—We copy the following from a Washington correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune; we trust it is correct.—Nothing would gratify Mr. Tyler more than to be impeached, in the present state of things at Washington.

A great effort seems to be making in some quarters to create the belief that the President is to be impeached, &c. &c. It is scarcely necessary to say to you that this is mere nonsense, and believed here by no men of sense. True, Mr. Botts did threaten something of the sort; but even if he intended it as more than a joke, I am sure that none of the Whigs consider it in any other light. The Whig party have a surer and better mode of attaining their end than by atempting to do any such thing as that. That such an end will be at last attained seems now almost certain.

BANK NOTE LIST.

Notes redeemed by the Comptroller at the following rates:

	Stock Act.	Stock & Est. Act.
Binghamton Bank,	69	74
Cattaraugus Co. Bk.,	85	77
Bank of Lodi,	83	97
Bank of W. N. Y.	75
Bank of Com. Buffalo.	73
U. S. Bank, do.		77
Mechanics' Bank do.		60
Erie Co. Bank, do.	72	60
Phœnix Bank, do.		73
Bank of America do.		[illegible]
Merchant's Ex. Bk. do.	75	63
Union Bank, do.	81	95
Towanda Bank,	68
Tenth Ward Bank.	94
Farmer's Bk. Seneca co.	par	74
Miller's Bank, Clyde,	par	[illegible]

Banks whose notes are not redeemed by the Comptroller.

Allegany Co. Bank,
Buffalo,
Com. Bk. Buffalo,
Staten Island Bank,
Bank of Olean.
Washington Bank,
James Bank.
St. Lawrence Bank,
Com. Bk. Oswego,
Clinton Co. Bank

Notes of all other Banks received at par.

We learn from the Buffalo Com. Adv. that the notorious Alexander McLeod was in the city on Friday last, and met with a rough reception at the hands of a parcel of loafers led on by one John McBrien. No violence was actually offered, but the loafers followed McLeod up street for some distance, loading him with abusive epithets and making threatning gestures, till, to escape them, he took refuge in a store, whence he quietly departed for the cars.

How the State may make money.—The State of New York is possessed of over half a million of acres of land in this State, which might be made available if proper measures were pursued to make them so. The land is now almost useles for want of roads. $200,000 laid out in the next four years in making roads through Montgomery and Hamilton counties, would insure a return to the State of about $5 for $1 laid out. We hope this subject will not be neglected by our next Legislature.

Notices.

TEMPERANCE HOUSE.

Mr. Asa C. Potter has opened a Temperance House at the State Bridge, in Verona, where he will be ready at all times to wait on those who give him a call, in good style, and on reasonable terms.

ALFRED ACADEMY,

AND

TEACHER'S SEMINARY.

W. C. Kenyon, Principal.
Miss Caroline B. Maxson, Preceptress.

LECTURES

On Phrenology and Physiognomy.—Drs. J. R. HARTSHORN, and E. RIDER.

On School Teaching.—LUKE G. MAXSON.

On Chemistry and Geology.—W. C. KENYON.

Lectures on other subjects as occasion may require.

This Institution is pleasantly located in the county of Allegany, fifteen miles South-East of Angelica, and six miles South of Almond. From its retired and quiet situation, it presents a favorable opportunity to parents to place their sons and daughters under a moral influence that will not be counteracted by those with whom they may associate.

The patronage which it has hitherto enjoyed, has been so liberal as to warrant very considerable expenditures in rendering it still more worthy of a more extended patronage; and it is hoped that it will, under its present organization, be rendered inferior to no similar Institution in Western New York.

The qualification of Common School Teachers will receive particular attention, so as to render them thorough and practical instructors of youth.

The Academic Year.—Is divided into three terms of fifteen weeks each. 1st, Commencing Wednesday 17th August, 2d, 7th December; 3d, 4th April, 1843.

Vacations.—At the expiration of the first and second Terms, one week each; at the expiration of the 3d Term, five weeks.

Tuition.—Varying with Instruction, from $3,50 to $4,75 per term.

Board.—From $1 to $2, depending on accommodations. Rooms in the Institution, furnished with Cook Stoves, can be had at a moderate expense.

SAMUEL RUSSELL, Esq., Prest.
Alfred, July, 1842.

PROPOSALS

To publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and [illegible] including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, [illegible] number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else [illegible] their history.

[illegible] may be addressed to the [illegible] S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y.

LIST OF LETTERS.

W. [illegible] arrearages are paid. A. A. F. Randolph, A. Maxson.

LIST OF RECEIPTS.

Of A. Maxson, $5, [illegible] Joseph Green, [illegible] Maxson, $2 each. Charles Potter, $1 [illegible]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Economy is the road to Wealth.

JAMES M. LETTS, would inform his friends and customers, and the public generally that he has removed his Tailoring Establishment, to the building occupied by Eli A. Gage as a Hat Store, where he will be ready at all times to attend to cutting and making all manner of clothing as cheap as can be done in the village or county. Military work done in the latest and most approved fashion. Ladies Habits, and Coat Dresses Cut to order, at short notice. All work done at this establishment, shall be warranted to fit.

De Ruyter, July 1st 1842.

FLOUR, PROVISIONS, GROCERIES, and six hundred other things, for sale by 11tf
May 11. HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

BOOK BINDING.

THE subscriber having connected a BINDERY with his printing establishment, is now ready to execute all kinds of Binding in a neat and durable manner, on as reasonable terms as at any other establishment in this section of country.

JAMES BAILEY.
De Ruyter, June 8th 1841.

THE FARMER'S EXCHANGE is the place to buy Goods CHEAP. Oct. 20, 1841.
31tf S. G. WALKER.

IMPORTANT WORK!

NOW IN THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION,

A DICTIONARY OF

Arts, Manufactures, and Mines,

Containing a clear exposition of their PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.

BY ANDREW URE, M. D., F. R. S., M. G. S.,
M. A. S. Lond., Mem. Acad. N. S.
Philad., S. Ph. Soc. N. Germ.
Hanov., Mulii, &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings.

THIS is unquestionably the most popular work [illegible]

[illegible]

STOVES.

COLD WINTER IS COMING!

[illegible]

Fancy Parlor Stoves,

[illegible] TOWN [illegible] STATE. Most kinds of Produce [illegible] CASH [illegible]

BRASS AND TIN WARE

Of every description, which he keeps constantly on hand and offers at [illegible]

LOW PRICES

[illegible] LEAKY

Eave Troughs

[illegible]

JUST RECEIVED

[illegible]

JOB WORK

[illegible] La Fayette Block [illegible]

REMOVAL.

J[illegible]

20 [illegible] STONE STORE

Not 25 or 50 per cent Reward.

S. G. WALKER

HAS [illegible] NEW GOODS, which he [illegible] to sell as CHEAP, if not cheaper than can be bought at any other establishment in De Ruyter. Among his assortment may be found Dry Goods, Dry Groceries, Crockery, Hardware, &c. Leghorn and Palm-Leaf hats, and a variety of other things too numerous to mention.

Hear ye!! Hear ye!! all persons wishing to buy goods CHEAP will please call at the Farmer's Exchange, and examine the quality and prices of his goods before purchasing elsewhere, and, Hear ye again!! any one having a little "Safety Fund" and inclined to S. G. Walker, will please call and deposit.

De Ruyter, May 28, 1842.

"Hard times and money scarce,"

IS the general complaint, and economy is the object of every person.

SUTTON & QUINBY have just opened a large assortment of Dry Goods, Groceries, Crockery, Paints, Oils and Dye-Stuffs. Persons wishing to make purchases are invited to call, as we feel confident that our Low Prices and Good Goods must give general satisfaction.

May 24 SUTTON & QUINBY.

BOOKS & STATIONERY.

SCHOOL BOOKS, of all descriptions, Miscellaneous Books & Stationery, at the Book Store of HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

De Ruyter, May 11, 1842. 11v3tf

50 PIECES BROAD CLOTHS, CASSIMERES, SATINETTES, at reduced prices at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

POETRY.

From the Leeds (Eng.) Northern Star.

A Starvation Anthem.

FOR THE ROYAL CHRISTENING.

Bring forth the babe in pomp and lace,
While thousands starve and curse the light;
But what of that! on royal face,
Shame knows no blush, however slight,
Bring forth the babe—a nation's moans
Will ring sweet music in its ear,
For well we know a nation's groans
To royal ears were always dear.

Bring forth the babe—down, courtiers, down!
And bow your lackey knees in dust
Before a child's beslobbered gown;
Our children can not find a crust.
When Christ was born, no servile throng
Around the Savior's manger met;
No flatterers raised their fulsome song—
But what was Christ to Alfred's pet!

God, who has heard the widow's moan—
God, who has heard the orphan's cry—
Thou, too, dost sit upon a throne,
But none round thee with famine die.
Things like this babe of royal birth,
Who boast their "princely right divine,"
Are but thy parodies on earth;
Theirs is oppression—mercy thine.

Bring forth the babe! from foreign lands
Fresh kingly vampires flock to greet
This new one in its nurse's hands—
(For royal mothers give no teat;)
Bring forth the toy of princely whim,
And let your prayers mount night and day,
For ought we not to pray for him
Who'll prey on us enough some day!

Oh! who would grudge to squander gold
On such a glorious babe as this!
What though our babes are starved and cold,
They have no claims to earthly bliss;
Ours are no mongrel—German breed,
But English born and English bred;
Then let them live and die in need,
While the plump Coburg thing is fed.

Christen the babe, Archbishop proud;
Strange servant thou of lowly Christ!
Thousands are to your purse allowed,
For Him the smallest loaf sufficed.
Though holy water's scanty now,
My lord you may dismiss your fears;
Take to baptize the infant's brow,
A starving people's bitters.

Miscellaneous Department.

From the Mother's Magazine.

ALICE W.—A FRAGMENT.

The bright, the beautiful, the joyous Alice W.! would that I could show her to you as last I saw her, and as she ever was, the centre of attraction, the beloved of all hearts. I imagine that I see her now; her tall graceful form—her smiling countenance—her bright and flashing eye—the dark brown ringlets hanging in rich profusion round her shoulders, and dancing in sympathy with her airy step.

From her childhood, Alice had known no real sorrow. In early life, her mother, owing to a feeble constitution and adverse circumstances, had been subject to grief, and indeed had acquired the habit of looking on the dark side of every event. As a natural consequence, her hours of sadness were many; yet, conscious of the importance of other views and feelings, she struggled against the gloomy tendencies of her nature and circumstances; and so successful was she, that at the time of her marriage the closest observer would have failed to detect this fault in her character. On the birth of Alice, her determination was formed so to train her as to prevent, if possible, the tendency to gloom and despondency which had so often embittered her own life. "Not that I can change her nature," said she to her husband, as they were one day conversing on the proper course to be pursued in relation to their only child, "but I think I may do much towards cultivating in her a uniform happy frame of feeling—at least, it shall never be said that our dear Alice learned of her mother to look with gloomy despondency either upon the works of the Creator or on the dispensation of his Providence."

And this resolution the mother of Alice sacredly kept. She made it her study to give her child bright and happy ideas of every thing about her. Nor was she unsuccessful. In after years, Alice was wont to say, that seldom if ever, did she see a tear in her mother's eye, save when some misconduct of her own called it there; and that she never met her, from the first kind salutation in the morning, till she bent over her for the parting kiss at night, without a smile upon her face. "If I went to my mother," said she, "with a tale of trouble, she had always some alleviating circumstance to point out, which in my sorrow I had overlooked. If I was sad, she cheered me with some amusing story, or direct my sympathies in active exertions for the comfort and alleviation of others. But her chief preventive against melancholy tendencies was the observation and study of the works of nature. She believed that a knowledge and love of those works would ensure our happiness, as they demonstrated so clearly the kindness of our heavenly Father towards us. From every bud and every blossom she taught me a lesson of joy. When I mourned, as I sometimes did, at the unsatisfying nature of all things terrestrial, almost before I missed her, she would bring from the garden its choicest productions, and by means of a magnifying glass would point out to me their varied and matchless beauties.—'No imperfection here, my dear Alice,' she would say, 'nothing incomplete, even in the smallest flower. Here is skill, beauty, finish, of the highest order.' And when the lesson was thoroughly learned, and my attention was taken from my sadness, she would speak of Him who thus in the minutest operations of his hand exhibited such infinite and varied excellence. Thus she gently led me to the admission of the still more important truth, that the dispensations of the divine Providence might be as perfect; and hence there was sufficient ground, even from the light of nature, to confide in Him in all the varied scenes of life."

And Alice was worthy of such a mother. Her life was a beautiful comment upon the instructions she had received. Her heart was ever gladsome—her step always light—her voice as joyous as the morning song of the birds. With a mind well stored and disciplined, she roved in the intellectual world, as free and happy as in the natural. Was it strange that the companions of her youth exulted in her friendship? She was first in every innocent sport among them. None could be unhappy where she was, and cold must have been the heart that did not go forth in love and kindness towards her.

* * * * * *

"Good evening, Alice," said Henry M, as he bounded into the summer-house where she was sitting. "What! in tears! weeping, Alice, what can have occurred to cloud the brow which has ever been the abiding-place and throne of sunny joy?—Are you sick, Alice? Tell me," said he, seating himself by her side, "you have promised to hide nothing from me."

"Nor will I, Henry," said the sobbing girl; "you have a right to know, and you shall know the cause of my grief. Nothing has occurred to trouble me. Myself, Henry, is the cause of my trouble. I have for the first time in my life been looking into my heart, and its hitherto hidden evils grieve and alarm me."

"Evils in your heart! my dear Alice; as well might yonder moon complain of deformity in her beautiful face this glorious evening, as you of wrong in heart. I will not believe it. You are sick, Alice; or—perhaps, I am the cause of those tears.—Have I done aught to grieve you?"

"Nothing, Henry—nothing, I assure you, nor am I ill; but my sorrow springs from conscious wrong. Do not interrupt me, and I will tell you all. Yesterday, as I was walking through our favorite woods, I amused myself with recalling the past incidents of my life—my joyous childhood—my happy days at school—the weeks of continual pleasure which I passed at home—the love of my father—the fondness and assiduous care of my mother; and then, Henry, your friendship—and so bright did my course seem, that involuntarily I asked, whence all these blessings—all these joys? I thought as I never thought before, of the Author of my being, the source of all this happiness; and he seemed to stand before me and charge me with ingratitude. Henry, it is true—too true, I have been—I am guilty of ingratitude towards my heavenly Father and Benefactor."

"Alice!" exclaimed Henry, "you astonish me. Who could require of you, with any show of reason, more in return than you have given? Your whole life has been a round of goodness. How often have I heard you speak with unbounded admiration of the Creator and his works. Your kindness of heart towards your fellow-creatures is without limit; and think you that He who is all mercy will reproach and condemn one so uniformly good?"

"Ah! Henry," said Alice, "you cannot deceive me if you would. True, my admiration has been called forth, as an intellectual being, towards the beauty and perfection which reign throughout the creation; and I have even rejoiced in the Author of that beauty and perfection. But then, I have worshipped him as infinite intelligence, not loved him as infinite moral excellence—much less have I regarded him as having claims upon me. But what would you say, Henry, were I to treat a fond and watchful parent as I have treated God? would you call me a grateful daughter? Suppose I disliked to think of her—suppose I avoided her presence, and all that could remind me of my dependence upon her, and obligations to her; what qualities could then compensate for such unkindness and ingratitude? and yet I have thus treated him to whom I am a thousand times more indebted than to my dear mother. I am conscious that I do not love the character of God, nor do I yield my heart to his holy law. Call me amiable, kind, generous, what you please; what true excellence of character has one who is without the love of God? And then, Henry, without that love, who can hope to be happy hereafter? Will God, think you, admit me to his glorious and holy presence, much as I admire the wonders, the magnificence and beauty of his works, unless I love him? No my dear Henry, no; I feel that love is beyond admiration. I feel that that heart only is right and susceptible of true joy, which, while it exults in wide-spread glories of infinite wisdom and power, can bow in homage and delight to infinite Justice and Mercy—which, while it lifts up its voice and exclaims, 'How wonderful are thy works, O God!' can, at the same time, and with sincere joy, utter the sentiment of the divine Saviour, 'thy will be done.' Henry, from this hour my purpose is formed. I will not cease to study and admire the works of my Creator and Benefactor; but I will also love his law—his government and character. Through the atoning sacrifice of the cross, I make my peace with him. I expect soon to be yours before the altar of God; but before that day of joy comes, will you bow with me before another altar? I am willing to be yours—but first let us both be God's.

THE DAUGHTER'S BURIAL.

Summer had come. The wild flowers of early spring were withered beneath the sun's scorching blaze, and sending forth on the gentle wings of the wind the sweet fragrance of their departure. They had sprung upwards from the earth's bosom, as the time heralds of summer's more gorgeous splendor, had staid one short month, and were gone. The wild flowers are my favorites, for in them I read a portrayer of human life. Their countless variety, the loveliness and simplicity of some and the majestic grandeur of others, their changeless fragrance and beauty, their early bloom, their drooping and dying just upon the confines of winter, like the last lingering and spirit-broken survivor of a past generation,—all mirror forth to the mind that is accustomed to read in the great book of nature, the semblance of life.

Did the reader ever stop from his journeyings to pass the sabbath in any one of the villages that repose so quietly among the Green mountains? If he has, the story of their unbroken stillness not to be told, for once enjoyed, it stamps itself upon the heart and forms a bright spot in one's life, to which memory loves to lead back the soul in after years, to throw around it again its hallowed influence.

But what means this? Why this measured and solemn walking in the street ere the sun be down? Why this gathering at a neighbor's house with such looks of sorrow? Ah! a funeral! I too went forth and mingled with the multitude in their sympathy for the bereaved, for whose heart has not felt its pangs? and, once felt, what bosom can hold back the deep fountain that swells up from the hidden recess of the soul.

The pastor ended his words of exhortation and prayer—kindred and friends sung a song for the lost one—when the black and mournful bier, borne upon men's shoulders, moved from the house of the deceased to the place appointed for all the living. 'Twas a little place we stood beside, yet it was a first born's. We have seen the aged die and gathered unto his fathers like a shock of corn fully ripe in its season—we have seen the middle aged in their strength and glory laid low in death, and there were tears mingled with the damp earth that covered them—but they were not those bitter, scalding tears that wring a mother's heart when the severing of earth's dearest tie is felt. The shade of six summers had scarcely crimsoned the cheek of this beloved daughter, ere the hand of fell disease grappled strongly its victim, and in a few brief hours of burning fever she that was prattling with her brother on the lawn had ceased to be.

The father stood there in strength and manliness, but his heaving bosom and the stealing tear told but too plainly of the struggling within. The mother was there. She was a young mother, yet was bowed down with grief and anxious watching; but it seemed as though she had nerved herself to come and see the end. When the sexton had laid the turf upon the little mound and leaned upon his spade, she turned away, and a light was upon her countenance, as if the angel spirit of her daughter had come back from heaven to whisper to her of an immortal union in the place of the holy, where separation will no more come forever. Then I went to my room to think how often he that knoweth what is best for us takes the little flowers, even the opening buds, that are too tender for earth, to transplant in a more genial soil on the banks of the river of life.—Literary Harvester.

PRAIRIE FLOWERS.

The following sketch of the Prairie Flowers is from a western paper:

The vegetable kingdom here appears to differ from that of the timber almost as much as the animal race. Each variation of soil has its own species of grass and herbs, although some are common over the whole region. Among its different productions, the rosin weed is the most remarkable, on account of the property ascribed to it of ranging its leaves due north and south, so that the first settlers profess to have determined their course by it in cloudy weather, as if by a compass.

From May until late in the fall the prairie is one vast bed of flowers; which, enjoying so much sun, are painted in the brightest colors. In the sea of green verdure, these of every hue of the rainbow, sparkle like so many gems. In the midst of all this variety however, each floral period which lasts about a month, has its own favorite and reigning flower; though thousands of others are interspersed in small quantities. No sooner does one species begin to fade than another commences to unfold its fresh and radiant glories. And thus does every moon, during the long flowering season shine upon a different succession of these verdant beauties.

The whole vegetable kingdom here, like the race of animals, is of a very innocent character. You may wade up to your shoulders in grass for a week, and you will not encounter a burr. No scent, either fœtid or odorous, ever salutes the nostrils.—There are no bitter or nauseous herbs which the cattle refuse to eat. Amidst all the endless variety of vegetables, I question whether there is a single poisonous herb.—Thus, the peaceful tribes of these abodes enjoy all the sweets of vegetation without any of its alloy, and all its beauties without any mixture of deformity. And it is the perfect innocence of their inhabitation, I conjecture, that renders them innocent too. No dizzy heights or yawning depths ever affright them; no rough crags nor frowning precipices habituate their eyes to the sight of blood and suffering, or their ears to the terrifying but intoxicating draughts of screams and moans of pain; no rough or uneven breaks in the ground around them ever mingle with their perceptions of the beauties of nature, but they are as ignorant of all these things as they are of language or thought. Born in the season of flowers and cradled in the softest lap of nature, their fiercest propensities are early soothed by the circumstances which surround them. During their whole existence their skies are the brightest—their suns the most gorgeous. The surface over which they move is as regular and unbroken as if levelled by the roller; and the morning opens to them a firmament above, and a kingdom below, upon which spring yearly lavishes his most charming embellishments, and autumn, from his golden horn ushers a profusion of sweets. In such an element of things, how could any creature be so viscious, unless its nature were totally so? How could darkness dwell under so much light; or an evil disposition under so much loveliness and joy.

IDLENESS.

Up and be doing, my friends! up and be doing! Idleness is a sad thing. What? have we feet, and shall we not walk?—Have we hands, and shall we not work?—We have more to do than we shall ever accomplish, if we are industrious; how then shall we get through if we are idle? Every bird building her nest, every spider weaving her web, every ant laying up for the winter, is a reproach to an idle man.—Up and be doing, I say! and do not expect the pot to boil while you let the fire go out. We must climb the hill to view the prospect; we must sow the seed to reap the harvest: we must crack the nut to get at the kernel. I cannot bear your tattling, talking, interfering busy-bodies, attending to the affairs of others, and leaving their own duties undone; but yet, it is a sad failing to go to sleep when we ought to be wide awake; to be creeping and crawling like snails, when we ought to be bounding forward like greyhounds. It is a sad thing, I say, and we ought to be ashamed of it. I have known blind men, and lame men, who, without an eye to see with, or a foot to stand upon, have done more for the good of their neighbors than many of us who have the use of all our faculties. Then, up and be doing, and let not the grass grow under your feet! Though the flesh be weak, if the spirit be willing, you will not be nappy in standing still. If you cannot hew wood, you may draw water. If you cannot preach in public, you can pray in private, and be striving to enter in, rather than waiting to be carried through, the straight gate that leadeth unto life. Let us not complain of poverty, with a mine of gold under our feet—let us not die of thirst, with a fountain of living waters, within our reach. If we have health and strength, let us work for the bread that perisheth; and having the means of grace, let us be diligent to obtain that bread that is eternal.

WOMAN'S INFLUENCE.—Like the olive tree—said to fertilize the surrounding soil—there are some few ministering angels in female's guise among us all, and about our paths, who sweetly serve to cheer and adorn life. Our amusements are insipid unless they contribute to them; our efforts of noblest ambition feeble, unless they applaud—its rewards valueless, unless they share them! There are, too, some rude spirits in the world, whose bolder nature female influence admirably serves to refine and temper; and perhaps it is not extreme eulogium of the poet—that without that influence many a man had been a 'brute indeed!'—The concurrence of both sexes is necessary to the perfection of our being, as to the existence of it; man may make a fine melody; but woman is also required, to make up harmony.

THE BIBLE.—As far as our species are concerned, we may say, one sun! one Bible! Shut that glorious book. Blot out from human memory what we have learned from its pages, and you quench the day-spring. We lie in darkness. To guilty, miserable man, there remains no Savior!—no heaven! no guide in life! The grave becomes a fathomless abyss, and eternity spreads around him like the ocean—dark illimitable, fearful! But open now again that book, and lo, the Sun of Righteousness arises with healing in his wings, and all around us and above us is love, and joy, and hope.

TOO GOOD TO BE LOST.—An old miser in New-England owning a farm, found it impossible one day to do his work without assistance, and accordingly offered any man food for performing the requisite labor.—A half-starved pauper hearing of the terms, accepted. Before going into the fields in the morning, the farmer invited his help to breakfast; after finishing the morning meal the old skin-flint thought it would be saving time if they should place the dinner upon the breakfast. This was readily agreed to by the unsatisfied stranger, and dinner was soon despatched. "Suppose now," said the frugal farmer, "we take supper; it will preserve time and trouble you know?"—"Just as you like," said the eager eater, and at it they went. "Now we will go to work," said the satisfied and delighted employer. "Thank you," replied the laborer, "I never work after supper."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

LIST OF LETTERS

REMAINING in the Post Office at De Ruyter June 30, 1842.

Allen Britton	Haskins Leander
Bentley E. A. Mrs.	Johnson Abira
Baker Sally A. Miss	Kinney Nathan
Barnard Daniel	Lewis L. E. Mrs.
Bogardus Isaac R.	Snow Harvey
Babcock Thos. E.	Seyman Benjamin
Curtis Lurana Mrs.	Sherwood Adah E.
Carr Thomas	Squares Ethan
Derbashire James	Shaver Harvey
Griswold Sherman S.	Terney John
Hagan Jane	Winons Stephen
Holmes Arza	Wooley Peter R.

M. SPEAR, P. M.

BOOTS! BOOTS! SHOES! SHOES!!

AT the sign of the Mammoth Boot, manufactured invariably of leather tanned in "cold liquor." Please call.

PROSPECTUS of the FARM HOUSE OF THE XIX CENTURY, or ENCYCLOPEDIA OF PRACTICAL AGRICULTURE, [illegible]

NO IMPOSITION.

NO STATES PRISON WORK!

[illegible]

De Ruyter, May 20, 1842.

JOB PRINTING.

BOOKS, Pamphlets, Way-Bills, Hand-Bills, Cards [illegible]

L. W. BLISS' Window Sash, Blinds [illegible]

J. N. ELMORE, Manufacturers' Agent.

October 4.

LOTS OF HATS & CAPS on hand—Fashionable and Old Fashioned, Bell Crowned and Low Crowned; and, to crown all, we are out of Fashion, Cash and most kinds of stuff received in payment, by HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

SILK! SILK! SILK!!!

A BEAUTIFUL assortment of plain figured and striped, just received and for sale very cheap at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

"A nimble sixpence is better than a slow shilling."

SPRING GOODS! SPRING GOODS!

CHEAP! CHEAP!! CHEAP!!!

THE undersigned are receiving a large assortment of goods suitable for the spring and summer trade, and invite their customers and the public generally to call and examine them at the one price store.

SUTTON & QUINBY.

Notice.

ALL persons who are indebted to the subscriber, either in accounts or notes, are requested to call and settle immediately and save cost.

De Ruyter, June 20, 1842.

JAMES M. LETTS.

THE FARMER'S EXCHANGE is the place to buy Goods CHEAP. Oct. 20, 1841.

S. G. WALKER.

How to make money,

IN the study of mankind and of the Yankee Nation [illegible] NEW GOODS [illegible] ELMORE'S [illegible] "Fortune's Favorites."

May 20

Of Drugs and Medicines,

THE subscriber keeps a much larger stock and [illegible] lower than those who advertise [illegible]

J. N. ELMORE.

[illegible] STONE STORE.

NEW TAILORING ESTABLISHMENT.

THE subscriber would inform the Citizens of De Ruyter and vicinity, that he has opened a shop in the [illegible] of S. G. Walker's store, [illegible] where he may at all times be found [illegible] that garments made [illegible] New York City.

N. B. Garments cut and warranted if made by competent workmen. New York Spring and Summer Fashions just received by W. P. GUEST.

De Ruyter, April 25th, 1842.

FLOUR! FLOUR! FLOUR!!!

SUPERFINE Flour for sale at the Farmers' Exchange, put in good order in barrels and half barrels. Said Flour is made from the best of western wheat, at one of the best mills in the state.

S. G. WALKER.

De Ruyter, April 13th, 1842.

BLANKS! BLANKS!!

JUSTICES Blanks, Farm and Mortgages, &c., just printed and for sale at this office.

De Ruyter, April 1842.

TEAS, SUGARS,

[illegible] NEW YORK CASH STORE.

500 PAIRS Boots and Shoes for sale at the STONE STORE.

May 20

AGENTS FOR THE REGISTER.

NEW-YORK.

Adams—Charles Potter, H. H. Baker, Joel Spencer.

[illegible]

CONNECTICUT.

[illegible]

NEW-JERSEY.

[illegible]

PENNSYLVANIA.

[illegible]

VIRGINIA.

[illegible]

OHIO.

Bloomfield—Charles Clarke.

Northampton—Samuel Babcock, B C Church.

Port Jefferson—Lewis A. Davis.

[illegible]

MICHIGAN.

Oporto—Job Tyler.

Tallmadge—Bethuel Church.

WISKONSAN.

Milton, Rock Co.—Joseph Goodrich, P. M. Stillman Coon.

IOWA.

Fredonia, Louisa Co.—M. Wheelock.

ILLINOIS.

Tremont, Perma Co.—James Dunham.

The Seventh-day Baptist Register

IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY,

AT DE RUYTER, MADISON CO., N. Y.,

BY

JAMES BAILEY.

TERMS.—To village subscribers who have the paper left at their doors, $2 25, in advance, or $2 50, at the expiration of the year.

To office and mail subscribers, $2 IN ADVANCE.

Each communication, involving facts and intended for insertion in the paper, must be accompanied by a responsible name.

No subscription received for a less term than six months.

All subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, will be considered as wishing to continue their subscription, and their paper will be continued until all arrearages are paid except at the discretion of the publisher.

Advertisements inserted on the most reasonable terms.

All letters and communications to ensure attention should be addressed to the publisher free of postage.

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.

VOL. III.—NO 23.] JAMES BAILEY, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.—— A. H. BURDICK, PRINTER [WHOLE NO. 127.

Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,——The SEVENTH DAY is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.—COMMANDMENT.——If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments.—Jesus Christ.

TWO DOLLARS IN ADVANCE,] DE RUYTER, N. Y., FOURTH-DAY, AUGUST 3, 1842. [PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Original Papers.

For the Register.

To the Delegates attending the General Conference at its approaching Anniversary.

Aside from the mere results of chance, no action can be efficient without thought; and in no other case does this truth apply with greater weight than to the action of a deliberative assembly, convened for the consideration of subjects identified with the advancement or decline of the Church—an assembly convened to legislate for the upbuilding of the kingdom of Christ! for the consummation of the highest purpose of Divine Wisdom! Is this the place, then, for the exhibition of hasty and irrelevant debate? for the raising of collateral issues growing out of the jealousy of private interests? this the place to cherish prejudices originating even in the circumstances of locality or kindred? God forbid that the triumph of christian principles shall be retarded by such unworthy labors!

All are ready to acknowledge that by unity much can be accomplished; but the great trouble is, to come at that unity. So long as truth is the basis upon which a point is to be established, & men will fail to search diligently for it, so long will there be inefficient action and contention. But so long as there is in the human mind a leaning towards the perception of truth, will it be possible to unite in any great question, or as nearly so, as different minds are similarly constituted. How important, then, that we give earnest heed to questions involving in a great measure the salvation of souls and the prosperity of the Church.

These thoughts are here presented in the hope that attention will be directed to this subject, and that the time is not far distant when brethren will attend our annual meeting prepared to act rather than to learn, and afterwards repent of having acted.

A few words by way of suggestion.—The practice of indiscriminately commissioning men to preach, so prevalent among our churches, is looked upon by many as an evil, and as tending to fasten upon us that reproach which we are now striving—and with some effect—to cast off; and which must be wiped away before the truth can be successfully presented through our instrumentality as a denomination. Would not the consideration of this subject come within the proper limits of controversy at the General Conference?

One word more, respecting the Conference itself; a remarkable feature of which is, that while it is professedly no other than a business meeting, its precious hours are divided and almost wasted, or crowded into the extremities of each day by a redundancy of preaching. On the score of self-gratification alone, this would be very desirable; but until the purposes of the Conference are essentially changed, no one has a right to attend with the expectation of finding fault with the frequency of "business meetings." If there must be preaching, let the sermons have reference particularly to the objects of the Conference, but in no instance to interrupt the business for which it was solely convened. A part of its business is to secure for the benevolent objects of the day, the interest and action of all the churches. How, I ask, is this to be effected, if the meetings of the societies having these objects in charge, are to be crowded into a few hours, while the better portion of the day is devoted to matters which have no reference to such objects? It is believed by many, that by infusing more vitality into the meetings of the Societies, the general interest of the Conference will be greatly increased.

F.

Religious Department.

A SHORT AND EASY METHOD WITH DEISTS.

BY REV. CHARLES LESLIE, M. A.

(Letter to a Friend.)

DEAR SIR,—You are desirous, you inform me, to receive from me some one topic of reason, which shall demonstrate the truth of the Christian religion, and at the same time distinguish it from the impostures of Mahomet, and the heathen deities: that our Deists may be brought to this test, and be obliged either to renounce their reason and the common reason of mankind, or to admit the clear proof, from reason, of the revelation of Christ: which must be such a proof as no impostor can pretend to, otherwise it will not prove Christianity not to be an imposture. And you cannot but imagine, you add, that there must be such a proof, because every truth is in itself one: and therefore one reason for it, if it be a true reason, must be sufficient; and, if sufficient, better than many: because multiplicity creates confusion, especially in weak judgments.

Sir, you have imposed a hard task upon me: I wish I could perform it. For, though every truth be one, yet our sight is so feeble that we cannot always come to it directly, but by main inferences and laying of things together. But, I think, that in the case before us, there is such a proof as you desire, and I will set it down as shortly and as painly as I can.

I suppose then that the truth of the Christian doctrines will be sufficiently evinced, if the matters of fact recorded of Christ in the Gospels are proved to be true; for his miracles, if true, establish the truth of what he delivered. The same may be said with regard to Moses. If he led the children of Israel through the Red Sea, and did such other wonderful things as are recorded of him in the book of Exodus, it must necessarily follow that he was sent by God: these being the strongest evidences we can require, and which every Deist will confess he would admit, if he himself had witnessed their performance. So that the stress of this cause will depend upon the proof of these matters of fact.

With a view, therefore, to this proof, I shall proceed,

I. To lay down such marks, as to the truth of matters of fact in general, that, where they all meet, such matters of fact cannot be false: and,

II. To show that they all do meet in the matters of fact of Moses and of Christ; and do not meet in those reported of Mahomet and of the heathen deities, nor can possibly meet in any imposture whatsoever:

I. The marks are these:

1. That the fact be such as men's outward senses can judge of:

2. That it be performed publicly, in the presence of witnesses:

3. That there be public monuments and actions kept in memory of it; and,

4. That such monuments and actions shall be established, and commence, at the time of the fact.

The two first of these marks make it impossible for any false fact to be imposed upon men at the time when it was said to be done, because every man's senses would contradict it. For example: Suppose I should pretend that yesterday I divided the Thames in presence of all the people of London, and led the whole city over to Southwark on dry land, the waters standing like walls on each side:—it would be morally impossible for me to convince the people of London that this was true; when every man, woman, and child, could contradict me, and affirm that they had not seen the Thames so divided, nor been led over to Southwark on dry land. I take it then for granted, (and I apprehend with the allowance of all Deists in the world,) that no such imposition could be put upon mankind at the time when such matter of fact was said to be done.

"But," it may be urged, "the fact might be invented when the men of that generation in which it was said to be done were all past and gone; and the credulity of after ages might be induced to believe that things had been performed in earlier times, which had not!"

From this the two latter marks secure us, as much as the two first in the former case. For whenever such a fact was invented, if it were stated that not only public monuments of it remained, but likewise that public actions or observances had been kept up in memory of it ever since, the deceit must be detected by no such monuments appearing, and by the experience of every man, woman, and child, who must know that they had performed no such actions and practised no such observances. For example: Suppose I should now fabricate a story of something done a thousand years ago; I might perhaps get a few persons to believe me; but if I were farther to add, that from that day to this, every man, at the age of twelve years, had a joint of his little finger cut off in memory of it, and that of course every man then living actually wanted a joint of that finger, and vouched this institution in confirmation of its truth; it would be morally impossible for me to gain credit in such a case, because every man then living would contradict me, as to the circumstance of cutting off a joint of the finger; and that, being an essential part of my original matter of fact, must prove the whole to be false.

II. Let us now come to the second point, and show that all these marks do meet in the matters of fact of Moses, and of Christ; and do not meet in those reported of Mahomet, and of the heathen deities, nor can possibly meet in any imposture whatsoever.

As to Moses, he, I take it for granted, could not have persuaded six hundred thousand men that he had brought them out of Egypt by the Red Sea, fed them forty years with miraculous manna, &c., if it had not been true: because the senses of every man who was then alive would have contradicted him. So that here are the two first marks.

For the same reason, it would have been equally impossible for him to have made them receive his five books as true, which related all these things as done before their eyes, if they had not been so done. Observe how positively he speaks to them.—"And know you this day, for I speak not with your children, which have not known, and which have not seen the chastisement of the Lord your God, his greatness, his mighty hand, and his stretched-out arm, and his miracles—but your eyes have seen all the great acts of the Lord which he did." Deut. xi. 2, 7. Hence we must admit it to be impossible that these books, if written by Moses in support of an imposture, could have been put upon the people who were alive at the time when such things were said to be done.

"But they might have been written," it may be urged, "in some age after Moses, and published as his!"

To this reply, that, if it were so, it was impossible they should have been received as such; because they speak of themselves as delivered by Moses, and kept in the ark from his time; (Deut. xxxi. 24—26,) and state that a copy of them was likewise deposited in the hands of the king, "that he might learn to fear the Lord his God, to keep all the words of this law, and those statutes to do them." Deut. xvii. 19. Here these books expressly represent themselves as being not only the civil history, but also the established municipal law of the Jews, binding the king as well as the people. In whatever age, therefore, after Moses, they might have been forged, it was impossible they should have gained any credit; because they could not then have been found either in the ark, or with the king, or any where else: and, when they were first published, every body must know that they had never heard of them before.

And they could still less receive them as their book of statutes, and the standing law of the land, by which they had all along been governed. Could any man, at this day, invent a set of acts of Parliament for England, and make it pass upon the nation as the only book of statutes which they had ever known? As impossible was it for these books, if written in any age after Moses, to have been received for what they declare themselves to be; that is, the municipal law of the Jews; and for any man to have persuaded that people that they had owned them as their code of statutes from the time of Moses, that is, before they had ever heard of them! Nay, more: they must instantly have forgotten their former laws, if they could receive these books as such; and as such only could they receive them, because such they vouched themselves to be. Let me ask the Deists but one short question: "Was a book of sham laws palmed upon any nation since the world began?" If not, with what face can they say this of the law books of the Jews? Why will they affirm that of them, which they admit never to have happened in any other instance?

But they must be still more unreasonable. For the books of Moses have an ampler demonstration of their truth than even other law books have; as they not only contain the laws themselves, but give an historical account of their institution and regular fulfillment: of the passover, for instance, in memory of their supernatural protection upon the slaying of the first-born of Egypt; the dedication of the first-born of Israel, both of man and beast; the preservation of Aaron's Rod which budded, of the pot of Manna, and of the Brazen Serpent, which remained till the days of Hezekiah. 2 Kings, xviii. 4, &c. And, besides these memorials of particular occurrences, there were other solemn observances, in general memory of their deliverance out of Egypt, &c., as their annual expiations, their new moons, their Sabbaths, and their ordinary sacrifices; so that they were yearly, monthly, weekly, and daily recognitions of these things.—The same books likewise farther inform us, that the tribe of Levi were appointed and consecrated by God as his ministers, by whom alone these institutions were to be celebrated; that it was death for any others to approach the altar; that their high-priest wore a brilliant mitre and magnificent robes, with the miraculous Urim and Thummim in his breast-plate; that at his word all the people were to go out, and to come in; that these Levites were also their judges, even in all civil causes, and that it was death to resist their sentence. Deut. xvii. 8—13; 1 Chron. xxiii. 4.

Hence, too, in whatever age after Moses they might have been forged, it was impossible they should have gained any credit: unless indeed the fabricators could have made the whole nation believe, in spite of their invariable experience to the contrary, that they had received these books long before, from their fathers; had been taught them when they were children, and had taught them to their own children; that they had been circumcised themselves, had circumcised their families, and uniformly observed their whole minute detail of sacrifices and ceremonies; that they had never eaten any swine's flesh or other prohibited meats; that they had a splendid tabernacle, with a regular priesthood to administer in it, confined to one particular tribe, and a superintedent high-priest, whose death alone could deliver those that had fled to the cities of refuge; that the priests were their ordinary judges, even in civil matters, &c. But this would surely have been impossible, if none of these things had been practiced; and it would consequently have been impossible to circulate, as true, a set of books which affirmed that they had practiced them, and upon that practise rested their own pretensions to acceptance. So that here are the two latter marks.

"But," to advance to the utmost degree of supposition, it may be urged, "these things might have been practiced prior to this alledged forgery; and those books only deceived the nation, by making them believe that they were practiced in memory of such and such occurrences as were then invented!"

In this hypothesis, however groundless, the same impossibilities press upon our notion as before. For it implies that the Jews had previously kept these observances in memory of nothing, or without knowing why they kept them; whereas, in all their particulars, they strikingly express their original: as the Passover, instituted in memory of God's passing over the children of the Israelites, when he slew the first-born of Egypt, &c.

Let us admit, however, contrary both to probability and to matter of fact, that they did not know why they kept these observances; yet, was it possible to persuade them that they were kept in memory of something which they had never heard of before? For example: Suppose I should now forge some romantic story of strange things done a long while ago; and, in confirmation of this, should endeavor to convince the Christian world that they had regularly, from that period to this, kept holy the first day of the week, in memory of such or such a man: a Cæsar, or a Mahomed: and had all been baptized in his name, and sworn by it upon the very book which I had then fabricated, and which of course they had never seen before in their public courts of judicature: that this book likewise contained their laws, civil and ecclesiastical, which they had ever since his time acknowledged, and no other. I ask any Deist, whether he thinks it possible that such a cheat could be received as the Gospel of Christians, or not? The same reason holds with regard to the books of Moses, and must hold with regard to every book which contains matters of fact, accompanied by the abovementioned four marks. For these marks, together, secure mankind from imposition, with regard to any false fact, as well in after ages, as at the time when it was said to be done.

[To be continued.]

From the N. Y. Observer

THE WIDOW'S OFFERING.

I was reading of the widow's "two mites." How small the offering! Yet to Him "who sat over against the treasury" it was more than all the others, of their abundance, cast in. It was "all her living." We try to follow the little offering. We would know if the Savior did not bless and magnify it, as he did the loaves and fishes, till it really accomplished more than the many offerings of the rich.

And then the spirit that prompted her to cast in "all her living." It showed an unshaken confidence in God, that he would provide. It was an unspeakable treasure of itself, that would nourish the soul though the body should famish.

But this spirit was not confined to that one bosom—nor to the period of our Lord's incarnation. There are other poor widows, who, like this one, cast in all their living, of whom it may be said, with much propriety, they have "done what they could." The spirit of Christ is one in every age of the world. It tends to the same general result wherever it suitably imbues the heart. It leads the poor widow now, no less than when Christ was on earth, to enquire what she can do, and to do what she can. And I know not that my eye ever rests upon the comment of Christ upon the conduct of the "poor widow" and her "two mites," without calling to mind a remark of one of our own days, who, like her of old, was a widow indeed.

An agent of a benevolent Board presented the claims of his Society. He asked for aid. I know not that the two mites even were in her possession. But did she refuse him? No. God had given her four sons. They might be called "all her living." She had given them back to him in the holy ordinance of baptism. She had lent them to him, as long as they lived! For them the midnight prayer ascended, when the stillness of death reigned around. These sons all hoped their hearts were renewed; they responded to the baptismal vow made in their behalf; they owned their obligations to be the Lord's "These," says she, "I'll put in the box."

Years have rolled away. I have watched that offering. The widow's sons.—where are they? Three of them are pastors of churches, and the fourth is far advanced in his course of preparation for the same sacred office. And the poor widow, —where is she? She yet lives. Though she cast into the treasury of the Lord "all her living," yet has not the cruise of oil or the handful of meal failed her to this day. "Jehovah Jireh." "The Lord will provide,"—will provide for those who put their trust in him. This poor widow has found it so; and others would, if they would confide in his promises.

Praying mothers! would you know what you can do for the Lord? You may not be able to cast into his treasury even "two mites;" you may be poor, indeed, and widows indeed: but you have sons, you have daughters, and the Lord hath need of them. You have professedly given them to the Lord,—withhold them not, when he calls. Cast them into His treasury, that they may "go everywhere preaching the word." It may cost you much sacrifice of feeling, but the Lord will abundantly reward you.

A QUESTION ANSWERED.—Not long since, we heard a brother offer up a prayer to God in meeting, in which he lamented over the lethargy of the members, in attending the house of prayer. And after invoking God's blessings on them, and the Spirit to revive them, he (as if in doubt whether they would let the Spirit operate upon their hearts,) exclaimed, "My God! what will become of those of thy professed followers, who disregard thy word, and neglect the assembling of themselves, and who walk not after the Spirit but the flesh."—The prayer made a deep impression upon our mind, and an answer to the inquiry presented itself immediately, which shows what will become of them. You will find it recorded in Jeremiah, xlviii. 10. "Cursed be he that doeth the work of the Lord deceitfully"—or as the German translator renders it—LAZILY! So the lazy, deceitful, half-hearted professor may expect nothing else but the fiery indignation of a jealous God, who demands the affection of our whole heart, mind and soul. The Savior has promised to be with you to the end—He demands your fidelity and worship to the end. Draw nigh unto him and he will draw nigh unto you—Depart from him and he will give you over to hardness of heart and a reprobacy of mind, that you may believe a lie and be damned. "Neglect not the assembling of yourselves together, as the manner of some is" "—Gospel Publisher.

Said a missionary of our own country, "I recollect once in particular, my mother's coming and standing by me as I sat in the door, and while she tenderly and solemnly talked to me of God, and my soul's concern, her tears dropped on my face. It was that made me a missionary." Another gentleman once said, "To the instructions and prayers of my mother, under God, I trace all the serious impressions which were made upon my mind in childhood, and which became stronger and stronger, and finally led me, as I hope, to trust in the Lord Jesus."—Mother's Magazine.

PREACHING ON ETERNITY.—"It was a question asked by the brethren both in the classical and provincial meetings of ministers, twice in the year, if they preached the duties of the times? And when it was found that Mr. Leighton did not, he was censured for the omission, but said, 'If all the brethren have preached to the times, may not one poor brother be suffered to preach on eternity?'"—Buck's Anecdotes.

"The maintenance of ministers is not an arbitrary thing, left purely to the good will of the people, who may let them starve if they please; no, as the God of Israel commanded that the Levites should be well provided for, so has the Lord Jesus, the King of the Christian Church, ordained, and a perpetual ordinance it is, that they who preach the Gospel, should live of the Gospel.

Children's Department.

Infant Dialogue.

BY [illegible]

Child. Father, who made that star so bright,
That twinkles, twinkles every night?

Father. 'Twas God, my [illegible], who sits on high,
Who made that star, and you and I.

C. But here are hills, and brooks, and trees,
Who then, dear father, made all these?

F. The hills, the brooks, and trees so tall,
Are all the Lord's—he made them all.

C. [illegible]
[illegible]

F. [illegible]
[illegible]

C. That God made these I've [illegible]
What is this God?—Where [illegible]

F. God is a spirit—[illegible]
And [illegible] you with a tender [illegible]

C. A spirit, you say—what do you mean?
Cannot this spirit—God—be seen?

F. No, child, not now; he's out of sight.
His throne is where there is no night.

C. But father, can this God see me?
And does he know, now, where we be?

F. Yes, dear, his ear hears what we say,
His eye beholds us every day.

C. Say, can I see that God above,
"Who loves me with a tender love?"

F. Yes, if you're good, the promise given
Says that you shall dwell in heaven;
There you will see this Mighty One,
And live forever near his throne.

REWARD OF PRINCIPLE.

A MOTHER'S STORY TO HER CHILDREN.

'Tell us a story, please, papa,' said George.

'Tell you a story! Ask mamma, who sits there so demurely."

Immediately the merry spirits capered over to Mrs. Lynn, and preferred their petition.

'Tell us something we never heard before, mamma."

Mrs. Lynn thought for a moment, and began:

'When I was about your age, Emma, my mother went out shopping one day, and took me with her.

'It was a bright, bitter morning in January, and though I was well wrapped up, I felt the cold severely. We stopped at the grocer's, and at the shoemaker's, and then we went to a dry goods store. The storekeeper knew my mother, and when we bought what we wanted, he told us of a poor widow in the neighborhood, who was in great distress. So my mother asked where Mrs. Marshall lived, and said she would go there directly. It was in a narrow alley, not far from the store: a mean, old, dirty, tumble-down house, with a family in every room. Mrs. Marshall lived in the garret. When we went in, we found her in bed. She had a very few bed-clothes, and there was no fire in her room. My mother talked to her, and found that she was sick of a liver complaint, and had nothing to depend on but her daily labor. She had worked too hard the week before, and was not able to leave her bed. 'I have neither money, victuals or fire-wood, ma'am, and I ain't able to earn any, and what will become of that poor boy, God only knows' —and the poor woman cried.

'I looked round, and saw a very ragged, lean little boy about six years old, sitting on a stool, at the foot of the bed, eating a crust of rye bread.

'Don't cry, mamma,' said the little boy, cheerfully; when the ladies are gone, I'll pray to God to help us.'

'My mother gave the child some money, and told him to go and buy a pound of coffee and a loaf of bread for his mother.—When he was gone, my mother said, 'your little boy seems well instructed.'

'Yes, ma'am,' said Mrs. Marshall, 'I got him in the Infant School, when he was able to go. It's a comfort to me, lying here as I am, to hear him say Scripture texts and hymns. He never misses his prayers, night or morning. I never knew Johnny to tell a lie in his life; and he would not lay a finger on what is not his own, if he was starving.'

'By this time Johnny came back. My mother promised to send some wood and other comforts, as soon as possible; and as we went down stairs, she stopped at one of the rooms and engaged a woman to nurse Mrs. Marshall. My sisters and I worked very hard that day, to mend up some old clothes for Johnny and his mother, and my brother Charles begged leave to give Johnny a plaid cloak which he had outgrown. Poor fellow! he jumped for joy when he came for the clothes, and Charles threw the cloak over his shoulders, and told him he might keep it.

'Mrs. Marshall was sometimes better, and sometimes worse. She worked when she was able, and my mother and other ladies helped her, but she suffered a good deal. When Johnny was about nine years old, he went out one morning after breakfast, and did not come home till near noon.

'Oh Johnny,' said Mrs. Marshall, 'where have you been?'

'Mother,' said Johnny, 'I am old enough to earn my living. I don't want to be a burden on you any longer. I have been looking for a place.'

'And did you get one, Johnny,' said Mrs. Marshall.

'Yes, mother; and the man I'm hired to will be here presently, to speak to you about me.'

'Mrs. Marshall asked him how he had managed. Johnny said he went and stood in the market, and looked at the farmer as they came in with their wagons, and when he saw one that looked good natured, he asked him if he wanted to hire a boy. At last he met with one that did. The farmer came, and agreed to take Johnny on trial for a month, and if they were mutually satisfied, to have him bound till he was twenty-one years old. So Johnny went away with his master.'

'And did he stay there, mamma?' asked George.

'You shall hear. The day after the month was up, Johnny came home. He looked very serious, and said he was not going back again. His mother asked him if he had been ill-treated. No; they had been very kind indeed. Had he enough to eat and drink? Plenty of the best. Was his work too hard? Nothing but what he could do very well. Was his master satisfied? Yes, his master wanted him to stay.

'Then why did you come away, Johnny?'

Johnny made no answer. Then his mother was frightened.

'Oh Johnny,' said she, 'I am afraid you have done something wrong.'

Johnny burst out crying. 'No, indeed, mother, I have done nothing wrong.'

'Then why won't you go back?'

'Mother,' said Johnny, wiping away his tears and looking very earnest, 'my master laughs at the Bible, and does not love the Lord Jesus Christ. I cannot like a man that calls the Holy Bible a bad book.—Mother, I won't be a burden on you. I'll get another place; but I can't live with people that don't love my Savior.'

'Poor Mrs. Marshall kissed her dear little boy, and they had scarcely done crying when the farmer came. He was very sorry to lose Johnny, for he said he was the best boy he had ever employed. He offered to bring Johnny up as his own child, (for he was a rich man,) if he would come back; but Johnny was firm. No offers would tempt him to cast his lot with those who did not serve the Lord. [A fact. It happened almost word for word as Mrs. Lynn relates it.]

Johnny soon got another place; and this time it was in a pious family, for God leads those who trust in him by ways they know not. His master loved him very much, for Johnny was a faithful Christian servant; and his wife dying soon after, he hired Mrs. Marshall for a house-keeper.—The country air and good living soon restored her health; and she lived to see Johnny grow up a pious, sensible, useful man.'

'And what has become of him, mamma?'

'He has a large farm of his own, now; he is married, has a good wife, and six nice children. He is a wealthy, influential man, and still remembers with gratitude those who befriended his childhood."

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, August 3, 1842.

Eternity.

It is manifest from the article of last week, that the soul of man is immortal; and no truth is more fully established by the scriptures than this. Almost every inspired writer asserts it. The evidences of the immortality of the soul, drawn from the light of nature, are also abundant and conclusive. Yes, fellow sinner! it is an incontrovertible truth that thy soul must eternally exist in happiness or misery. We wish now to impress upon your minds that you are to decide which state shall be yours, and that the present is the appointed time to make the decision. The prophet Elijah says, "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve." "Therefore, also, now saith the Lord, turn ye even to me with all your heart, and with fasting, and with weeping, and with mourning, and rend your heart and not your garment, and turn unto the Lord your God; for he is gracious and merciful, slow to anger and of great kindness, and repenteth him of the evil." "But seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." "Seek and ye shall find; knock and it shall be opened unto you." Jesus preached, "Repent ye, and believe the gospel." God commanded all men, every where, to repent. John the Baptist, and the Apostles preached to men that they should repent and be baptized.—Paul preached to the jailer, saying, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." The Savior says, "except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." Thus it is thy duty to repent, to turn from your sins, believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, obey the commandments of God, and seek him with all your heart, if you would inherit eternal life. O, sinner, will you choose life, or will you seek death!—As moral agents, it is evident that we have the power of acting as we please. Yes, sinner! you can resist the spirit, and call down eternal damnation upon your soul.—But will you do it? O! I pray you, do it not. Be ye reconciled to God and you shall be saved.

Now is the time for you to choose. The above admonitions are all in the present tense. Annanias said unto Paul, and now why tarriest thou? "Arise and be baptized, calling on the name of the Lord." "Behold now is the accepted time; behold now is the day of salvation." God says, "my spirit shall not always strive with men." The spirit now says, "Come." The next moment God may say to his spirit, and servants, "Let them alone." Now is the time, because the next moment God may say to the destroyer, his days are numbered, let his life be taken from him. God says, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave whither thou goest." Fellow sinner! will you now choose the Savior? Do it, and thy soul shall live.

We have shown that there is an eternity to which all hasten—that it is just at hand—that in it is a state of happiness, and another of misery—that every individual must decide which state he will inherit—and that the present is the appointed time for the decision. Come now, reader, let us reason. Let the question be faithfully answered, Am I prepared for eternity.—"Prepare to meet thy God," says he who sits upon the throne. The preparation necessary is to exercise repentance towards God and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and to live as a light in the world. Are you ready? The Apostle to the Gentiles before his death could say, "For I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith." "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints." Infinitely happy is he whose work is done, and who is ready to enter into rest. What holy persons, beloved christians, ought we to be, in view of the happy eternity in reserve for us. Let us remember that we are working for eternity. Serious thoughts on eternity will lead to activity in the vineyard of the Lord. They will detach the affections from the world, with all its pleasures, riches, honors, and amusements.—How vain all these things appear when the soul is just ready to launch into eternity! "A great man had an extraordinary mark of distinction sent him by his prince, as he lay on his death-bed. 'Alas,' said he, looking coldly upon it, 'this is of immense value in this country; but I am just going to a country where it will be of no service to me!'" Serious thoughts on eternity should lead us to diligence in whatever our hands find to do, to faithfulness in persuading sinners to be reconciled to God, to fervency in prayer, and cheerfulness in bearing the cross of Christ. They will also make religion unspeakably lovely—its duties pleasant, and its promises indescribably sweet. They will teach us to regard our fellows as hastening with us to eternity. They will take away all fear, and make the near approach to death joyous in the extreme. "I am going (said Doct. Payson, just before his death,) to Mount Zion, to the city of the living God, to the heavenly Jerusalem, to an innumerable company of angels, to the general assembly and church of the first born, and to God the Judge of all. The celestial city is full in my view. Its glories beam upon me, its sounds strike upon my ears, and its spirit is breathed into my heart. Nothing separates me from it but the river of death, which now appears as a significant rill that may be crossed at a single step whenever God shall give permission. The sun of righteousness has been gradually drawing nearer, and nearer, appearing larger, and brighter, as he approached, and now he fills the whole hemisphere, pouring forth a flood of glory, in which I seem to float like an insect in the beams of the sun; exulting, yet almost trembling, while I gaze upon this excessive brightness, and wondering with unutterable wonder, why God should deign thus to shine upon a sinful worm. A single heart, and a single tongue seem altogether inadequate to my wants. I want a whole heart for every separate emotion, and a whole tongue to express that emotion."

But we are fearful that all of our readers are not prepared for eternity. How different then must be your feelings and prospects from the Christian's! Remember the dying words of the Hon. Sir Francis Newport. When near death he looked towards the fire and said, "O, that I might lie upon that fire for a hundred thousand years to purchase the favor of God! but it is a fruitless wish. Millions of millions of years will bring me no nearer the end of my tortures than one poor hour! O Eternity! Eternity! who can discover the abyss of Eternity! O that I were in hell that I might feel the worst; and yet I dread to die because that worst will never have an end. When will be the last breath—the last pulse that shall beat my spirit out of this decayed mansion into the desired regions of death and hell! O it is at hand; but I am afraid again to die! Ah! the forlorn state of one that has no God to fly to for peace and comfort." His last expression was, "O the insufferable pangs of hell and damnation!" A young man about to leave this world, exclaimed, "The battle's fought, the battle's fought, the battle's fought, but the victory is lost forever!" With some of you the battle is nearly fought; with all it must end soon. How will the victory stand? God has declared that to him every knee shall bow. Every hour is hastening you to the crisis, and yet you have not commenced the preparation. How dreadful must be your end without Christ. Think upon it, sinner, when you lie down, and when you rise up. Think upon eternity till you can do it with pleasure. Do it now. This is the only certain time. Not long since a young man in the vigor of health, with the fairest prospect of a long and prosperous life, was thrown from a vehicle and conveyed to the nearest house in a state that excited instant and universal alarm for his safety. A physician was called. The first question of the wounded youth was, "Sir, must I die? Must I die? Deceive me not in this thing." His firm tone and penetrating look demanded an honest reply. He was told he could not live more than hour. He waked up as it were at once to a full sense of the dreadful reality. "Must I then go into eternity in an hour? Must I appear before my God and Judge in an hour? God knows that I have made no preparation for that event. I knew that impenitent youth were sometimes cut off thus suddenly, but it never entered my mind that I should be one of that number. And now what shall I do to be saved?" He was told that he must repent and believe on the Lord Jesus Christ. "But how shall I repent and believe? Here is no time to explain. The monster death will not wait for an explanation. The work must be done. The whole business of an immortal being in this probationary life is now crowded into one short hour, and that an hour of mental agony and distraction." Friends were weeping around, and running to and fro in the frenzy of grief. The poor sufferer, with a bosom heaving with emotion and with an eye gleaming with desperation, continued the cry of "what shall I do to be saved?" till within less than an hour his voice was hushed in the stillness of death. And now, fellow sinner! what more shall I say to persuade you to prepare for eternity? Time, Death, Eternity, will not wait for you to delay the preparation; it may be with you, "now or never."

Leslie's Method with Deists.

We commence publishing this week, Leslie's method with the Deist. It will occupy but a few numbers. We commend it to the attention of all our readers. The Christian ought to understand well the arguments by which his religion can be successfully defended from the assaults of Infidelity, and every person ought to study the arguments well before he gives himself up to sensuality. Human nature is inclined of itself to sin, but is not inclined to that species of Infidelity that denies the existence and attributes of God as revealed in the Bible, and embraces the doctrine of annihilation. The way in which men become Infidels, is in seeking an excuse or justification for sin. No person is an Infidel from the operations of his understanding simply, unaided by his natural inclination to commit and love sin. "It has been said of this brief and triumphant argument of Leslie, that it is 'the standing reproach of Deism,' no serious reply to it having been attempted."

The Anniversary.

The article of "F." on our first page is worthy of notice. Nothing, perhaps, has rendered our operations so inefficient as the fact that measures have been proposed and adopted at the same session of the assembly, without giving them careful and mature deliberation. Measures thus adopted are very liable to be ephemeral, or at most are ineffectually carried out. To remedy this evil, the delegates should be well advised of whatever matters may be presented before leaving home, and be prepared to act from mature deliberations, and if possible from the instructions or advice of their constituents.

Tract operations, we suppose will occupy the attention of those attending our anniversaries, both as it regards co-operating with the American Tract Society, and the publication of "Sabbath Tracts," now in a course of publication. Br. Griswold's letter also presents a subject on which the most judicious action is necessary. These, and all other subjects that may be presented, should receive careful attention.

Sabbath Tracts.

The first No. of the series has been forwarded us by the General Agent, from New-York. The subject of the Tract is an "Apology for introducing the subject of the Sabbath." It is ably written. The Tract is "got up" in good taste, and neatly executed by J. D. Swain, No. 68 Barclay Street, New-York. We commend it to all our readers.

MR. J. M. CARPENTER.—We learn from the "Journal of the American Temperance Union," that this noble hearted Washingtonian from Cincinnatus, is lecturing in New York City to overflowing houses and is listened to with deep interest. May success attend his efforts in the great Emporium, and honors cluster thick around his pathway wherever he goes.

Traveling Agents.

We wish to engage one or more efficient persons as Agents of the Register, to extend its circulation. Any person wishing to engage may communicate with us, by giving good references, if unknown to us.

For the Register.

MR. EDITOR—In view of recent developements, and the wrong state of feeling which prevails to an alarming extent in this community, in reference to the violation of the seventh commandment, allow me to ask the friends of moral purity, why they are not up and doing? why do they not try to be a terror to evil doers? where is the consistency when you talk and write of, and deprecate and mourn over, the sins committed in our large cities and towns, and yet take no notice of the crimes committed in our own neighborhood? do not the vile of both sexes go about our streets without a blush, and without feeling that public indignation is out against them? do we not find many sympathising with them, and trying to sustain them by representing that all females, or most of them, are alike fallen, thereby seeking to sustain licentiousness? Why are these things so? ought not this whole community to frown upon those who are known to be licentious, and to consider those who have made friendship with them at the expense of the reputation of other females, as partners in the trade; whatever their standing or pretensions may be? and shall the thief who commits depredations upon the property of his fellow citizens be sent from our village in chains to await his trial in the county jail, while the robber of female virtue walks securely at large among us at noon-day with face erect? and shall a young man who has the misfortune to enter into matrimonial engagements with a woman, who afterwards proves herself to have been a prostitute, have his feelings quieted by vile men who shall tell him, that his lot is not harder than most others, except in the misfortune of its publicity, while they ridicule him in his absence? Is it not time to talk, and write, and legislate on this subject? is there not danger that our own children and youth may be tainted with such false and dangerous influences? Will not the friends of virtue speak out?

A FRIEND TO PURITY.

Missionary Department.

For the Register.

Journal of Br. Griswold.

July 1. Another month has passed away. May I so number my days as to apply my heart to wisdom.

Left Elder Bailey's for the second Brookfield Church. Attended a covenant meeting of that church in the afternoon. A most refreshing season. All expressed a determination to prosecute the christian life with more zeal. May their resolutions be carried into action.

2. Sabbath; Preached at the same place. Took up a subscription for my Agency.—After which we sat down to commemorate the death of our adorable Redeemer.—Much union and good feeling prevail here, although there appears something of a want of that spirituality of which we all complain. Preached in the afternoon.—Solemnity pervaded the assembly.

3. Went to West Brookfield to hear a discourse on the "Christian Sunday." I asked the speaker to inform me how to keep Sunday, but could get no satisfactory answer, as he discarded the old Testament in toto. Preached at the same place twice in the afternoon. Spent the week in trying to collect funds. Found the friends willing to give if they could be satisfied that all was right. Too much ground of complaint.

9. Sabbath; preached at the third Brookfield Church in the morning, and at the second church in the afternoon. Took up a subscription for my Agency.

10. Attended the church meeting of the second Brookfield church, for the purpose of endeavoring to have the difficulties between this and the first church removed. Brethren felt anxious that the same should be done, and appointed a committee to wait on the first church; also requested me to attend with them.

11—12. Attended meeting on Plainfield Hill, where the Lord is evidently reclaiming backsliders and converting sinners.

13. Preached at Coonsville. Endeavored to show that the ways of Zion mourn—Some I hope are mourning over her desolations.

14. Attended a meeting at Leonardsville Solemn season. We all covenanted anew with our God, and pledged ourselves to return unto Him, and to seek until we find.—Lord, enable us all to keep inviolate our vows.

15. Left for Preston. Passed through North and South New Berlin and Norwich. At the two last places is a Temperance House for the entertainment of the traveler. Called on Dea. C. Rogers, and was hospitably entertained.

16. Sabbath; preached in the morning and afternoon. Took up a subscription for the cause of missions. This appears like a second Waterford. Love and harmony prevail, and their peace is like a river.

17. Visited Br. Nathan Rogers; found them well. Afternoon went to hear a Reformed Drunkard lecture. Sad experience his.

18. Delivered a Temperance address at Preston meeting-house; formed a temperance society. Tee-totalism is the order of the day here.

20. Returned to Brookfield. Held an interesting conversation with the Tee-total landlord at New Berlin concerning the Sabbath.

21—2. Attended the religious meeting at Leonardsville. The Lord has evidently heard the prayers of his children here.

23. Sabbath; preached at Leonardsville, on the fruit of resolving to seek the Lord. Four were baptized, while numbers more are apparently lingering around the pool. Brethren, the vows of God are upon you. "For Zion's sake hold not your peace, until the sound of abundance of rain is heard." Will not thou, Oh Lord, revive thy work here?

24. By request, attended the church meeting at Leonardsville. Committee from second church being present, the difficulties between the two churches were at last formally settled; and long may it be ere any thing to mar said union shall again occur.

25—6. Being detained by the hurt of my horse, enjoyed a most precious season on each morning at sunrise in the house of God where, and at which time, prayer meetings are held, also, in the evening, at which many are the tears of penitence shed by the mourning, yet returning prodigal. Yes, blessed be God, even sinners in Leonardsville are being converted to Jesus. Oh, brethren, hold on to the promise of our covenant keeping God. Pray and not faint—Let no difficulty discourage, no opposition daunt. Take up every stumbling block from before the car of Immanuel, which is rolling forward lest he trample them in his anger, and crush them in his fury.—The Lord can work, and who will hinder? Preached in the afternoon from "I will arise and go to my Father." All appeared to respond, Amen. Gave a Temperance Address at Coonsville to a large and respectable audience.

27. Went to Hamilton; tarried at Br. Luke P. Babcock's over night. Found them firm in observing God's holy Sabbath; although lamenting over the low state of religious feeling in their own hearts.

28. Left for De Ruyter. In passing through Log City found there was to be an examination of a candidate for ordination in the Baptist church. While my horse was feeding, I went in to see the proceedings.—The young man gave an interesting experience, and a short account of his call to the work of the ministry, and closed with his views of Christian Theology, with which no great exceptions could be taken, [illegible] his and the counsel's views concerning the Sabbath. He said that he had not examined the subject, but supposed that the first day should be kept, because most people kept it; and he supposed that the Apostles did the same. Being asked if any thing drawn from the fourth commandment [illegible] ties or observance of Sunday, he said not, as the law (he said,) was done away; and for proof he quoted, "The law and the prophets were until John." I almost wished that the good old headless John might have risen and defended himself from the charge of being the bar over which the law of God could not be drawn! Will some of the Literati on Hamilton Hill just condescend to shed a little light on the above? I for one wish to know how to observe the first day of the week. If Sunday is the day which Christians are to keep holy, then we poor Seventh-day Baptists are guilty of shamefully desecrating said day!! But if the seventh-day be the Sabbath and is obligatory, then Sunday keepers are the guilty violators of God's law! For in vain do we worship God when we teach for doctrines the commandments of men.

30. Sabbath; preached twice at De Ruyter. Peace and harmony have [illegible] taken up their abode in this church. The singing of the choir here deserves a passing notice for the very correct and [illegible] manner in which they perform that part of the worship of God's house. This part of divine worship is too much neglected.

During the past month I [illegible] the following sums [illegible] $21 02. Interest $21.78 [illegible] paid, and $25.[illegible] to be paid [illegible] of Sept. [illegible] Brookfield [illegible] — Preston church $[illegible] De Ruyter [illegible] of Luke P. Babcock, $[illegible]

In closing permit me to call the attention of the Missionary Society to a few particulars. Knowing, as I do, that almost universal dissatisfaction prevails against the standing fund, would it not be best at the coming Conference to make it either available or let it revert back to its original donors? From my knowledge of the subject, I am certain that it is the only way to preserve a spirit of missions. The experiment has been tried, and found that such a fund is a curse instead of a blessing. Some of the fund is lost entirely; on other's parts the interest is in arrears for four and five years. The Notes are protested, both interest and principal.—Such being the state of things, I hope that something will be done to restore lost confidence.

Voluntary contributions are evidently best calculated to promote piety in the saint and spread it abroad. Will the brethren & members of our Society instruct their delegates accordingly? Those with whom I have left accounts to collect for my Agency will please forward them to me at the Conference. Br. Scott will need all that can be spared. Times, we know, are hard. But shall the cause of religion suffer the most? And while the little puny banks of this world are failing and winding up, let us remember that the bank of heaven is yet good, and its notes are all at par. No discount on them. Let not, then, the cause of our Redeemer become insolvent. Brethren, have faith in God.

SHERMAN S. GRISWOLD, Ag't.
De Ruyter, July 31, 1842.

P. S. It will be expected that all interest due from individuals who have parts of the standing fund loaned to them will be paid before the first of September, as the state of the Missionary Society requires it. Much of the interest is in arrears now, which gives dissatisfaction, as the donors have a right to demand that the interest be yearly paid and applied agreeably to their wish. Our missionary operations must not, and, as far as I am concerned, shall not longer be managed thus. Brethren, let the approaching session of our Anniversaries be anticipated in our prayers, that all may come up to transact business for God, and not for ourselves. The Macedonian cry has long pealed upon our ears, "Come over and help us." And shall we, nay, can we longer listen, and the blood of souls be not required at our hands?

S. S. G.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

ARRIVAL OF THE ACADIA.

Sixteen Days Later from Europe.

The Acadia left Liverpool on the 5th inst. and arrived at Boston on the 21st.—Among the news is Another Attempt upon the Life of the Queen.

A great excitement existed in London, by another attempt to assassinate the Queen—which occurred within a few hours after clemency had been shown to Francis, the late criminal, whose punishment has been commuted to imprisonment for life.—It took place on her Majesty's return from the Royal Chapel, a few minutes before 12, on the 2nd inst. When the royal cortege had proceeded a short distance, a young man named Dassett observed a deformed lad, having a large hump on his right shoulder, and dressed in a long shabby brown [illegible] coat, lying half crouched down by the side of one of the trees of Green Park, with a pistol in his hand.—This was just as the carriage approached; he seized the pistol from him, but not until he had [illegible] and [illegible] fire. The boy escaped in the tumult, but was soon arrested. His name is John Bean, the son of quite a respectable man. The pistol was found charged with [illegible] pieces of tobacco pipe. There seems to be no assignable reason for the wretched transaction, unless to acquire a little notoriety.

Parliament—The Distress.

The proceedings of Parliament have been important. The great measures which were proposed by Sir Robert Peel, are passing successfully through the different stages of legislation, with undiminished majorities, though there is no disguise of discontent and dissatisfaction at some of them, on the part of his Tory supporters. The Premier's view of reform are too comprehensive to square with the contracted principles of the Conservative party generally. The Tariff bill and the Income-tax bill have already received the royal sanction, and become laws. The Poor-law bill will soon be passed. These great measures [illegible] produce the relief [illegible] The distress of the commercial and manufacturing [illegible] every day [illegible] The great [illegible] Law League at the [illegible] of [illegible] Sturge [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] the 18th [illegible] They were allowed [illegible] the town without opposition [illegible] the English troops [illegible] about 250 [illegible] killed on the field, while on our side not a single casualty took place.

Several skirmishes had taken place along the coast, but without [illegible] result [illegible] the Chinese had suffered considerable loss. More vigorous measures were [illegible] and a movement to the northward was intended upon the arrival of the expected reinforcements.

The [illegible] forces would it was supposed have maintained their present position until about the end of June.

Affghanistan.

A [illegible] has been received that Shah Soojah was murdered [illegible] and that Futteh Jung [illegible] He was [illegible] the English [illegible]

[illegible] had arrived at Jellalabad, and effected a junction with the troops composing the garrison of that fortress.

France.

The intelligence from the Continent is of little interest, if we except the publication of a royal ordinance in France, imposing an additional duty of 20 per cent. on all linen yarn imported into the kingdom. As may be expected, such a revolutionary measure has produced great [illegible] with English manufacturers, but it is expected the French government will submit to an amelioration.

The reports of the illness of Louis Philippe turn out to be untrue. He is in excellent health.

Spain.

A new ministry under Rodil, has been formed. Slight insurrections had occurred in Catalonia, but were easily suppressed. The army of the North has been disbanded, and the signs of returning quiet are more and more encouraging.

Congressional News.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

WASHINGTON, JULY 25, 1842.

Rates of Postage.

A bill to change the existing rates of postage to 5, 10, 15, 20, and 25 cents, instead of the rates now charged, to prohibit the coastwise transmission of them in foreign ships, to prohibit private expresses from carrying letters on mail routes, and to tax mammoth newspapers 1 cent for every 5 square inches over 1307, it may contain, is now before the Senate, and will probably pass that body, if not the House. All the features of it but the last, will be universally approved of. But, for one, I consider large and cheap newspapers as one of the most vauable of all our means of imparting instruction to the masses of society. And, to tax them heavily, is a sort of crime against man's right to eat of the tree of knowledge; a right so dearly bought!

I omitted to notice one or two valuable items in the new tariff bill, as it passed the House, One is, a section prohibiting the importation of obscene and licentious prints, books, and engravings, rendering them liable to be seized and burned by the Custom officers. Another relates to the drawback on distilled spirits. This is now 5 cents a gallon, and it is one of the great supports of the business of distillation. This is to be reduced 1 cent a gallon, each year, till it is extinct. This is just as it should be. We have too long paid a bounty on the manufacture of "distilled damnation."

News of the Day.

There were upwards of ninety speeches delivered in the House of Representatives, under the one hour rule, while the last Tariff bill was under discussion, besides a much larger number under the fifteen minute rule.

The Drowned Lady.—The body of the young lady found in the water at the foot of Butler street, in this city, has been identified as that of Miss Stuart, of Upper Canada. A reward of $100 had been offered for her body. She was of a wealthy and distinguished family residing in Upper Canada, and having been in a deranged state of mind for a length of time, it was thought best to place her in the Lunatic Asylum in this state. She was in company with her brother and some others. They had taken the steamboat Troy, from Albany, on the 15th inst., and while approaching the wharf at the foot of Barclay street, she made her escape through the cabin window and was drowned.

Inquest.—Mr. Isaac Lowis, Coroner, held an inquest on the 20th inst., on the body of Mrs. Hannah Rogers, of Plainfield, who died the day before. Verdict, "that the deceased came to her death by reason, or in consequence of blows inflicted on her person by Denison Rogers, her husband, on the night, or in the evening of the 15th of July, inst., while the said Denison Rogers was in a state of intoxication, produced by drinking ardent spirits." Thus is another added to the long list of crimes perpetrated in consequence of intemperate habits.—Otsego Republican.

Two More of the Patriot Prisoners escaped from Van Dieman's Land.—We were gratified yesterday to learn that Samuel Chandler and —— Wait, two of the Patriot Prisoners who were captured at the Short Hills, in Canada, in 1837, and banished to Van Dieman's Land, have escaped from that place of Stripes and Sculls, and are now near their homes and families. They were both worthy men, and their return is hailed with great pleasure by all who knew them.—Rochester Daily Democrat.

French Steamers.—The arrival of the French war steamer "Le Gomer" in our waters, is an interesting occurrence. But the errand on which she comes, is yet more interesting, and has more national importance in it. The eight commissioners she brought, are now at Washington, endeavoring to induce our government to make arrangements for an international commerce on a grander scale than has hitherto been contemplated. France has built, or is building 60 steamers, which will be employed to augment her naval force in war, and to carry on a rapid commercial intercourse in peace. All her navy yards, as at Rochefort, Brest, Cherbourg, and Toulon, are now busy with the preparations for this marine. The places which are to be visited by this commerce, are numerous and distant from each other.

The Virginia Embargo.—It appears that the threat made by the State of Virginia to retaliate upon New York for refusing her insolent demands for the surrender of men charged with that which is no crime here, but rather a virtue—helping men to their freedom, has been in one case actually executed. Capt. Hammond, of the schooner Banner, has recently made affidavit that he sailed to James River, Va., being engaged in the coasting trade. When about to return, an Inspector, acting under the law to inspect New York vessels, required him to pay the sum of $10, and to give a bond of $1,000 that he would not take away any slave! That he was obliged afterwards to put back to an inlet Watchipriggo, from which place he was not permitted to depart, until he had paid another ten dollars. The inspector was accompanied by sixteen men, armed with muskets, bowie knives and swords, and enforced his iniquitous demands by threats of violence. Not being able to give another bond, the inspector seized all his papers as security, promising to return with them at an early hour the next morning, which he did not do, and the vessel was obliged to sail without recovering any of the papers. Two other vessels were treated in a similar manner. If this be not piracy under sanction of a law, which is itself a violation of the Constitution, it will be difficult to define that crime. We trust that the authorities of this State will not be slow to seek redress where it cannot fail.

The Methodist Church.—From the minutes of the annual Conferences of the Methodist Episcal Church in the United States, ending in 1842, we learn that the whole number of membership is as follows:

Lay members,	913,001
Effective traveling and local preachers,	10,920
Superannuated preachers,	290
Total,	925,000

On the passage of the steamboat Troy from Albany to New-York on the 16th inst., a Miss Stuart, of Kingston, U. C., threw herself overboard and was drowned. She was supposed to be deranged, and was 25 years of age.

The body was interred at Flatbush, by order of the coroner, but was taken up as soon as identified, and re-interred in one of the church burying grounds at the Wallabout.—Brooklyn Eve. Star.

Wild Man.—Report says, a man, supposed to be insane, has made his appearance recently in the town of Albion, Maine. He has been seen about the fields, and on the skirts of the forest, in a state of complete nudity, wandering about and picking wild berries. At the last dates, the inhabitants were making diligent search for him. —Portland Argus.

Marine Camels.—We learn from the Nantucket Inquirer, that one of those "prodigious artificial sea monsters"—intended to be used in assisting loaded vessels over the shoals,—was launched last week.

These camels are one hundred and thirty-four feet long, nineteen feet deep, twenty-six feet wide on deck, and twenty-eight feet wide on the bottom. When in operation, they are tied together by fifteen chains passing through them under the bottom of the vessel to be transported. When it is necessary to lighten them, after they have been placed under the ship, they are pumped out by a six horse engine. It requires a burthen of two hundred tons to settle them one foot.

These are the first specimens of this kind of naval architecture ever introduced into this country; although they have been long used, we believe, in some parts of Germany. They are expected to be of great service at Nantucket, in enabling loaded vessels to pass over the shoals, whereas, heretofore, whaling vessels fitting for sea, have been compelled to take on board their outfit after leaving the wharves. —New Bedford paper.

Extraordinary Preservation of Life.—A most extraordinary instance of the preservation of life occurred on the Mississippi, a few days since. On the last trip of the Pre-emption from New Orleans to this port, Capt. Butler had on board a younger brother, about 18 or 19 years of age. The boat struck a snag below the mouth of the Ohio, which tore off some of the planks on the lower guard. A loose plank was thrown over the hole. In the night about one o'clock, the younger Mr. Butler got out of his berth, and without dressing, went on the lower deck, and, stepping on the plank it tilted up, letting him fall through into the river. The boat being under headway, and sinking deep, he passed under the wheel and came up some distance astern of the boat. The night being dark, he was not discovered, nor were his cries heard. Putting himself into the current, he floated down about three miles, and lodged on the head of an island. He succeeded in reaching the land, and remained there two days, no boat passing in the meantime. Being without any clothes except his shirt, and without food, he was greatly annoyed by the musquetoes, and suffered a good deal from hunger. On the second day he got a log into the river, and succeeded in reaching the main shore, where he soon succeeded in getting food and raiment.

No one on board the Pre-emption knew how he was lost overboard, and it was thought he had accidentally fallen over.—At the mouth of the Ohio, the Captain left his boat and returned down the river, in the expectation of finding the body, as he supposed he was certainly drowned. Contrary to his expectation he had the pleasure of returning with him sound and well.—St. Louis Republican.

A fool-daring feat was performed by a youngster named Bones last evening in this village. He ascended the north end of the Congregational Church, so along the ridge of the roof and up the steeple to the top of the vane, a distance of about two hundred feet, by the aid of nothing but the lightning rod attached to the building. From the ground to the top of the vane is 125 feet. After swinging awhile upon the vane, and dancing a jig upon the brass ball, he descended again, with apparent self-confidence that he had not been in the least exposed to danger.

There is no man in his senses, nor more than one fool in ten thousand, who would venture on such a journey.—Stamford Com. Adv.

Shocking Suicide.—We learn from the Belfast (Me.) Signal, that the wife of Robert Lermond committed suicide last week, by cutting her throat in a most shocking manner. She was found by her husband in a cooper's shop, where she had attempted to bleed to death by cording the leg above the knee cutting dpep gashes into the thigh; the same operation was performed upon one arm, and a cooper's adz was the instrument used to inflicit the wounds; but failing in these attempts, her next resort was to cut her throat; this she accomplished, and in so doing cut out a piece of the windpipe, which was found upon the floor. Before committing the act, she completed her work, set every thing to rights, and sent her children out to pick berries. She was an industrious, good woman, and a member of the Methodist church. She was about 50 years old. It must have been a case of monstrous insanity.—Boston Atlas.

How the Circle Widens.—At the Paris Anti-Slavery Convention, in March last, Count Frolich, a member of the Swedish Diet, was present; likewise M. de Tourguenoff, a former minister of the Emperor Alexander, who, with his brother, had come to concert a plan for the emancipation of the Russian serfs, and who had himself offered to emancipate three hundred peasants.—Anti-Slavery Standard.

The Madisonian states that a certain capitalist is negotiating for the purchase of all the claims against the States, amounting to $200,000,000.

At the late council of the Creek Indians in Arkansas, a law was passed, prohibiting the introduction of spirituous liquors into that nation, except for the use of persons bringing it into the country. For the first offense, the liquor to be spilt; for the second, the liquor to be spilt, and the offender to receive twenty-five lashes; and for the third offense, the liquor to be spilt, and the offender to be handed over to the law-makers of his town, to prescribe the punishment—which is generally death for the third offense of any kind.

Death of a Miser.—The Norwich papers contain a notice of the sudden death of James Smith, "for many years the keeper of an oyster and dram shop, on Water st." The Courier says:

"An examination of the premises where he had carried on his business, revealed some curious facts. A considerable sum of money, all in specie, was found hidden in old segar boxes and raisin boxes, in old shoes and in bags, and in every by-place and rat hole about the shop. It is not yet known how much money he had hidden away in this manner, but we understand that it will probably amount to at least four thousand dollars.

The Illinois Boundary Question—The Commissioners to locate the lands granted by the United States to Illinois, having made the principal part of their selections north of the line drawn due west from the southerly bend of Lake Michigan, claimed by Wiskonsan as her boundary by the ordinance of 1787, Gov. Doty, of Wiskonsan, has sent a letter to Gov. Carlin, of Illinois, notifying him to refrain from selecting public lands for the use of that State, within the territory claimed by Wiskonsan.

National Expenses.—According to an official communication, it appears that the expenditures between the 4th of March, 1841, and March 4th, 1842, were as follows:—viz., civil, miscellaneous, and foreign intercourse, $6,292,211 56; military, $13,635,411 95; naval, $6,300 592 95; treasury notes, and the old funded debt, $7,058,107 01; total, $33,266,403 47.

Destructive Shell.—We understand that a weapon of the most destructive character has lately been invented by an American resident in England, and the model sent to this country to be submitted to the U. S. Government for their purchase and approval. The principles of its destructibility have not been divulged, nor will they probably be if our government purchase the exclusive right. It is represented to be an "infernal machine" of the first water, not only scattering destruction where it strikes, but cutting and slashing as it proceeds, with two-edged teeth and cutters.—The model is in the hands of an intelligent engineer of this city, who will shortly proceed to Washington on the subject.—Com. Adv.

Reaction of Repudiation.—The Detroit Advertiser states, that the State of Michigan is in pressing want for rail road iron to complete thirty or forty miles of rail road, to enable her to use her public works, but her credit has fallen so low that nobody will trust the State unless some individual will guarantee payment.

A Boy Convicted of Murder.—The Fincastle Va. Democrat gives an account of the death of Col. Jon Persinger, of Allegheny county, under aggravating circumstances. During his recent harvest, among his cradlers was a young negro whom he had raised and treated with as much indulgence as he did his children, except that he did not come to the table. This boy did not please the Col. in his mode of cutting, and he commanded him to change it. The boy persisted, and the Col. stood before him to stop him. He threw his cradle forward with great force—cutting his master's pantaloons the first time, and the second cutting his leg nearly off above the knee. The negro mounted his horse (which he was permitted to own and keep) and rode off. Mortification ensued in the Col's leg, in a few days, and he died.—The boy was apprehended, and tried on the 9th inst. and condemned to be hung on the 12th of August next. The Democrat thinks the boy's act attributable to the permission of too much equality and indulgence from his master.—Boston Atlas.

A Noble Act.—About sunset on Thursday evening, an Irish boy, about four years old, fell overboard from Stetson's wharf, next south of Sargent's wharf. An alarm being given, a young man named Edward Powers, about eighteen years of age, apprentice to Messrs. Whitmore & Holbrook, boat builders, hearing the cry, immediately leaped from the second story window of the shop where he was at work, a distance of about 18 feet to the ground, and then jumped overboard and seized the boy, just as the tide was about to sweep him under the wharf, and brought him safely on shore.—Boston Transcript.

What an Example.—The Washingtonians resorting to a Distillery.—The Washingtonians of Hartford celebrated the anniversary of American Independence in the first distillery erected in Connecticut.—The building is 204 feet long, and there was room to set six tables the whole length. The stand for the orators was a still up side down, and, capable of accommodating four persons. This is "carrying the war in to Africa!"

Hot.—The thermometer stood on Wednesday of last week, in Belfast, at 95 degrees above zero. On the Kennebec it was at 100. The composition roller of the "Signal" melted and run off the cylinder! Warm work for the Pressmen. They would not have been much to blame if they had run off.

Notices.

Notice.

An EXAMINATION of the Students of De Ruyter Institute will be held on Tuesday and Wednesday, the 9th and 10th of August inst. The Young Ladies will read Compositions on Wednesday afternoon.—In the evening there will be an EXHIBITION at the Union Church, commencing at 6 1-2 o'clock. The friends of Education are respectfully invited to attend.

G. M LANGWORTHY, Principal.
De Ruyter, July 28, 1842.

The Missionary Agent

Will lecture as follows:

At Scott on the first Sabbath in August.

" Truxton, on first day after the first Sabbath in August.

" Lincklaen, on Monday, 8th of August at 5 o'clock, P. M.

" Verona first church on the second Sabbath in August.

" Second church in Verona on first day following the second Sabbath, at 5 o'clock P. M.

" Adams on the third Sabbath in Aug

" Hounsfield church on first day following the third Sabbath, at such time and place as the brethren will please to see appointed.

" Berlin on the fourth Sabbath in Aug.

" Petersburg on the first Sabbath in Sept.

All interested will please attend, as my time is necessarily limited

S. S. GRISWOLD,
Missionary Agent.
De Ruyter, Aug. 1, 1842.

General Conference.

The S. D. B. General Conference will hold its next session with the Church in Berlin, Rensselaer co., N. Y., commencing on the first day of the week before the second Sabbath in September next, at 10 o'clock, A. M. Introductory discourse by Eld. W. B. Gillett, or N. V. Hull, substitute. JAMES BAILEY, Cor. Sec.

☞The A. S. D. B. Missionary Society will meet on the second day of the Conference at the call of the President; and the Evangelical Board for disseminating Religious Truth among the Jews, on the fourth day, at 10 o'clock, A. M.

☞The 7th Anniversary of the A. S. D. B. Tract Society will be held in Berlin, on the 5th day of the week before the 2d Sabbath in September next, (Sept. 8,) at 10 o'clock, A. M.

PAUL STILLMAN,
General Agent.

TEMPERANCE HOUSE.

Mr. Asa C. Potter has opened a Temperance House at the State Bridge, in Verona, where he will be ready at all times to wait on those who give him a call, in good style, and on reasonable terms.

PROPOSALS

For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead,) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

ALFRED ACADEMY,

AND

TEACHER'S SEMINARY.

W. C. Kenyon, Principal.
Miss Caroline B. Maxson, Preceptress.

LECTURERS.

On Phrenology and Physiognomy.—Drs J. R. HARTSHORN, and E. RIDER.

On School Teaching.—LUKE G. MAXSON.

On Chemistry and Geology.—W. C. KENYON.

Lectures on other subjects as occasion may require.

This Institution is pleasantly located in the county of Allegany, thirteen miles South-East of Angelica, and six miles South of Almond. From its retired and quiet situation, it presents a favorable opportunity to parents to place their sons and daughters under a moral influence that will not be counteracted by those with whom they may associate.

The patronage which it has hitherto enjoyed, has been so liberal as to warrant very considerable expenditures in rendering it still more worthy of a more extended patronage; and it is hoped that it will, under its present organization, be rendered inferior to no similar Institution in Western New York.

The qualification of Common School Teachers will receive particular attention, so as to render them thorough and practical instructors of youth.

The Academic Year.—Is divided into three terms of fifteen weeks each. 1st, Commencing Wednesday 17th August; 2d, 7th December; 3d, 4th April, 1843.

Vacations.—At the expiration of the first and second Terms, one week each; at the expiration of the 3d Term, five weeks.

Tuition.—Varying with Instruction, from $3.00 to $4.75 per term.

Board.—From $1 to $2, according to accommodations. Rooms in the Institution, furnished with Cook Stoves, can be had at a moderate expense.

SAMUEL RUSSELL, [illegible]
Alfred, July, 1842.

MARRIED.

In Brookfield, [illegible] Crandall, Mr. GEORGE BURDICK, and Miss CYRENA COON, [illegible]

LIST OF LETTERS.

Charles Carl, George Crandall, Paul S[illegible]

LIST OF RECEIPTS.

Of George Crandall, $[illegible] Clark, [illegible] Lewis, Sophrona Fisher, Z. Strawn, Z. B. Babcock, $2, [illegible] Z. Strawn, $2.25, [illegible] .75 returned, credited to J. Kenyon, D. Maxson, L. Matterson, .25 each.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

What is Economy?

RANDOLPH & DUNHAM, take pleasure in informing their customers, and the public generally, that they continue the Tailoring business in "Mechanic's Hall," in rooms adjoining the Register Office," in all its various branches, where they will be happy to wait on customers on the shortest notice. Thankful for the patronage already bestowed on this establishment, they would say, that all work entrusted to them shall be done in a style not surpassed by any of the [illegible] in this village or county," and at prices that will suit their customers, and tend to that "Economy" which has been advertised to be the "road to wealth."—Cutting done at sight, and warranted to fit if properly made up. [illegible] work done at this Establishment will be warranted to fit [illegible]

S. F. RANDOLPH.
[illegible] DUNHAM.

De Ruyter, August 3, 1842.

Economy is the road to Wealth.

JAMES M. FETTS, would inform his friends and customers, and the public generally, that he has removed his Tailoring Establishment, [illegible] ing occupied by Eli A. Gage as a Hat Store, [illegible] he will be ready at all times to attend to [illegible] making all manner of clothing as [illegible] be done in the village or county. [illegible] done in the latest and most approved [illegible] dies Habits, and Coat Dresses Cut [illegible] notice. All work done at this establishment [illegible] be warranted to fit.

De Ruyter, July 1st 1842.

LIST OF LETTERS

REMAINING in the Post Office at De Ruyter, June 30, 1842.

Allen Britton	Haskins Leander
Bentley E. A. Mrs.	Johnson Abira
Baker Sally A. Miss	Kinney Nathan
Barnard Daniel	Lewis L. E. Mrs.
Bogardus Isaac R.	Snow Harvey
Babcock Thos. E.	Seyman Benjamin
Curtis Lurana Mrs.	Sherwood Adah E.
Carr Thomas	Squares Ethan
Derbashire James	Shaver Harvey
Griswold Sherman S.	Terney John
Hagan Jane	Winons Stephen
Holmes Arza	Wooley Peter R.

M. SPEAR, P. M.

BOOTS! BOOTS! SHOES! SHOES!!

AT the sign of the Mammoth Boot, manufactured invariably of leather tanned in "cold liquor." Please call.

FLOUR, PROVISIONS, GROCERIES, and one hundred other things, for sale by 11tf
May 11. HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

BOOK BINDING.

THE subscriber having connected a BINDERY with his printing establishment, is now ready to execute all kinds of Binding in a neat and durable manner, on as reasonable terms as at any other establishment in this section of country.
JAMES BAILEY.

De Ruyter, June 8th 1841.

☞IMPORTANT WORK!
NOW IN THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION,
A DICTIONARY OF
Arts, Manufactures, and Mines,
Containing a clear exposition of their
PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.
BY ANDREW URE, M. D., F. R. S., M. G. S.,
M. A. S. Lond.; Mem. Acad. N. S.
Philad.; S. Ph. Soc. N. Germ.
Hanov.; Mulh. &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings

THIS [illegible] the most popular work [illegible] and a book most [illegible] the wants of all classes of the [illegible] the important [illegible]

[illegible] Manufacturer, Metallurgist, [illegible] to the principles of their respective [illegible] the masters [illegible]

[illegible] Merchants, Brokers, Drysalters, Druggists, and Officers of the Revenue, characteristic [illegible] of the commodities which pass [illegible]

[illegible] the finest developements of chemistry [illegible] Students of these kindred [illegible]

[illegible] Capitalists, who may be desirous of [illegible] their funds in some productive [illegible] judiciously, among [illegible]

[illegible] gentlemen of the Law [illegible] give rise to litigation [illegible]

[illegible] Great Britain [illegible] paramount [illegible]

[illegible] at 25 cents [illegible]

[illegible] 8tf

STOVES.
COLD WINTER IS COMING
[illegible]

L[illegible] Thomas & Avery, [illegible] the largest and best assortment of STOVES ever offered in this [illegible] every desirable pattern of [illegible] and

Fancy Parlor Stoves,

[illegible] Wholesale & Retail on as favorable terms as can be purchased in this TOWN COUNTY or STATE. Most kinds of Produce [illegible] CASH, even, will not be refused in payment for any article in his line of business.

The subscriber manufactures all kinds of Stove Furniture, Pipe, Sheet Iron, [illegible]

BRASS AND TIN WARE

of every description, which he keeps constantly [illegible] and offers at as

LOW PRICES

[illegible] warranted, made [illegible] LEAKY.

Eave Troughs

[illegible]

JUST RECEIVED

[illegible] Western [illegible] Stoves [illegible]

JOB WORK

[illegible] Block [illegible]

[illegible] 1842 8tf

REMOVAL.

J[illegible] FETTS [illegible] removed his Tailoring [illegible] April 1842

[illegible] STONE STORE

Not 25 or 50 per cent Reward.
S. G. WALKER

HAS [illegible] NEW GOODS, which he is [illegible] determined to sell as CHEAP, [illegible] can be bought at any other establishment in De Ruyter. Among his assortment [illegible] Dry Goods, Dry Groceries, Crockery, Hardware, [illegible] Leghorn and Palm-Leaf hats, and a variety of other things too numerous to mention.

Hear ye! Hear ye!! all persons wishing to buy goods CHEAP will please call at the Farmer's Exchange, and examine the quality and prices of his goods before purchasing elsewhere; and, Hear ye again! [illegible] having a little "Safety Fund" and indebted to S. G. Walker, will please call and deposit.

De Ruyter, May 23, 1842.

"Hard times and money scarce."

IS the general complaint, and economy is the object of every person.

SUTTON & QUINBY have just opened a large assortment of Dry Goods, Groceries, Crockery, Paints, Oils and Dye-Stuffs. Persons wishing to make purchases are invited to call as we feel confident that our Low Prices and Good Goods must give general satisfaction.

May 24 SUTTON & QUINBY.

BOOKS & STATIONERY.

SCHOOL BOOKS, of all descriptions, Miscellaneous Books & Stationery, at the Book Store of HART, ACKLEY, & CO.
De Ruyter, May 11, 1842. 11v3tf

50 PIECES BROAD CLOTHS, CASSIMERES, SATINETTES, at reduced prices at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

POETRY.

Sabbath Evening.

Sweet is the last and parting ray,
That ushers placid evening in,
When with the still expiring day,
The Sabbath's peaceful hours begin;
How grateful to the anxious breast,
The sacred hours of holy rest!

Hush'd is the tumult of the day,
And worldly cares and business cease,
While soft the vesper breezes play,
To hymn the glad return of peace!
Delightful season! kindly given
To turn the wandering thoughts to heaven!

Oft as this peaceful hour shall come,
Lord raise my thoughts from earthly things,
And bear them to my heavenly home,
On faith and hope's celestial wings—
Till the last gleam of life decay
In one eternal Sabbath day.

Miscellaneous Department.

THE LAWYER REFORMED.

The town clock had already struck ten. The wind moaned dolefully as it found its way through the crevices of a dilapidated cottage, and as the rain pattered on the window, it told how comfortless was all without. On that night many a family drew closer around their comfortable firesides, as they listened to the elements raging around them. But there was one poor building to which we alluded where was no comfortable hearth, but every thing looked desolate and lonely. There was but a single room, and that contained furniture of the meanest quality. The wretched looking beds, the broken chairs, the naked walls, the handful of coals almost expiring on the hearth, told of poverty in its most naked form. On one of the beds lay a female whose countenance, shallow and emaciated, indicated the ravage of grief, rather than diseas. The close observer could still detect there the lingering traces of beauty. By the expiring embers sat a young girl, perhaps of seventeen, clothed with a thin calico gown. Poverty and suffering had not effaced the beauty of her countenance. But her eyes were red with weeping, and her cheeks, pallid with grief were still most lovely.—Shivering with cold she was steadily pursuing her work, for that was the sole dependence of the family for daily food.

"Julia," said the mother, "do lay aside your work and go to bed. You will perish with cold."

"But, mother," replied Julia, brushing away the tear which was gathering, "I promised Mr.———, the tailor, that I would have it done this evening, and besides there is nothing left in the house to eat in the morning. So that I must finish this, before I sleep." And again she plied the needle with assiduity.

But where was the father, and the husband all this time? Dead? No. Gone to sea? No. An unfortunate debtor immured in prison? No. But he was tipling in a Coffee House, upon the fee he had that day by accident secured, for transacting a little piece of law business. And who was he? Once he was the most splendid lawyer in the city of——, but now was an outcast drunkard. The fearful habit of taking a little had wound a chain around him which he ineffectually struggled to break. One after another of his clients left him, and one after another of his friends forsook him, until almost unawares to himself, he found himself pennyless, houseless, friendless, and a street drunkard. His companion sunk under the blow, and became an invalid. His beautiful Julia, raised in luxury and tenderness, for a while grieved, but as want, absolute want, pressed, she aroused herself to meet the exigency. For a year she had supplied the scanty living of the family, whilst her unnatural parent was expending every cent he could get for the maddening liquor.—But it was evident that her strength was gradually sinking under the task.

"Julia, my daughter," again said the invalid mother, in a voice feebled and choked with grief, "what is to become of us," I feel that I cannot stand it much longer, and you will die from exposure."

"O, mother, dont say so," replied Julia in a tone of assumed cheerfulness, but which trembled with emotion, "for God has not forsaken us yet. He will sustain us."

"Oh, who would have supposed that we could ever have been reduced to this!—Dear George, they lay all the blame on him, but it belongs to those who made him a drunkard.

He was generous and noble once, and would have scorned the idea of seeing his wife and child suffer want! But now he does not notice it, and we soon shall be gone, I feel it!" And here the disconsolate woman burst into tears, and Julia, notwithstanding all her efforts, wept aloud.

But God had seen the sufferings of these two lovely beings, and prepared deliverance for them. The father had found his way home amid the peltings of the storm. The window curtain was drawn a little aside, and through a broken pane of glass he had seen and heard all that had passed. His heart was penetrated, remorse fastened on his soul, and he bowed down and solemnly vowed, that, God strengthening him he would never again drink a drop of alcoholic drink. He rose from his knees another being, and as he entered his dwelling, still somewhat under the influence of liquor, he addressed his wife and child in a tone of affection which had not saluted their ears for months. Both started at it, as though some voice had addressed them from heaven. But little was said. The morning came, and the first thing the father did was to search out the Washingtonian pledge, and sign it. Now he felt that he was a rescued man, and the energies of his mind as if relieved from bondage again, acted with their former powers. He sought the court room, and as he entered it, his former partner saw the change, and shaking him by the hand, exclaimed,

"You have reformed, hav'nt you, George?"

"Yes, by God's help, I have, and a few moments ago I signed the pledge."

The lawyer amazed, held up his hands and exclaimed, "Gracious heavens, what can not the Washingtonians accomplish!"

His former associates and admirers crowded around him, to shake his hand, and in five minutes the street drunkard was reinstated. The reformed man's eye moistened as he fervently ejaculated, "God bless you my friends for this."

"But come George," said his partner with all the familiarity of former days, "come, you must plead the cause of this widow, whose property is at stake and here is the fee," and he placed in his hands a $100 bill. "If we gain the cause it will be increased to $500." The reformed man seemed stunned with astonishment, as prosperity thus poured upon him, but in a few moments, with his former vigor, and acumen, he was eliciting the evidence in the case. The room was thronged with people, who listened to every question with the intensest interest. At last he rose to plead the case, and as his splendid mind, under the excitement of his strange situation, and the desire to acquire what he had lost, burst into strains of surpassing eloquence, a deep murmur of pleasure was heard throughout the room. The jury after a moment's consultation gave their verdict in favor of his client, and as that was pronounced by the foreman, the audience burst into loud applause; in one moment more the widow's agent had placed in his hands the stipulated fee.

It was near sunset, and Julia, worn down with incessant labor, was looking into the street, when suddenly a carriage stopped before the door. In a moment more, a servant bearing a bundle knocked at the door.

"Is this the house of lawyer———?" said he, addressing Julia.

"Yes," she replied, "but my father is not at home."

"I was told to leave this bundle with you and deliver this note," and he handed the articles to the wondering girl. The handwriting was her father's, but what it could mean, was more than she could imagine. But let me give you a copy of the little note as explanatory.

"Dear Julia—Use the articles of clothing in the bundle for yourself and mother, and come immediately to me. The carriage will wait for you. Do not delay, for I wish to see you. Your Father George."

Bewildered, she rushed unto her mother, and read the note. Hope sprang up in the soul of the disconsolate wife, and invalid as she was, unassisted, she arose from her bed.

"I see how it is," said she, "God has saved my husband! come, let us go immediately to him!" Both sobbed with joy as the sunshine of happier days dawned upon them. In a few moments more, the happy wife and daughter were locked in the passionate embrace of the reformed drunkard. It is unnecessary to trace it farther, but suffice it to say, that Lawyer——— in a short time recovered his property, his influence and his friends; that his wife recovered, and from that day forth, the father, mother and daughter were among the happiest of the happy.—Morn. Star.

THE THAMES TUNNEL.

This extraordinary work is now on the point of completion; and the boldness of the enterprise, the indefatigable labor with which it has been prosecuted, and the remarkable skill which has been exercised in bringing it to this point of unquestionable success, place it among the most remarkable scientific performances of the age.

The whole of the tunnel, nearly 1200 feet in length, is now completed, and will be opened in a very short time as a public thoroughfare for foot passengers; the workmen are busily engaged in erecting the staircase on the Wapping side, which is all that remains to complete this extraordinary work. The projector and engineer had the gratification, a short time since, of being the first who walked from bank to bank, to shaft on the London side. Those shafts on both sides of the river, which are intended for foot passengers are really grand things. They are a succession of stair cases going round a vast circular excavation, between seventy and eighty feet deep; and when they shall be all lighted with gas, will be amongst the most extraordinary parts of the whole structure.—Even now they strongly realize the poetic conception of the descent into the caverns of the Egyptian mysteries; and the view of the interior, nearly a quarter of a mile in extent, lighted with a long succession of melancholy flames, would probably have suggested to a Greek the image of an entrance into Tartarus. But, in our day, the sublime is well exchanged for the practical, and this vast and formidable-looking cavern will be stripped of its poetic associations by the passage of carters and wagons, bales of goods, and herds and bullocks.—Still it will be almost impossible to divest ourselves of the recollections really attaching to this work. We have before us altogether a new attempt to conquer nature—a great experiment to make rivers passable without a boat or bridge—a new and capable contrivance for expediting the intercourse of mankind. The stone bridge is at all times the most expensive edifice in the world, and the bridge of boats is liable to accidents, and always certain to be broken up in every instance of a flood.—Besides this, the fixed bridge blocks up the navigation of the river for all vessels beyond the size of a barge or a small steamboat. The expense of the stone bridge is also enormous. Waterloo bridge cost upwards of a million—London bridge about as much more—Westminster and Blackfriars bridges, which were built at a cheaper rate, and in cheaper times, so constantly demand repairs that they probably have cost more than either of the modern ones; but the Tunnel has the advantage of giving a passage from side to side of the Thames where from the breadth of the river, a stone bridge would have probably cost nearer two millions than one, and where no bridge could be thrown across without blocking up the most important part of the Thames, that portion which may be called the great wet dock of London. Yet the expense of the whole has not amounted to more than 400,000*l.*; and even this is to be remembered as an expense greatly increased by the novelty of the experiment, by difficulties unforseen in the commencement, by several irruptions of the river, by the dearness of workmen's wages, arising from the peculiar peril, and singular nature of the labor connected with an undertaking carried on at all hours, and wholly by artificial light. All this, too, in constant hazard of an influx of the river, and the various difficulties belonging to working in a mine. The weight of a vast body of water above, acting alike during summer and winter, which at any moment might break in, and againt whose incursions it was as necessary to fortify the outside of the Tunnel as the interior, added greatly to the difficulties of the undertaking.

The original object of the tunnel was, to convey cattle, passengers and general traffic from the rich counties on the Kent side to the great mercantile region of the metropolis—the London and East and West Indian Docks. How far this will be now effected, is a question which remains to be decided by experience. But any fear of the structure itself we should regard as altogether visionary. The building of the Tunnel seems as solid as a rock. During the whole period from its commencement, we have not heard a single instance of its giving way, vast as the pressure was from above, and trying as were the damps, the ground springs, and the extreme difficulty of building under water.—At this moment, the roof is obviously as free from damp as the roof of St. Paul's! and unless an earthquake should burst it the whole fabric seems much more likely to last than were it exposed to the diversities of temperature, the heats and frosts, above ground. The especial advantage of the system of the Tunnel is, that it can be adopted in any part of the course of the river, and even in its widest part, (for few European rivers exceed the breadth of the Thames at Rotherhithe, unless where they spread into marshes or lakes,) and yet offer no impediment to navigation.

But we regard it as having a still higher character; we consider it as a noble and essential adjunct to the railway system which is now spreading over Europe, which is obviously meant as a great instrument of civilization, and which without it must suffer a full stop at the banks of every great river. For we cannot look to any resource in the clumsy and always insecure contrivance of a bridge of boats or masonry, incurring a great loss of time, requiring change of engines and carriages, with a hundred other disadvantages; while by a tunnel, the whole train might sweep along wholly unobstructed, and be many a league on its course before a traveler could have crossed by the bridge. We shall thus probaly see the Rhine, the Danube, and the Rhone passed below their beds, if the Governments of their countries shall have the funds or the common sense to follow up their present projects for the rail roads. Our impression decidedly is, that the tunnel is essential as a part of the rail way. England has a right to pride herself alike on the scientific intrepidity and the palpable value of the undertaking to mankind. Brunel has been knighted on the completion of this work. But his perseverance and talent deserve a more productive distinction. We hope that he will give us a history of this great, new, and decided triumph over nature.—Blackwood's Magazine for June.

A GOOD WIFE.—Sir James Macintosh thus beautifully describes, in a letter to a friend, the character of his deceased wife. It contains one of the most interesting exhibitions of female excellence, and the power of female influence we have ever met with. If there were more such wives, there would be less domestic sorrow.

"Allow me in justice to her memory, to tell you what she was, and what I owed her. I was guided in my choice only by the blind affection of my youth. I found an intelligent companion and a tender friend, a prudent monitress, the most faithful of wives, and a mother as tender as children ever had the misfortune to lose. I met a woman who by the tender management of my weakness, gradually corrected the most pernicious of them. She became prudent from affection; and though of the most generous nature, she was taught frugality and economy by her love for me.—During the most critical period of my life, she preserved order in my affairs, from the cares of which she relieved me. She gently reclaimed me from dissipation; she propped my weak and irresolute nature; she urged my indolence to all the exertions that have been useful or creditable to me and she was perpetually at hand to admonish my heedlessness and improvidence. To her I owe whatever I am; to her whatever I shall be. In her solicitude for my interest, she never for a moment forgot my feelings or my character. Even in her occasional resentment, for which I but too often gave her cause, (would to God I could recall those moments) she had no sullennes nor acrimony. Her feelings were warm and impetuous, but she was placable, tender, and constant. Such was she whom I have lost; and I have lost her when her excellent natural sense was rapidly improving, and after eight years of struggle and distress had bound us fast to each other—when a knowledge of her worth had refined my youthful love into friendship, before age had deprived it of much of its original ardor—I lost her, alas! (the choice of my youth and the partner of my misfortunes,) at a moment when I had a prospect of her sharing my better days.

The philosophy which I have learnt, only teaches me that virtue and friendship are the greatest of human blessings, and that their loss is irreparable. It aggravates my calamity, instead of consoling me under it. My wounded heart seeks another consolation. Governed by these feelings, which have in every age and region of the world actuated the human mind, I seek the relief, and I find it, in the soothing hope and consolatory opinion, that a benevolent wisdom inflicts the chastisement, as well as bestows the enjoyment of human life; that superintending goodness will one day enlighten the darkness which surrounds our nature, and hangs over our prospects; that this dreary and wretched life is not the whole of man; that an animal so sagacious and provident, and capable of such proficiency in science and virtue, is not like the beasts that perish; that there is a dwelling-place prepared for the spirits of the just, and that the ways of God will yet be vindicated to man. The sentiments of religion, which were implanted in my mind in early youth, and which were revived by the awful scenes which I have seen passing before my eyes in the world, are I trust deeply rooted in my heart by this great calamity."—Rel. Mag.

THE JOYS OF HOME.

O, what so refreshing, so soothing, so satisfying, as the placid joys of home!

See the traveler. Does duty call him for a season to leave his beloved circle? The image of his earthly happiness continues vividly in his remembrance. It quickens him to diligence; it cheers him under difficulties; it makes him hail the hour which sees his purpose accomplished, and his face turned towards home; it communes with him as he journeys; and he hears the promise which causes him to hope 'thou shalt know also that thy tabernacle shall be in peace; and thou shalt visit thy habitation and not sin.'—O, the joyful reunion of a divided family—the pleasures of renewed interview and conversation after days of absence.

Behold the man of science. He drops the labor and painfulness of research, closes his volume, smooths his wrinkled brow, leaves his study, and, unbending himself, stoops to the capacities, yields to the wishes, and mingles with the diversions of his children.

'He will not blush that has a father's heart,
To take in childish play a childish part
But bends his sturdy back to any toy
That youth takes pleasure in to please his boy.'

Take the man of trade. What reconciles him to endure the fastidiousness and impertinence of customers? What rewards him for so many hours of tedious confinement? By and by the season of intercourse will arrive; he will be embosomed in the caresses of his family, he will behold the desire of his eyes, and the children of his love, for whom he resigns his ease; and in their welfare and smiles he will find his recompense.

Yonder comes the laborer. He has borne the burden and heat of the day; the descending sun has released him from his toil, and he is hastening home to enjoy repose. Half way down the lane, by the side of which stands his cottage, his children run to meet him; one he carries and one he leads. The companion of his humble life is ready to furnish him with his plain repast. See, his toil-worn countenance assumes an air of cheerfulness; his hardships are forgotten; fatigue vanishes; he eats and is satisfied; the evening fair, he walks with uncovered head around his garden; enters again and retires to rest, and the 'rest of a laboring man is sweet, whether he eats little or much.' Inhabitant of this lonely lovely dwelling, who can be indifferent to thy comfort! Peace be to this house.'

'Let no ambition mock thy useful toil,
Thy homely joys, and destiny obscure,
Nor grandeur hear with a disdainful smile,
The short and simple annals of the poor.'

SUMMER PRAYER MEETINGS.—Often have we spoken of the infinite importance of making increased exertions to sustain the meetings, at those seasons of the year when the world invites, and usually with so much success, the individual attention of Christians. It is very easy at the close of a long and busy day in summer, to find an excuse for neglecting the prayer meeting, and although the excuse will not stand in the day of judgment, and hardly in the court of conscience now, it keeps the Christian at home, when he ought to be with the people of God. Let the church, then, be taught to feel that when the world pleads most loudly, the church must not relax her efforts in the Redeemer's cause, but on the contrary should redouble them; exertions should be made to give spirit and life to evening meetings, that they may attract and not weary; and no means should be ommitted to resist the current of worldly-mindedness which will now come in on the church like a flood.—N. Y. Obs.

SOUTHERN JUSTICE.—The examination of Lt. E. Smoot, for killing the negro boy, Peter, noticed in our paper yesterday, says the Mobile Ledger, was had before Justices Barnes and Schooley, and after a hearing of the testimony, was fully acquitted, it being deemed a case of "Justifiable homicide."

No doubt of it; for who ever heard of a white man's being hung in the slave-holding states for the murder of a negro?

ADVERTISEMENTS.

PROSPECTUS OF THE FARM HOUSE OF THE XIX CENTURY, OR ENCYCLOPEDIA OF PRACTICAL AGRICULTURE, containing the best mode of culture adopted in France, England, Germany, and Flanders; full practical instructions to guide the small cultivator, the farmer, the director, and the large proprietor in the improvement of an estate; the general principle of agriculture, and the culture of all the useful plants; the training of domestic animals, and the veterinary art; the description of various arts relating to agriculture; rural implements and buildings; the management and improvement of vines, fruit trees, timber, and forests, [illegible]; the economy, organization, and direction of a rural establishment; and finally, legislation as applied to agriculture; closing with a table of contents alphabetically arranged, a list of figures, abbreviations, and authorities cited.

An Elementary, Complete and Methodical Course of Rural Economy, with more than Two Thousand Engravings, representing the various Implements, Machines, sets of Apparatus, Breeds of Animals, Trees, Shrubs, and Plants, Rural Buildings, etc. Digested and Revised by a Committee of Scientific and Practical Agriculturists, belonging to the Agricultural Society of France, under the direction of M. F. Bailey, Member of the Societies of Agriculture and Horticulture. Translated from the French, with Notes adapting it to the use of farmers in the United States of America, by Elizur Wright, jr. formerly Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in the Western Reserve College, Translator of La Fontaine's Fables, &c.

Agriculture is the foundation of all human arts—the art for which man was made, and the perfection of which is the chief happiness and glory as the lord temporal of this planet. Of this sublime art, all other arts and sciences are but satellites, [illegible]

[illegible]

The 1st number will be issued on the 1st of [illegible] 1842.

All orders and remittances [illegible] to S. S. HASKELL, Publisher, 138 Fulton St. New York.

New York, Jan. 1, 1842.

 All editors who will give the above [illegible] insertions, and forward the papers containing them to the New York Watchman, shall be entitled to one copy of the work. 18w3

NO IMPOSITION.
NO STATES PRISON WORK!

THOSE wishing to purchase BOOTS and SHOES of superior quality of custom work will find just the place by calling at the sign of the MAMMOTH BOOT.

De Ruyter, May 20, 1842.

JOB PRINTING.

BOOKS, Pamphlets, Way, Hand-Bills, Cards, Bills, &c. &c. neatly executed at this office.

L. W. BLISS' Window Sash,
Bliss' & Co. Blinds.

Holme's Sampson & Salisbury Edged Tools consisting of Broad Axes, Hand Axes, Adzes and Chisels, at Factory prices by J. N. ELMORE,
October 4 Manufacturers' Agent.

LOTS OF HATS & CAPS on hand—Fashionable and Old Fashioned, Bell Crowned and Low Crowned; and, to crown all, and not be out of Fashion, Cash and most kinds of stuff received in payment, by HART, AUKLEY, & CO.

SILK! SILK!! SILK!!!

A BEAUTIFUL assortment of plain, figured and striped, just received and for sale very cheap at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

"A nimble sixpence is better than a slow shilling."

SPRING GOODS! SPRING GOODS!
CHEAP! CHEAP!! CHEAP!!!

THE undersigned are receiving a large assortment of goods suitable for the spring and summer trade, and invite their friends and the public generally to call and examine them at the one price store. SUTTON & QUINBY.

Notice.

ALL persons who are indebted to the subscriber, either in accounts or note, are requested to call and settle immediately and save cost.
De Ruyter, June 20, 1842. JAMES M. LETTS.

How to make money,

IS the study of mankind and of the Yankee Nation in particular. The easiest and most practicable plan for accomplishing the desired end in these times is to "Save Money," which can be done by purchasing NEW GOODS, instead of the musty accumulations of many shops and many years. The place to do this, is at ELMORE'S, whose stock of NEW GOODS is nearly equal to all the rest received in this village and who is daily dispensing great bargains to "Fortune's Favorites."
May 30

Of Drugs and Medicines,

THE subscriber keeps a much larger stock and sells much lower than those who advertise two columns.
May 30 J. N. ELMORE.

4 CASES Superior quality, fashionable Hats just received, and for sale low at the
May 23 STONE STORE.

NEW TAILORING ESTABLISHMENT.

THE subscriber would inform the Citizens of De Ruyter and its vicinity, that he has opened a shop in the second story of S. G. Walker's store, Farmer's Exchange, where he may at all times be found, and where those who are pleased to favor him with a call may have their garments made as well as at any establishment west of New York City.

N. B. Garments cut and warranted if made by competent workmen. New York Spring and Summer Fashions just received by W. P. GUEST.
De Ruyter, Apr. 28th, 1842.

FLOUR! FLOUR!! FLOUR!!!

SUPERFINE Flour for sale at the Farmers' Exchange, put up in good order in barrels and half barrels. Said Flour is made from the best of western wheat at one of the best mills in the state.
S. G. WALKER.
De Ruyter, April 13th, 1842.

BLANKS! BLANKS!!

JUSTICES' Blanks, Deeds, Mortgages, &c., just printed, and for sale at this office.
De Ruyter, Apr. 27, 1842.

TEAS, SUGARS.

CALL and see how cheap they are selling them at the NEW YORK CASH STORE. [illegible]

500 PAIRS Boots and Shoes for sale at the
May 30 STONE STORE.

AGENTS FOR THE REGISTER.

NEW-YORK.

Alfred—Thos. Potter, H. H. Baker, Joel Spencer.
[illegible]

RHODE-ISLAND.

[illegible]

CONNECTICUT.

[illegible]

NEW-JERSEY.

[illegible]

PENNSYLVANIA.

[illegible]

VIRGINIA.

Lost Creek—Levi H. Bond.
[illegible]
New Salem—Jephthah F. Randolph.
[illegible]
Lowther's Run—Asa Bee.

OHIO.

Bloomfield—Charles Clarke.
Northampton—S. Babcock, B. C. Church.
Port Jefferson—Lewis A. Davis.
Jackson—Davis Loofborrow.
[illegible]—G. N. Sweeney.
Kingsville—Julius M. Todd.

MICHIGAN.

Oporto—Job Tyler.
Tallmadge—Bethuel Church.

WISKONSAN.

Milton, Rock Co.—Joseph Goodrich, F. M. Stillman Coon.

IOWA.

Fredonia, Louisa Co.—M. Wheelock.

ILLINOIS.

[illegible], Peoria Co.—James Dunham.

The Seventh-day Baptist Register
IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY,
AT DE RUYTER, MADISON CO., N. Y.,
BY
JAMES BAILEY.

TERMS.—To village subscribers who have the paper left at their doors, $2 25, in advance, or $2 50, at the expiration of the year.

☞To office and mail subscribers, $2 in ADVANCE.

Each communication, involving facts and intended for insertion in the paper, must be accompanied by a responsible name.

No subscription received for a less term than six months.

☞All subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, will be considered as wishing to continue their subscription, and their paper will be sent to them accordingly. No paper will be discontinued till all arrearages are paid except at the discretion of the publisher.

☞Advertisements inserted on the most reasonable terms.

☞All letters and communications to ensure attention should be addressed to the publisher free of postage.

L. G. Rogers

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGIST

VOL. III.—NO 24.]

JAMES BAILEY, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.—— A. H. BURDICK, PRINTER

Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,——The SEVENTH DAY is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.—COMMANDMENT.——If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments.—JESUS CHRIST

TWO DOLLARS IN ADVANCE.]

DE RUYTER, N. [illegible] TH-DAY, AUGUST 10, 1842.

[PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

T WORK!
ry of es, and Mines,
Exposition of their
and practice
M. D. F. R. S. M. G. S.
Mem. Acad. N. S
Soc. N. Germ.
&c. &c.
ngravings

Original Papers.

For the Register.

Manner of Conducting General Conference.

We are on the eve of another Anniversary. Those who have studied the history of these seasons, marked their influence in uniting the hearts and encouraging the efforts of Christian brethren, and seen how intimately they have been connected with our progress in numbers, and in graces, will look forward to the approaching session with a deep interest. Such will feel, that whatever view may be taken of the wisdom or folly of annual Conferences, the question how they shall be conducted, so long as they continue to be held, is one of great importance. An argument often used against the continuance of our present arrangement, and one which seems to have weight with many minds, is drawn from the consideration, that of late, Conferences have been little more than a dead form, without interest and without use.—With this declaration, strong as it is, one would not do well to contend, for it is true to a lamentable degree. But with the conclusion which is drawn from it, that therefore they should be discontinued, there might be more successful dispute. It is the business of the Christian, in every department, to exert himself to preserve what is good and to reform what is bad. If he find himself connected with a set of arrangements, the design of which he can not but approve, yet the practical workings of which do not meet the expectations of those who made them, the first question naturally urged upon him will be as to the way in which they can be made to accomplish that design; nor will he be satisfied to throw away the whole, until every measure of reform has been tried.—Apply this to the case under consideration. If it be acknowledged that an annual Conference is adapted to secure union of interest and exertion, and to encourage and quicken us in the work to which we are devoted, then should we be slow to abandon this plan on the ground that it was not carried out with interest? Our inquiry should rather be, how the practical operation of this plan might be made to secure the end for which it was adopted?

But let us look at the mode in which Conferences have been conducted, and see if a reason may not there be found for this alledged want of interest. It needs but a superficial view to perceive, that on these occasions generally, preaching is the prominent item to which attention is invited.—To this a part of every day—and that the most valuable part—is given. Those hours which are likely to draw together the largest number of interested hearers, are almost exclusively occupied in this one exercise; while the business of Conference, for which all have professedly come together, and for the transaction of which long and laborious journeys have been undertaken, is crowded into such times as can not well be used for any thing else.—The consequence of such an arrangement is apparent. The great body of those who attend take no interest in the actual proceedings of Conference, because they have been attended to under circumstances which made it impossible for them to be witnesses and actors. Many even of those who were delegated to meet for the transaction of business connected with Conference or the Societies, are drawn away from most of the meetings bearing directly upon these subjects. The business is hurried through in such a form as to render it impossible that a very deep impression should be made in favor of the different objects presented; and all retire from the place with a feeling of indefiniteness in regard to the condition and prospects of our enterprises, which must be in a high degree painful. Is it surprising, then, that many feel little interest in the sessions of Conference?

Now let us suppose a different arrangement to be adopted, and see if there be not reason to believe that these sessions might be made interesting and profitable. Our brethren have come together at their annual festival. It is fitting that grateful acknowledgments of our obligation to a protecting and guiding Father should be made? Let, then, the first and principal exercise of the first-day be a meeting for prayer and praise, and listening to the word of life—an exercise which shall be so conducted that the hearts of all shall be warmed, and brotherly love awakened in each. This might be followed by a meeting for the appointment of a committee to arrange the future exercises, so that each interest might have a place, and know its place, and the minds of all be prepared for the business to be done. The following days might be distributed by this committee as should be deemed best, only giving to each Society a convenient time for a public meeting, and leaving its more especial Society business to be attended to at such intervals as might be found. For instance—and more particularly—Let the second day be given to the business of the Conference, and if it be not completed on this day, other times may be found to finish it. Let the third day be given to a meeting of the Missionary Society, in which a report of its past doings shall be made, resolutions embodying its plans and obligations shall be discussed, and the whole subject of missions so brought before the minds of all present that an onward impulse shall be given to the cause. Let another day be given to the Tract Society for the same purpose; and another still to the Education Society's interests. These meetings should be provided with business, and the whole arrangement for each completed before the commencement of the session, by the officers of the respective Societies, so that they may be entered upon with spirit, and conducted to the glory of God and the instruction of man. By this means, an understanding of the condition of all our benevolent enterprises would be in the possession of those who should attend on these meetings, and the exercises of Conference, instead of being lifeless and useless, would be looked for with pleasure and attended with advantage.

Will our brethren—especially those who are responsible for the manner of conducting the business of Conference and the Societies—think of these things, and come up to our anticipated meeting prepared to give life and interest to the exercises connected with their respective objects?

B.

Religious Department.

A SHORT AND EASY METHOD WITH DEISTS.

BY REV. CHARLES LESLIE, M. A.

(Letter to a Friend.)

(Continued.)

Let me produce, as another and a familiar illustration, the Stonehenge of Salisbury Plain. Almost every body has seen or heard of it; and yet nobody knows by whom, or in memory of what, it was set up.

Now, suppose I should write a book to-morrow, and state in it that these huge stones were erected by a Cæsar or a Mahomed, in memory of such and such of their actions; and should farther add, that this book was written at the time when those actions were performed, and by the doers themselves, or by eye witnesses; and had been constantly received as true, and quoted by authors of the greatest credit in regular succession ever since; that it was well known in England, and even enjoined by Act of Parliament to be taught our children; and that we accordingly did teach it our children, and had been taught it ourselves when we were children; would this, I demand of any Deist, pass current in England? Or, rather, should not I, or any other person who might insist upon its reception, instead of being believed, be considered insane?

Let us compare, then, this rude structure with the Stonehenge, as I may call it, or "twelve stones" set up at Gilgal. Joshua, iv. 6. It is there said that the reason why they were set up, that when the children of the Jews, in after-ages, should ask their meaning, it should be told them. Ch. iv. 20—22. And the thing in memory of which they were set up, the passage over Jordan, was such as could not possibly have been imposed upon that people at the time when it was said to be done: it was not less miraculous, and from the previous notice, preparations, and other striking circumstances of its performance, (iii. 5, 15,) still more unassailable by the petty cavils of infidel sophistry, than their passage through the Red Sea.

Now, to form our argument, let us suppose that there never was any such thing as that passage over Jordan; that these stones at Gilgal had been set up on some unknown occasion; and that some designing man in an after-age, invented this book of Joshua, affirmed that it was written at the time of that imaginary event by Joshua himself, and adduced this pile of stones as a testimony of its truth; would not every body say to him, "We know this pile very well, but we never before heard of this reason for it, nor of this book of Joshua.—Where has it lain concealed all this while? And where and how came you, after so long a period, to find it? Besides, it informs us that this passage over Jordan was solemnly directed to be taught our children from age to age; and, to that end, that they were always to be instructed in the meaning of this particular monument: but we were never taught it ourselves, when we were children, nor did we ever teach it to our children. And it is in the highest degree improbable that such an emphatic ordinance should have been forgotten during the continuance of so remarkable a pile of stones, set up expressly for the purpose of preserving its remembrance."

If, then, for these reasons, no such fabrication could be put upon us, as to the stones in Salisbury Plain, how much less could it succeed as to the stonage at Gilgal? If, where we are ignorant of the true origin of a mere naked monument, such a sham origin cannot be imposed, how much less practicable would it be to impose upon us in actions and observances which we celebrate in memory of what we actually know: to make us forget what we have regularly commemorated; and to persuade us that we have constantly kept such and such institutions, with reference to something which we never heard of before; that is, that we knew something before we knew it! And, if we find it thus impossible to practice deceit, even in cases which have not the above four marks, how much more impossible must it be that any deceit should be practiced in cases in which all these four marks meet?

In the matters of fact of Christ likewise, as well as in those of Moses, these four marks are to be found. The reasoning indeed, which has been already advanced with respect to the Old Testament, is generally applicable to the New. The miracles of Christ, like those of Moses, were such as men's outward senses could judge of; and were performed publicly, in the presence of those to whom the history of them, contained in the gospel, was addressed. And it is related that "about three thousand" at one time, (Acts, ii. 41,) and about "five thousand" at another, (iv. 4,) were converted in consequence of what they themselves saw and heard, in matters where it was impossible that they should have been deceived. Here, therefore, were the two first marks.

And, with regard to the latter, Baptism and the Lord's Supper were instituted as memorials of certain things, not in after ages, but at the time when these things were said to be done; and have been strictly observed, from that time to this, without interruption. Christ himself also ordained Apostles, &c., to preach and administer his ordinances, and to govern his church "even unto the end of the world." Now, the Christian ministry is as notorious a matter of fact among us as the setting apart of the tribe of Levi was among the Jews; and as the era and object of their appointment are part of the gospel-narrative, if that narrative had been a fiction of some subsequent age, at the time of its fabrication no such order of men could have been found, which would have effectually given the lie to the whole story. And the truth of the matters of fact of Christ, being no otherwise asserted than as there were at the time (whenever the Deist will suppose the Gospel to have been fabricated,) public ordinances, and a public ministry of his institution to dispense them, and it being impossible, upon this hypothesis, that there could be any such things then in existence, we must admit it to be equally impossible that the forgery should have been successful. Hence, it was as impossible to deceive mankind, in respect to these matters of fact, by inventing them in after ages, as at the time when they were said to be done.

The matters of fact reported of Mahomed, and of the heathen deities, do all want some of these four marks by which the certainty of facts is established. Mahomed himself, as he tells us in his Koran, (6, &c.) pretended to no miracles; and those which are commonly related of him pass, even among his followers, for ridiculous legends, and as such are rejected by their scholars and philosophers. They have not either of the two first marks; for his converse with the moon, his night-journey from Mecca to Jerusalem, and thence to heaven, &c., were not performed before any witnesses, nor was the tour indeed of a nature to admit human attestation: and to the two latter they do not affect to advance any claim.

The same may be affirmed, with little variation, of the stories of the heathen deities: of Mercury's stealing sheep, Jupiter's transforming himself into a bull, &c., besides the absurdity of such degrading and profligate adventures. And, accordingly we find that the more enlightened Pagans themselves considered them as fables involving a mystical meaning, of which several of their writers have endeavored to give us the explication. It is true, these gods had their priests, their feasts, their games, and other public ceremonies; but all these want the fourth mark, of commencing at the time when the things which they commemorate were said to have been done. Hence they cannot secure mankind, in subsequent ages, from imposture, as they furnish no internal means of detection, at the period of the forgery. The Bacchanalia, for example, and other heathen festivals, were established long after the events to which they refer; and the priests of Juno, Mars, &c., were not ordained by those imaginary deities, but appointed by others in some after age, and are therefore no evidence to the truth of their preternatural achievements.

To apply what has been said:

We may challenge all the Deists in the world to show any fabulous action accompanied by these four marks. The thing is impossible. The histories of the Old and New Testament never could have been received, if they had not been true; because the priesthoods of Levi and of Christ, the observance of the Sabbath, the Passover and Circumscision, and the ordinances of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, &c., are there represented as descending uninterruptedly from the times of their respective institution. And it would have been as impossible to persuade men in after ages that they had been circumcised or baptized, and celebrated Passovers, Sabbaths, and other ordinances, under the ministration of a certain order of priests, if they had done none of those things, as to make them believe at the time, without any real foundation, that they had gone through the seas on dry land, seen the dead raised, &c. But, without such a persuasion, it was impossible that either the Law or the Gospel could have been received. And the truth of the matters of fact of each being no otherwise asserted than as such public ceremonies had been previously practiced, their certainty is established upon the FULL CONVICTION OF THE SENSES OF MANKIND.

I do not say that every thing which wants these four marks is false; but that every thing which has them all, must be true.

I can have no doubt that there was such a man as Julius Cæsar, that he conquered at Pharsalia, and was killed in the Senate-house, though neither his actions nor his assassination be commemorated by any public observances. But this shows that the matters of fact of Moses and of Christ have come down to us better certified than any other whatsoever. And yet our Deists, who would consider any one as hopelessly irrational that should offer to deny the existence of Cæsar, value themselves as the only men of profound sense and judgment, for ridiculing the histories of Moses and of Christ, though guarded by infallible marks, which that of Cæsar wants.

Besides, the nature of the subject would of itself lead to a more minute examination of the one than of the other, for of what consequence is it to me, or to the world, whether there ever was such a man as Cæsar, whether he conquered at Pharsalia, and was killed in the Senate-house, or not? But our eternal welfare is concerned in the truth of what is recorded in the scriptures; whence they would naturally be more narrowly scrutinized, when proposed for acceptance.

How unreasonable, then, is it to reject matters of fact so important, so sifted, and so attested; and yet to think it absurd, even to madness, to deny other matters of fact, which [illegible] their evidence—have had comparatively little investigation—and are of no consequence at all!

[To be continued.]

From the Morning Star

A QUESTION.

Can a person remain in a sin-fostering Church, and not be a partaker of that sin? Sin may be in a Church for a season and still that sin not be chargeable to the Church as a body; for a reason that the sin is not under the sanction or approval of the church. And for a time, during the steps of discipline, during the course of action against the corruption of the minority, the sins of the few cannot be chargeable upon the many.

But when the efforts of the church have been brought to bear in favor of sin, and against those who are laboring to remove it, that church then becomes a sin-fostering church. It endorses the sin, and instead of being a reformatory body, is an association whose powers are lent to the support of that which Christ came to destroy. Can it be the duty of any one to remain in a church whose powers have been thus prostituted? We say no. To remain is to become partaker of the wrong and to incur the guilt which attaches to the body.

It is the duty of no person to follow a church when she departs from God. God does indeed bind us so long as she follows him. But we have personal responsibilities: we have an account to render to him for the talents he has committed to us; and the so called church can not step in to cancel the obligations under which we stand as souls bound to the Judgment seat. Every one must give an account of himself to God. The plea of public opinion, or "the Church!" can not avail at that Day!

What then can we do, but to depart from the Church, when we depart from Christ? The contrary doctrine deals condemnation upon every soul who has left the fellowship of the Mother of harlots. Why did Luther depart from the church of Rome?—Because she had departed from God! And for the same reason every one should leave a church when it becomes a sin-fostering institution. Then "salvation is out of it," not in it!

The contrary is to put a church above the Bible—yea, above God himself! It is to set up the popish claim of infallibility for the church, and make her decrees the rule of moral action, instead of God's revealed will, if christians are not at liberty to leave her communion when she departs from God.

But a Church does depart from God when she in any one point knowingly connives at sin, or lends her influence to sustain it. As with individuals, so with churches. He who offends knowingly, in one point is guilty of all. He fosters a root of rebellion in his heart, which keeps the Holy Spirit out; and as the Holy Spirit is kept out, he is disqualified from complying with the spiritual requirements of his law. He who has one trait of the mind of Christ, has all the lineaments in some degree.—The "new man," is put with his various faculties, not with one isolated attribute.—And it requires the same sacrifice, a complete consecration so far as light extends, to obtain one of the features of the "new man" that it does not receive them all—inasmuch as they are not communicated separately but together.

So with a church in her associated capacity. When she turns her influence in support of sin, that moment she becomes a [illegible] church. And to say that [illegible] is the church of Christ, is to affirm that the kingdom of Christ is a sin-fostering institution, at war with itself, at war with its Head, and at war with the moral nature of the [illegible].

From [illegible]

INTERESTING ANECDOTE.

[illegible]

Children's Department.

From the Sabbath School Messenger.

"THOU GOD, SEEST ME."

Ellen was a very little girl, but she had often heard of God. She had been taught that she was a great sinner, and when she thought of him, she felt afraid. My dear children, you may sometimes feel afraid to meet the eye of your kind and indulgent parent, when you have been disobedient: so the sinner feels in the presence of God; he would flee away from his presence. But how can we fly from God? Read the 139th Psalm, and you will see what David said about it. "If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; if I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there: if I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me." I wish every one of my little readers would commit this Psalm to memory. Your mothers will find it for you. It is not very long. But I must not forget little Ellen.

One evening when the stars were shining brightly, her father called Ellen, and taking her out, showed her the beautiful worlds of light—for stars, dear children, are worlds or suns, some much larger than our earth. Ellen had learned a pretty little hymn, which she now repeated to her father:

[illegible]

Ellen was deeply impressed with the [illegible] which her father talked to her, [illegible] the ever-present eye of God. She [illegible] that God knew every [illegible] every thought that was in [illegible] she never felt it as she did [illegible] she raised her eyes to the [illegible] slowly after her father, [illegible] God, seest me."

Ellen went to bed, but she could not [illegible] and though the light was taken out [illegible] the room, she felt the eye of God was [illegible] She remembered that her father [illegible] "The darkness hideth not from [illegible] the darkness and the light are both alike to him." You may think, my [illegible] Ellen was so young, she [illegible] very great sinner, [illegible] afraid of God, [illegible] She felt that she had [illegible] ever-present God, and as [illegible] she began to cry. Her mother [illegible] was passing the room, heard her [illegible] and stopped to see what was the [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] dear children, that [illegible] rests on you. You cannot [illegible] that he does not hear, nor [illegible] he does not know. Perhaps some [illegible] boys that you know, use [illegible] to them as Ellen did [illegible] companions, "God sees you, he hears every word you say." If you are ever tempted to do wrong, remember, "Thou God seest me," and think whether you would like to do it knowing that he is looking at you.

I once heard of a man who went to steal something, and took his little son with him. He was afraid some one would see him, so he looked all around among the bushes, and when he was satisfied there was no one near, began to fill his bag. The little boy said, "Father, stop, you hav'nt looked every where." The man was frightened, and looking around, said, "Where, my son?" The child, pointing upwards, said, "There, father, you hav'nt looked to see if God saw you." The father dropped the things he had been taking, and went home, afraid to steal, when he remembered that God saw him. This little boy had been to Sabbath School, and there had learned this text, which I hope each one of you, my dear children, will remember, "Thou God seest me."

M.

VOL. III. SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER. VOL. III.

North and South—Free an
—The Trenton Gazette says
dolph says in a speech, that tures of New Jersey in 1840
more valuable than the cott
Georgia and South Carolina, millions; and even the potatoe
United States, at only 30 exceeded in value the Carolina, Georgia

TER.

1842.

...atson.

...Providence I will hold ... Church in Watson on ...day, the 17th inst., at 5 o'clock, P. M., for the purpose of aiding the A. S. D. B. Missionary Society.

S. S. GRISWOLD, Agent.

De Ruyter, Aug. 9, 1842.

Upon all subjects save the immediate personal claims of the Gospel, all men are willing to yield a proper attention; and yet no subject is so much connected with the present and eternal interests of every soul, as this. The Savior admonishes, "seek first the kingdom of heaven, and its righteousness." The invitations and promises of the gospel are all in the present tense, but man promises repentance and obedience in the future.

Every matter of dollars and cents receives candid attention, while almost every means is resorted to to drive the claims of religion from the thoughts, and whatever thought may be bestowed, are either involuntary, or are exercised to resist the spirit's influence. Herein is the great folly of men, that they either put far from their thoughts the subject that infinitely more than all others concerns them, or give it an unfair examination when it does occupy their thoughts.

If candor is needful in common affairs among men, how much more in the relation men sustain to God, and in the great things that concern the eternal well-being of the soul?

At a late meeting of the F. M. R. S. of this place the following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That we feel ourselves called upon by crimes committed and developed in this village and its vicinity, within the past year, to act decidedly and fearlessly in the course we have espoused.

Resolved, That the libertine, (whatever may be his pretensions to the name or character of a gentleman,) should be excluded from social and friendly intercourse with the virtuous, no less than abandoned females; and that to receive and treat with complacency such men, is, in effect, to give countenance to the foulest of CRIMES.

Resolved, therefore, That we will not countenance the guilty of either sex, by inviting them to our houses or social parties; or by visiting them at theirs, except on errands of necessity or mercy.

Resolved, That we disclaim the idea inculcated by some, of all persons being alike degraded in their sentiments and habits of life; and feel that those who advocate it, give fearful evidence of deep depravity of heart, and of being themselves involved in the guilt they charge upon others.

De Ruyter Institute.

The Summer Term closes to-day. The former good character of the school has been maintained. The next term will commence Sept. 9. We repeat our former invitations "to send on scholars, and the school will be well sustained." We trust the friends of the school will not let their good feeling abate, but rather renew their efforts to sustain it by sending scholars.

Our article on Universalism has been copied by the N. York Baptist Register, and by the Seventh-Day Baptist Register, neither of which has given us any credit. An oversight, no doubt.—Northern Advocate.

We are willing to make satisfaction to our Brother of the Advocate. We copied the article from the New York Baptist Register, and finding no credit there, we gave none.

"THAT ADDRESS" to the Missionary Society of the Central Association is called for. We would just say that the person appointed to write has informed us that it will be forth coming as soon as his engagements will allow.

☞REV. B. C. CHURCH has removed to Tallmadge, Ottawa Co., Mich., at which place his correspondents may address him.

Extract of a letter, dated

Tallmadge, Mich., July 11, 1842.

Bro. Bailey—I have frequently intimated that you would, ere long, hear good news from here. Although things move slow, the prospect is still brightening. Last first day I was invited to Lecture on the subject of the Sabbath. I accepted with pleasure, had a good audience, and close attention.—At the request of the same assembly, I promised another Lecture.

Yours, to serve,
B. CHURCH.

For the Register.

Let all Read, Think, and then Speak their Minds.

In my last monthly report I called the attention of those friendly to the cause of Missions to the importance of maturing some plan for future operations. Since then I have had an interview with Br. Hubbard, the Treasurer, and from statements made by him, I am more fully convinced of the inefficient plan of our past and present mode of operations. In company with him I examined the situation of our Missionary Society, and find that we are indebted to the amount of about $320, for services rendered previous to the present year. The above fact I make known at his request. I find the same dissatisfaction here as elsewhere to the existing plan. Having had a good opportunity the past summer of learning the wishes of the denomination, permit me to offer a few hints further for consideration; and also in compliance with F.'s communication last week.

As the great cause of complaint lies against the standing fund, and its past management, I am of the opinion that this must become either available, or revert back from whence it come. But how are the debts of the Society to be liquidated if this be done? I answer, first, not by using the funds raised this present season; as they were given expressly for Dr. Scott's mission. But may there not be 32 of the life members, or who are not life members, who will agree to pay $10 each, and thus once more place our missionary cause on the track? I am confident there is. This would set us on our feet again, and taking warning from past experience, may we not hope that we may be enabled hereafter to shun the rock on which we have foundered? Will not the Local Agents see how many are willing to give their life membership, or give otherwise for the above purpose, and report to the Conference? Let it be done this month, that after the rising of our Society, we may enter the field anew. Thus much for the old Society. Now for a new one.

And first I see no need of disbanding the old Society, only let it be dependent on voluntary contributions. The nature of the cause to be supported, I am confident, require that aid, and that only. The reasons in favor of voluntary effort are too numerous to mention. Suffice it to say, that while the funding system has a direct tendency to lessen responsibility, the voluntary one increases it, not only in the donor, but his successors. Let, then, our Missionary operations be conducted on this principle, and I firmly believe that far more of the Macedonian calls will be responded to. Let us but have our general Missionary Society based upon this and conducted so that confidence can be placed in its proceedings, and we shall soon see auxiliaries clustering around like satellites which reflect back the effulgence of their primary.

Local feelings must be discarded, and the cause of truth must be that which excites to action. Brethren, the field is the world—a fallen, sinful, dying world. Its groans and tears—its agonizing cries have too long remained unheeded. To the church has the world looked for almost nineteen centuries, for the bread of life, for the balm to remove its disease, and for the hope that blooms to immortality. Friends! to the rescue!—A world is to be reclaimed. Under the banner of Immanuel let us go forth, armed with the panoply of heaven, and soon we may hope to see error hiding its head, while truth will stand emblazoned in golden capitals.

S. S. GRISWOLD.

Scott, August 5, 1842.

For the Register.

MR. EDITOR—The following letter to the general agent of the Tract Society, evinces a determination to meet the christian responsibility in a manner becoming a lover of the truth; and in the hope that the example may not be without its influence, I venture to lay it before your readers.

"Brother S———,

"Please to receive the enclosed for the Tract cause, from a few sisters in ———, praying that you may have the aid of your brethren and the blessing of God to attend you in your efforts in this object." Yours, &c.

Here follows a list of fifteen names, with their subscriptions amounting in all to $10,-10.

Would that it was our pleasure to record more frequently, such exhibitions of christian spirit on the part of those to whose labors the interests of the benevolent institutions of the Church are so aptly commended—that the Missionary, and the friend of Tracts might no longer languish in despair of success. And where is the church, in which the sisters have not enough of the self-sacrificing spirit of religion, to render this trifling but important service to the cause which, above all things else, they profess to love?

Do they look with suspicion upon "this using of means"? Hear, then, the great Founder of the Church: "The kingdom of heaven is likened unto leaven which was hid in three measures of meal, until the whole was leavened." The spirit of eternal Truth is thus implanted in the hearts of men, and thus eventually to triumph over error; but does not every sister know by what "means" the working of leaven may be advanced, or even entirely checked?

Do they doubt the consolations of a benevolent spirit? Let them remember the devoted Mary, and the blessed reward of [illegible] generous love.

Sisters,—and brethren too,—examine your hearts with reference to this subject, and see whether your "withholding" does not proceed from a lack of christian confidence, or of love for the cause of Christ, rather than from any fear of pecuniary destitution.

The following interesting anecdote is copied from the report of the N. Y. City Tract Society:

"Missionaries in a West India island were about building a chapel. One of them in calling over the names of his people, to see how much they would give, called the name of "Fitzgerald Matthew." "I am here, sir," he instantly replied; at the same time I saw him hobbling on his wooden leg out of the crowd. I wondered what he meant, for the others answered to their names without moving from their places.—On coming up, he put his hand into one pocket and took out a handful of silver wrapped in a paper, and said with a lovely kind of abruptness, "That's for me, Massa." Oh, I said, keep your money at present, I don't want it now: I only wanted to know how much you could afford to give; I will come for the money another time. "Ah, Massa," he replied, "God's work must be done, and I may be dead." And with that he plunged his hand into another pocket, and took out another handful of silver, and said, "That's for my wife, Massa." Then he put his hand into a third pocket, and took out a somewhat smaller parcel, and ~~said~~, "That's for my child, Massa." It was altogether, near three pounds sterling—(more than thirteen dollars)—a large sum for a poor field negro with a wooden leg. The Missionary adds, "Let me never forget the simple expression of the poor negro; let it be engraven on my heart; let it be my motto in all that I take in hand for the cause of Christ—"GOD'S WORK MUST BE DONE, AND I MAY BE DEAD." F.

For the Register.

Some things which I think are not Polite.

When I see a young gentleman mimic persons who are deformed in body, or who have an impediment in their speech, or who are deficient in mental faculties, I say ~~that~~ young man is not polite.

When one treats aged people with neglect, I say, he is not polite.

When I see a company of young men on the Sabbath, standing on the steps of the church, forming a sort of set guard in front of the doors, and staring the ladies full in the face as they approach to enter the sacred courts—I cannot help thinking that those young men are not quite so polite as they might be. When I hear a person use profane language—he may wear as fine cloth as Europe or America can manufacture, he may carry as many superb watch seals as he ever uttered oaths—he may have his pockets filled with invitation cards, demonstrating what a variety of fashionable circles have desired his company—I heed not all this tinsel, but I come directly to the conclusion, that he is not polite: let him be Esq., Capt., or General—or the Hon., or even the President himself, he is not a gentleman.

YOUNG HUMPHREY.

For the Register.

Consider the Apostle and High Priest of our Profession Christ Jesus.—Paul.

The want of a proper consideration of the character of Christ and his attributes and offices, no doubt, even among his professed followers, is the primary cause of many of the divisions that take place in the church, and many of the delinquencies in individual members. Were men to have the fact continually in their minds that Jesus Christ is that being that created the Heavens and the Earth, and still holds the reigns of government in his hands, who would dare to sin in the immediate presence of Omnipotence? Yet such is the case; and men transgress his holy law. When we look into the sacred scriptures we find that Christ is represented as possessing all the attributes of God, and also bears all the titles ascribed to the Deity, such as Omnipotence, Omniscience, Omnipresence. He is called Jehovah, Lord of hosts, the only wise God our Savior, the beginning and the ending, the first and the last, the Almighty, the King of kings, and Lord of lords, and unto his people he is their prophet to teach, their priest to atone, and their king to rule.

1. He, by the power of the Eternal Spirit, teaches men the way of life by convincing them of sin, righteousness, and judgment, for the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared unto all men teaching us the denying of ungodly and worldly lusts, &c.

2. By the same Spirit shews to the convinced sinner that he is a propitiation for sin, and has power on earth to forgive sin, and impart a portion of that faith that is unfeigned which works by love and purifies the heart.

3. He is their king to rule. Here is a most important point to take into consideration. As a king, he has a right to make laws for the government of his kingdom; and every deviation, evasion, or alteration of his laws, is high treason in us, and dishonorary to the king; therefore, it is man's highest duty to study the sacred volume of His Law, as far as in him lies to keep all his commands, as he will not take mockery for sacrifice.

I would therefore say, in conclusion, let those who name the name of Jesus depart from evil, and keep his whole law, while those that substitute their own inventions or tradition, instead of the law of God, are solemnly admonished to look well to see on what foundation they rest their hopes.

C.

Congressional News.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

WASHINGTON, AUGUST 1, 1842.

The Florida War Bill,

Providing for the "armed occupation" of the territory, finally passed the House, so amended as to make it no armed occupation at all, but merely a donation of so much land as 2,500 families might occupy, in order to hasten the settlement of the territory. The Senate have not yet acted on the amendments. In this undisguised form of robbery, there are some Senators who had little patience with it, who voted for the original bill; but it has become a law.

Steamers to France.

The proposition of the French Government, to unite with their own in establishing a line of mail steamers between the two countries, has been quite favorably received. It was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, who reported in favor of it; and a resolve was adopted directing the Secretary of the Navy to report a plan to carry it into effect, at the ensuing session of Congress. It is a good movement, compared with many schemes to promote the public welfare, by relieving the public of the care of their own business and money.

The Contingent Appropriation Bill, providing definitely for all those items of expenditure which have heretofore been left to the discretion of the heads of departments, and giving their printing to the lowest bidder, and for other purposes, involving an amount of nearly a million, passed the House to-day. Early in the session, it would have taken six weeks to pass it, at least. The bill makes a considerable saving in public expenses, and cuts off the sources of much corruption and favoritism.

Indian Titles.

Mr. Preston has introduced a joint resolve that indirectly repeals the Land bill. It proposes that no distribution of the land fund among the States shall take place, till the sums paid for the extinguishment of Indian titles has been reimbursed to the Treasury. He declared that his vote on two treaties now pending respecting a large tract of Iowa, would depend on the passage of the resolve. There seems to be a disposition to favor it.

The Tariff Bill

has been discussed in the Senate, with much attention to the details of the bill; but the majority voted to concur in the bill as it passed the House, except the proviso to save the land bill, which is still under discussion. It will probably pass by the day after to-morrow; and, if the land provision is retained, will be vetoed before the close of the week. It is understood, that if Congress then adjourns, without passing any revenue law, Mr. Tyler will convene them again the next day, for the purpose. He will be sustained, if a movement so decisive and bold should be made.

The Boundary Treaty.

There is a fair prospect that the intrigue of the ultra Slavery party to prevent the confirmation of this important Treaty by the Senate, will be defeated. Their only ground of opposition, viz: the failure to include the difficulties growing out of the slave trade in the same treaty, does not meet with the approbation of the best portion even of the Southern press, though some Northerners of both parties, are servile enough to countenance it. Shame on them! Their want of statesmanship is equalled only by their servility, as Mr. Adams very justly called their subserviency to ultra Southern feeling.

Rights of Colored men.

There has been a remarkable debate in the Senate, on the exclusion of colored men from the Army and Navy, terminating in the vote to exclude them, on the shameless pretense of the danger of entrusting arms in their hands! Six Northern Democrats voted for it!

Yours truly, P. P.

News of the Day.

Forgery on the Auditor's Office of Illinois.—A system of fraud and forgery has just been discovered in the Auditor's office of Illinois, by which that State will be a loser to the amount, it is said, of three hundred thousand dollars. The perpetrator of these forgeries is Milton H. Walsh, a young man who has been a clerk in the office of the Treasurer and Auditor for several years past, and has hitherto borne an irreproachable character.

From the Eastern Argus.

THE BOUNDARY LINE—TERMS OF THE TREATY.

We know the great anxiety felt by the people of Maine, to learn the particulars respecting the treaty just concluded between Lord Ashburton and our Government in regard to the settlement of the Boundary Question; and shall therefore proceed substantially, to state them. In the first place it may be proper to say that all our Commissioners have, so far as we know, or have reason to believe, done their whole duty faithfully. We say this because of the insinuations to the contrary, thrown out in various quarters respecting the course of Judge Preble; who, instead of meriting censure, deserves his full share of commendation. We repeat what we have heretofore said, that there has not been the slightest grounds for the vile communications in several papers censuring his course. As nothing has been said against the others, they need no defense.

The boundary is to be substantially the one fixed by the King of the Netherlands. It includes, we believe, a small strip of barren territory at the extreme north, in the Canadas, not given in the award. For the claim to the territory ceded to Great Britain, the United States get the disputed grounds in New Hampshire, also a strip about three quarters of a mile wide, the whole distance of the line of Vermont, [illegible] on the British Possessions, and Rouse's Point in New York.

Massachusetts gets [illegible] and Maine [illegible] the [illegible] payment [illegible] the [illegible] in the Aroostook [illegible] the Civil Fund [illegible] making [illegible] Maine also gets [illegible] to the [illegible] the right of [illegible] produce in British vessels to England [illegible] her dependencies, on the same terms [illegible] conditions that they would [illegible] the products of the Colonies. This arrangement gives the whole [illegible] St. John, to the American [illegible] Aroostook and [illegible] choice of markets. It is [illegible] therefore, that the products [illegible] region will be shipped to the West Indies and other British ports.

Under these circumstances [illegible] timber be readily stripped [illegible] to a good market, but that [illegible] in that section will soon fill up with hardy yeomen. [illegible] we do not hesitate to say that [illegible] a capital bargain [illegible] Nor are we prepared [illegible] lants in the [illegible] New Hampshire, Vermont, and New York, together with the free navigation of the St. John, and the [illegible] in the [illegible] valley, are not a fair [illegible] territory and [illegible]. On the contrary, we think [illegible].

The United States get less territory [illegible] quantity [illegible] but [illegible] really [illegible] question [illegible] the free navigation of the St. John [illegible].

The question [illegible] with [illegible] very [illegible] we leave [illegible] ers to [illegible] are various [illegible].

The South has [illegible] plaint [illegible] takes to pay Maine [illegible] chusetts $[illegible] The Florida war cost [illegible] the comparison.

THE [illegible]

The Wheat Harvest [illegible] country is now about half through [illegible] never was there more delightful weather, or a fairer prospect of a continuance of the same blessing. There will be but one short crop this year—[illegible]—while Wheat, Barley, Oats, Grass, Potatoes, &c. are prolific almost beyond example.—Rochester Advertiser.

The farmers of this Island are now gathering in their Harvest and there will doubtless be a large crop. Hay, Wheat, Oats, are all first rate. Corn is extremely promising. The only drawback will be upon the Rye, which will afford but a middling crop.—Brooklyn (L. I.) Star.

We regret to learn that the fear entertained for the safety of the Wheat, is in many cases too fully realized. Some fields of fine growth, we are told, will not yield over one-fourth of a crop, and nearly all are more or less injured from rust. Oats will be good. Corn is coming forward pretty well, and may yet produce an average yield. Potatoes bid fair. The ground begins to thirst for rain.—Erie (Pa.) Gazette.

Weather and Crops.—The rain of Friday and Saturday—the first which fell since the harvest fairly commenced—will not much annoy the farmers in getting in their crops. It is followed by cool weather—very cool for the season—the thermometer down to 46 this morning—a change of 40 or 50 degrees in a few days.

We cannot find, after diligent inquiry, any cause for altering our statements respecting the unequalled quantity and luxuriance of the crops, and the excellent manner in which, through the fineness of the weather, they have been secured thus far. Never before was there such an immense yield in the Genesee Valley.—Roch. Eve. Post, Aug. 1.

Bituminous coal has recently been found in Augusta, Oneida county, N. Y. The discovery was accidental. A. M. Porter, on whose land the coal was found, was digging a well, and at the depth of seventy feet, he struck the vein. Mr. P. has been offered $20,000 for his farm by an eastern capitalist.

THE GREAT WESTERN SEMINARY GOING UP!—PHŒNIX LIKE.

To the Editor of the Rochester Eve. Post:

SIR—About two months ago the public journals announced the melancholy tidings that this institution (located at Lima, N. Y.) was consumed by fire. Your readers will be pleased to know that its foundation, on a plan materially improved and enlarged, is again laid. The builders, viz. Messrs. Anderson & Coleman, of Rochester, are under contract to have it completed ready for the school by the first of December next. The expense of rebuilding and re-establishing the institution will be about twenty-four thousand dollars.

The corner stone was laid yesterday. It was an occasion of thrilling interest. A box of zinc containing catalogues of the institution; an address delivered by Rev. A. Steele before its trustees and literary associations, just before its destruction by fire; together with copies of sundry books, periodicals, &c., was deposited in the stone, to await the period when posterity shall have occasion to review the doings of its ancestry.

Prayer was offered by the Rev. Mr. Copeland, and an appropriate address delivered by Prof. Seager, the Principal; the assembly being occasionally exhilarated by the two Brass Bands of Lima, who responsively spoke to each other and to the multitude in the richest strains of melody.

[illegible] the benevolent friends of the institution lay by something in store, with which to help through this important enterprise [illegible] let parents and guardians [illegible] the Hall the coming [illegible] with students—so shall the glory [illegible] exceed the glory of the [illegible] establishment.

J. COPELAND.

Lima, July [illegible], 1842.

[illegible] Wednesday [illegible] occurred [illegible] corner of Tenth [illegible] and [illegible] streets, which deserves pub[illegible] Adams, the great lion [illegible] Joe Smith's scheme, delivered a discourse in favor of the Latter Day Saints. In the latter part of his discourse he called out with Stentorian lungs, "where [illegible] the celebrated and learned Dr. West? He [illegible] I was coming to Philadelphia [illegible] Why does he not appear and [illegible] in his power?" At [illegible] moment a portly figure started up and [illegible] the audience by stating, "Ladies [illegible] gentlemen, the person who has [illegible] professes to speak by inspiration [illegible] had he possessed what he [illegible] he would have known that Dr. West is present, and now challenges him [illegible] the truth of his monstrosities before [illegible] enlightened community.—Jour. of [illegible]

[illegible] Disappearance of Elder Orson Pratt.—The Warsaw Signal, a paper published [illegible] Nauvoo, states that information had [illegible] at Warsaw of the sudden [illegible] of Elder Orson Pratt, a [illegible]. He left a paper stating [illegible] was caused by [illegible] and by [illegible] church. He [illegible] statement relative [illegible] Mrs. [illegible] some in Nauvoo [illegible] suicide, and [illegible] of him.

[illegible] indigenous [illegible] of [illegible] A [illegible] of Fernando Cortez, was the first [illegible] in Mexico. He [illegible] grains among [illegible] brought [illegible] Spain for the use of the army [illegible] these few grains have [illegible] the golden harvest.

Mr. Catherwood's Panoramas.—The manner in which the rotunda in Prince street, used by Mr. Catherwood for the exhibition of his fine panorama, was set on fire on Friday evening last, was at first a mystery. But we think now, that there is pretty good evidence that the calamity was brought about by lightning. The building had been lighted by gas, which was conducted into it by a main pipe, branching out into an immense number of small tubes, for the purpose of highly illuminating every part of the picture. Just before the time of the fire, the gas had been turned off and all was dark within the building. The man who takes charge of it had left. Suddenly, according to the testimony of a lady who lives near, the lightning was seen to strike the building, and in a moment a prodigious mass of flame rose up. A gentleman also says he saw the same. It is probable that the main pipe was burst by the electric fluid, and the gas set on fire.

The loss to Mr. Catherwood is very severe. Four of his grand panoramas were destroyed, viz: Jerusalem and Thebes, which were in exhibition, and Lima and another, which lay on the floor rolled up. Also drawings collected by years of toil from distant parts of the world, and nearly all the drawings and objects of curiosity collected by Messrs. Catherwood and Stephens from Central America.—Journal of Commerce.

Schenectady and Troy Railroad.—We learn that the work of laying down the rails upon this road will be commenced during the present week, and the whole enterprise prosecuted to completion with all possible despatch. Mr. Norris, of Philadelphia, has nearly completed the locomotives for the use of the road; and our fellow citizens, Messrs. Eaton & Gilbert, are at work upon the cars, one of which is completed, and may justly be ranked among the finest specimens of mechanical skill, taste, and ingenuity, that they have ever "turned out."—Troy Budget.

North and South—Free and Slave Labor.—The Trenton Gazette says that Mr. Randolph says in a speech, that the manufactures of New Jersey in 1840 were made more valuable than the cotton crop of Georgia and South Carolina, by several millions; and even the potatoe crop of the United States, at only 30 cents a bushel, exceeded in value the cotton crop of South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama; yet who thinks of legislation or nullification for potatoes?

Exploring Expedition.—A letter from Washington to the New Orleans Advertiser states that Capt. Wilkes, of the Exploring Expedition, has brought home among other valuable things, 2,000 charts, 1,000 maps, 11,000 specimens of plants, 4,000 specimens of fishes, 50,000 specimens of shells, 2,000 landscapes, 2,800 specimens of reptiles, 4,000 specimens of marine plants, 1,500 drawings of South Sea Islanders, 26 large boxes of journals, &c.

A Snake Pie!—A few days ago, the family of a farmer of Sunbury, Pa., baked some pies in the morning, and sat them in the cellar to cool for dinner. When one of them was cut, out popped a snake, to the utter amazement of all at the table.—It is presumed that his snakeship, without meditating the least harm to any one, crawled between the upper and under crust while the pie was cooling on the cellar floor.

Another Patriot Gone.—Capt. Rufus Avery, who was at the storming of Fort Griswold, in Groton, Ct., when it was so gallantly defended by Col. Ledyard, and who was severely wounded at the time, died at Groton last week, at an advanced age.

The Century Plant.—We learn that our enterprising townsman, Bernard Duke, has one of the Hundred Year Flowering Aloe, Agave Americana, now in the finest state of florescence. The flower stem alone is over twenty feet in height, covered with lateral branches, at the extremity of, and along which, are thick clusters of flowers. The plant is said to be most imposing in appearance, and will, no doubt, attract thousands of visiters. The last one of this kind, which flowered in Philadelphia, was exhibited for the benefit of the Orphan's Asylum, and was seen by upwards of 35,000 persons. Mr. Duke's plant will be exhibited at the Masonic Hall.—Phila. Amer. Sentinel.

We lately recorded the death of Deacon John Whitman, of East Bridgewater, at the advanced age of one hundred and seven. The editor of the Plymoth Rock, in speaking of the death of this venerable man, says:

"He was supposed to be the oldest man in Massachusetts, and his whole life presents a striking illustration of the effect of temperance, morality, and industry. For more than half a century, intoxicating liquors as a drink, has been banished from his board; and his voice heard promulgating the doctrine of Total Abstinence, when few could be found of sufficient moral courage to speak out upon the subject. He was a practical agriculturalist, even after he had completed his hundred year. And as exhibiting a life of morality and virtue, he has perhaps been unsurpassed in the history of man."

Hamilton College.—The commencement of this Institution was held in the Congregational church in Clinton, on Wednesday the 27th inst., with great interest. The degree of A. B. was conferred on twenty-three young gentlemen, and that of A. M. on Ensign Barker, Gerardus B. Docherty, Rev. J. W. Baynes, Rev. Erastus I. Gillett, Rev. John W. Taggart, Rev. Edward Sherrill, and Rev. Mr. Sunderland; the degree of D. D., on the Rev. Leonard Bacon, of New Haven; and LL. D., on Geo. Wood, Esq., of New York. The speakers acquitted themselves generally with great credit, and the compositions of some of them were uncommonly excellent.

On the afternoon preceding, an address was delivered before the Sigma Phi Society, by Professor Eaton, of Hamilton Theological Seminary, which is highly spoken of, and one also by Erastus Clark, Esq., of Utica, and a poem by Gurdon Huntington, of New York city. Orations were delivered by members of the junior classes in the evening.—N. Y. Evangelist.

Rutgers' College.—The annual commencement was held on Tuesday 20th ult. On the Monday preceding the Baccalaureate address was delivered by the Rev. Dr. Cannon, from 1 Kings, xx. 11. On Tuesday morning an address was delivered before the Alumni, by Cornelius Vandenberg, Esq. The address in the afternoon, was delivered by Rev. Dr. Breckinridge. His subject was Liberty, and his oration an able one. The degree of Bachelor of Arts was conferred upon nineteen young men, and that of Master of Arts upon twenty-two. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon the Rev. David Abel, Missionary to China.

Gov. Pennington was present, and also Gen. Pierre Van Cortlandt, who has now attained his 90th year, and is the oldest graduate of the Institution now living.—N. Y. Evangelist.

Union College.—The commencement exercises were held on the 27th ult., in the Presbyterian church in Schenectady. They were of an unusually able and interesting character. His Excellency, Gov. Seward, addressed the Senate on Monday evening. His subject was the Physical Improvement of the State, and was an able production, evincing great research.

On Tuesday afternoon, the Rev. Dr. Stone, of Brooklyn, addressed the Alpha of the Phi Beta Kappa Society; and A. Steel, Esq., of Albany, pronounced a Poem before the same body. David Paul Brown, Esq., of Philadelphia, delivered an oration before the Literary Societies in the evening. His theme was "Speech," or the power of Oratory, and was a brilliant effort.

On Wednesday, the customary exercises took place, the venerable Dr. Nott presiding. The degree of A. B. was conferred upon 96 of the members of the graduating class. The honorary degree of D. D. was conferred on Rev. Horatio N. Brinsmade, of Newark, N. J., and that of LL. D. on Dr. T. Romeyn Beck, of Albany.—N. Y. Evangelist.

A Bone Story.—Fish stories have become so common that they possess no interest whatever. This makes it very pleasant to meet with something like the following, which is published in the Lexington (Ky.) Intelligencer, of the 22d inst., and is an extract from the letter of a physician in a distant county of Kentucky, to his friend:—Eve. Post.

"Dr. G., my brother, and myself, are in attendance, at this time, upon one of the most extraordinary cases, I suppose, that history gives an account of. Our patient is a young lady, twenty-four or twenty-five years of age, who has been subject to a dislocation of almost all the joints belonging to the human system, ever since 1832; also violent spasms. Sometime last fall there commenced forming in her mouth osseous matter, and during the months of November and December, there were taken from her mouth some twenty-five or thirty bones, of various sizes and shapes, after which she appeared partially to regain her health, but within the last forty days, Drs. G., F., W., and myself, have taken from the mouth, ears, nose, throat, left arm, side and all the way down to the foot, bones amounting in all, during her last illness, to 192. One thing is very remarkable, that, no matter where these bones present themselves, not a drop of blood follows their dislodgement from any part of the body. The young lady possesses cheerfulness and vivacity amidst all her sufferings, and appears to entertain no doubt of her recovery.

Manufacture of Silk in Ohio.—Mr. John W. Gill, of Mount Pleasant, Hamilton Co., Ohio, manufactured during the last year upwards of $9,000 worth of silk goods.—His clear profit on the capital invested was ten per cent. He has three large cocooneries, and commenced this season to feed upwards of two millions of worms, which, he calculates, will yield him upwards of six hundred bushels of cocoons, worth at present prices $2,000, but much more to him, as he will manufacture the whole crop into various fabrics.

A New Species of Hunting.—As the harbor boat C. C. Trowbridge, was going out on Monday evening, to tow a schooner into the river, the captain was informed by some hunters that a large buck had been chased into the lake. The captain and his hands kept a sharp look out for some time, and at length discovered the buck about a quarter of a mile distant, with nose and horns only out of water. The boat immediately gave chase, and after a race of over two miles, succeeded in capturing him. He was taken on board and brought to town alive, and butchered by Mr. Byrnes. This is certainly a new species of hunting.—Milwaukie Courier.

Autopsy of the Duke of Orleans.—A post mortem examination of the remains of the Duke was made by several surgeons of Paris at the request of the King. The results were as follows:—

First, that the death of the Prince was caused by a fracture of the posterior part of the skull, extending from one ear to the other, and ascending to the frontal bone, which was almost entirely severed from the head. Secondly, that all the other organs of His Royal Highness were perfectly sound, and in such a state of preservation as to admit of a belief that the Prince, whose constitution was excellent, and whose mode of living was admirably regular, would have lived to a great age. Another result from the autopsy is a conviction in the minds of the faculty, that the head of the Prince had sustained all the force of the fall, as no other part of His Royal Highness's person was seriously injured, and hence they infer that he did not jump out of his carriage, but was thrown out suddenly by some violent shock while he was standing up. When the autopsy was completed, the process of embalmment was performed by the same medical commission. This occupied five hours more, being perfected by half-past five in the afternoon. The body was wrapped in a waxed cloth and laid in a leaden coffin, which was lined with white satin, the head being raised on a pillow covered with the same material. Over the body was placed the Prince's Royal uniform of a general officer, with his epauletts, his ribbon, and other insignia of the order of the Legion of Honor, his sword, and his African Kepy. This done, the interstices were filled up with wadding. The proces verbal was then signed by the persons present, rolled up, put into a bottle hermetically sealed, and placed in the coffin, which was immediately after soldered up, and enclosed in an oak case, covered with black velvet, and ornamented with silver nails, escutcheons, and handles. The heart of the Prince was in like manner enclosed in an urn of lead, cased with oak, covered with black velvet. The clergy were then admitted, and they sprinkled the august remains with holy water. This being done, the coffin and urn were carried back into the chapel, and replaced on the cenotaph.

The Harvest.—The wheat harvest, in this county, is now about half through with, and never was there more delightful weather—or a fairer prospect of a continuance "of the same blessing." There will be but one short crop this year—corn, while wheat, barley, oats, grass potatoes, &c., &c., are prolific almost beyond example.—Verily we ought to be a distressed people. Rochester Adv.

Riot in Philadelphia.—A severe fight took place between the blacks and whites, in the south part of Philadelphia, yesterday forenoon. From fifteen hundred to two thousand blacks were engaged in it, and as many whites. The excitement was caused by a procession of the blacks, who were marching through the streets for the purpose of some celebration. The pavements were torn up, and stones thrown in every direction. It is not as yet known who was injured. In the evening the disturbances were renewed, by an attack upon a hall for discussion, that the blacks are building in the city.—Eve. Post.

Important Arrest.—A young man named Horace Pagnud, first clerk in the auditor's office, Miss., was arrested in this city yesterday, says the Buffalo Commercial of Friday, by Sheriff Brown on charge of forging a large amount, between $70,000 and $100,000, in state warrants. Pagnud was traced to St. Louis, and from thence to this city by Mr. R. M. James, and brought before Recorder Stow for examination, which resulted in a full commitment, until such time as a requisition can be obtained of the Governor for his removal to Mississippi. The accused is some 22 years of age, and has relatives of standing in St Louis.

Alonzo B. Holcomb, a farmer of Leory Township, Pa. undertook to remove the stake to which he had kept an animal tied to another part of the field, when he was attacked and gored to death. So furious were the assaults of the animal, that the man was literally torn piecemeal, not an article of clothing was found upon his person, except the wristband of his shirt.

On Sunday afternoon the 24th ult. a son of Mr. Richard Steel, of Philadelphia, was drowned in the Delaware while bathing. From a dozen to twenty persons have lost their lives at, and near Philadelphia within a few days, in the same way.

Quite an excitement prevailed at Albany on Tuesday last, on information that some emigrants who had arrived in a tow boat from New York, had several cases of small pox. They were properly taken care of.

The Wheeling Times of Tuesday say of the crops of Western Virginia—"We were out on the Cross Creek hills the other day, where our visual orb could embrace an expanse of country scarcely less than 60 miles in circumference, in Ohio, Virginia, and a little in Pennsylvania, and the whole country appeared almost a wilderness of wheat stacks. We query whether there ever was so much raised on the same ground."

By the Richmond Aurora of the 15th inst. we learn that a supposed insurrection amongst the blacks, in Smyth county Va. has been discovered and put down. The ringleaders have been arrested and imprisoned. They intended killing all the old people, and making slaves of the young ones.

The quantity of land given by the bill now before Congress for the armed occupation of Florida, exceeds 100,000 acres. The value is estimated at a million of dollars.

It is stated that all who have bought cotton within the last six months, and shipped it to Europe on their own account, will lose from $3 to $5 per bale—constituting a loss of $2,000,000; to be supported by the merchants and planters of Louisiana and Mississippi.

The manufacture of candles from lard is another step in the progress of improvement. It has been done by Dr. Figures, of Franklin, Tennessee. The Nashville Union describes them as possessing superior excellence and brilliancy, as fully equal to sperm in everything but their appearance, and can be rendered superior in every particular. They last longer, give a more brilliant light, and can be afforded at a cost of 50 per cent. less.

An Extra Session of the Ohio Legislature commenced at Columbus, on the 25th ult. The ostensible object of the meeting was the districting of the State according to the new apportionment. In both branches of the Legislature, on the first day, resolutions were offered denying the right of Congress to pass a law defining the manner in which members should be elected.

In the town of Kennebunk, Me., 7000 panes of glass were broken by the hail and wind during a storm. Mr. John Chadborn of Alfred was killed by lightning.

An American Atheneum has been founded in a central part of Paris, by the liberality of George Gibbs, Esq., of South Carolina, and the subscription from most of his resident countrymen.

It is officially announced in the London Gazette, that the expenditures of the United kingdom during the year ending 5th of April last, exceeded the revenue by the sum of $2,139,984, and that therefore nothing will be applied to the reduction of the national debt between the 7th of July and the 10th of October.

The number of births in France in 1839 was 957,740; of deaths, 780,600; of marriages, 266,890. The population of France now amounts to 33,540,000. Deaths in Paris, in 1840, 28,294.

A lad, named George Wright, was drowned while bathing at Rochester, on the 27th ult. His parents forbid his going to bathe; he disobeyed, and his disobedience cost him his life.

Two men named L. B. Parker and Wm. Stewart risked their lives in Baltimore, a day or two ago, and saved an old lady from drowning. Pass round their names.

Notices.

[illegible] THE MISSIONARY AGENT [illegible] are as follows:

" Verona first church on the second Sabbath in August.
" Second church in Verona on first day following the second Sabbath, at 5 o'clock P. M.
" Adams on the third Sabbath in Aug
" Hounsfield church on first day following the third Sabbath, at such time and place as the brethren will please to see appointed.
" Berlin on the fourth Sabbath in Aug
" Petersburg on the first Sabbath in Sept

All interested will please attend, as my time is necessarily limited

S. S. GRISWOLD,
Missionary Agent

De Ruyter, Aug. 1, 1842.

General Conference.

The S. D. B. General Conference will hold its next session with the Church in Berlin, Rensselaer co., N. Y., commencing on the first day of the week before the second Sabbath in September next, at 10 o'clock, A. M. Introductory discourse by Eld. W. B. Gillett, or N. V. Hull, substitute. JAMES BAILEY, Cor. Sec.

☞The A. S. D. B. Missionary Society will meet on the second day of the Conference at the call of the President, and the Evangelical Board for disseminating Religious Truth among the Jews, on the fourth day, at 10 o'clock, A. M.

☞The 7th Anniversary of the A. S. D. B. Tract Society will be held in Berlin on the 5th day of the week before the third Sabbath in September next. (Sept [illegible]) at 10 o'clock, A. M.

PAUL STILLMAN,
General Agent

TEMPERANCE HOUSE.

Mr. Asa C. Potter has opened a Temperance House at the State Bridge, in Verona, where he will be ready at all times to wait on those who give him a call, in good style, and on reasonable terms.

PROPOSALS

For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead,) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

ALFRED ACADEMY,

AND

TEACHER'S SEMINARY.

W. C. Kenyon, Principal.
Miss Caroline B. Maxson, Preceptress.

LECTURERS.

On Phrenology and Physiology.—Drs. J. R. HARTSHORN, and E. RIDER.

On School Teaching.—LUKE G. MAXSON.

On Chemistry and Geology.—W. C. KENYON.

Lectures on other subjects as occasion may require.

This Institution is pleasantly located, in the county of Allegany, thirteen miles South-East of Angelica, and six miles South of Almond. From its retired and quiet situation, it presents a favorable opportunity to parents to place their sons and daughters under a moral influence that will not be counteracted by those with whom they may associate.

The patronage which it has hitherto enjoyed, has been so liberal as to warrant very considerable expenditures in rendering it still more worthy of a more extended patronage; and it is hoped that it will, under its present organization, be rendered inferior to no similar Institution in Western New York.

The qualification of Common School Teachers will receive particular attention, so as to render them thorough and practical instructors of youth.

The Academic Year.—Is divided into three terms of fifteen weeks each. 1st, Commencing Wednesday 17th August; 2d, 7th December; 3d, 4th April, 1843.

Vacations.—At the expiration of the first and second Terms, one week each; at the expiration of the 3d Term, five weeks.

Tuition.—Varying with Instruction, from $3.50 to $4.75 per term.

Board.—From $1 to $1.25 [illegible] accommodations. Rooms in the Institution, furnished with Cook Stoves, can be had at a moderate expense.

SAMUEL RUSSELL, [illegible] Pres.
Alfred, July, 1842.

DIED.

In [illegible] TRUMAN [illegible]

LIST OF RECEIPTS.

[illegible]

LIST OF [illegible]

[illegible]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

IN CHANCERY. [illegible]

[illegible]

What is Economy!

R[illegible]

[illegible]

De Ruyter, August 8, 1842. 2tf

Economy is the road to Wealth.

JAMES M. [illegible]

[illegible]

De Ruyter, [illegible] 1842.

LIST OF LETTERS

REMAINING [illegible] 1842.

Allen Britton	Haskins [illegible]
Bentley E. A. Mrs	Johnson [illegible]
Baker Sally A. Miss	Kinney Nathan
Barnard Daniel	Lewis [illegible] Mrs
Bogardus Isaac R.	Snow Harvey
Babcock Thos. E.	Seymour [illegible]
Curtis Lurana Mrs.	Sherwood Adan E.
Carr Thomas	Squires Ethan
Derbashire James	Shaver Harvey
Griswold Sherman S.	Terney John
Hagan Jane	Winans Stephen
Holmes Arza	Wooley Peter R

M. SPEAR, P. M.

BOOTS! BOOTS! SHOES! SHOES!!

AT the sign of the Mammoth Boot, manufactured invariably of leather tanned in "cold liquor." Please call.

FLOUR, PROVISIONS, GROCERIES, and six hundred other things, for sale by 11tf
May 11. HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

BOOK BINDING.

THE subscriber having connected a BINDERY with his printing establishment, is now ready to execute all kinds of Binding in a neat and durable manner, on as reasonable terms as at any other establishment in this section of country.
JAMES BAILEY.
De Ruyter, June 8th 1841.

THE FARMER'S EXCHANGE is the place to buy Goods CHEAP. Oct. 29, 1841.
S. G. WALKER.

☞IMPORTANT WORK!

[illegible] IN THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION,

A DICTIONARY OF

Arts, Manufactures, and Mines,

Containing a clear exposition of their

PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE

By ANDREW URE, M. D., F. R. S., M. G. S., [illegible]

[illegible]

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings

THIS [illegible]

[illegible]

STOVES.

COLD WINTER IS COMING

[illegible]

L[illegible]

Fancy Parlor Stoves.

[illegible]

BRASS AND TIN WARE

[illegible]

LOW PRICES

[illegible]

Eave Troughs

[illegible] Also,

JUST RECEIVED

[illegible]

JOB WORK

[illegible] 5tf

REMOVAL.

JAMES M. [illegible] 1842.

20 [illegible] STONE STORE

Not 25 or 50 per cent Reward.

S. G. WALKER

H[illegible]

[illegible]

De Ruyter, May 20, 1842.

"Hard times and money scarce,"

IS the general complaint, and economy is the object of every person.

SUTTON & QUINBY have just opened a large assortment of Dry Goods, Groceries, Crockery, Paints, Oils and Dye-Stuffs. Persons wishing to make purchases are invited to call, as we feel confident that our Low Prices and Good Goods must give general satisfaction.
May 24. SUTTON & QUINBY.

BOOKS & STATIONERY.

SCHOOL BOOKS, of all descriptions, Miscellaneous Books & Stationery, at the Book Store of HART, ACKLEY, & CO.
De Ruyter, May 11, 1842. 11tf

50 PIECES BROAD CLOTHS, CASSIMERES, SATINETTES, at reduced prices at the NEW YORK CASH STORE

POETRY.

From the Louisville Journal.

The Dead Mariner.

BY G. D. PRENTICE.

"Sleep on, sleep on! above thy corse
The winds their Sabbath keep;
The waves are round thee, and thy breast
Heaves with the heaving deep.
O'er thee mild eve her beauty flings,
And there the white gull lifts her wings,
And there the blue halcyon loves to lave
Her plumage in the deep blue wave.

Sleep on; no willow o'er thee bends
With melancholy air,
No violet springs, nor dewy rose
Its soul of love lays bare;
But there the sea-flower, bright and young,
Is sweetly o'er thy slumbers flung,
And, like a weeping mourner fair,
The pale flag hangs its tresses there:

Sleep on, sleep on; the glittering depths
Of ocean's coral caves
Are thy bright urn—thy requiem
The music of its waves;
The purple gems for ever burn
In fadeless beauty round thy urn,
And, pure and deep as infant love,
The blue sea rolls its waves above.

Sleep on, sleep on; the fearful wrath
Of mingling cloud and deep
May leave its wild and stormy track
Above thy place of sleep;
But when the wave has sunk to rest,
As now, 'twill murmur o'er thy breast.
And the bright victims of the sea
Perchance will make their home with thee.

Sleep on; thy corse is far away,
But love bewails thee yet;
For thee the heart-wrung sigh is breathed,
And lovely eyes are wet;
And she, thy young and beauteous bride,
Her thoughts are hovering by thy side,
As oft she turns to view, with tears,
The Eden of departed years."

Miscellaneous Department.

THE DRUNKARD'S BIBLE.

"Mr. President," said a short, stout man with good-humored countenance, and a florid complexion, rising as the last speaker took his seat. "I have been a tavern-keeper."

At this announcement there was a movement through the whole room, and an expression of increased interest.

"Yes, Mr. President," he went on, "I have been a tavern-keeper, and many a glass have I sold to you, and to the secretary there, and to dozens of others that I see here,"—(glancing around upon the company.)

"That's a fact," broke in the president—"many a gin tody and brandy punch have I taken at your bar. But times are changed now, and we have begun to carry the war right into the enemy's camp. And our war has not been altogether unsuccessful, for we have taken prisoner one of the rum-sellers' bravest generals! But go on, friend W——, let us have your experience."

"As to my experience, Mr. President," the ex-tavern-keeper resumed, "in rum-selling and rum-drinking, for I have done a good deal of both in my time, that would be rather too long a story to tell to-night—and one that I had much rather forget than relate. It makes me tremble and sick at heart, whenever I look back on the evil that I have done. I, therefore, usually look ahead with the hope of doing some good to my fellow men.

"But there is one incident that I will relate. For the last five years, a hard-working mechanic, with a wife and several small children, came regularly, almost every night, to my tavern, and spent the evening in the bar-room. He came to drink, of course, and many and many a dollar of his hard earnings went into my till. At last he became a perfect sot—working scarcely one-fourth of his time and spending all he earned in liquor. His poor wife had to take in washing to support herself and children, while he spent his time and the little he could make at my bar. But his appetite for liquor was so strong, that his week's earnings were usually all gone by Tuesday or Wednesday, and then I had to chalk up a score against him, to be paid off when Saturday night came. This score gradually increased, until the score amounted to three or four dollars, over his regular Saturday nights pay, when I refused to sell him any more liquor until it was settled. On the day after I had thus refused him, he came in with a neat mourning breast-pin, enclosing some hair—no doubt, I thought—of a deceased relative. This he offered in payment of what he owed. I accepted it, for the pin I saw at once was worth double the amount of my bill. I did not think, or indeed care about the question, whether he was the owner or not; I wanted my own, and in my selfish eagerness to get my own, I hesitated not to take a little more than my own.

"I laid the breast-pin away, and all things went on smoothly for a while. But he gradually got behind hand again, and again I cut off his supply of liquor. This time he brought me a pair of brass and-irons, and a pair of brass candlesticks, and I took them and wiped off the score against him. At last he brought a large family Bible, and I took that too—thinking no doubt I could sell it for something.

"On the Sunday afterwards, having nothing to do—for I used to shut my bar on Sundays, thinking that it was not respectable to sell liquor on that day—I opened this poor drunkard's family Bible, scarcely thinking of what I was doing.—The first place I turned to was the family record. There it was stated, that, upon a certain day, he had been married to Emily ——. I had known Emily ——, when I was a young man, very well, and had once thought seriously of offering myself to her in marriage. I remember her happy young face, and seemed suddenly to hear a tone of her merry laughter

"Poor creature!" I sighed involuntarily as a thought of her present condition crossed my mind—and then with no very pleasant feelings I turned over another leaf. There was the record of the birth of four children; the last had been made recently, and was in the mother's hand.

"I never had such strange feelings as now came over me. I felt that I had no business with this book. But I tried to stifle my feelings, and turned over several leaves quickly. As I suffered my eyes to rest upon an open page, these words arrested my attention:

"Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging; whoso is deceived thereby is not wise."

"This was just the subject, that, under the feelings I then had, I wished to avoid, and so I referred to another place. There I read—

"Who hath woe? Who hath sorrow? Who hath wounds? Who hath babbling? Who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine. At the last it biteth like a serpent, it stingeth like an adder."

"I felt like throwing the book from me. But once more I turned the leaves and my eyes rested upon these words;

"Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink; that puttest thy bottle to him and makest him drunken."

"I closed the book suddenly, and threw it down. Then, for half an hour, I paced the room backwards and forwards in a state of mind such as I never before experienced. I had become painfully conscious of the direful evils resulting from intemperance, and still more painfully conscious, that I had been a willing instrument in the spread of these evils. I can not tell you how much I suffered during that day and night nor describe the fearful conflict that took place in my mind; between a selfish love of the gains of my calling, and the plain dictates of truth and humanity. It was about nine o'clock, I think, on that evening, that I opened the drunkard's Bible again, with a kind of despairing hope that I should meet there with something to direct me. I opened at the Psalms and read two or three chapters.—As I read on, without finding any thing that seemed to apply directly to my case, I felt an increasing desire to abandon my calling, because it was injurious to my fellow men. After I had read the Bible, I retired to bed but could not sleep. I am sure that during that night I thought of every drunken man to whom I had sold liquor, and of all their beggared families.—In the brief sleep that I obtained I dreamed that I saw a long line of tottering drunkards, with their wives and children in rags. And a loud voice said, 'Who hath done this?'

"The answer, in a still louder voice, directed, I felt, to me, smote upon my ear like a peal of thunder—'thou art the man!'

"From this troubled slumber I awoke to sleep no more that night. In the morning the last and the most powerful conflict came. The question to be decided, was—

"Shall I open my tavern or at once abandon the dreadful traffic in liquid poison?"

"Happily, I decided never to put to any man's lips the cup of confusion. My next step was, to turn the spicket of every keg, or barrel of spirits, wine, beer or cider, and let the contents escape upon the floor. My bottles and decanters were likewise emptied. Then I came and signed your total abstinence pledge, and what is better, never rested until I had persuaded the man whose Bible had been of so much use to me, to sign the pledge likewise.

"And now, Mr. President, I am keeping at my old stand, a temperance grocery, and am making restitution as fast as possible. There are at least half a dozen families, that my tavern helped make poor and wretched, to whom I furnish a small quantity of groceries every week, in many cases equal to the amount that used to be spent at my bar for liquor. Four of my oldest and best customers, have already signed the pledge by persuasion, and I am not going to rest, until every man that I helped to ruin is restored to himself, his family, and society."

A round of hearty applause followed this address, and then another of the reformed drinkers took the floor.

From the Boston Recorder.

OUR MINISTER.

MR. EDITOR,—I have taken the liberty to state to you my grievances, in hope of your friendly assistance or sympathies at least. I am seriously dissatisfied with our minister. There are many and trying defects about him, and you can judge for yourself, whether they are not sufficient to demand his removal from us.

He is rather a tall man. I confess I do not know what height he ought to be, so as to be just the right sort of a man; but I am painfully sensible that there is more of him in this respect than there ought to be. Perhaps I ought to have measured him before this, and having found also the proper standard, have been able to tell you precisely how much there was of him. But besides other difficulties in the way of doing this, I have rather shrunk from having him catechise me about my object, while he was undergoing the operation. Whether wrong in this or not, I am dissatisfied with the man. And as I do not see how he could well be a shorter man, even if he knew what height would accommodate me, I think he had better leave.

2. And for another reason, he has sharp black eyes. This is a greater grievance than the former. The eyes are no small affair, especially of any man that has to do with us about our sins. I suppose I should get along well enough with the pastor's eyes if he was a merchant or a mechanic; for in that case he would have no direct connexion with my character. But I hear him preach, and he deals personally with me at times in my own house, and he fixes his eyes on me, and looks as if he saw the inside of my heart. And those black eyes, when the owner is heated in [illegible] of some of his terrible sermons, they trouble me. As his glance sweeps over the assembly, and now and then lights upon me, they have such a withering look, that I feel withered by them. I cannot tell precisely what color I should like to have them, but they do not suit me now, at any rate; and as I do not see how the owner will change their present hue, I think he had better leave, and then I shall have a better chance to ascertain whether his successor's eyes will suit me any better.

3. He does not enter the pulpit genteelly. He is grave and sober enough about doing the thing, but if he should alter in some points, I should be in more danger of being suited. Here again I have no certain standard. I have never seen the matter handled in any book. I fell in with "Miller on Clerical Manners," expecting to find some scale in which to weigh the delinquent, and weigh him down, but the rules there do not answer my purpose. Neither gospel nor epistle says anything about it. And, in lack of authorised regulations on the subject, I design to measure the aisle, and calculate how many steps will carry the pastor through it, and honorably into the pulpit, and send him word of the number; giving him to understand that if he don't leave the old pace, and follow the new, he may count on an early parish meeting to prepare the way for some other man to attempt to meet my views on this subject.

4. When in the pulpit I think he is a very rash man. Like a man in desperate earnestness, he drives the truth at people, not seming to care a pin how many, or who were wounded by his missiles. He fires all sorts of artillery, great and small, and as he takes care to have his guns well loaded, they do not go off in vain. He does not seem to have any of that kind of prudence and caution, which would be evinced by rebuking only certain kinds of wickedness, and thus shooting over our heads. But he drives at every species of iniquity, as though mercilessly bent on being the death of every old serpent, and all the young ones too. There is no getting out of his way. I have left off some habits, expecting never to hear the hissing of another shot; but to my confusion, he seems to have no hesitation to aim his ordnance at every thing wrong in me that yet dare show its head. I seldom get through a Sabbath without a wound. There is no prudence nor mercy in the man. It is intolerable, that a man should be suffered to wield sharp and terrible weapons with so much rashness. And a few of us are bent on giving him a chance to break people's bones elsewhere. He has broken quite enough here.

5. I have also another sore trial. The rim of his hat is too broad, I am not quite sure what would satisfy me best, to have it an eighth of an inch smaller or larger; but it is not right now; that is settled.—Indeed, how he came to get that new hat without calling upon some of the most wise and judicious among us to consult with him and put the matter right, is a mystery to me. There are a number of us that would have been very glad to have had a reference of that kind made. We could have saved the present complaint. Or if, as is not improbable, we had got by the ears ourselves in discussing the matter, he would have been clear of the reproach of not having submitted so important an affair to the discerning among his parishioners. From what I know of the man, I am not disposed to believe he will suffer any interference in the matter; and rather than have a man with so alarming a defect in so important an appendage to his person, I shall spare no pains to get a pastor who will not fail of coming among us, among other solid qualifications, with the right sized rim to his hat!

6. The size and quality of his cane is a trial to me. I have not seen it often enough, I confess, to give a very scientific account of it; but the glimpses I have had revealed the fact that there is something not altogether right about that same cane. I am grieved that it is the sort of walking stick it is. It is true, it does not take any distinguished part in the pastoral ministrations, and cannot be said to have any peculiarities of moral character. Yet an exchange would comfort me. And it would be very kind and respectful in him to submit the matter to a quorum of us, who are always ready to sit in council on such matters. If he does not soon remove this stumbling block out of the way, we shall feel that this addition to other grievances will result in an effort to have such a pastor here as will take special pains to please us about the size of his cane.

7. I have farther to complain of frequently recurring instances of incivility.—There are a number of us who occupy the Sabbath as a day of rest, and our morning slumbers, in consequence, make our arrival at the sanctuary less exact in regard to seasonableness than some of our puritanical neighbors. Besides our greetings at the church door, the giving and receiving of news there, and now and then the disposal of the fag-end of a political discussion, makes our arrival at our pews somewhat bordering on "sermon time." I have felt annoyed on such occasions by the fact that there was so general an interest in the congregation to know who the late comer was, as to bring a thousand eyes upon me, and not unfrequently those black ones in the pulpit; and then that pause in the services by the pastor, that made my footsteps sound like those of a heavy dragoon, and my shutting the pew-door, though very softly done, resound like the iron gate of a prison!

Now all this is intolerable. And all my trouble in the premises might be easily saved. Let the preacher wait for me. It is very uncivil to leave a man behind so. And if he cannot accommodate me in this thing, he had better leave this parish behind him, and we will see if we cannot find a man who will not start the cars till he is very certain every passenger is on board, myself in particular.

Mr. Editor, I did not intend to have trespassed so long upon your patience, but when one gets to traveling over the territory of his sorrows, he cannot finish in a hurry. I do not know that you can give me any relief. I beg your kind aid if you can.

AN AFFLICTED PARISHIONER.

RELATIVE HEIGHT OF THE ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC OCEANS.—The following facts are extracted from an article in the Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society at London, for 1830. In Nov. 1827, Mr. J. A. Lloyd received a special commission from Gen. Bolivar to make a survey of the Isthmus of Panama and Darien, in order to ascertain the best line for a communication by road or canal between the two seas.—Operations were commenced May 5, 1828, at Panama, and he arrived at the banks of the River Chagres, June 30, having leveled the distance of 22 miles and three-fourths, and being now 170 feet above high water mark in the Pacific. Operations were suspended on account of the inclemency of the season. Feb. 7, 1829, leveling was resumed along the course of the river. To Cruces, distant 10 miles, the descent was 115 feet, and to La Bruja, nearly 12 miles distant from the mouth of the Chagres, and nearly 82 miles from Panama, the descent was 08 feet. From La Bruja there is no perceptible current to the sea: that is, high water mark in the Pacific was found 13 feet and a half higher than high water mark in the Atlantic at Chagres. The difference between the highest and lowest tides of Panama is 27½ feet: at Chagres on the Atlantic the rise and fall of the tide is 1 foot 2 inches. The time of high water is nearly the same at both places. The following are the principal results of these observations:—1. The mean height of the Pacific at Panama is 352 feet higher than that of the Atlantic at Chagres. 2. At high water the Pacific is highest 1,355 feet. 3. At low water the Pacific is lower than the Atlantic 651 feet.—Ohio Obs.

THE RUSSIAN BOY.—Prodigies of musical talent in mere children, which would appear to be amongst the wildest freaks of nature, have been of no uncommon occurrence, from the days of Mozart down to Lizty, but there has rarely been presented a more striking example of it than that of Antoina Rubinstein, a boy not more than twelve years of age, who has just arrived in London from Moscow. His instrument is the piano forte, over the difficulties of which he has acquired a perfect command, in the ancient as well as the modern style of playing, being equally at home in the fugue of Bach, and the caprice of Talberg and his school. But this is his least striking quality.

We have seen numbers of children exercised rather than exhibited in public, whose constraint has betrayed the sacrifices the perfection of their mechanism has cost them, but this boy is all play and sport, and rolls his head and long hair over the keys while he is playing, without in the least disturbing his most complicated passages, imitating at the same time, in a grotesque manner, the peculiar trickeries of the composer upon whose music he is engaged. At present the knowledge of his talent has not travelled out of a few select musical circles, but it has astonished all who have heard him, as well for its rarity, as for the ease and playfulness which attended the display of it.—London Times.

BEST MANNER OF SUPPORTING NEWSPAPERS.—The following remarks of a contemporary, on the best manner of supporting a newspaper, are true to the letter.—We commend them to the consideration of the public.

"Much depends upon the supporters of a newspaper whether it is conducted with spirit and interest—if they are negligent in their payment, the pride and ambition of the editor is broken down—he works at a thankless and unprofitable task—he becomes discouraged and careless—his paper loses its pith and interest, and dies. But on the contrary, if his subscribers are of the right sort—if they are punctual, liberal hearted fellows—always in advance on the subscription list—taking an interest in increasing the number of his subscribers—now and then speaking a good word for his paper; cheering him on in his course by smiles of approbation; with such subscribers as these, I would forswear comfort, ease, leisure,—every thing that could possibly step between me and the gratification of every laudable desire on their part; I would know no other pleasure but their satisfaction. How much then can the supporters of a newspaper do, to make it interesting and respectable—indeed, without concurring efforts on their part, the publisher of a paper will not, can not bestow the attention which is necessary to make it what it should be."

DRY YEAST.—The following kind of yeast is very convenient, and those who have tried it, say it answers an excellent purpose, and is not injured by keeping any length of time. Make a very strong hop tea; wet rye meal thoroughly with it, and spread it to dry in crumbs. Put it away in bags. When you want to use it, put a teacup full in soak over night, in the chimney-corner; in the morning, add about two gills of lukewarm water, and thicken it with flour, about as thick as pancakes. If kept moderately warm, it will be ready for use in a short time. This is enough for eight loaves.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

PROSPECTUS OF THE FARM HOUSE OF THE XIX CENTURY, OR ENCYCLOPEDIA OF PRACTICAL AGRICULTURE, containing the best mode of culture adopted in France, England, Germany, and Flanders; full practical instructions to guide the small cultivator, the farmer, the director, and the large proprietor in the improvement of an estate; the general principle of agriculture, and the culture of all the useful plants; the training of domestic animals, and the veterinary art; the description of various arts relating to agriculture; rural implements and buildings; the management and improvement of vines, fruit trees, timber, and forests, tanks, etc; the economy, organization, and direction of a rural establishment; and finally, legislation as applied to agriculture, closing with a table of contents [illegible] figures, abbreviations, [illegible]

An Elementary, Complete and Methodical Course of Rural Economy, with more than Two Thousand Engravings, representing the various Implements, Machines, sets of Apparatus, Breeds of Animals, Trees, Shrubs, and Plants, Rural Buildings, etc. Digested and Revised by a Committee of Scientific and Practical Agriculturists, belonging to the Agricultural Society of France, under the direction of M. T. Bailly, Member of the Society of Agriculture and Horticulture. Translated from the French, with Notes adapting it to the use of farmers in the United States of America, by [illegible] Wright, [illegible] formerly Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in the Western Reserve College, Translator of La Fontaine's Fables, etc.

Agriculture is the foundation of all other arts—the art for which man was [illegible] the perfection of which is his chief happiness and glory as the lord temporal of this planet. [illegible]

[illegible]

TERMS.—The work will be published as a semi-monthly periodical, [illegible] 56 pages octavo, each 25 cents, and when completed will contain forty numbers, at $10.

Five dollars paid in advance for the first 20 Numbers, shall entitle the subscriber to the remaining [illegible] Numbers for four dollars.

[illegible] $1, regularly [illegible]

The 1st number will be issued [illegible] 1842.

All orders and remittances [illegible] to S. S. HASKELL, Publisher, [illegible] New York.

New York, June 1, 1842.

[illegible]

NO IMPOSITION.

NO STATES PRISON WORK!

THOSE wishing to purchase BOOTS and SHOES of superior quality [illegible] will find just the place by calling at the sign of the MAMMOTH BOOT.

De Ruyter, May 23, 1842.

JOB PRINTING.

BOOKS, Pamphlets, Way, Hand-Bills, Cards, Bills, &c. &c., neatly executed at this office.

L. W. BLISS' Window Sash, Blind & Co. [illegible] Elmore.

Holme's Sampson & Sansbury Edged Tools consisting of Broad Axes, Hand Axes, Adzes and Chisels, at Factory prices by J. N. ELMORE, Manufacturers' Agent.

October 4.

LOTS OF HATS & CAPS on hand—Fashionable and Old Fashioned, Bell Crowned and Low Crowned; and, to crown all, and not be out of Fashion, Cash and most kinds of stuff received in payment by HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

SILK! SILK!! SILK!!!

A BEAUTIFUL assortment of plain, figured and striped, just received and for sale very cheap at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

"A nimble sixpence is better than a slow shilling."

SPRING GOODS! SPRING GOODS!

CHEAP! CHEAP!! CHEAP!!!

THE undersigned are receiving a large assortment of goods suitable for the spring and summer trade, and invite their friends and the public generally to call and examine them at the one price store. SUTTON & QUINBY.

Notice.

ALL persons who are indebted to the subscriber, either in accounts or notes, are requested to call and settle immediately and save cost.

De Ruyter, June 20, 1842. JAMES M. LETTS

How to make money,

IS the study of mankind and of the Yankee Nation in particular. The easiest and most practicable plan for accomplishing the desired end in these times is to "Save Money," which can be done by purchasing NEW GOODS, instead of the trashy accumulations of many shops and many years. The place to do this, is at ELMORE'S, whose stock of NEW GOODS is nearly equal to all the rest received in this village and who is daily dispensing great bargains to "Fortune's Favorites."

May 23.

Of Drugs and Medicines,

THE subscriber keeps a much larger stock and sells much lower than those who advertise two columns.

May 23. J. N. ELMORE.

4 CASES. Superior quality, fashionable Hats just received, and for sale low at the STONE STORE.

May 23.

NEW TAILORING ESTABLISHMENT.

THE subscriber would inform the Citizens of De Ruyter and its vicinity, that he has opened a shop in the second story of S. G. Walker's store, Farmer's Exchange, where he may at all times be found by those who are pleased to favor him with a call, [illegible] have their garments made as well as at any establishment west of New York City.

N. B. Garments cut and warranted if made by competent workmen. New York Spring and Summer Fashions just received by W. P. GUEST.

De Ruyter, April 25th, 1842.

FLOUR! FLOUR!! FLOUR!!!

SUPERFINE Flour for sale at the Farmers' Exchange, put up in good order in barrels and half barrels. Said Flour is made from the best of western wheat at one of the best mills in the state. S. G. WALKER.

De Ruyter, April 18th, 1842.

BLANKS! BLANKS!!

JUSTICES' Blanks, Personal Mortgages, &c., just printed and for sale at this office.

De Ruyter, April 20, 1842.

TEAS, SUGARS.

CALL and see how cheap they are selling them at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

500 PAIRS Boots and Shoes for sale at the STONE STORE.

May 23.

AGENTS FOR THE REGISTER.

NEW-YORK.

[illegible] H. H. Baker, Job Spencer.
[illegible] Mason Greene, Orra [illegible]
[illegible] Stillman, Adm [illegible]
[illegible] Scott
[illegible]
[illegible] Potter
[illegible] Maxson
[illegible] Samuel E. Lan[illegible]
[illegible] Dea. E. P. Cran[illegible]
[illegible] H. P. Greene
[illegible] West
[illegible] Eld. Wm. G. [illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible] M. Lewis
[illegible] Rogers
[illegible] P. Burdick
[illegible] James Hubbard, Hi[illegible]
[illegible] T. Greene
[illegible] Stillman, William B. [illegible]

RHODE-ISLAND.

[illegible]
[illegible] Jacob D. Babcock.

CONNECTICUT.

[illegible] Wm. Maxson.
[illegible]

NEW-JERSEY.

[illegible]

PENNSYLVANIA.

[illegible]

VIRGINIA.

[illegible]

OHIO.

[illegible] E. C. Church.
[illegible]

MICHIGAN.

[illegible]

WISKONSAN.

[illegible] Goodrich, P. M. Stillman [illegible]

IOWA.

[illegible] M. Wheelock.

ILLINOIS.

[illegible] James Dunham.

The Seventh-day Baptist Register

IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY,

AT DE RUYTER, MADISON CO., N. Y.,

BY

JAMES BAILEY.

TERMS.—To village subscribers who have the paper left at their doors, $2 25, in advance, or $2 50, at the expiration of the year.

☞ To office and mail subscribers, $2 in ADVANCE.

Each communication, involving facts and intended for insertion in the paper, must be accompanied by a responsible name.

No subscription received for a less term than six months.

☞ All subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, will be considered as wishing to continue their subscription, and their paper will be sent to them accordingly. No paper will be discontinued till all arrearages are paid except at the discretion of the publisher.

☞ Advertisements inserted on the most reasonable terms.

☞ All letters and communications to ensure attention should be addressed to the publisher free of postage.

L. T. Rogers

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.

VOL. III.—NO 25.] JAMES BAILEY, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.—— A. H. BURDICK, PRINTER. [WHOLE NO. 129.

Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,——The SEVENTH DAY is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.—COMMANDMENT.——If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments.—JESUS CHRIST.

TWO DOLLARS IN ADVANCE.] DE RUYTER, N. Y., FOURTH-DAY, AUGUST 17, 1842. [PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Original Papers.

For the Register.

DEAR SIR,—I noticed in the 20th No. of the Register a query, or rather a string of queries over the signature of S. S. G., which the writer desires some one to answer. I have waited several weeks and not having seen any notice taken of them, I have thought proper to offer a few remarks on the subject, lest our silence should be construed into an acknowledgment that the practice of the denomination is indefensible. In the first place, I object to the terms in which the subject is proposed. He asks, "Is it consistent for a Seventh-Day Baptist Minister to baptise one whom he knows will not observe the Sabbath, or one with whom he will not commune, or one whom he knows will not unite himself to any particular Church?" This is not a fair representation of the sentiments or practice of those who do not believe that baptism is an ordinance in the church or the door into it.

It likewise takes for granted that the prerequisites for baptism and the communion are the same. He asks, is it consistent, &c., without referring to any standard by which the consistency or inconsistency of the practice is to be decided. Consistent signifies, "To stand together or in agreement."—Webster. A man may be consistent in error as well as in truth.—That is, one part of his error may stand in agreement with the other parts of it. A Paidobaptist, for instance, is consistent with himself while he holds to infant sprinkling and to a first-day Sabbath, whereas a first-day Baptist is inconsistent with himself while he rejects infant sprinkling and yet embraces a first-day Sabbath, which is supported by the same kind of arguments as are used by Paidobaptists to sustain infant sprinkling. The Baptist has more truth but less consistency.

One man may make expediency the standard, another, public opinion, a third, the tradition of the fathers, a fourth, the decision of councils, while the fifth may reject every standard but Divine revelation. It is evident that different answers will be given to his queries according to the different standards adopted for their trial.

A person unacquainted with the views and practice of the denomination, might be led to suppose that many of our Ministers were in the habit of baptising persons fully instructed into the knowledge of God's law, but yet were determined not to obey a known command, or were determined never to unite with any Church, although they acknowledged it to be the duty of all Christians to unite with some Church of Christ. I know of no such Seventh-Day Baptist Ministers, and I presume they have only an imaginary existence.

The subject on which S. S. G. wishes information, when cleared of all the fog thrown around it, I presume, is, "What do the scriptures require of a candidate for baptism as a prerequisite for that ordinance?" Do they require that the administrator shall have a previous knowledge that the candidate will observe the seventh-day as the Sabbath, or that he will unite with some particular church, or that the administrator could participate with him in celebrating the Lord's Supper? Our opinion is that the scriptures will not sustain an administrator in making such demands, or any others, not recognized by Christ or the Apostles.

In defending the practice of the denomination, I will not urge prescription. The practice may have been followed from time immemorial, but that will not prove it either scriptural, or right.

In all positive institutions the law enjoining said institutions is the sole rule of action. We are not to look beyond the law for instruction in regard to subjects or modes, the law is imperious, and is the exact measure of obedience: no more, no less. That baptism is a positive institution, is admitted by every one; yet many professedly pious have attempted to modify it. They have extended or restricted it as regards the subjects, and in various ways changed the mode, while others have appended many unscriptural ceremonies to the institution. In all this we see a total disregard to the rule applicable to all positive institutions. In order to solve the queries of S. S. G., it will be necessary to enquire what instruction the Savior has given on the subject. This will be found in the great Commission given to the Apostles recorded by Matthew and Mark. Mathew xxviii. 19, 20. Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptising [or immersing] them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things whatever I have commanded you. The Commission as recorded by Mark, varies from that by Matthew in phraseology, but not in substance. We find here none of the tests alluded to by S. S. G. But let us enquire how the Apostles understood the subject. Did they recognize those tests? Let their preaching and practice answer the question. On the day of Pentecost, Peter, filled with the Holy Ghost, preached to those assembled on that occasion, and many were pricked in heart, and said, men and brethren what shall we do? Here was a very proper occasion for Peter to have introduced those tests if he had understood the Savior to have enjoined them. But instead of this he said, "Repent and be baptised every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. Again, Philip went down to the city of Samaria, and preached Christ to them. But when the believed Philip, preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ, they were baptised both men and women. In the same chapter, we have an account of Philip's preaching to the eunuch. And as they went on their way they came to a certain water: and the eunuch said, see, here is water, what doth hinder me to be baptized? Did Philip ask him if he kept the seventh-day, or did he exact a promise of him that he would connect himself with some particular church, or did he baptize him into the church at Jerusalem? On these questions the scriptures are silent. But not so in regard to the prerequisites to baptism, he required faith in Christ. And Philip said, if thou believest with all thine heart, thou mayest. And he answered, and said, I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, and on that declaration Philip baptized him.

In pursuing the history of the Apostles we arrive at this certain conclusion, that they uniformly required of the candidates, repentance towards God and faith in Jesus Christ, and whenever these were apparent they baptized them. But it will be objected that Christ instructed his disciples to observe all things whatever he had commanded them. This is true, but not as a condition for baptism. To illustrate the subject we will suppose a case. A Gentile (the eunuch if you please,) is brought under the influence of the preaching of Peter or Philip. He becomes sensible of his lost condition as a sinner. He enquires what he shall do to be saved, and is told to exercise repentance towards God and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and to be baptized in his own name for the remission of sins, and that he shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. The man replies, I do most heartily repent of my sins, and do flee to the Lord Jesus Christ as my only refuge, and wish to be baptized in his name. But we will suppose A. B. present, and not being satisfied with the man's confession, should ask him, "Do you observe the seventh-day as the Sabbath?" and the candidate should reply, I have hitherto lived without hope, and without God in the world. I have paid little or no attention to the subject of religion. I am ignorant in regard to the Sabbath. I do not know whether a Sabbath is enjoined under the Gospel or not, and if there is any, I am not satisfied what day it is. I wish to be instructed into all the will of God. But what church do you wish to be baptized into? My mind is not enlightened on this subject, and I did not know that it was necessary for me to be baptized into any particular church. I wish to be baptized into the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. I am but little acquainted with church organization, and have not yet made up my mind in regard to any particular church. One thing I do know. I hate my former sins, and mean to take the scriptures as my guide, and as fast as I can learn the will of God I shall count it my privilege and my joy to do it. Now, whatever course A. B. might adopt, I have no hesitation in believing that an Apostle would baptize him, and then as he had opportunity, instruct him more perfectly into the duties of religion.

With these remarks I close the present No., and shall wait to hear what will be said on the other side, when, if God permit, I may resume the subject.

ELI S. BAILEY.

Do what is worthy of reward, but care not to be rewarded.

For the Register.

A HASTY SKETCH OF ** ******.

The little Village of   is the most beautiful in our County. Its situation, in a beautiful and quiet valley, bordered by hills, which are agreeably diversified with meadow, pasture, and woodland, renders the appellation of "the fair Hamlet of the Vale" truly appropriate.

Here is seen the neat cottage, the abode of peace and contentment, surrounded by trees and shrubbery, and by sweet scented flowers of every hue, which are cultivated by the delicate hands of the fair. There rises the elegant mansion, displaying the skill of the architect and indicative of the wealth and taste of its possessor. There also is the splendid public edifice—emblematic of the enterprize and intelligence of the citizens, and proud and valuable monuments of their liberality. In fact a picture is here presented to the eye rarely to be found in any other village of the State.

As the eye is wandering over this scene of beauty and splendor, it is almost imperceptibly arrested by a small and humble edifice, situated upon the line of the road, its front projecting a few yards further than the large and well-finished houses upon either side. Its clapboards are off, or hanging only by a single nail; its windows, instead of glass, are liberally supplied with boards and shingles; its door is off; its—but let us walk in, no matter about the door—This is the entry, from which two doors once opened into the inner apartment; but, one being among "the things that were but are not," a few rough boards slightly fastened fill the vacuum. Its walls, like the outer ones, are chalked and cawed by no unskillful hand, with obscene words and uncouth images, exhibiting the indefatigableness of the operators.

The furniture and embellishments of the inner apartment, the style, variety, and arrangement, all surpass the power of letters to describe. There is such an adaptation to the purposes for which they were originally designed, that even the most fastidious cannot withhold encomiums worthy of the subject, and in language not to be misconstrued.—Here—in this room—the gems of intellect have been caused to expand, and the young idea has been taught to shoot——paper wads! These venerable walls have echoed the wisdom of by-gone ages, the soul-stirring appeals of Henry, and the sublime pathos of a Blair. And here still, following in the footsteps of their illustrious predecessors, are those who are destined to wield the power of sovereignty when we are slumbering beneath the sod. Here,

> Our needful knowledge like our needful food
> Unhedged, lies open, &c.

Reader, if you doubt the truth of this sketch; the beauty of the village; the situation of the edifice; its external appearance; its internal arrangements; if you question its appropriateness for the high purpose for which it was designed, you are truly skeptical, and nothing—nothing will produce conviction of its truth but a visit to the venerable Edifice itself—to the School House in the Village of ** ******.

INCOG & CO.

Religious Department.

A SHORT AND EASY METHOD WITH DEISTS.

BY REV. CHARLES LESLIE, M. A.

(Letter to a Friend.)
(Continued.)

To the preceding four marks, which are common to the matters of fact of Moses and of Christ, I subjoin four additional marks; the three last of which, no matter of fact, how true soever, either has had, or can have, except that of Christ.

This will obviously appear, if it be considered,

5. That the book which relates the facts, contains likewise the laws of the people to whom it belongs.
6. That Christ was previously announced, for that very period, by a long train of prophecies; and,
7. Still more peculiarly prefigured by types, both of a circumstantial and personal nature, from the earliest ages; and,
8. That the facts of Christianity are such as to make it impossible for either their relaters or hearers to believe them, if false, without supposing a universal deception of the senses of mankind.

The fifth mark, which has been subordinately discussed above, in such a manner as to supersede the necessity of dwelling upon it here, renders it impossible for any one to have imposed such a book upon any people. For example: Suppose I should forge a code of laws for Great Britain, and publish it next term; could I hope to persuade the judges, lawyers, and people, that this was their genuine statue-book, by which all their causes had been determined in the public courts for so many centuries past! Before they could be brought to this, they must totally forget their established laws, which they had so laboriously committed to memory, and so familiarly quoted in every day's practice; and believe that this new book, which they had never seen before, was that old book which had been pleaded so long in Westminster-Hall, which has been so often printed, and of which the originals are now so carefully preserved in the Tower.

This applies strongly to the books of Moses, in which, not only the history of the Jews, but likewise their whole law, secular and ecclesiastical, was contained. And though, from the early extension and destined universality of the Christian system, it could not, without unnecessary confusion, furnish a uniform civil code to all its various followers, who were already under the government of laws in some degree adapted to their respective climates and characters, yet was it intended as the spiritual guide of the new church. And in this respect, this mark is still stronger with regard to the Gospel than even to the books of Moses; inasmuch as it easier, (however hard,) to imagine the substitution of an entire statute-book in one particular nation, than that all the nations of Christendom should have unanimously conspired in the forgery. But, without such a conspiracy, such a forgery could never have succeeded, as the Gospel universally formed a regular part of their daily public offices.

But I hasten to the sixth mark, namely, Prophecy.

The great fact of Christ's coming was previously announced to the Jews, in the Old Testament, "by all the holy prophets which have been since the world began." Luke i. 70.

The first promise upon the subject was made to Adam, immediately after the fall. Gen. iii. 15. Compare Col. ii. 15, and Hebrews ii. 14.

He was again repeatedly promised to Abraham, (Gen. xii. 3, xviii. 18, and xxii. 18, Gal. iii. 16,) to Isaac, (Gen. xxvi. 4,) and to Jacob, Gen. xxviii. 14.

Jacob expressly prophesied of him, under the appellation of "Shiloh," or Him that was to be sent, Gen. xlix. 10. Balaam also, with the voice of inspiration, pronounced him "the Star of Jacob, and the Sceptre of Israel." Numb. xxiv. 17. Moses spake of him as One "greater than himself. Deut. xviii. 15, 18, 19, Acts iii. 22. And Daniel hailed his arrival, under the name of "Messiah the Prince." Chap. ix. 25.

It was foretold that he should be born of a virgin, (Isa. vii. 14,) in the city of Bethlehem, (Micah, v. 2,) of the seed of Jesse; (Isa. xi. 1, 10;) that he should lead a life of poverty and suffering, (Psalm 22,) inflicted upon him, "not for himself," (Dan. ix. 26,) but for the sins of others; (Isa. liii.,) and, after a short confinement in the grave, should rise again; (Psalm xvi. 10, Acts ii. 27, 31, and xiii. 35—37;) that he "should sit upon the throne of David for ever," and be called "the mighty God," (Isa. ix. 6, 7,) "the Lord our Righteousness;" (Jer. xxxiii. 16,) "Immanuel, that is, God with us;" (Isa. vii. 14. Matt. i. 23,) and by David himself, whose son he was according to the flesh, "Lord." Ps. cx. 1, applied to Christ by himself, Matt. xxii. 44, and by Peter, Acts ii. 34.

The time of his incarnation was to be before "the Sceptre should depart from Judah," (Gen. xlix. 10,) during the continuance of the second Temple, (Hag. ii. 7, 9,) and within seventy weeks, or 490 days, that is, according to the constant interpretation of prophecy, 490 years from its erection, Dan. ix. 24.

From these, and many other predictions, the coming of Christ was at all times the general expectation of the Jews; and fully matured at the time of his actual advent, as may be inferred from the number of false Messiahs who appeared about that period.

That he was likewise the expectation of the Gentiles, (in conformity to the prophecies of Gen. xlix. 10, and Hag. ii. 7, where the terms "People," and "Nations," denote the Heathen world,) is evinced by the coming of the wise men from the East, &c., a story which would of course have been contradicted by some of the individuals so disgracefully concerned in it, if the fact of their arrival, and the consequent massacre of the infants in and about Bethlehem, had not been fresh in every one's memory: by them, for instance, who afterward suborned false witnesses against Christ, and gave large money to the soldiers to conceal, if possible, the event of his resurrection; or them who, in still later days, every where zeslously "spake against" the tenets and practices of his rising church.

All over the East, indeed, there was a general tradition, that about that time a king of the JEWS would be born, who should govern the whole earth. This prevailed so strongly at Rome, a few months before the birth of Augustus, that the Senate made a decree to expose all the children born that year; but the execution of it was eluded by a trick of some of the Senators, who, from the pregnancy of their wives, were led to hope that they might be the fathers of the promised Prince. Its currency is also recorded with a remarkable identity of phrase by the pens of Suetonius and Tacitus. Now, that in this there was no collusion between the Chaldeans, Romans, and Jews, is sufficiently proved by the desperate methods suggested, or carried into effect, for its discomfiture. Nor, in fact, is it practicable for whole nations of contemporary, (and still less, if possible, for those of successive) generations to concert a story perfectly harmonious in all its minute accompaniments of time, place, manner, and other circumstances.

In addition to the above general predictions of the coming, life, death, and resurrection of Christ, there are others which foretell still more strikingly several particular incidents of the Gospel narrative: instances unparalleled in the whole range of history, and which could have been foreseen by God alone. They were certainly not foreseen by the human agents concerned in their execution, or they would never have contributed to the fulfillment of prophecies referred even by themselves to the Messiah, and therefore verifying the divine mission of Him whom they crucified as an impostor.

Observe, then, how literally many of these predictions were fulfilled. For example: read Psalm ix. 21. "They gave me gall to eat, and vinegar to drink;" and compare Matt. xxvii. 34. "They gave him vinegar to drink, mingled with gall." Again, it is said, Psalm xxii. 16—18. "They pierced my hands and my feet. They part my garments among them, and cast lots upon my vesture;" (The soldiers did not tear his coat, because it was without seam, woven from the top throughout; and therefore they cast lots for it. But this was to human view entirely accidental. With the passage in the Psalms, as Romans, they were not likely to be acquainted. The same remark applies to the next instance, from Zechariah.

And here it may be suggested, (in reply to those who insidiously magnify "the power of chance, the ingenuity of accommodation, and the industry of research," as chiefly supporting the credit of obscure prophecy,) that greater plainness would have enabled wicked men, as free agents, to prevent its accomplishment, when obviously directed against themselves. The Jews, not understanding what Christ meant by his "lifting up," (John viii. 28, xii. 32, 33,) and not knowing that he had foretold his crucifixion to his apostles, (Matt. xx. 19,) instead of finally stoning him—the death appointed by their law (Levit. xxiv. 16,) for blasphemy, (Matt. xxvi. 65,) more than once menaced against the Savior, (John viii. 59, x 33,) and actually inflicted upon Stephen (Acts vii. 58,) for that offense—unconsciously delivered him to the predicted Roman cross. Again, the piercing of his side was no part of the Roman sentence, but merely to ascertain his being dead previously to taking him down from the cross; "that the body might not remain there on the Sabbath day," which commenced that evening a few hours after the crucifixion. From his early giving up the ghost, however, it was not necessary that "a bone of him should be broken." (Exod. xii. 46. Numb. x. 12. Psalm xxxiv. 20, like those of the two thieves, his fellow-sufferers. John xix. 32—36.) as if it had been written after John xix. 23, 24. It is predicted, likewise, Zech. xii. 10. "They shall look upon me whom they have pierced;" and we are told, John xix. 34, that "one of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side."

Compare also Psalm xxii. 7, 8. "All they that see me laugh me to scorn: they shoot out their lips and shake their heads, saying, He trusted in God that he would deliver him; let him deliver him if he will have him," with Matt. xxvii. 39, 41, 43. "And they that passed by reviled him, wagging their heads, and saying, Come down from the cross. Likewise also the chief priests, mocking him, with the scribes and elders, said, He trusted in God; let him deliver him now, if he will have him, for he said, I am the Son of God." His very price, and the mode of laying out the money previously specified, (Zech. xi. 13,) are historically stated by Matthew, in perfect correspondence with the prophet, chap xxvii. 6, 7. And his riding into Jerusalem upon an ass, predicted, Zech ix. 9, (and referred by one of the most learned of the Jewish Rabbies to the Messiah,) is recorded by the same inspired historian, chap. xxi. 5. Lastly, it was foretold, that "he should make his grave with the wicked, and with the rich in his death." (Isa. liii. 9,) or, as Dr. Lowth translates the passage, "his grave was appointed with the wicked, but with the rich man was his tomb:" which prediction was precisely verified by the very improbable incidents of his being crucified between two thieves, [Matt. xxvii. 38,] and afterwards laid in the tomb of the rich man of Arimathea. Ib. 57, 60.

Thus do the prophecies of the Old Testament, without variation or ambiguity, refer to the person and character of Christ. His own predictions in the New, demand a few brief observations.

Those relating to the destruction of Jerusalem, which specified that it should be "laid even with the ground," and "not one stone be left upon another," [Luke ix. 44,] "before that generation passed," [Matt. xxiv. 34,] were fulfilled in a most surprisingly literal manner, the very foundations of the temple being ploughed up by Turnus Rufus. In another remarkable prophecy he announced the many false Messiahs that should come after him, and the ruin in which their followers should be involved. Matt. xxiv. 24—26. That great numbers actually assumed that holy character before the final fall of the city, and led the people into the wilderness to their destruction, we learn from Josephus. Antiq. Jud. xviii. 12, xx. 6, and B. J. viii. 31.—Nay, such was their wretched infatuation, that under this delusion they rejected the offers of Titus, who courted them to peace. Ib. B. J. vii. 12.

It will be sufficient barely to mention his foretelling the dispersion of that unhappy nation, and the triumph of his Gospel over the gates of hell, under every possible disadvantage—himself low and despised, his immediate associates only twelve, and those illiterate and unpolished, and his adversaries the allied powers, prejudices, habits, interests, and appetites of mankind.

[To be continued.]

Children's Department.

BE KIND TO YOUR SISTER.

One morning there was a little girl sitting on the door steps of a pleasant cottage near the common. She was thin and pale. There was a touching expression in her sweet face, which the dull, heavy expression about her jet black eyes did not destroy.

Her name was Helen. For several weeks she had been drooping, without any particular disease; inconstant in her attendance at school, and losing gradually her interest in all her former employments. Helen had one sister, Clara, a little older than herself, and several brothers.

This day she seemed better; but something her sister had said to her a few moments before gave that expression of sadness to her, as she sat at the door of the cottage. Clara soon came to her again.

"Helen," said she, "mother says you must go to school, so get up, come along and get ready, and not sit there moping any longer."

Helen.—"Did mother say so?"

Clara.—"Yes she did. You are well enough, I know, for you always say you are sick just at school-time. Get your bonnet, for I shan't wait."

Helen got up slowly, and wiping away with her apron the tear that had started in her eye, she made her preparations to obey her mother's command.

Now Clara had a very irritable disposition. She could not bear to have Helen receive any more attention or sympathy than herself; and unless she was really so sick as to excite fears, she would never allow that she was sick at all. She had determined not to go to school along this morning, and therefore had persuaded her mother to make her sister go with her. In a few moments they were both ready. Their dinner had been packed in a large basket which stood in the entry.

"Helen," said Clara, "I've carried the basket every day for a week, it's your turn now.

H.—"But it's twice as heavy now; I can but just lift it."

C.—"Well, I dont care. I have got my Geography and Atlas to carry, so take it up and come along—I shan't touch it.

Helen took up the basket without saying another word, though it required all her little strength; and walked slowly behind her sister. She tried hard to keep from crying, but the tears would come as fast as she could wipe them off. They walked on thus, in silence, for about a quarter of an hour. Clara felt too much ill-humored to take any notice of her sister. She knew she had done wrong, but was too proud to give up, and was determined to "hold," excusing herself by thinking, well, Helen is always saying she is sick, and making a great fuss, it's just good enough for her. When she had reached the half-way stone, she had half a mind not to let her rest there, as usual; but the habit was too strong to be easily broken, and she sat down sullenly to wait for Helen to come up.

The broad flat stone was shaded by a beautiful weeping willow, and around the trunk of this tree ran a little brook. It would seem as if the beauty of this place would have charmed away the evil spirit which was raging in Clara's breast—but no! The cool shade brought no refreshment to those evil passions. She sat sullenly till Helen came up, and then began to scold her for being so slow.

"Why don't you come along faster, Helen? You will be too late to school, and I don't care if you are, you deserve a good scolding for acting so."

"Why, Clara, I am tired—my head does ache, and this basket is very heavy. I do think you ought to carry it the rest of the way."

"Do give it to me, then," said Clara, and she snatched it from her with such violence that the cover came off—the tarts and the apples rolled out, and fell in the water, the gingerbread followed, and the pie rolled into the dirt. It has been truly said, "anger is a short madness," for how little reason have those who indulge in it. Helen was not to blame for the accident; but Clara did not stop to think of this.—Vexed at having lost her dinner, she turned and gave her sister a push, and then walked on as rapidly as possible. Oh! could she have foreseen the consequence of this rash act. Could she have known the bitter anguish which it would afterwards cause her, worlds would not have tempted her to do it; but Clara was angry. Helen was seated just on the edge of the water, and she fell in, it was not deep. She had waded there many a day, with her shoes and stockings off, and she easily got out, but it frightened her very much, and took away all her strength. She could not even call to her sister, or cry.

A strange feeling came over her, such as she had never known before. She laid her head on the stone, and closed her eyes, and thought she was going to die, and wished her mother was there. Then she seemed to sleep for a few moments, but bye and bye she felt better, and getting up, she took her empty basket and walked on as fast as she could towards school.

It was nearly half done when she got there; and as she entered the room, all noticed her pale face and wet dress. She took her seat, leaned her aching head upon her hand, and attempted to study, but in vain. She could not fix her attention at all. The strange feeling came over her again—the letters became mingled together—the room became dark—the thrill voice of the little child screaming its A B C in front of her desk, grew fainter and fainter—her head sunk upon her book, and she fell to the floor. Fainting was so unusual in this school that all was instantly confusion, and it was some minutes before the teacher could restore order. Helen was brought to the air, two of her companions despatched for water, and none were allowed to remain near, except Clara who stood by, trembling from head to foot, and almost as white as the insensible object before her. O! what a moment of anguish was this—deep, bitter anguish—her anger melted away at once, and she would almost have sacrificed her own life, to recall the events of the morning. If Helen only recovered, she would spend the future in endeavoring to atone for past unkindness. It seemed for a short time, indeed, as if she would be called upon to fulfil her promises. Helen gradually grew better, and in about an hour was apparently as well as usual. It was judged best, however, for her to return home, and a farmer who happened to pass by in a new gig, very kindly offered to take her.

Clara could not play with the girls as usual. Her heart was full, and she was very impatient, to be once more by her sister's side. O! how eagerly she watched the sun in his passage round the school house; and when at length he threw his slanting beams in through the west window, she was the first to obey the joyful signal, and books, paper, pen, ink and slate, instantly disappeared from her desk.

Clara did not linger on her way home. She even passed the half-way stone with no other notice than a deep sigh. She hurried to her sister's bed-side, impatient to make up by every little attention for her unkindness. Helen was asleep. Her face was no longer pale, but flushed with a burning fever. Her little hands were hot; and she tossed restlessly about on her pillow; she would mutter to herself, "stop, stop," and then again beg her not to throw her to the fishes.

Clara watched long in agony for her to wake. This she did at last, but it brought no relief to the distressed sister and friends. She did not know them, and continued to talk incoherently about the events of the morning. It was too much for Clara to bear; she retired to her own room, and lonely bed, and wept there. By the first dawn of light, she was at her sister's bedside; but there was no alteration. For three days Helen continued in this state. At the close of the third day, Helen gave signs of returning consciousness—recognized her mother, and anxiously inquired for Clara. She had just stepped out and was immediately told of this. O! how joyful was the summons.

She hastened to her sister, who at her approach looked up and smiled; the flush in her cheek was gone, and her face was deadly pale. Clara was entirely overcome; she could only weep; and as she stooped to kiss her sister's white lips, the child threw her arms round her neck, and drew her still nearer. It was a long embrace—then her arms moved convulsively, and fell by her side—there was a few struggles—she gasped once or twice—and little Helen never breathed again.

Days, weeks, and months rolled on.—Time had somewhat healed the wound which grief for the loss of an only sister had made, but it had not the power to remove from Clara's heart the memory of her unkindness. She never took her little basket of dinner to school, nor passed the half-way stone without a deep sigh, and sometimes a tear of bitter regret. Children who are what Clara was go and be what Clara now is—mild—amiable—obliging and pleasant to all.

A FATHER'S COUNSEL.

FROM THE GERMAN.

Truth will not accommodate itself to us, my son, but we must conform ourselves to truth.

Hold yourself too good to do evil.

What you can see, look at with your own eyes.

Fear no man so much as yourself.

Learn gladly of others; and whenever they talk of wisdom, honor, happiness, light, freedom, virtue, listen attentively.—But do not believe at once all that you hear. Words are only words, and when they drive along so very easily and swiftly, be on your guard; for horses that draw a valuable load travel slowly.

It is easy to despise, but to understand is far better.

Teach not others, until you have learned yourself.

Take care of your body, but not as if it were your soul.

Meddle not with the affairs of others, but attend diligently to your own.

Flatter no man, and permit no man to flatter you.

Depend on no great men.

HYPOCRISY.—The first consideration with a knave, is how to help himself, and the second, how to do it with the appearance of helping you. Dionysius, the Tyrant, stripped the statue of Jupiter Olympus of a robe of massive gold, and substituted a cloak of wool, saying, "Gold is too cold in winter, and too heavy in summer: it behooves us to take care of Jupiter."

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, August 17, 1842.

Traveling Agent.

Br. DANIEL BABCOCK, of Scott, is now engaged as a traveling agent for the Register. We request agents and all friends of the press, to aid him in extending our circulation, and in settling the accounts for the present and past volumes. He will visit first Oneida, Jefferson, Lewis, Otsego, and Madison counties.

General Conference.

Br. John Whitford, of Berlin, wishes us to give information to those proposing to attend the General Conference, that as there is no public conveyance from Albany or Troy to that place, that teams will be provided and be at Congress Hall in Troy, on Sept. 2d, at 10 o'clock, A. M., to convey all that may meet them there at that time.

De Ruyter Institute.

The Fall Term will commence in the Primary Department on Friday, the 9th of September, and in the Higher Department on Friday, the SIXTEENTH of Sept.

Profanity.

"Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain, for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain."

The relation that exists between God and man requires the exercise of the most profound veneration of the latter towards the former. Man is every way dependent upon God, having nothing good, or enjoying anything but what is the gift of God. This condition alone would lay the creature under endless and unchanging obligation to venerate the name of the Great Jehovah.—Beside this, God has, in the language of the third command, by his eternal fiat, determined that men shall not take his name in vain. Thus, a double guard is thrown around the name of the Great Eternal, and the fact is announced that God will ascribe guilt to every soul that dares profane his name, as a means of deterring from this most daring sin. If the decree of a rightful lawgiver can define and enforce laws; if natural relations and dependencies call for veneration and respect; if the free exercise of unbounded benevolence is worthy of regard, then all men are bound to venerate and adore the name of God; and this obligation must last as long as God exists, and have application to all persons, in all times and places. The spirit and letter of this command is violated,

1. When God's name is profanely used. This is a very common practice with many. The profane man, in order to give force to his assertions, or to grace his speech, or show his recklessness, imprecates the curse of the Most High upon himself, and dares him to render his spirit eternally miserable. This low and daring profanity is confined to those who have no consistent respect for themselves, and who belong to the least civilized and refined portion of community, and who have the least perception of moral obligation. They who profanely use the name of God, show that they do not understand their responsibilities. The appending a profane oath to an assertion, is prima facia evidence that the assertion is false, and that both the speaker and hearer understand it thus.

2. A careless use of the name. Besides profane swearers, there are others who are guilty of this sin, viz: all who use it with the same unconcern that they speak any other name. Public Lecturers are, to a great extent culpable in this matter. The name of the Great Jehovah is as freely and as carelessly introduced as any thing.—Some ministers of the gospel, likewise, in their addresses to the throne, use the name with as much apparent familiarity as they would the name of an equal. In reading and speaking, this name is introduced in the same careless or vain manner. All of these ways, though they may not exhibit such deep depravity as profane swearing, are alike reprehensible, and contrary to the law of God, which says, thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain.

For the Register.

DE RUYTER, Aug. 10, 1842.

BR. BAILEY,—Permit me to say through the Register, the Lord is doing a great work in the East part of Lincklaen, whereof we are glad.

I have been attending a series of meetings at the Methodist Chapel, which have continued more than two weeks, and have resulted in giving liberty to perhaps fifty souls; "captivity has been led captive, and gifts have been given to men." Ministers, and lay members of different denominations have concentrated their efforts, and labored for the salvation of sinners. God blessed abundantly their humble labors, and answered their devout supplications in the conversion of men heretofore hardened in their opposition to God's government.—Upwards of thirty have been baptized, besides those who have been poured or sprinkled, and we are still hoping for the conversion of others who are enquiring the way to Zion. May the good Lord grant unto men submission to his holy word, and hasten the time when the Bible shall be emphatically the only religion of Protestants.

Eld. Varnum Hull attended a meeting with me in Otselic, last Sabbath and first-day; one was baptized and two added to the church. O! may Christians look up, for their redemption draweth near; backsliders, "awake and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give them light;" and may sinners be saved from sin and death, and the work of the Lord triumph gloriously. Unto him be all the glory and all the praise forever. Yours in Christian bonds,

S. M. BURDICK.

A CARD.

The Principal and Teachers of De Ruyter Institute take this opportunity of expressing to the "De Ruyter Band" their grateful acknowledgements for the very excellent Music with which they entertained the audience at their Exhibition on the evening of the 10th inst. While the Band deserve much praise for their perseverance in acquiring a musical talent, at so great a sacrifice of time and money, adding so much to the pleasantness and honor of our village, they ought to receive the cordial support of our citizens, to encourage them in their noble enterprize.

G. M. LANGWORTHY,
Principal.

De Ruyter, Aug. 14, 1842.

Missionary Department.

For the Register.

SHILOH, July 22d, 1842.

BR. BAILEY,—I send you this communication, desiring it published in the Register for the purpose of correcting some erroneous impressions in relation to the application of Missionary money raised by the brethren and friends in Shiloh. It appears from communications recently received from Iowa Territory, that our friends there, and Elder Scott also, supposed that he was appointed a Missionary and sent out into that field of labor by the particular request of those who had raised Missionary money in Shiloh, and that the money pledged here was to be appropriated for the support of the Mission. Elder Scott and others who have received these impressions, have, doubtless, wondered why our money was not advanced in due season to sustain him in his journey. I would observe, the supposition is erroneous. We had no correspondence whatever with the Conference, or with the Missionary Society, in relation to our funds, or the appointment of a Missionary. Our money was not subscribed with the expectation that it would go into the Treasury of the Missionary Society. The conditions of the subscription guarantied that the Missionary employed should be one of our own choosing, and held responsible to us.

When Elder Cochran declared in a communication published in the Register, that he could not prosecute the duties of his appointment as Missionary, because there were no funds in the Treasury to sustain him, our hearts were filled with painful emotions. We could not endure the thought that Missionary labor should cease in our denomination for such a cause. An effort was made to furnish the means to sustain Eld. Cochran while performing Missionary labor in the Western States. We soon had two hundred dollars pledged for this object, and a letter was sent to Eld. Cochran requesting him to engage in the work. Being disappointed of his services, we next made application to Eld. Hull. He did not encourage us that he could immediately enter the field of labor. Not succeeding in obtaining a Missionary to visit the Western States, and the Macedonian cry, "Come over and help us," reaching our ears from Pennsylvania, Susquehannah Co., we resolved on sending Br. Jacob Ayers, a Licentiate, to visit our brethren in that region, and labor to promote the cause of the Redeemer among them. He labored with success for some time in Pennsylvani, assisted in organizing a Church, and subsequently removed his family and located himself with the brethren there. As a compensation for his services, we appropriated to him about fifty dollars. Eld. Hull, when here last fall, expressed a willingness to labor for us three months in the course of the year among the destitute in the western part of the State of New York. We gave him sixty dollars to enable him to perform the labor. Sickness, and other causes have prevented him hitherto from fulfilling his engagement, but we trust his health will be restored, and that he will soon be enabled to perform the service. When Br. Griswold presented the claims of the Missionary Society, he obtained a portion of our funds, and a part still remains unappropriated.

Our brethren of the Salem Church have consented to dispense with the labors of Eld. Clawson for six months. We are now endeavoring to obtain the requisite funds to sustain him while he performs a Missionary tour through the Western States. We hope, with the co-operation of our brethren in East Jersey, and Rhode Island, to be enabled to do this. Our design is to have him engage in the work as early in the month of August as practicable. We believe while the cry for Missionary labor is so urgent, the fields white and beckoning to the harvest and laborers so few, that it is the duty of Churches who have Ministers, and are sustaining them, to be willing to dispense with their labors for six months, or longer, not withholding their accustomed salary for the support of their families during the interval, that they may be engaged in Missionary labor.—Where one Church is [illegible] contiguous Churches should furnish the Missionary with an outfit, and be willing that their own Minister [illegible] the destitute Church a month [illegible] during the absence of its regular Pastor. In this way the [illegible] would be equalized and Missionaries would be multiplied and [illegible]. I hope the example of our Salem brethren may be imitated by other Churches, and this plan of augmenting the number of Missionaries tried. Yours, &c.

AZOR ESTEE.

Congressional News.

From the N. Y. [illegible]

WASHINGTON, August [illegible], 1842.

The Tariff Bill

has passed the Senate, precisely as [illegible] the House, after strenuous efforts to amend it, in many respects. This was the result of a caucus division, and [illegible] changes that even a majority desired were precluded.

It is much doubted whether [illegible] raise as much revenue as [illegible] on all goods would secure. The average rate of duties by this bill [illegible]. The average in the tariff of 1828, which caused the fierce nullification war, was [illegible] per cent. nearly. On many articles the bill will act as an entire prohibition of import; cheap wool, for instance, which is very little raised in this country. The Veto is expected to-morrow. Its precise nature [illegible] settled. It is supposed that its objectionable features will be confined to the distribution clause. If so, Congress will pass the same bill without that clause. The bill passed the Senate by two majority, two Senators dodging the vote, [illegible] and Henderson. Had they voted in accordance with their own views, or those of the States they represent, the bill would have passed. The majority in either House is too small to be of any avail against a Veto. There are a few, however, who are for adjourning at once, and leaving the Government without any legal revenue—men who cry, with [illegible] of Va., "Perish the tariff, perish the Constitution; perish the Union," rather than give up the land bill. But it is hoped such violent counsels will not prevail. It is too much to be hoped, however, that we shall not have a scene of unprecedented violence on the reception of the Veto.—This will soon be terminated by the Day of Adjournment.

The House, this morning, voted, without any dissenting voice, to adjourn [illegible] night from this day. The Senate [illegible] the resolve, and postponed the subject [illegible] one week. This is owing to the [illegible] with Great Britain, which it is [illegible] was laid before them in Executive Session, this afternoon. There will be a struggle to defeat this treaty, though [illegible] have not a successful one, and it will be necessary to pass a bill to carry it into effect. For this purpose the Senate may wish to delay the adjournment a [illegible] longer. Nothing more has transpired [illegible] respect to the terms of the treaty than your readers already know.

Disgraceful Scenes.

It is time the House adjourned, for more reasons than one. It is time the people had a reckoning with some of those who have disgraced themselves and the country with their violence in the House. The past week has witnessed two such scenes as gave rise to the epithet "bear garden," as applied to the House.

Andrews, of Virginia, enraged at a severe and not a very civil remark made by Bowne, of New York, advanced across the hall to assault him; and Bowne started to meet him, both boiling with passion. But the more sober men interfered and prevented a fight.

Stanley, of N. C. was addressing the House on another occasion, when SPRIGG, of Kentucky, who was DRUNK, rose, and bid him stop; declaring with an oath that he should stop. He then pronounced him a liar! Stanley told him that he was not in a condition to judge. The interference of Sprigg's friends prevented any farther turmoil. He has since apologized to Mr. Stanley for his conduct. He ought to have been expelled from the House, long ago.—A few such men bring upon Congress a disgrace that an age can hardly wipe out.

The Army Bills.

The Army appropriation bill, and the bill to reorganize the army, have both been acted on finally, the disagreeing [illegible] the two Houses having been arranged [illegible] this way, viz: the appropriation [illegible] left simply a bill to give money [illegible] provisions to reduce the army are [illegible] ferred to the other. [illegible] regiment of dragoons is to be converted [illegible] corps in a few months, and all the [illegible] ments in the service, are to be reduced to [illegible] 42 men each. This action [illegible] the House [illegible] 7000 men, nearly [illegible] the war spirit [illegible]

[illegible]

Storm at New Haven.—Last [illegible] evening a hail storm of considerable violence visited us. The changes of temperature in the air had been very great during the previous part of the day. At about 2 o'clock the thermometer rose to 87 degrees in the shade, at which time the wind was blowing fresh from the south. About 5 o'clock commenced indications of a gathering storm. I observed an immense cloud extending like a great sheet N. W. from the zenith—another was seen rising from the S. W.; and a third, attended by thunder and lightning, appeared in the N. E., while other parts of the sky were nearly or quite clear.—Flocks of little birds flying swiftly, and with great apparent agitation, afforded a known prognostic of a hail storm.

Directly the wind began to blow violently. In a moment the air was filled with hailstones flying. Peals of thunder were heard at intervals. The average size of the hailstones was of a large robin's egg; but I observed some much larger, and picked them up subsequently. The thermometer descended rapidly, falling ten degrees in fifteen minutes.

But a more remarkable phenomenon connected with this storm, was the falling of [illegible] the storm, Mr. Wood, [illegible] brought into the [illegible] about three [illegible] of the kind called [illegible] fish. He had found it lying in the [illegible] It was evidently but lately dead. [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] a large portion of the children were [illegible] with the measles—that all, some one hundred in number, old and young were forced naked as it were into the street—and a scene of distress never equalled in this region will readily be conceived.—Nat. Dem.

Further.—We learn from a passenger on the Vermillion last evening, that during the blow on Sunday night, the schooner Starkey, loaded with 600 barrels of salt, in attempting to enter Grand River, was driven ashore outside the pier, where she now lies, high and dry.—Detroit Advertiser.

The corporation of Newark have passed a resolution to fill up the Morris canal in that city, unless the bridges are made less dangerous to life and limb than their present dilapidated state renders them.

Col. Kearney, on taking command of Fort Gibson, has prohibited gambling, horse-racing, drinking and swearing among the troops, under severe penalties.

A man named Williams has been convicted at New Orleans for carrying slaves to Louisiana charged as convicts, contrary to law. He was sentenced to pay a fine of $12,000, while the slaves had been confiscated to the State. He is said to be unable to pay the fine, and will therefore under the law in such case made and provided, lie in jail for life. It is thought, however, that he may be liberated under another law.

London, according to late authority, now measures 7 1-2 miles in length from east to west, by a breadth of 9 miles from north to south. Its circumference, allowing for various inequalities, is estimated at thirty miles, while the area of the ground it covers is considered to measure no less than eighteen square miles.

A terrific scene occurred at a "camp-meeting," in York county, Pa., on Sunday the 24th ult. Between 11 and 12 o'clock in the evening there was a thunder storm, which, for rain, lightning, and loud thunder, never was equalled. The lightning struck into the camp, and killed three horses on the spot, besides stunning a number of persons present on the occasion. The scene was one of the most terrific and awful—the shrieks of the women, the neighing of the horses, and the successive peals of thunder, preceded by the most vivid sheets of lightning, made the whole spectacle one of great and awful sublimity.

There was quite a gale in the Chesapeake on Sunday. A schooner named Gustavus Weems was capsized, and Geo. Aherst drowned. A ship and some smaller vessels were driven ashore by the same gale, but no serious damage was sustained by them.

The Chicago American says, that about two hundred thousand bushels of wheat have been exported from that city since the opening of the navigation the present season. They have been accompanied by large quantities of oats, corn, hides and flour, and a considerable quantity of wool.

The remains of the steamboat Lexington, which was burnt and sunk in the Sound some two years since, have at last been found by the divers, at the bottom of the Sound, in one hundred feet water. The hold has been casually examined, and no sand found in the hull. To raise it will consequently not be as hard a matter as we apprehended, and will be effected forthwith. It will be recollected that her iron chest contained a large amount of money, belonging to parties here and at Boston.—No bodies were found about the wreck.—N. Y. Evangelist.

One of the largest specimens in America of the Agave Americana, or One Hundred Year Flowering Aloe, is now in bloom in the neighborhood of Philadelphia. The lower stem is now 20 feet in height, and covered with lateral branches, on which are placed immense clusters of rich yellow flowers and greenish yellow buds.

"Speculators," says Napoleon, "trace their schemes on paper, fools read and believe them. All are babbling about general happiness, and presently the people have no bread to eat; then comes a revolution. Such is usually the fruit of all their fine theories."

The New Orleans Courier mentions the case of a man, who, some six or seven weeks since, invested $10,000 in Third Municipality notes. By the recent rise in that money, he has cleared something like $25,000—a comfortable little profit in these hard times.

A party of Seminoles, among them Halleck Tustenuggee, and another chief, "were the observed of all observers," in Chartres street yesterday, where they were making some purchases, previous to their departure for their home in the "Far West." They were decorated out in all their beads and bells, feathers and finery, and made quite a showy appearance. Two negroes were along with them acting as interpreters. The whole party arrived here a few days since from Florida, and will shortly leave for Arkansas.

Col. Wm. Robinson, Jr., President of the Exchange Bank of Pittsburg, sailed in the Caledonia, as agent for the U. S. Government, to negotiate in Europe for the $12,000,000 loan.

One of the good things in Theodore Hook's last is, where speaking of railroads and steamboats, to both of which he frequently signifies his abhorrence, he says, "they annihilate space and time, as the newspapers say, not to mention a multitude of passengers beside."

A case of spontaneous combustion occurred at Hartford, Conn., recently. In drawing linseed oil, some of it was spilt on the floor; it was absorbed by a coarse sponge, and placed on a shelf—the smell of something burning led to an examination of the premises, when the sponge was found in a state of combustion, and just ready to burst into a flame. Only about two hours had elapsed between the time of using the sponge and the discovery.

A serious incident is said to have occurred to Mr. and Mrs. Dickens on their return from America. Their oldest child, being taken by surprise at their reappearance, was so transported with sudden joy as to become delirious, which continued with alarming symptoms for some time.—He was recovering at the last accounts.

A man was killed in Mobile by the explosion of a soda fountain, near which he was standing, on the 19th ult.

During his residence in Spain, it is stated that Washington Irving will avail himself of the facilities afforded to him by his position, to prepare his long contemplated history of Mexico.

A Runaway.—Our city was visited by one of those dangerous occurrences yesterday about noon. A horse belonging to the livery stable of Mr. G. Charles, took fright on Main street and made for the bridge. When in front of Curtiss' building, the fright was communicated to a fine span of horses attached to a double wagon. They started off at full speed, after knocking over a horse and demolishing a buggy near them. On the bridge they ran foul of a single wagon, containing a man with his wife and four children. Here a terrific scene ensued. The horse was thrown down by the tongue passing nearly through his body, and the wagon was thrown violently some distance. The two horses, with their vehicle, passed completely over the prostrate animal. The two running teams rushed furiously down Buffalo street. The horse of Mr. Charles run against a post in front of Chapman's jewelry store, State street, where he left the remains of the buggy, and passed down the walk to the livery stable. The double team brought up in a shattered condition near the wood market. But what is most extraordinary, none of the persons in the wagon on the bridge were injured seriously, the concussion being so violent as to throw them from under the horses feet.—Rochester Democrat.

We have heard of four thousand different apologies, but the strangest apology of all is made by the editor of the Paris Sentinel. He says: "the chief workman in our office, being a Presbyterian minister, has gone to St. Louis, to attend a Synod, in consequence of which our sheet is only half its usual size."—Cleaveland Gatherer.

Alabama.—The name ALABAMA, says the Mobile Ledger, is Muscoghee, and signifies "here we rest." It was the name of an Indian fortress on the Yazoo river, and was transferred to the territory that now forms that State.

Tuscaloosa, or as it should be spelled Tuscalusa, is Chickasaw. It is compounded of Tusca, warrior, and Lusa, black—meaning the "Black warrior." This was the name of the noble chief who opposed, with so much daring bravery, the progress, and who was, with the citizens generally of his immense town, slain by the Spanish commander De Soto.

Manville was the name of a large Indian town which stood, as is supposed, on the north bank of the Alabama river, in Clark county, and was the capital of Tuscaluza, from which we have the name of the city, bay, &c., of Mobile.—Banner & Pioneer.

From the New York Evangelist.

PROFANE SWEARING---THE PRESIDENT.

MESSRS. EDITORS:—You called on your Washington correspondent to contradict, if he could, his remark that Mr. Tyler was a profane swearer. I am sorry that it is not in my power even to qualify the averment of a fact so notorious, and so painful to good men. That I did not refer to it from any special hostility to the President, your readers must be aware, from the fact that I have always commended his administrative policy when it was possible for a friend of Northern rights and free labor to do so. I do not belong to his party, nor to the party of his opponents.

Allow me to add a few other statements respecting this vice, profanity.

I have had, I think I may say, some peculiar opportunities of associating with educated men, and statesman, in various parts of our country, and noticing their habits, in this respect. And I must say, that, with one exception, I never heard so much profane swearing in my whole life, in any body of gentlemen, as I hear among the members of Congress. There are some men, of high standing, who are peculiarly notorious for this vulgar, as well as wicked practice. I have frequently been shocked by oaths used in debates, in the course of this session. I think such conduct, in our public men, is a fair subject of public animadversion. The exception I refer to was the great SLAVEHOLDERS' CONVENTION, at Annapolis, in January last. I never heard such horrible profanity, in my life, save from here and there an abandoned individual, as from the members of that body. I remarked to a distinguished citizen of Maryland, himself a member of that body, and a man of pure lips, at least.

"O," said he, "you must remember that you are not in New-England, or New York."

"No," thought I, "nor among those who can claim, as a body, to mingle in the society of civilized, not to say refined and Christian people." I think, that, perhaps with the exception of Charleston, S. C., the farther one goes southward, the more frequently is the ear saluted with profanity, in what is termed "good society." At least, my observation, and information, so far as they go, prove it.

Yours, with respect,

P. P.

Mr. Froward.—We are pleased to learn that the Secretary of the Treasury is so far convalescent as to be able to take moderate exercise. It is his intention to leave in a few days for Bedford Springs, where he will remain a short time, and then return to the duties of his Department.—National Intelligencer.

Heroic Act.—A few days ago, the Midlothian coal mine in Chesterfield co. was discovered to be on fire; the overseer and several slaves were below and exposed to imminent danger. As soon as it was made known to Mr. Thomas Y. Hall, superintendent of the Blackheath mines, he equipped himself and descended into the mine through fire and smoke, and rescued the owner and negroes from a death of torture. Too much credit cannot be given to such gallant conduct. Had this adventure occurred in the days of old Rome, Mr. Hall would have been rewarded with a civic crown for his noble self-devotion.—The mine was immediately covered up, and it was thought the fire would soon be smothered.—Richmond Enquirer.

Large Gun.—This morning between ten and twelve o'clock, Capt. Stocton's large wrought iron cannon was tried at the Navy Yard. This mammoth gun is 13 feet long, with a bore 12 inches, and will carry a ball of 112 pounds. She is handsomely set upon a carriage, and looks as pretty as a new dollar. Five several shots were fired, the shots severally containing 15, 25, 35, 40, and 45 pounds of powder.

The reports of the three last shots were deafening, and caused quite a sensation among the flooring upon which she stood, although the piece receded but trifling.—The trial was in every respect satisfactory.—Philadelphia Gazette.

Emigration to Wiskonsan.—The Cleveland Herald says the tide of emigration through the lake channel this season is setting into Wiskonsan Territory with great force. The rich farming lands of the Territory offer great inducements to agriculturalists, and as yet no State indebtedness threatens high taxation. A sample of the 'crowd' is given in the last Southport American, which says:

"We are told that in Milwaukie the emigrants have to lodge in the streets; in Racine every tavern is crowded; in Southport the taverns full; there is scarcely a room to let, and one house has we believe thirty families in the chambers."

Narrow Escape.—A young lady, a near relation of Mr. Papler, on the Hookstown road, went into the cellar on Saturday last for the purpose of using the usual precaution against the presence of flies which beset the meat. This precaution consisted in burning a quantity of gunpowder. In the absence of Mr. Palper, the young lady thought she would attend to this duty herself. She accordingly procured a flask with about half a pound of powder in it, and attempted to let some of the powder fall on the coals from the flask. It instantly exploded. The muscles were rent from the right fore arm, her breast and face were much burned, and one of her toes nearly cut off. Her foot was also split in twain for some distance up. With the exception of these wounds she escaped. To have escaped with life is the next thing to a miracle. The hands and eyes were uninjured.—Baltimore Sun.

The Mammoth Cave a Cure for consumption,—A writer in the Journal of Commerce announces the curious and interesting fact that the atmosphere of the famous Mammoth Cave, in Kentucky, has qualities of the highest efficacy for diseased lungs. Dr. Mitchell, most of whose family have died of consumption, and who was himself reduced to a hopeless condition by the same disease, believing that there were restorative properties in the air of the cave, resolved to make it his residence for a season; and about the first of April he established his quarters near the Star Chamber, about a mile from the entrance, whence he emerged for the first time at the close of June. His health and strength were so far restored that he rode eighteen miles on horseback.

He says that in a week from the time of going into the cave his cough was gone, and that his appetite and strength increased daily. He felt lonely the first week, but soon became reconciled to his solitude, and now he would rather live in the cave than elsewhere.

We extract the following passages from the article in the Journal:

My opinion of the effect of the atmosphere of the cave is made up from personal observation. I have known the cave for twenty-nine years. I have been in it at all seasons of the year, during all kinds of weather, both day and night. During the late war large quantities of saltpetre were made at the cave, and for this I prepared to carbonate alkalies, which are required in large proportion to produce crystalization, &c.

At that time from 30 to 70 hands were employed in digging up the earth, &c which covered the bottom of the cave, and conveying it by oxen to hoppers in the cave, about one mile from its mouth. During the whole time these men were engaged, there was not a single case of sickness among them.

The atmosphere of the cave is dry,—and the temperature even and equal. I had never known it to vary half a degree through the year, from 60 degrees Farenheit. Combustion goes on well, lights burn clear,—respiration is easy. The earth, which had been lixivated and thrown out of the hoppers, re-impregnates again in about three years, yielding from 3 to 5 lbs of nitrate to the bushel. Animal flesh will not putrify in this atmosphere, nor will vegetable matter decompose.

Meat hung up in the cave a few days becomes so strongly impregnated with nitre as to become unpleasant to taste. The corn cobs left by the oxen which were fed in the cave thirty years ago, are in a perfect state of preservation; the logs used for water pipes are sound and good. Animal flesh dries in the cave and becomes hard. These facts I state, that men of science may compare my conclusions and my premises together.

At this season of the year a strange current of air rushes out at the mouth of the cave; in the winter the current changes and blows equally strong in the cave.

According to the late United States census, there are in the United States four million horses. It is stated that they require twenty thousand tons of iron annually for shoes.

We saw a few days ago, says the Upper Marlboro (Me.) Gazette, an old man, who about 20 years since, was as black as negroes generally are. His color has undergone an entire change, except a few spots on his face, and he is now perfectly white, and his skin exceedingly fair. His hair is the only evidence of his ever having been a negro.

An extra session of the N. Y. Legislature commences on the 15th of August.

Notices.

General Conference.

The S. D. B. General Conference will hold its next session with the Church in Berlin, Rensselaer co., N. Y., [illegible] on the first day of the week before the [illegible] Sabbath in September next, at 10 o'clock, A. M. Introductory discourse by Eld. W. B. Gillett, or N. V. Hull, substitute.

JAMES BAILEY, Cor. S[illegible]

☞The A. S. D. B. Missionary Society will meet on the second day of the Conference at the call of the President, and the Evangelical Board for disseminating Religious Truth among the Jews, on the fourth day, at 10 o'clock, A. M.

☞The 7th Anniversary of the A. S. D. B. Tract Society will be held in Berlin on the 5th day of the week before the [illegible] Sabbath in September next, (Sept. [illegible]) at 10 o'clock, A. M.

PAUL STILLMAN,
General Agent.

TEMPERANCE HOUSE

Mr. Asa C. Potter has opened a Temperance House at the State Bridge, in Verona, where he will be ready at all times to wait on those who give him a call, in good style, and on reasonable terms.

PROPOSALS

For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a [illegible] complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and [illegible] including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their [illegible] operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death (if dead), number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y.

ALFRED ACADEMY,

AND

TEACHER'S SEMINARY.

W. C. Kenyon, Principal.
Miss Caroline B. Maxson, Preceptress.

LECTURERS.

On Phrenology and Physiology.—Drs J. R. HARTSHORN, and E. RIDER.

On School Teaching.—LUKE G. MAXSON.

On Chemistry and Geology.—W. C. KENYON.

Lectures on other subjects as occasion may require.

This Institution is pleasantly located, in the county of Allegany, thirteen miles South-East of Angelica, and six miles South of Almond. From its retired and quiet situation, it presents a favorable opportunity to parents to place their sons and daughters under a moral influence that will not be counteracted by those with whom they may associate.

The patronage which it has hitherto enjoyed, has been so liberal as to warrant very considerable expenditures in rendering it still more worthy of a more extended patronage; and it is hoped that it will, under its present organization, be rendered inferior to no similar Institution in Western New York.

The qualification of Common School Teachers will receive particular attention, so as to render them thorough and practical instructors of youth.

The Academic Year,—Is divided into three terms of fifteen weeks each. 1st, Commencing Wednesday 17th August, 2d 7th December, 3d, 4th April, 1843.

Vacations.—At the expiration of the first and second Terms, one week each; at the expiration of the 3d Term, five weeks.

Tuition.—Varying with Instruction, from $2.00 to $4.75 per term.

Board.—From $1 to $1.[illegible] [illegible] accommodations. Rooms in the Institution [illegible]

SAMUEL RUSSELL [illegible]

[illegible]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

L[illegible]
HART, ACKLEY & CO.

A[illegible]

[illegible]

What is Economy?

RANDOLPH & DUNHAM [illegible]

Economy is the road to Wealth.

J[illegible]

LIST OF LETTERS
Remaining in the Post Office [illegible]
Ames [illegible]
Benney H. A. Mrs
Brant Sally A. Miss
Barnard [illegible]
Bogardus Isaac F
Babcock Thos. D
Curtis Lorana Mrs
Carr Thomas
Derbyshire James
Griswold Sherman S
Hagan Jane
Holmes Arza
[illegible]
Lewis [illegible]
Shaw H[illegible]
Sayles [illegible]
Sherwood [illegible]
Squires Hagan
Sawyer Harvey
Tenney [illegible]
Williams [illegible]
Wooley [illegible]
M. SPEAR, P. M.

BOOTS! BOOTS! SHOES! SHOES!
AT the sign of the Mammoth Boot [illegible] Please call.

FLOUR, PROVISIONS, GROCERIES [illegible]
May 11. HART, ACKLEY & CO.

BOOK BINDING.
THE subscriber having connected a BINDERY with his printing establishment, [illegible] to execute all kinds of Binding in a [illegible] manner, on as reasonable terms as at any establishment in this section of country.
JAMES BAILEY.
De Ruyter, June 3rd 1842.

THE FARMER'S EXCHANGE is the place to buy Goods CHEAP. Oct. 20, 1841.
S. G. WALKER.

Notice.
ALL persons who are indebted to the subscriber, either in accounts or note, are requested to call and settle immediately and save cost.
De Ruyter, June 20, 1842.
JAMES M. LETTS

IMPORTANT WORK!
[illegible] DICTIONARY OF
Arts, Manufactures, and Mines,
[illegible]
Illustrated with 1241 Engravings.
T[illegible]

STOVES.
COLD WINTER IS COMING
L[illegible]
Fancy Parlor Stoves,
[illegible]
BRASS AND TIN WARE
[illegible]
LOW PRICES
[illegible]
JUST RECEIVED
[illegible]

J[illegible]
20 [illegible]

Not 25 or 50 per cent Reward.
S. G. WALKER.
H[illegible] Farmer's Exchange [illegible]
De Ruyter, May 27 1842

"Hard times and money scarce."
I[illegible] SUTTON & QUINBY have just opened a large [illegible] Low Prices and Good Goods must give general satisfaction.
May 24 SUTTON & QUINBY

BOOKS & STATIONERY
SCHOOL BOOKS, of all descriptions, Miscellaneous Books & Stationery, at the Book Store of HART, ACKLEY, & CO
De Ruyter, May 11, 1842. 11v3tf

50 PIECES BROAD CLOTHS, CASSIMERES, SATINETTES, at reduced prices at the NEW YORK CASH STORE

POETRY.

The Forest Trees.

They're beautiful! they're beautiful!
The spreading forest trees,
By morning's gentle zephyrs fanned,
Or by the noon-tide breeze.
And when o'er them the setting sun
Casts his last lingering ray,
O then they seem too beautiful,
Too lovely for decay!

We love them in the spring time, when
The cold winds from the north
Are hushed, and warmer breezes come
To call the green leaves forth.
We then in every opening bud
Our Father's love may see.
Who in a robe of beauty decks
Each woodland forest tree.

When bright beams the summer sun,
And sultry is the air,
O, it is then we joyfully,
To their cool shade repair
Where we may see the wood birds come,
Melodious in their lays,
And perch upon the bows, to hymn
Their varied songs of praise.

And in the early autumn, when
The summer days have flown,
They're lovely in the gorgeous robe
Which over them is thrown.
But soon is heard in forest dell
The wild wind's moaning sound,
And then those leaves of every hue,
Lie scattered all around.

"'Tis ever thus." The things of earth,
All beautiful and bright,
Are fleeting, fading, dying soon,
To meet decay and blight.
Yet oh, there is a "better land,"
Where sorrows never come,
Where no decay or blight is known—
It is the "spirit home."

Value of a Moment.

BY MONTGOMERY.

At every motion of our breath
Life trembles on the brink of death.
A taper's flame that upward turns,
While downward to the dust it burns.
Moment by moment years are past,
And one ere long will be our last:
'Twixt that (long fled) which gave us light.
And that which soon shall end in night,
There is a point no eye can see,
Yet on it hangs eternity:
This is that moment,—who shall tell
Whither it leads to heaven or to hell!
This is that moment—as we CHOOSE,
The immortal soul we save or lose.
Time past and time to come are not;
Time PRESENT is our only lot.
Oh God! henceforth our hearts incline,
To seek no other love than thine.

Miscellaneous Department.

THE CROTON AQUEDUCT.

This stupendous structure is now completed, and in a few weeks at furthest the city will have a foretaste of the thousand benefits it is destined to confer. Our citizens may not be generally aware that in this magnificent work they are surpassing ancient Rome in one of her proudest boasts. None of the hydraulic structures of that city, in spite of the legions of slaves at her command, equal, in magnitude of design, perfection of detail, and prospective benefits of this aqueduct. The main trunk consists of an immense mass of masonry, six feet and a half wide, nine feet high, and forty miles long, formed of wall three feet thick, cemented into solid rock. But this water channel, gigantic as it is, is far from being all the work. The dam across the Croton, which retains the water in a grand reservoir, is a mound of earth and masonry, forty feet high and seventy feet wide at the bottom, and has connected with it many complicated but perfect contrivances to enable the engineer to have complete control over the mighty mass of water.

The river thus thrown back towards its source will form a lake of five hundred acres, which will retain a supply for emergencies of some thousands millions of gallons, and also offer, as a collateral advantage, many picturesque sites for country seats upon the woody points which will jut out into its smooth basin. A tunnel leads the water from this reservoir into the aqueduct, and eleven more of these subterraneous passages occur before reaching Harlem River, having an aggregate length of seven-eighths of a mile, and many of them being cut through the solid rock. At intervals of a mile, ventilators are constructed in the form of towers of white marble, which give to the water that exposure to the atmosphere without which it becomes vapid and insipid; and these dazzling turret's mark out the line of the aqueduct to the passengers upon the Hudson.

The streams which intersect the line of the structure are conveyed under it in stone culverts, the extremities of which afford the engineers opportunity of displaying their architectural taste. Sing Sing creek, with its deep ravine, is crossed by a bridge of a single eliptical arch of eighty-eight feet span, and a hundred feet above the stream. Its unusually perfect workmanship was proved by its having settled but one inch after the centres were removed. The view of its massive grace from the narrow valley beneath is one of the most striking points upon the line. Sleepy Hollow, well known to the readers of imaginative lore, is spanned by a series of graceful arches.

The bridge across Harlem River has been the subject of much controversy. The admirers of magnificent symmetry and perfection, and those interested in preserving the navigation of that stream, have warmly advocated the erection of a bridge over which the water might pass upon its regular level; while the friends of more measured economy recommend a lower and cheaper structure, to which pipes should descend and rise therefrom after the manner of an inverted syphon. The plan finally adopted is that of a high bridge, but still with its surface ten feet below the usual grade, which falls fourteen inches to the mile. It is a quarter of a mile long, one hundred and sixteen feet above high water, and its estimated cost exceeds three quarters of a million.

Across this the water is conveyed in huge iron pipes, protected from the frost by a covering of earth four feet deep.—Near Manhattanville is a tunnel a quarter of a mile long, through the hill at that place, and its valley is crossed by pipes descending one hundred and five feet.—Clendenning Valley is passed at an elevation of forty feet, and arches of appropriate size, upon the lines of the streets, leave simmetrical carriage ways and foot paths.

We paid a brief visit yesterday to the two great reservoirs of this stupendous aqueduct. The receiving reservoir, at Yorkville, thirty-eight miles from the dam at Croton river, is in two divisions, both covering a space of thirty-five acres, capable of containg one hundred and sixty millions of gallons. It is enclosed by granite walls of solid masonry, roughly finished. The bottom of the basin is the natural soil.

The distribution reservoir, at Murray's Hill in Forty-second street, is a much finer and more expensive work. It is nearly square, and covers an area of about five acres. The bottom is made of puddled clay, as smooth, hard, and water-tight as marble itself. This area is four hundred and forty feet square at the base, and is divided in the centre by a wall of granite nineteen feet thick at the bottom, and four at the top. It is surrounded by a wall, also of granite, composed of three distinct columns of solid mason work. The outer column is five feet thick; the second six, and the third or inner one a lining of granite, about fifteen inches in depth, placed upon a concrete masonry above thirty feet thick at the base.

From the outside to the middle wall, the thickness of neither included, the distance is fourteen feet; and from the extreme of the outer wall to the inner angle of the third is sixty feet, the three walls uniting at the top. At a distance of ten feet from each other are thick cross walls with solid arches, thus binding the whole into one solid imperishable mass. From the top of the Northeast cornice to the level of the street the distance is fifty-six feet. The depth of the reservoir is forty feet; and it will contain water to the depth of thirty-six feet, or about twenty-two millions of gallons—as computed a few days since by James Renwick, Jr., one of the engineers employed on the work.

At the east end of the division wall a well has been sunk to the depth of fifty feet, communicating with a sewer below, and forming a waste wier for the discharge of the surplus water, when it rises in the reservoir above the height of thirty-six feet. At the bottom of the well is laid a block of granite, weighing seven tons, and still further to break the fall of overflowing stream, and to prevent it from wearing away the stone, water to the depth of six feet rests permanently at the bottom.—From the well waste-water is conveyed by a sewer, nearly a mile to the North-River.

The style of architecture is Egyptian—well fitted by its heavy and imposing character for a work of such magnitude. The summit of the walls around the whole area is flagged, and will be provided with a heavy iron railing—forming a beautiful and sightly promenade twenty feet in width.—The grounds immediately around the work have been purchased by the corporation to protect it from encroachments. The receiving and discharging pipes are two in number—each about three feet in diameter. It is now nearly four years since the work was first commenced; and during the working season, on an average, about 400 men have been constantly employed upon it, besides great numbers employed in the winter season in bringing materials. During the whole time no lives have been lost by accidents. Two men had their legs broken by a downfall of the banks—and this is the extent of the injuries that have been sustained. The whole cost will not be far from $500,000. Above the door at which you ascend to the summit by three flights of eight, thirteen, and thirty steps, is the following inscription:

CROTON AQUEDUCT.

DISTRIBUTING RESERVOIR.

Commissioners.	Engineers.
Samuel Stevens,	John B. Jervis, Chief.
Zebedee Ring,	H. Allen, Principal Ast.
John D. Ward,	P. Hastle, Resident.
Benjamin Birdsall,	Builders.
Samuel R. Childs.	Thompson Price & Sons
Commenced	Completed
MDCCCXXXVIII.	MDCCCXLII.

Such is a condensed but comprehensive view of this noble structure. It is now completed, with the exception of the High Bridge. The bridge will occupy two years more, but a temporary pipe has been laid over the river upon the coffer dams of the bridge, which will afford us a supply of water for two or three years, until the completion of the entire work. Its estimated cost, owing to changes of plan, rise of labor, and provisions, &c., has risen from five to twelve millions—a great sum abstractly considered, but a trifling one compared with the benefits resulting from the work. The excess of the city mortality over that of the country is always great, and is attributable, in a great degree, to the injurious qualities of the water of the wells, which receive the filtrations of all the noxious animal and vegetable matters which load the surface of the ground.—Remove this cause by a bountiful supply of pure water, and we not only diminish the number of deaths, but relieve, in perhaps an incalculable degree, the amount of suffering from disease, which is properly attributable to this source, but which does not absolutely destroy life. We have suffered under this daily growing evil, up to this time, unaware of its magnitude, which can indeed be measured only by the favorable changes which will be perceptible when its causes shall be removed. Nor will this be the only benefit. Metaphysicians prove that physical and moral purity are closely allied, and their theory seems corroborated by the unwashed persons and sordid garments of the criminals at the bar of the Police. Thus by giving facilities and inducements to personal cleanliness, we shall also increase if philosophers be right, the purity of the mind, which always harmonize more or less with the body which encloses it; and the diminution of sickness and of crime will go hand in hand. Public Baths then will form just subjects for the attention of the Fathers of the City; none of whom, we hope, will side with the English Mayor, who opposed their establishment on the ground that he had not been in the water for twenty years, and felt no worse for it. Fountains too will display their grace amid our utilitarian rows of bricks. Troy, New Haven, and even the village of Springfield, boast of these ornaments, but the great city of New York as yet can show none. Let no one think them useless extravagancies; for by adding their graceful mite to the other benefits of the Croton Aqueduct in making our city a desirable residence, they enhance the value of property, and thus give to our citizens a direct pecuniary return for their vast outlay, in addition to inestimable improvements which they receive in their health, morals and enjoyments.—New York Tribune.

From the Vermont Chronicle.

A FRAGMENT.

* * * * I sat at my open window. The trees before me were assuming the first delicate green of spring, and the light of a mild sunset was just passing away.—The villagers—my friends and neighbors whom I see, and whose voices I hear every day in the busy street,—were passing by; and for a time I pleased myself with thinking over the calm pleasures of home in which each one, at such a season, and at such an hour, would soon repose.

But I had been reading an account of one of those visions of the eternal world, as they seem, when the soul, freed partially from this earthly clog, puts forth its unimpeded energies to understand and to realize disembodied existence. I had been thinking of William Tenant, whose visions of the heavenly glory seem to have been like those of the apostle to the Gentiles when he heard the unspeakable things which it is not possible for man to utter. I remembered how that insight in his case, elevated him above the world; how the thought of what he saw and heard was with him every hour of the day for years; and how holy and spiritual was his life in consequence. I had thought, too, of that poor London girl, who, in her dream, witnessed the ineffable love of heaven and heard its thrilling song, but neither joined in the rapture of the one, or felt the warmth of the other, and was started from the vision by the closing round her of a cold iron ever-during darkness.

What I had read began to mingle with what I saw. The forms before me lost their materiality, and I seemed to look on spirits moving to and fro. I went with one and another into the realms of spiritual existence, and saw how each was affected by the touch-stone of heaven's ineffable holiness and glory. As the darkness came on and the passengers disappeared, my thoughts again passed forward to each one's home, to look, not as before upon an earthly scene, but upon the spirits that for a time dwelt there. I followed each to "his maker and his God;" I gathered them in groups, I separated them in companies, according to character and affinities—according to religious state and habits.

How changed was the aspect of those dwellings as I went from street to street! Beautiful residences that I had always looked upon with delight, drove the cold blood back curdling in my heart. Low huts that had been deemed a nuisance for ugliness, were lighted up with a heavenly glory, and became chief ornaments of the village. And oh! how often in the same house and the same room did the near connection of celestial, amaranthine beauty with the horrors of eternal death, startle and agitate me!

Yes—it is in the midst of these immortal spirits that I live. I take the hand—I see the eye that meets my own, the speaking soul; but with what emotion should I do it, were the veil entirely rent away! *

* * * * *

From the Christian Secretary.

TIMES HAVE CHANGED.

Time was, when children, stockingless and shoeless, measured the snows, eat their porridge, and went to bed with sparkling eyes, plump faces, rosy cheeks, and healthy constitutions. Time is, when children cannot eat coarse food, but plums, sweetcakes and sweetmeats, and it would be almost an unpardonable crime for the nurse to suffer them to put their feet on the floor. Their pale countenances tell the mischief. Time was, when children obeyed their parents, were made to know their places, and were not considered of age, until they were twenty-one; when they stood up before the old, & honored the man of grey hairs. Time is, when a child governs the family, has his own way, and thinks he knows more at fifteen than his father ever did, does, or ever will know; and all the respect age gets from him, is either a jeer, a sharp yes, or a flat no.—Time was, when the young women laid their hands to the milk-pail, the wash-tub, the spindle, or the distaff. Time is, when these things are exchanged for the pencil, the piano, the theatre, or its auxiliaries,—Time was when tilling the ground was considered honorable employment for young men. Time is, when thousands are ruined by the flatteries of commerce. Time was, when honesty and religion dwelt in the same. Time is, when (in too many instances,) they are hardly neighbors. Time was, when the voice of family prayer was heard in almost every house. Time is, when this voice is heard in but few families. Time was, when the special influences of God's spirit was indispensably necessary to convert a sinner. Time is, when the common influences of the spirit, with the help of human agency, is judged sufficient to effect the change. Time was, when religious subjects generally took the lead in social conversation. Time is, when they generally bring up the rear, if they appear at all. Time was, when ministers had nothing to preach but the gospel. Time is, when if you take from ministers every subject but the gospel, many of them would not have much of any thing left.

Mr. Editor, as some of your newspaper writers are very good in detecting the errors of others, will you give them leave to point out errors in the above remarks.

S. W.

From the [illegible]

RIGHT TRAINING OF THE MIND.

1. The habit of voluntary and protracted attention: a thing not innate—a thing to which the mind is averse, and to which it is led only by continued and reiterated action. Hence, in colleges, young men generally make insurrection against those studies which demand the most concentrated and protracted action of mind.

2. The acquisition of elementary principles. Every part of God's system is under the government of elementary principles.—Without system, man will everywhere see in truth insulated fragments, and be in a wilderness without a clew to guide him in or out. Elementary principles are the key of knowledge. God in creation locked up every thing into systems, but has left the key with us. And we must find the key-hole, and put in the key.

3. Precision of thought. Without this, the mind is not exercised, and knowledge is not gained. Many, when called to give a definite account, can do nothing but hesitate and stammer. Why? Because their impressions are general and undefined.

Definitions are the pivots of knowledge. He who has got the definition, has got all; and he who has not got a definition, has got nothing but an indefinite approximation to knowledge. Without precision of thought, it is impossible to define.

4. Condensation and concentration of thought. Conceptions may be poured out clear and beautiful as a brook running through a meadow; but there will be but little power. Light must be brought to a focus, to burn. Nothing but labor in the workshop of thought and words, can overcome the incorrigible propensity of mind to take the easy course of prosing out words to one idea.

5. Balance of mind. There is a propensity to cultivate to excess those faculties which are most prominent. This increases the disproportion, and makes the mind a monster.

Such is the outline of things to be done by literary institutions.

PARALLEL OF THE SEXES.—The North American says, there is an admirable partition of qualities between the sexes, which the author of our being has distributed to each, with a wisdom that challenges our unbounded admiration.

Man is strong—Woman is beautiful.

Man is daring and confident—Woman is diffident and unassuming.

Man is great in action—Woman in suffering.

Man shines abroad—Woman at home.

Man talks to convince—Woman to persuade and please.

Man has a rugged heart—Woman a soft and tender one.

Man prevents misery—Woman relieves it.

Man has science—Woman taste.

Man has judgment—Woman sensibility.

Man is a being of Justice—Woman an angel of mercy.

NOBILITY.—What art thou then to despise men, or what raises thee above them? Thy services or thy virtues? But how many more obscure men more virtuous than thou, more laborious, more useful?—Thy birth? We respect it: In thee we salute the shadow of thy ancestors; but is a shadow to pride itself on the homage paid to the body? Thou wouldst have reason to pride thyself, if they gave thy name to thy ancestors, as they gave to the father of Cato the name of his son, "The light of Rome." But what pride can a man inspire thee with which owes thee nothing, and for which thou art only indebted to chance? Birth excites emulation in great souls, and pride in little ones. Hear the men who thought nobly and who knew how to value men. "There are no slaves who have not had slaves for their ancestors; no slaves who have not had kings for their ancestors."—Plato. "A person is not born for our glory, what he was before is nothing to us."—Seneca. Consult thyself, enter into thyself."—Marmontel.

JUGS.—The jug is the most singular utensil; a pail, tumbler, decanter, may be rinsed and you may satisfy yourself by optical proof that the thing is clean; but the jug has a little hole in the top, and the interior is all darkness. No eye penetrates it, no hand moves over the surface. You can clean it only by putting in water, shaking it up, and pouring it out. If the water comes out clean, you judge you have succeeded in purifying the jug, and vice versa. Hence the jug is like the human heart: no mortal eye can look into its recesses, but you can judge of its purity only by what comes out.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

PROSPECTUS of the FARM HOUSE OF THE XIX CENTURY, or En[illegible] of Practical Agriculture, containing the best mode of culture adopted in France, England, Germany, and Flanders [illegible]

An Elementary, Complete and Methodical Course of Rural Economy, with more than Two Thousand Engravings, representing the various Implements, Machines, sets of Apparatus, Breeds of Animals, Trees, Shrubs, and Plants [illegible]

[illegible]

to S. S. HASKELL, Publisher [illegible] New York.

New York, June 1, 1842.

 All editors who will give this prospectus [illegible] insertions, and forward the papers containing them to the New York Watchman, shall be entitled to one copy of the work.

NO IMPOSITION.

NO STATES PRISON WORK!

THOSE wishing to purchase BOOTS and SHOES of superior quality [illegible] will find just the place by calling at the sign of the MAMMOTH BOOT.

De Ruyter, May 20, 1842.

JOB PRINTING.

BOOKS, Pamphlets, Way Bills, Hand-Bills, Cards, Bills, &c. &c. neatly executed at this office.

L. W. BLISS' [illegible] Bliss & Co. [illegible] Hitme's Sampson & Sanders [illegible] consisting of Broad Axes, Hand Axes, Adzes and Chisels, at Factory prices by J. N. ELMORE

October 4. Manufacturers' Agent.

"A nimble sixpence is better than a slow shilling."

SPRING GOODS! SPRING GOODS!

CHEAP! CHEAP!! CHEAP!!!

THE undersigned are receiving a large assortment of goods suitable for the spring and summer trade, and invite their friends and the public generally to call and examine them at the one price store. SUTTON & QUINBY.

Notice.

ALL persons who are indebted to the subscriber, either in accounts or notes, are requested to call and settle immediately and save cost.

De Ruyter, June 20, 1842. JAMES M. LETTS.

How to make money.

IN the study of mankind and of the Yankee N[illegible] [illegible] NEW GOODS [illegible] ELMORE'S [illegible] NEW GOODS [illegible] Fortune's Favorites.

May 3.

Of Drugs and Medicines.

THE subscriber keeps a much larger stock and sells much lower than those who advertise [illegible]

May 3. J. N. ELMORE.

4 CASES Superior and fashionable Hats [illegible] at the STONE STORE.

NEW TAILORING ESTABLISHMENT.

THE subscriber would inform the citizens of De Ruyter [illegible] that he has opened a shop [illegible] S. G. Walker's store [illegible] where he may at all times be found [illegible] those who are pleased to favor him with a call [illegible] garments made as well as at any establishment west of New York City.

N. B. Garments cut and warranted if made by competent workmen. New York Spring and Summer Fashions [illegible] W. P. GUEST.

De Ruyter [illegible] 1842.

FLOUR! FLOUR! FLOUR!

SUPERFINE Flour [illegible] the Farmers' Ex[illegible] in barrels and [illegible] This Flour is made from the best of western wheat at one of the best mills in the state. S. G. WALKER.

De Ruyter, Apr. 18, 1842.

BLANKS, BLANKS!

JUST [illegible]

[illegible]

C[illegible] STONE STORE.

500 [illegible] STONE STORE.

AGENTS FOR THE REGISTER.

NEW YORK.

[illegible]

NEW JERSEY.

[illegible]

PENNSYLVANIA.

[illegible]

VIRGINIA.

[illegible]

OHIO.

[illegible]

Port Jefferson—[illegible]

[illegible]

MICHIGAN.

[illegible]

WISKONSAN.

[illegible]

IOWA.

[illegible]

ILLINOIS.

[illegible]

The Seventh-day Baptist Register

IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY,

AT DE RUYTER, MADISON CO., N. Y.,

BY

JAMES BAILEY.

TERMS.—To village subscribers who have the paper left at their doors, $2 25 in advance, or $2 50 at the expiration of the year.

[illegible] office and mail subscribers, $2 in advance.

Each communication, involving facts and names [illegible] in the paper, must be accompanied by a responsible name.

No subscription received for a less term than six months.

☞ All subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, will be considered as wishing to continue their subscription, and their paper will be sent to them accordingly. No paper will be discontinued till all arrearages are paid except at the discretion of the publisher.

☞ Advertisements inserted on the most reasonable terms.

☞ All letters and communications to ensure attention should be addressed to the publisher free of postage.

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.

VOL. III.—NO 26.] JAMES BAILEY, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.—A. H. BURDICK, PRINTER. [WHOLE NO. 13[illegible]

Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,——The SEVENTH DAY is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.—COMMANDMENT.——If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments.—JESUS CHRIST.

TWO DOLLARS IN ADVANCE.] DE RUYTER, N. Y., FOURTH-DAY, AUGUST 24, 1842. [PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Original Papers.

For the Register.

The Importance of Evangelical Preaching.

BR. BAILEY;—You will please insert the following article, if it meets your approbation.

While an ample foundation is laid by the mediation of Christ for the salvation of sinners, and while the power and grace of God are confessedly necessary to render the same effectual, there is, in the plan of Providence, a peculiar necessity and prominence attached to the ministry of the word. Paul says, "it hath pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe." Again he inquires, "how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher? and how shall they preach except they be sent?" It is, therefore, very manifest that religious instruction is an appointed appropriated means of man's salvation, and that God has made special provision therefor, both under the old dispensation and the new, by the institution of a ministry—calling men from the ordinary ranks and avocations of life to labor in the gospel, to teach and preach Jesus Christ. This does not supercede, nor, in any wise, interfere with the duty of common christians to "speak often one to another," and to instruct and persuade sinners to embrace the gospel. Nevertheless it is an arrangement of peculiar importance, and highly requisite and honored as a means of the conversion of sinners, and the edification of saints. Hence, the Lord Jesus, having given his apostles a commission to "go and teach all nations, baptizing them" &c. "promised to be with them always, even unto the end of the world."

Whoever suitably examines this subject will perceive that a select and permanent ministry is a wise provision, and that it has received, in all ages, the sanction of the Divine blessing. Not that a blessing has followed all which has passed under the name of preaching. For some have run before they were sent; and, as might have been expected, have told their "own dreams," instead of "speaking God's word faithfully." Unskillful and unfaithful teachers ought, doubtless, to be numbered among the greatest curses which have ever visited this fallen world. Still, the position above taken is perfectly tenable.

The ministry is, in itself, a rich blessing—an ascension gift: and, when it has been faithfully fulfilled, the experience of multitudes has responded to the exclamation, "How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the gospel of peace, and bring glad tidings of good things!" Hence, the high responsibility which lies upon pastors and teachers! With what earnestness and diligence ought they to labor for the instruction of mankind! and how careful should they be "rightly to divide the word of truth, and give every one his portion in due season?" How deep should the impression be upon their minds, that it is the truth of God which is to be dispensed—not "the traditions of the elders," and the "dogmas of men." The preaching to be performed is "the preaching that God has bidden them." They are to "take of the things of Christ," and exhibit to the people; give a simple statement of gospel facts and principles; and inculcate the holy precepts of the Divine law. The greatest care must be taken "not to preach themselves," but "Christ Jesus the Lord." The matter of evangelical preaching is furnished to their hands. They are only to draw from Heaven's magazine, and impart the sacred treasure to their hearers in plain, definite and persuasive language, with a view to obtain their consent to gospel offers, and promote the salvation of their souls. Then, how peculiar—how sacred—and how vast is this work! Let the ministers of religion more deeply realize their obligations, and "the necessity which is laid upon them," and see that their commission is fulfilled. Every thing urges to ministerial fidelity, and blessed will the recompense be which awaits the faithful herald of gospel grace.

How important also it is that faithful and well-taught ministers should be multiplied. The number already in the field bears no adequate proportion to the wants of the church and the world. One of the most pressing obligations of the age is "to pray the Lord of the harvest that he would send forth laborers into his harvest;" and not only to pray thus, but to use all other proper means to enlarge the ranks of the ministry—to bring forward men of the right stamp—and to furnish a supply for all the waste places of Zion. We ought not to rely upon their being called and raised up of God independent of human effort. We might as well rely on the efficiency of Divine grace for the salvation of sinners without the teaching and preaching of the word at all. God is wont to call men to the ministry in the use of proper means: and there is no doubt that much more might be done than heretofore to augment the number of competent and faithful teachers. Let the inquiry be made with proper and general solicitude, what can be done? and let means already provided, and others which may be furnished, be faithfully employed, and the watchmen will be greatly multiplied, and their labors, under God, will be made extensively to bless the nations of the world.

And if these views are just, it is a duty belonging to the churches, and to the people every where to labor to supply themselves with pious and faithful instructors, and to sustain them in their work. It would seem that nothing more can be necessary than to state the design and importance of the ministry, and the order of Christ upon which it is founded, to evince the duty of men in regard to its improvement. Every society should procure, if practicable, an evangelical teacher; attend faithfully on his ministrations; contribute liberally to his necessities; be faithful doers of the word, and not hearers only; and labor diligently to attain the end of their faith, even the salvation of their souls.

Yours, as ever,
JABEZ CHADWICK.
Weedsport, July, 1842.

Religious Department.

A SHORT AND EASY METHOD WITH DEISTS.

BY REV. CHARLES LESLIE, M. A.

(Letter to a Friend.)

(Concluded.)

But the seventh mark is still more peculiar, if possible, to Christ, than even that of Prophecy. For whatever may be weakly pretended with regard to the oracular predictions of Delphia or Dodona, the heathens never affected to prefigure any future event by types, or resemblances of the fact, consisting of analogies either in individuals, or in sensible institutions directed to be continued, till the ante-type itself should make its appearance.

These types, in the instance of Christ, were of a two-fold nature, circumstantial and personal.

Of the former kind (not to notice the general rite of sacrifice,) may be produced as examples:

1. The Passover, appointed in memory of that great night when the Destroying Angel, who slew all "the first-born of Egypt," passed over those houses upon whose door-posts the blood of the Paschal Lamb was sprinkled; and directed to be eaten with what the Apostle (1 Cor. v. 7, 8,) calls "the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth."

2. The annual expiation, in two respects: first, as the High Priest entered into the Holy of Holies (representing heaven, Exod. xxv. 40, Heb. ix. 24,) with the blood of the sacrifice, whose body was burnt without the camp, "wherefore Jesus also, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate;" (Heb. xiii. 12,) and "after he had offered one sacrifice for sin, for ever sat down at the right hand of God;" (x. 12;) and secondly, as "all the iniquity of the children of Israel was put upon the head" of the Scape Goat. Lev. xvi. 21.

3. The brazen serpent, by looking up to which the people were cured of the stings of the fiery serpents; and whose "lifting up" was, by Christ himself, interpreted as emblematical of his being lifted up on the cross. John iii. 14.

4. The manna, which represented "the bread of life that came down from heaven." John vi. 31—35.

5. The rock, whence the waters flowed, to supply drink in the wilderness; "and that rock was Christ." 1 Cor. x. 4.

6. The Sabbath, "a shadow of Christ," (Col. ii. 16, 17;) and, as a figure of his eternal rest, denominated "a sign of the perpetual covenant." Exod. xxxiii. 16, 17. Ezek. xx. 12, 20. And, lastly, to omit others.

The temple, where alone the shadowy sacrifices were to be offered, because Christ, "the body," was to be offered there himself.

Of personal types, likewise, I shall confine myself to such as are so considered in the New Testament.

1. Adam, between whom and Christ a striking series of relations is remarked. Rom. v. 12—21, and 1 Cor. xv. 45—49.

2. Noah, who was "saved by water; the like figure whereunto, even baptism, doth now save us, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ." 1 Peter iii. 20, 21.

3. Melchisedec, king of Salem, who was made "like unto the Son of God, a priest continually." Heb. vii. 3.

4. Abraham, "the heir of the world," (Rom. iv. 13,) "in whom all the nations of the earth are blest." Gen. xviii. 18.

5. Isaac, in his birth and intended sacrifice, whence also his father received him in a figure, (Heb. xi. 19,) that is, of the resurrection of Christ. He too was the promised seed (Gen. xxi. 12, and Gal. iii. 16,) in whom all the nations of the earth were to be blessed. Gen. xxii. 18.

6. Jacob, in his vision of the ladder, (Gen. xxviii. 12, and John i. 51.) and his wrestling with the angel; whence he, and after him the church, obtained the name of Israel. Gen. xxxii. 28, and Matt. xi. 21.—The Gentile world also, like Jacob, gained the blessing and heirship from their elder brethren, the Jews.

7. Moses, (Deut. xviii. 18, and John i. 45,) in redeeming the children of Israel out of Egypt.

8. Joshua, called also Jesus, (Heb. iv. 8,) in acquiring for them the possession of the Holy Land, and as Lieutenant to the "Captain of the host of the Lord." Josh. v. 14.

9. David, [Psalm xvi. 10, and Acts ii. 25—35,] upon whose throne Christ is said to sit, [Isa. ix. 7,] and by whose name he is frequently designated [Hos. iii. 5, &c.] in his pastoral, regal, prophetical capacity.

10. Jonah, in his dark imprisonment of three days, applied by Christ to himself. Matt. xii. 40

The eighth mark is, that the facts of Christianity are such as to make it impossible for either the relaters or the hearers to believe them, if false, without supposing a universal deception of the senses of mankind.

For they were related by the doers, or by eye-witnesses, to those who themselves likewise either were, or might have been present, and undoubtedly knew many that were present at their performance. To this circumstance, indeed, both Christ and his apostles often appeal. And they were of such a nature as wholly to exclude every chance of imposition. What juggler could have given sight to him "that was born blind," have fed five thousand hungry guests with "five loaves and two fishes;" or have raised one, who had been "four days buried," from his grave.

When, then, we add to this, that none of the Jewish or Roman persecutors of Christianity, to whom its first teachers frequently referred as witnesses of those facts, ever ventured to deny them; that no apostate disciple, under the fear of punishment, or the hope of reward, not even the artful and accomplished Julian himself, ever pretended to detect them: that neither learning nor ingenuity, in the long lapse of so many years, has been able to show their falsehood: though, for the first three centuries after their promulgation, the civil government strongly stimulated hostile inquiry: and that their original relators, after lives of unintermitted hardship, joyfully incurred death in defense of their truth. We cannot imagine the possibility of a more perfect or abundant demonstration.

It now rests with the Deists, if they would vindicate their claim to the self-bestowed title of "men of reason," to adduce some matters of fact of former ages, which they allow to be true, possessing evidence superior, or even similar, to those of Christ. This, however, it must at the same time be observed, would be far from proving the matters of fact respecting Christ to be false; but certainly without this, they cannot reasonably assert that their own facts alone, so much less powerfully attested, are true.

Let them produce their Cæsar, or Mahomed,

1. Performing a fact, of which men's outward senses can judge;

2. Publicly in the presence of witnesses;

3. In memory of which public monuments and actions are kept up;

4. Instituted and commencing at the time of the fact;

5. Recorded likewise in a set of books, addressed to the identical people before whom it was performed, and containing their whole code of civil and ecclesiastical laws:

6. As the work of one previously announced for that very period by a long train of prophecies:

7. And still more peculiarly prefigured by types, both of a circumstantial and personal nature, from the earliest ages; and,

8. Of such a character as made it impossible for either the relators or hearers to believe it, if false, without supposing a universal deception of the senses of mankind.

Farther; let them display, in its professed eye-witnesses, similar proofs of veracity in some doctrines founded upon it, and unaided by force or intrigue, a like triumph over the prejudices and passions of mankind: among its believers, equal skill and equal diligence in scrutinizing its evidences, OR LET THEM SUBMIT TO THE IRRESISTIBLE CERTAINTY OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION.

And now, reader, solemnly consider what that religion is, the truth of which is proved by so many decisive marks. It is a declared revelation from God; pronounces all men guilty in his sight; proclaims pardon, as his free gift through the meritorious righteousness, sacrifice, and intercession of his only Son, to all who trust alone in his mercy and grace, cordially repenting and forsaking their sins; requires fervent love, ardent zeal, and cordial submission toward himself, and the highest degree of personal purity and temperance, with rectitude and benevolence towards others; and offers the aid of the Holy Spirit for these purposes, to all who sincerely ask it. Consider, this religion is the only true one, and while it promises peace on earth and eternal happiness to all who do receive and obey it, it denounces everlasting destruction against all who do not. It is in vain for you to admit its truth, unless you receive it as your confidence, and obey it as your rule. Study, then, embrace it for yourself; and may the God of love and peace be with you.

STRONG REASONS.

There are many strong reasons why I cannot be a Universalist.

1. If the doctrine was true, the Bible would plainly, repeatedly and solemnly declare it, which is not the case.

2. After all the metaphysical quibbling of those who believe the doctrine, innumerable passages in the Bible, most [illegible] ing at as if there is no hell in future being.

Among these passages are the following.

'The rich man also died, and in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in [illegible].' Now, admitting this [illegible] settled in our mind, that Christ would [illegible] so far depart from reality, to [illegible] ural and impossible, as to [illegible] after death, if such a thing [illegible]. All that Universalists say [illegible] is so strained and inconsistent, that I could not conceive it if I would.

Again, 'It is better for thee to enter into life halt or maimed, rather than having two hands, or two feet, to be cast into everlasting fire.' However figurative this whole passage may be, it is clear to my mind that the disciples of Christ were not in danger of being cast into everlasting fire in this world; consequently they were warned of such a fire, or state, in another world.

Again: 'But he that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost, hath never forgiveness, but shall be in danger of eternal damnation.' To me it is clear that men cannot be in danger of what cannot exist, therefore eternal damnation is a reality.—Christ said to the Pharisees, 'Ye shall receive the greater damnation.' Why speak of a future damnation for sins that they had already committed? Are men damned, (as Universalists say,) when they sin? Why then did Christ say 'ye shall receive'?

But I must be short.

3. Another reason why I cannot be a Universalist is, the Bible declares, that God deprives men of natural life for their sins, as in the case of the Sodomites, Ananias, his wife, the Egyptians, &c. Now I cannot see how wrath [illegible] exercised upon men for sins which [illegible] denly removed from this [illegible] world. In such a case is not sin [illegible] cause of their happy change? [illegible] not such be glad that they sinned [illegible] they know that by sinning they [illegible] the sooner to heaven?

4. Another reason is, I am frequently called to witness the death of persons [illegible] have been Universalists all their life time, but who renounced Universalism [illegible] they are dying. Does God leave them and teach them in a dying hour what is not true. Or, does God forsake them and suffer the devil to torment them at such times? But on the other hand, I have never seen one, who when dying, [illegible] the first time, there embraced Universalism.

5. Another reason, is, when men are really converted from their sins to God, they renounce Universalism, if they [illegible] believed it. But when they backslide and cease to pray, they frequently turn Universalists.

6. Another reason is, the preaching of the doctrine of Universalism produces no revivals, or conversions from sin to holiness.

7. Once more. The Universalists [illegible] so little brotherly kindness [illegible] Christians, that I cannot [illegible] the spirit of Christ. [illegible] leave them, or oppose their [illegible] they forthwith seek to destroy [illegible] slandering his character! How can I unite with such a people?

8. I see also, that when a [illegible] another denomination [illegible] and sin, that Universalists [illegible] ungodly, so called, rejoice [illegible] stead of being grieved for the cause's sake, and laboring to restore such a one [illegible] Bible directs, they make great rejoicings in their papers, and circles, over the Christians' fall?—Can I unite with a people that rejoice in iniquity?

9. It is beyond a reasonable doubt, that the doctrine of 'rewards and punishments' cannot be true unless there be a future [illegible]. No person having the slightest acquaintance with human nature, and every-day occurrences, can believe that men are punished or rewarded to perfection in this life.

10. Inseparably connected with the faith that all will be saved, there are so many absurdities, such as no devil, no judgment, no literal resurrection, no sacrifice for sins, &c. &c., that I cannot believe the doctrine.

11. Aside from the influence of education, or the consciousness of guilt, my mind is ever impressed with the solemn conviction, that there will be an eternal separation of the righteous from the wicked. In vain do I strive to obliterate from the table of the mind, this awful truth. The deep affections of my soul, rising in their strength, to grasp the thought, that all friends, whether virtuous, or vile, will meet me in heaven, are overcome by the superior power of the divine conviction, that 'without holiness no man shall see the Lord.'—And when my faith would [illegible] Redeeming mercy [illegible] and quench with the waters of [illegible] the devouring flames [illegible] quenched.' God himself [illegible] 'the wages of sin is death' [illegible] because [illegible] Christ [illegible]

[illegible]—Morning Star.

[illegible]

Children's Department.

[illegible]

A [illegible] cherished by all [illegible] Sabbath-schools [illegible] Christ [illegible] of being [illegible] of earthly [illegible] er, to be the reverse, that even [illegible] rents should turn [illegible] and in [illegible] burnt up at the stake [illegible] these sufferings would be as nothing in comparison with the heavenly [illegible] would be introduced [illegible] would not rather burn an hour than burn forever. Cyril, whose history we have just cited, was truly wise. Young as he was, he knew how to count the cost, and [illegible] the time [illegible] not at all be weighed [illegible] Christ [illegible] with the bravery of [illegible] a Cæsar, a Bonaparte [illegible] they may nevertheless [illegible] casting all the fame of the [illegible] in the world in the shade [illegible] the deepest disgrace in the [illegible] of mankind—death in the horrid [illegible] consuming fire, could not intimidate [illegible] the youthful Christian. Such [illegible] have no cause for fear. Either [illegible] what they are called to [illegible] will be more than supported [illegible] no martyrdom, no pain, in [illegible] would gladly be [illegible] the Judge who con[illegible] what would [illegible] he had only proved as [illegible]

[illegible] he who learns to sin, has [illegible] of the wick[illegible] but they can only [illegible] the present world [illegible] kill the body. So [illegible] from which all the [illegible] the soul. In [illegible] the Lord. He [illegible] He will [illegible] suffer their souls [illegible] of the righteous can[illegible] and by the [illegible] necessarily destined to a [illegible]

[illegible] be for Christ, [illegible] they should have to die,—and [illegible] in that day when a [illegible] would could [illegible] save the soul from [illegible]

From the [illegible]

[illegible] THE BIBLE.

[illegible] the Bible so [illegible] Mary to her mother.—

'Yes, I [illegible] many times, my dear,' said [illegible]

[illegible] you must know all that there [illegible] this time, but yet you read it over.

[illegible] you remember last summer, Mary, [illegible] you were away at Miss Brooke's [illegible]

[illegible] when you got a [illegible] read it over [illegible] read the letter so [illegible] a pleasure [illegible] and you,

[illegible] some parts [illegible] hundreds of times [illegible] reminds [illegible] my heaven[illegible] and therefore I [illegible] said

[illegible] You may [illegible] the formation of [illegible] perpetual en[illegible] does [illegible] at any other [illegible] learning is not [illegible]—moral [illegible] schools, [illegible] are kept out [illegible] ingenuity [illegible] at Westminster, [illegible] three and five [illegible] they are kept [illegible] taken care of by a [illegible] while their moth[illegible] go out and work [illegible] less or more, is [illegible] The moral [illegible] consideration.—Lord [illegible]

[illegible] I have given prompt attention [illegible] so as to prevent [illegible] that he may give prompt attention when you call him. Either gratify [illegible] show him that his remarks [illegible] are improper or untimely. The child who calls "mamma! mamma! mamma!" without attention, will give no attention when called.

[illegible] to eat or take food without asking, or to tease when denied.—The bare expression of a parent's wish at such a time should be law, from which no appeal should be made.

Lester T. Rogers

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, August 24, 1842.

Traveling Agent.

Br. DANIEL BABCOCK, of Scott, is now engaged as a traveling agent for the Register. We request agents and all friends of the press, to aid him in extending our circulation, and in settling the accounts for the present and past volumes. He will visit first Oneida, Jefferson, Lewis, Otsego, and Madison counties.

General Conference.

Br. John Whitford, of Berlin, wishes us to give information to those proposing to attend the General Conference, that as there is no public conveyance from Albany or Troy to that place, that teams will be provided and be at Congress Hall in Troy, on Sept. 2d, at 10 o'clock, A. M., to convey all that may meet them there at that time.

Baptism.

A writer in the "South Western Christian Advocate" insists that but one mode of Baptism was practiced by the Apostles, and that that mode was sprinkling or pouring, and thinks it problematical how immersion was introduced. He also styles immersion a "superstitious appendage," and that candidates were in a state of nudity. He likewise "seriously objects to it" for various reasons, as the following. The idea of immersion makes the candidate shudder; Indecency—a great crowd of spectators—muddy water, &c.

When such doctrine as the above is taught by religious teachers, as being gospel-wise, it is time to let the truth come. On this subject there has been much written by Pedo-Baptists. Fine spun theories have been brought out, and elaborate arguments set forth. The great effort has been to make people believe that sprinkling or pouring was Gospel Baptism. And some beside the above mentioned writer, have gone so far as to deny that immersion was Baptism.—Our opinion of the matter is simply this, that Pedo-Baptists find themselves in possession of the sentiment from tradition that sprinkling or pouring is Baptism, and instead of searching the scripture to see if these things are so, they wrest the scriptures and get up long sophistical "yarns" to prove their system. That but one mode of Baptism, (and that immersion,) was taught and practised by Christ and his Apostles, we think the scriptures plainly enough show.—A scriptural examination of this subject will show what the mind of the Spirit and the practice of the Apostles was. We assume the ground that immersion of believers, and that only, is taught in the New Testament.

The first mention that is made of Baptism is in Matt. iii. All Jerusalem and Judea and the region round about Jordan went out to John the Baptist and were baptized of him in Jordan. 16 verse, "And Jesus when he was baptized went up straightway out of the water," &c. In these passages no other mode than immersion could have been practiced. In the 6th verse the inspired writer states expressly that they were baptized in Jordan, not near it, by the side, or on the bank, but in Jordan. In the 16th verse he also states that when Jesus was baptized, he went up straightway out of the water. How could he come out of that in which he was not? If he was sprinkled, or poured on the bank, why was the expression "out of" used? Taking these two passages in connection with numerous others of the like import, with the fact that the primitive meaning of Βαπτω, Βαπτιζω, Βαπτισμα, [Bapto, Baptizo, Baptisma,] and their cognates, is to immerse, immersion, and not sprinkle, must settle the question that immersion according to the scriptures is gospel-wise.

Immersion is further proved from the record concerning the Eunuch in Acts viii. 26—39. Here it is expressly stated that they, both Phillip and the Eunuch, went down into the water, and that they came up out of the water. This would not have been necessary if sprinkling on the bank would answer the requirement of the institution of Baptism.

The word Baptizo is the only term used in the Greek where Baptism is mentioned. Bapto is never used in such a case. The original, ordinary, and figurative meaning of Baptizo is to immerse, to dip, to overwhelm. We have shown above that Christ, who is our great example was baptized in Jordan, and that the Eunuch, who was baptized by one of his disciples, went down into the water and came up out of it. Thus, from the example of Christ, and the practice of those he instructed, the doctrine of immersion is clearly set forth. Having established the fact that Baptism was by immersion in the two instances, and that the ordinary meaning of Baptizo is to immerse, we must conclude that immersion was the only mode of Baptism. This argument must stand unless the Pedo-Baptists can show from the scriptures that another mode was practiced. The most they have ever done is to infer from circumstances that candidates could not have been immersed. But could it even be shown to be true that another mode was practiced, it could by no means be shown that immersion was not right.

The metaphorical use of the term gives strength to the argument. Matt. xx. 22; Jesus says, "are ye able to be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with?" In this he refers to that overwhelming weight of suffering that should come upon him.—Will any Pedo-Baptist say that Christ was only barely sprinkled or touched with suffering? No, indeed, he was overwhelmed. The sun refused to shine upon such a scene. He was overwhelmed and sunk under the load. Matt. iii. 11, "He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire." This has reference to the day of Pentecost. At that time "there appeared unto them cloven tongues like as of 'fire,' and they were all filled with the 'Holy Ghost,'" and all the house was filled where they were sitting.—Consequently they were immersed, or completely overwhelmed. Other metaphorical use of the term like the above might be shown, but these are sufficient.

The view that was entertained by the Apostle Paul may be gained from Rom. vi. 4, 5. "Therefore, we are buried with him by baptism into death.—For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death," &c. It never was a custom to bury by sprinkling a little dirt, or plant in the same way. When we bury persons they are entirely covered up, and so when we we plant seeds.

It is contended by some Pedo-Baptists that the Greek prepositions rendered into in the phrases "in Jordan," "down into the water," mean at, near, or to. If this mode of translating the prepositions εν, [en,] εις, [eis,] is adopted in this case, it will apply equally well in others. Thus in Matt. xxv. 46, 'These shall go away near, or to, everlasting punishment, but the righteous at, or near, or to life eternal.' They never shall enter in, as the text states, but come near. The wicked shall not be turned into hell, with all the nations that forget God, but shall be turned near to hell. The righteous shall not enter into heaven, but come near to it. This shows the folly of such caviling with the scriptures.

In the Greek, Βαπτιζω, [Baptizo,] and its cognates, is used when the ordinance of Baptism is mentioned, and is confined to this with few exceptions, but when it is used with reference to any thing else the idea of immersion is intended to be conveyed. But other words are used for sprinkling, pouring, washing, &c., and words, too, that express the idea more clearly than others could, for sprinkling, washing, &c., are their proper definitions. Thus we have the following:

Louo, to wash the person of an individual, John xiii. 10. 2 Peter ii. 22, &c.

Pluno, to scour or wash clothes, Rev. vii. 14, &c.

Nipto, to rinse hands or face, 1 Tim. i. 10, &c.

Ekkeo, to pour water or oil, Rev. xvi. 1, 2, 3, 4, 8, &c.

Ballo, to pour rapidly, John xiii. 5, &c.

Breko, to wet, moisten, rain, &c., Luke vii, 38, &c.

Rantizo, to sprinkle water, 1 Peter i. 2, &c.

If "sprinkling" or "pouring" is Baptism, why were not some of the above words used that would express the idea clearly and forcibly? But, instead of that, the Holy Spirit has, in every case, dictated the use of that word whose only signification is to dip, immerse, plunge, overwhelm, and others of the same and no other import.

Action and Feeling.

Obedience to the will of God is essential to the enjoyment of his love. Hence, those who complain of want of feeling in the cause of religion, may find the true cause of their indifference in their want of action.—Action will create feeling, and feeling will promote action, so that they who will may constantly increase in their religious enjoyment, till like the pious Payson they may exclaim, "I can find no words to express my happiness. I seem to be swimming in a river of pleasure, which is carrying me on to the great fountain." But where there is no action there can be no feeling. The natural man cannot be strong without food. Obedience is the food of the soul. "The willing and obedient shall eat the good of the land." How oft Christians say, 'Oh, I do not feel as I want to. I have no religious enjoyment.' The scriptures furnish a sure remedy for this case. Let these complainers change their cry, and say 'I do not act as I ought to. I have no proper religious action,' and remember that action creates feeling, and then carry out the principle, and there will be no want of religious enjoyment. Those who act right will feel right, and with them all will be right.—Try and see.

Fear God and keep his commandments.

Teachers of De Ruyter Institute.

MORGAN L. WOOD, A. B., a recent graduate of Union College, has been engaged as Principal of De Ruyter Institute. Mr. LANGWORTHY is retained as Teacher of Mathematics, &c.,—a station for which he is pre-eminently qualified. Miss SEVERANCE continues Preceptress in the Ladies' Department. Her qualifications for her Department are every way sufficient, and her reputation as a Teacher is untarnished. The manners and habits, as well as mental and moral culture of those under her charge receive all due attention.

"Leslie's Method."

We close this week this short and conclusive method with Deists. If all our readers have not given it a careful perusal, we now invite them to devote a few hours to it, and examine well the argument.—If it cannot be gainsayed, we ask all to embrace it. If it can, let us see how. The vital principles of religion lie in this one subject. If the argument stands, the religion of the Bible, with all its doctrines and duties, stands with it, and he that neglects to yield an immediate obedience to the same, greatly endangers the interests of his soul, while he is found among the enemies of God.

ERRATUM.—In the article of E. S. Bailey, last week, the word "own" was improperly inserted in the sentence "and be baptized in his name."

For the Register.

BR. BAILEY,—I observe in the Register of August 10th, '42, an article of the signature B., upon the "Manner of Conducting the General Conference," as to the merits of the article touching the "manner" of conducting the Conference, I have nothing to say. But so far as that article, (though covertly,) argues for an annual Conference, I would respectfully ask, would it not be better to let the subject remain in silence rather than hazard the consequences of again agitating it. Such is the mind of C.

Missionary Department.

For the Register.

BR. BAILEY.—In our last letter, we noticed, that in consequence of ill health, we were about to close our labors in Fredonia, I. T. After resting two days, we made an effort to preach, but failed; however had strength to attend the ordinance of baptism. The people of the town gathered upon the bank of the beautiful Iowa, and during the exercises we had almost forgotten our enfeebled health. If the worship of God in this imperfect state will cause the worshiper to be happy, and banish all thoughts of sorrow from the mind of the suffering probationer, what must be the enjoyment of those in heaven, where it is one eternal sunshine of glory, and where fatigue, toil, and suffering are changed into perfect rest? How melodious must be those notes when that innumerable throng shall strike their lyre, and with one shout, "as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of many thunders, say Hallelujah, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth." "Blessed," truly, "are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life." Finding it in vain to wait to regain our health so as to carry forth the labors necessary to accomplish the object here, we made preparations to depart, and on the 9th of June, left our weeping friends and a field bidding as fair for a plenteous harvest as any we ever vested. None but Ministers of the gospel are prepared to judge what our feelings were on this occasion. Some were pleading the merits of the Redeemer's blood. Infidels were deserting their falsified fabrications, and the ranks of the enemy were manœuvreing as though their General was about to abandon the empire.

The Church constituted in Iowa is in a very beautiful country, and in Fredonia, a very convenient location for a large town, being on the bank of the Iowa River, up and down which the proud steamer frequently plays, laden with almost every thing necessary for domestic use in this newly settled country; also, safely conveying the traveler up the river as it winds its way through the green carpeted prairies, interspersed with groves of timber, all of which are calculated to give interest and beauty to all around. Much of the land is uncultivated and for sale. The soil is of a sandy inclination and accounted very fertile by those who have enjoyed its rich productions. The inhabitants say they have a very healthy climate. Those wishing to communicate with the church may address Dr. Enoch Maxson, their clerk, Po. Fredonia, Louisa co., I. T.

After leaving Fredonia, we re-crossed the Mississippi at Wyoming, and spent the night in Illinois City, where we distributed such tracts as we had on hand. But of these messengers of mercy we were compelled to have but a scanty supply.

10. While crossing the prairies, found it quite convenient to fall into winter habits. Spent the night on the banks of Green River, and thought it cold for June; however, no frost was visible.

11. Drove up Rock River, which is given by all travelers as the beauty of the west. Many of the inhabitants of this beautiful and rich country act as though they thought "there was no God." In conversation with one wicked man, while he was extolling the country, we asked him to estimate the contrast between those green carpeted prairies, and the dread abode of the finally impenitent. His countenance fell, and he acknowledged his wretched condition while unreconciled to God. He, with his blaspheming associates soon stole away, and we were the only visitors left at this inn. If the awful condition of those justly condemned by God's holy law, disheartens the rebel, what must be the effect when justice thunders forth the heart-rending sence, "depart from me ye workers of iniquity, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels"? May sinners awake to their awful condition before it is eternally too late!—As the additional distance to pass by the Church in Wiskonson was trifling, we made them on our way, and found them happily situated and enjoying good health. We spent two Sabbaths with them, preached what our health would permit, and in company with Eld. Coon, visited the most of the families. Our friends are commencing a settlement west of Rock River, where with immediate action, an uninterrupted society may be secured. This country holds forth great inducements for the emigrant, offering on easy terms almost every convenience for luxurious habits. In some parts living springs and rippling brooks are in abundance, while in other places, with a few exceptions, water may be easily obtained by the medium of wells. The water is as pure and clear as any issuing from an eastern fountain, though of a limy tincture.

Leaving Wiskonsan, we passed through Chicago, and fourteen miles east of Michigan City spent the Sabbath with Br. [illegible] Brown; thence to Eld. Tyler's in Michigan, and found him struggling against a torrent of opposition for the advancement of truth. This state presents a great field for Missionary labor, but our appointed time having expired, warned us of the necessity of a speedy return. Hence we have hastened on our way, spending but little time with our friends as we came along, knowing it required diligence to arrive in time for Conference. And to God be glory for his parental care, and preserving grace during his absence. His guardian angel has watched over us—mercy in abundance has been bestowed. His kind hand has led us through many dangers, and the Savior's promise, "Lo, I am with you" has been verified. Notwithstanding some embarrassments have attended us, and we return almost worn out, we have no occasion to regret the engagement in this soul-cheering enterprise. We have only to mourn that we are not more devoted to God, and more willing to die upon the altar for the Redeemer's sake. While we are here kindly received by our friends, we can but feel for those lonely groups we have met with joy, but soon had to bid adieu, perhaps to meet no more in this vale of tears. But may we hail each other in heaven, where parting will be no more. And for them our prayer is, that the [illegible] of Missions may direct that way some of his devoted servants, that they die not without proper instruction. And as they are pleading for aid, we ask

Lo! child of God, hearest thou the plaintive song
That rolls the Mississippi vales along,
Mounts on the air, with dread impetus driven,
Each accent speaks, Where is the road to heaven?
Angelic spirits seize the sad acclaim,
And waft to the realms of bliss again,
And up before th' incarnate Son, unroll
The howling miseries of the expiring soul.
Grasp then the hour, nor fly from scenes of woe,
Thy crown in heaven with diadems shall glow,
Enrolled with angels, and with angels blest,
Bask with thy God in unmolested rest!

J. L. SCOTT.

De Ruyter, Aug. 23, 1842.

Congressional News.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

WASHINGTON, AUGUST 15, 1842.

Lotteries.

The lottery venders have been trying themselves for several weeks past to excite sympathy with themselves by reviling Mr Danforth, and other philanthropists in the District, whose assaults on their nefarious business it was not quite so easy to meet directly. They have also plead with great zeal and earnestness their 'vested rights,' and how unconstitutional it was to violate their 'contracts' to cheat people out of their hard earnings. But it is too late in the day to uphold such a system of villainy by any devices [illegible]

[illegible]

News of the Day.

[illegible]

On approaching [illegible] some of our company [illegible] that the high prairie [illegible] caught fire [illegible] wagons had been consumed, and among them the commissary's, which contained not only our trunks, but a large number of cartridges. The explosion of these we had mistaken for the report of our cannon.

We dashed ahead with the hope of rendering assistance to our companions, but before we could reach the place of the steep and rugged hill, the fire was dashing down with frightful rapidity, leaping and flashing across the gullies, and roaring in the deep and yawning chasms with the wild and appalling tones of a tornado. Ever and anon, as the flames would strike the dry and craggy tops of the cedars, a report as of a musket would be heard, and in such quick succession did these reports follow each other, that I can liken them to nothing save the the irregular discharge of infantry.

The wind was blowing fresh from the west when the prairie first caught, carrying the flames with a rapidity astounding, over the very ground on which we had traveled during the day. The wind lulled with the sun, and now the fire began to [illegible]

[illegible] was bound to Chicago, and when about six miles south of Manitou Island she ran into the Great Western on her larboard bow, carrying away a portion of her bulwarks, bowsprit, cutwater and figure-head, and split her stem.

"The shock was violent. Capt. Douglass, of the brig Virginia, who was standing at the time on the hurricane deck of the Western, by the wheel, was thrown over the railing by the force of the blow, and was landed on the promenade deck.—Fearing severe consequences from the collision, he sprung upon the Illinois, and there remained. Had the blow been received by the Great Western 'amidships,' she would, in all probability, have gone to the bottom, the crash was so great.

"It is not yet known with certainty how the collision originated, but the conclusion of the [illegible] is, that the Great Western was on her right course, and that of course the fault, if any, was in the Illinois.]

Lester T. Rogers

"The collision created great alarm among the passengers, some being thrown from their berths; but no personal injury was sustained. On examination of the Western, it has been ascertained that she will be able to perform her regular return trip up the lakes."

Stupendous Fish Story.—The Edinburgh Chronicle, of June 18th, states that there was caught on the 15th of June, off the island of May, in the turbot nets, a shark, five feet one inch in length, and weighing about four stone; in the mouth there are six rows of teeth. It was purchased by Messrs. George Dickson & Co., of Dundas street, and on cutting it up, in order to preserve it, they found in its stomach, a small tin canister, containing a seal with a beautifully engraved Roman head, thirty-four coins, consisting of British, (Charles II. and George II.) French, Dutch, Roman, Brazillian, Hindostan, and others, apparently Chinese, or East India coins, but so old as to be undecipherable; also, an old map of Scotland, engraved by Jeffrey, in which some of the towns are spelt thus: Sterling, Montross, Dans, Aire, &c., a portion of the Evening Courant, bearing date Monday Sept. 9th, 1811, in which were wrapped two of the coins, (silver) one of them is Charles II., of the year 1671, and is in excellent preservation, and a piece of the Courier of date 16th May, in which the seal was wrapped.

Ohio New State Loan.—The bill to authorize the Fund Commissioners to borrow $800,000 on the credit of the state, to be applied to the arrearages due contractors, has passed the House. It provides for the issue of stock, bearing an interest of ten per cent., payable st the State Treasury, (or if the money cannot be obtained on such terms,) in New York, redeemable after 1850. The stock is not to be sold at less than par.—Columbus Journal.

Lightning at Sea.—The British brig Mary, at Quebec, from London, was struck by lightning while on her passage to the former port. We copy the following from the Quebec Mercury of the 4th instant:

"On the night of Saturday, the 16th of July, in latitude 46 30, longitude 57, was struck by lightning. At 11 o'clock P. M., it commenced to blow a gale, accompanied by a heavy torrent of rain, which was attended with vivid and reiterated flashes of lightning, and loud peals of thunder. The vessel was literally encompassed and illumined by the electric fluid, playing, as it were, in garters and broad ribands all around; and with one simultaneous shock, at almost the same moment, struck the top-gallant-mast and foremast, detaching spinters from each of them. Nor did the destructive element stop here; for next, in its rapid flight, it alighted, with frightful force and a loud crash, on the chain cable, ninety fathoms in length, which was coiled up on the centre of the deck, close to the windlass, whence every object which presented itself to the senses seemed as if it were bespangled with large sparks of glowing fire, such as are shed all around in a foundry, when rod-hot irons are struck on a solid anvil by the hammer. Its effect was so sudden and power, and its impulse so great, as to cast the mate and three of the hands prostrate, within a foot or two of the spot where the last explosion took place. The fluid finding a conductor in the chain cable, passed by it from the vessel into the sea."

Dreadful Surgical Operation.—One of the most appalling and arduous surgical operations perhaps ever attempted, was performed at the King's College Hospital, New Brunswick, last week, on a young girl of twelve, who had a tumor in a cavity of the upper jaw-bone, which actually pushed the eye-ball out of its socket, and produced the most hideous deformity. In order to get at the tumor, incisions had to be made in the integuments of the face, and the cheek-bones sawed through and removed from their various detachments.—For about sixteen minutes, the time which the operator took, the whole of the right side of the face was laid bare, exposing the back part of the throat, tongue and palate. Some of the spectators turned pale at the sight of the operation, but the poor girl bore it with wonderful fortitude, and the operator worked with a skill as though his nerves were of iron. After the operation, the whole of the complicated integuments were replaced with sutures, and there are hopes of the recovery of the girl, if the nervous system survives the shock.

The Occulation.—This unusual occurrence of the occulation of a star by the planet Venus, on the night of the 8th inst., was looked forward to with considerable interest by star gazers. It unfortunately happened, as in most instances, that the intervention of a haze or cloud obstructed their view. In one case, the observation was complete, and that is stated thus in the Nantucket Enquirer:

"The occultation of the star Beta Virginis by the planet Venus was observed at this place on the evening of the 8th inst, under circumstances peculiarly advantageous. After a showery day, the weather became unusually fair and tranquil, and, for observations at low altitudes, the atmosphere was in a favorable state. The manifest and gradual diminution of the star's brilliancy by the atmosphere of the plant, near the period of immersion, and the steady increase of its lustre after the emersion were very interesting parts of the phenomenon. The immersion occurred at 7h 57m 01s, and the emersion at 8h 00m 58s, mean solar time at this meridian, as noted by an assistant with a chronometer of steady habits, and whose rate was determined by observations, a short time previous and subsequent to the event. As this occultation is of some importance to navigation and to science in general, its more minute circumstances will be prepared at leisure for future publication.

Ladies, &c.—Women are at a great premium in Texas. Congress have passed a law granting 2,982 acres of land to every woman that will marry, during the present year, a citizen of that republic, who was such at the time of the Declaration of Independence. What a chance is this for the 559,760 hopeless old maids in the United States?

The Sangamo (Ill) Journal says that Orson Pratt has left the Mormon city of Nauvoo, in consequence of the base slanders by which Joe Smith is striving to destroy the character of his wife, in revenge for having exposed his villany. This is part of the plan by which the 'Prophet' seeks to cover his systematic scoundrelism.

"Come, come, come," said one who was fast asleep, "get up, get up; don't you know it's the early bird that catches the worm?" "Serves the worm right," said the grumbling sleeper; "worms shouldn't get up before the birds do!"

The Board of Aldermen of Boston have resolved that "no threatrical exhibition, scenic performance, or equestrian exercises, of any description, shall take place in that city after sunset of the evening preceding the Lord's day.

Buffalo has been infested with a gang of counterfeiters, one of the chief of whom has been at length arrested, with a large amount of bills in his possession. They consist of twelve $100 bills on the Northern Bank of Kentucky; one $50 bill on the Citizen's Bank of Louisiana, N. O.; and two $20's Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of ——(place of issue blank.) The plate of the twenties was found upon the prisoner, a person calling himself James Walker. Of course, he was fully committed for trial.

It is a somewhat singular fact that the floors in the Patent Office at Washington are made of stone imported from Germany by a Connecticut man, who works an extensive quarry in his own land of "blue laws" and "horn gunflints." The stones were transported as ballast, at a trifling cost. That, together with the low wages of Germany, enabled the calculating Yankee to furnish the Government with the imported stone at a price less than he could afford his own—yielding him, it is said, a handsome profit.

During the first six months of the present year the mortality has been great in several towns bordering upon both sides of the Connecticut river, in New Hampshire and Vermont. The disorder most fatal has been a malignant putrid sore throat.—Gradually has it extended to adults, and the disorder is, in the most cases, fatal when it falls from the throat to the stomach and lungs.

The Shakers.—A young sprig from New York visited the Shakers at Lebanon the other day, and as he was wandering through the village, encountered a stout hearty specimen of the sect, and thus accosted him:—"Well Broadbrim, are you much of a Shaker?" "Nay," said the other, "not over much, but I can do a little that way." So he seized the astonished Gothamite by the collar, and nearly shook him out of his boots.

Good Stock.—Deacon Hewitt, and old New Hampshire veteran, had no less than seven sons engaged in the continental army at one time. Two were captains, three lieutenants, one ensign, and a fifer.

"I don't know where that boy got his temper; he did not take it from me." "Why no, my dear, I don't perceive that you have lost any!" was the affectionate reply of his cara sposa.

Dr. Bennett, the late Mormon General and Mayor of the holy city of Nauvoo, in disclosing the revelations of the 'prophet' Smith, winds up one of his chapters with the following precious morceau:

"If Joe Smith is not destined for the devil, all I can say, that the duties of a devil have not yet been clearly understood."

The New Orleans Bulletin of the 27th ult. states "that all the officers employed in the Bank of Orleans, now winding up, from the lowest to the highest, would be honorably discharged with not a cent of liability resting upon their shoulders. It is a pleasure for us to make so flattering a communication in these days of bank trickery and fraud." It is remarkable.

Gov. Carlin, of Illinois, is said to have made requisition upon Gov. Reynolds, of Missouri, for the delivery of the person of Gen. Bennett, charged by Jo. Smith with high treason against the State of Illinois.

Gov. Porter has refused the Executive sanction to the apportionment bill lately passed—consequently, the matter remains as before the extra session labored at it.

It is estimated that twenty-eight million pounds of genuine coffee are consumed annually in Great Britain and Ireland, and that not less than eighteen millions of pounds more of vegetable matter are fraudulently sold under the name of coffee.

Epitaph.—Giving a good character to a man going to a new place who oftentimes had a bad character in the place he has just left.

The number of castles, of which there are known to be existing remains, are in England 461, Wales 107, Scotland 155, Ireland 120, total 843.

The St. Louis Journal states that the Camanches, Cochataways, and two other tribes of Indians have commissioned Gov. Butler, Col. McIntosh, and Mr. Logan to request the President of Texas to send commissioners, to meet the chiefs of those tribes on Red river, to form a treaty of peace.

Astonishing.—The price of emigrant passage between N. Y. and Buffalo, is about a dollar and a half; and has been a dollar and a quarter. Between New York and Liverpool, in as fine ships as ever swam, the price is from four to five dollars. If we add the price to Cleaveland and Detroit, it would not exceed a dollar. So that the people of the old world may pass from their shores four hundred miles into the interior of the new world, for seven dollars. We dare say that the provisions for the voyage often cost as little as the passage; so that fifteen dollars covers the whole, and leaves a dollar for accidents.—Jour. of Com.

A Resignation En Masse.—The Whig members of the Ohio Legislature resigned in a body on the 11th instant, leaving both Houses without a quorum. The cause of this extraordinary movement was the intolerable course pursued by the Democratic party on the subject of Districting the State.

The resigned members of the Legislature have published an address to their constituents, setting forth their reasons for the course they have taken. It is signed by thirteen Senators and thirty-four Representatives.—Com. Adv.

Drowned.—The Coroner held an inquest at the Alms House in the Park, on the body of the man who was found in the dock at the foot of Fletcher street. He was identified as a Spaniard, aged 25, called Indian Joe, and had fallen into the water on Wednesday. Verdict, found drowned.

Laudable Munificence.—Mr. Adam Haverling, of Bath, Steuben county, in this State, has given a farm of one hundred and seventy acres, valued at $6000, together with an eligible village lot of one acre and a half, to build and endow an academy. Deprived of the blessings of education in early life, Mr. H. determined that the same cause which produced his misfortune should be averted from the village of his adoption; and to this end he has, with a munificence and liberality worthy of all praise, made a donation, the proceeds of which will erect a most beautiful edifice, and furnish it with a valuable library.—May the "Haverling Library" prove a blessing to the community in which it is to be located, and its founder to be held in grateful remembrance by the present and all future generations.

Missouri Law.—The Executive Committee of the Am. A. S. Society have taken legal advice in regard to what can be done for Thompson, Work, and Burr, confined for twelve years in the penitentiary of Missouri. The result is, that nothing can be done for their relief—the case being quite out of the Jurisdiction of other courts. The only thing which can possibly avail them is, for the governors of those States of which they were citizens, to expostulate with the governor of Missouri, and obtain some abridgement of the time. whether they will do this is very doubtful. This is a hard case; for it is admitted even in Missouri, that they broke no law except by a forced construction. Indeed, when the young men were arrested, it was a long time before they could find any law under which to try them, and the law they applied did not, and never was intened to have any relation to the case.

The Protestant Sabbath Schools of Philadelphia, in their annual celebrations for two years, have, by a sepcial prohibition excluded the scholars of the colored schools. The Catholic Sabbath Schools have freely admitted the colored schools to their processions, and made no difference on account of complexion. 'Honor to whom honor is due.'

African Church.—The Banner and Pioneer states, that there is an African church at Lexington Ky., with more than one thousand communicants. Of the pastor it says, 'He does more to suppress vice than all the police of the city.' And yet, probably, this pastor and most of the members of his church, are articles of merchandise!

Distres in England.—Says Lord Brougham, "thousands of persons were without food for days; he could not say that it was for one day alone, without a morsel of food. In some cases the poor were unable to leave their beds. They thus starved for days; because, as it was said by some of them, that in a recumbent position, the pangs of hunger were more easily endured. They were living on things that ought not to be eaten by men; and literally envied the husks to the swine which they could not eat." I have given his lordship's own words, because this statement bears out, to the fullest extent, all my previous assertions, and because the House of Lords received the declaration of such melancholy and heart-rending facts, without a single note of sympathy, or sound of commiseration.—Jour. of Com.

The Portland Maine Argus considers the terms of the Boundary agreement very favorable for that State; and to the conditions already published, adds, that Lord Ashburton pledges his government to pay for the timber stopped by the various booms on the St. John.

One of the most eminent oriental scholars of the age, is Professor Lee, of one of the English Universities, and yet all his education was acquired during the moments of leisure which he found while employed as a journeyman carpenter.

Massachusettss has a population of 94 1-2 to the square mile. Pennsylvania but 39. England has 260. If Massachusetts was as densely populated as England it will be perceived, it would contain over two millions of inhabitants. If the United States were also as populous as Massachusetts, we should be a nation of nine-five millions! What a stupendous prospect ahead.

An old man named Johnson, having been detected in trying to steal slaves from Kentucky, was caught and committed to prison at Warsaw, Ohio, in default of procuring bail for $2,000. The punishment for this offence is twenty years imprisonment.

Mr. Webster, Secretary of State, is, it is said, confined to his bed by sickness.

Notices.

General Conference.

The S. D. B. General Conference will hold its next session with the Church in Berlin, Rensselaer co., N. Y., commencing on the first day of the week before the second Sabbath in September next, at 10 o'clock, A. M. Introductory discourse by Eld. W. B. Gillett, or N. V. Hull, substitute.

JAMES BAILEY, Cor. Sec.

☞The A. S. D. B. Missionary Society will meet on the second day of the Conference at the call of the President; and the Evangelical Society for disseminating Religious Truth among the Jews, on the fourth day, at 10 o'clock, A. M.

☞The 7th Anniversary of the A. S. D. B. Tract Society will be held in Berlin on the 5th day of the week before the second Sabbath in September next, (8 [illegible]) o'clock, A. M.

PAUL STILLMAN,
General Agent.

TEMPERANCE HOUSE.

Mr Asa C. Potter has opened a Temperance House at the State Bridge, in Verona, where he will be ready at all times to wait on those who give him a call, in good style, and on reasonable terms.

PROPOSALS

For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church [illegible] to give us as full an account as [illegible] of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of [illegible], number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

ALFRED ACADEMY,

AND

TEACHER'S SEMINARY.

W. C. Kenyon, Principal.
Miss Caroline B. Maxson, Preceptress.

LECTURERS.

On Phrenology and Physiology.—Drs. J. R. HARTSHORN, and E. RIDER.

On School Teaching.—LUKE G. MAXSON.

On Chemistry and Geology.—W. C. KENYON.

Lectures on other subjects as occasion may require.

This Institution is pleasantly located, in the county of Allegany, thirteen miles South-East of Angelica, and six miles South of Almond. From its retired and quiet situation, it presents a favorable opportunity to parents to place their sons and daughters under a moral influence that will not be counteracted by those with whom they may associate.

The patronage which it has hitherto enjoyed, has been so liberal as to warrant very considerable expenditures in rendering it still more worthy of a more extended patronage; and it is hoped that it will, under its present organization, be rendered inferior to no similar Institution in Western New York.

The qualification of Common School Teachers will receive particular attention, so as to render them thorough and practical instructors of youth.

The Academic Year.—Is divided into three terms of fifteen weeks each: 1st, Commencing Wednesday 17th August; 2d, [illegible] 7th December; 3d, [illegible] April, 1843.

Vacations.—At the expiration of the first and second Terms, one week each; at the expiration of the 3d Term, five weeks.

Tuition.—Varying with Instruction from $3.50 to $4.75 per term.

Board.—From $1 to $1.50 [illegible] accommodations. Rooms in the Institution, furnished with Cook Stoves, can be had at a moderate expense.

SAMUEL RUSSELL, Esq., Pres't.
Alfred, July, 1842.

MARRIED.

[illegible] MATTHEW STILLMAN [illegible] BURDICK [illegible]

LIST OF LETTERS

[illegible]

LIST OF LETTERS

[illegible]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Berkshire Hogs.

[illegible]

What is Economy?

[illegible]

De Ruyter, August 3, 1842.

Economy is the road to Wealth.

JAMES M. LETTS [illegible]

De Ruyter, July 1st 1842.

LIST OF LETTERS

REMAINING in the Post Office at De Ruyter June 30, 1842.

Allen Britton
Bentley E. A. Mrs
Baker Sally A. Miss
Barnard Daniel
Bogardus Isaac R.
Babcock Thos. E.
Curtis Lurana Mrs.
Carr Thomas
Derbashire James
Griswold Sherman S
Hagen Jane
Holmes Arza
Haskins Leander
Johnson [illegible]
Kinney [illegible]
Lewis L. E. Mrs
Shaw Harvey
Seaman Benjamin
Sherwood Adah E
Squires Ethan
[illegible] Harvey
Tenney [illegible]
Wimans Stephen
[illegible] Peter R.

M. SPEAR, P. M.

BOOTS! BOOTS! SHOES! SHOES!!

AT the sign of the Mammoth Boot, [illegible] "good." Please call.

FLOUR, PROVISIONS, GROCERIES, and one hundred other things, for sale by
May 11. HART, ACKLEY & CO.

IMPORTANT WORK

[illegible]

Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

[illegible]

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings.

[illegible]

STOVES.
COLD WINTER IS COMING

[illegible]

Fancy Parlor Stoves

[illegible]

BRASS AND TIN WARE

LOW PRICES

[illegible]

JUST RECEIVED

[illegible]

"Hard times and money scarce."

[illegible]

HART, ACKLEY & CO.

[illegible]

Notice.

ALL persons who are indebted to the subscriber [illegible] are requested to call and settle immediately and save cost.

De Ruyter, June 27, 1842.

JAMES M. LETTS.

BOOK BINDING.

THE subscriber has connected a BINDERY with his printing establishment, and is now ready to execute all kinds of Binding in a neat and durable manner, and on as reasonable terms as at any other establishment in this section of country.

JAMES BAILEY.

De Ruyter, June 8th 1842.

Lester T. Rogers

POETRY.

"I Sing of Calvary."

BY MRS. SOUTHEY.

Down from the willow bough
My slumb'ring harp I'll take,
And bid its silent strings
To heavenly themes awake.
Peaceful let its breathings be,
Soft and soothing harmony.

Love, LOVE DIVINE, I sing,
O, for a seraph's lyre,
Bathed in Silou's stream,
And touch'd with living fire.
Lofty, pure the strain should be,
When I sing of Calvary.

Love, love on earth appears!
The wretched throng is way;
He beareth all their griefs,
And wipes their tears away.
Soft and sweet the strain should be,
Savior, when I sing of Thee.

He saw me as he passed,
In hopeless sorrow lie,
Condemned and doomed to death,
And no salvation nigh.
Loud and long the strain should be
When I sing his love to me.

"I die for thee," he said—
Behold the Cross arise!
And lo! He bows his head—
He bows his head and dies!
Soft, my harp, thy breathings be,
Let me weep on Calvary.

He lives! again He lives!
I hear the voice of Love—
He comes to sooth my fears,
And draw my soul above.
Joyful now the strain shall be,
When I sing of Calvary.

Miscellaneous Department.

A TOWN OF PRAIRIE DOGS.

Learning from the guide who had returned that there was a large city or commonwealth of prairie dogs directly on the route the command would take, with two companions I started on ahead to visit these neighbors. We were induced by a double object—firstly by a desire to examine one of the republics about which prairie travelers have said so much; and secondly, to obtain something to eat, for the flesh of these animals was said to be excellent.

We had proceeded but a short distance after reaching a beautiful prairie before we came upon the outskirts of the commonwealth a few scattering dogs were seen scampering in, and by their short and sharp yelps giving a general alarm to the whole community.

Upon the first cry of danger from the outskirts it was soon taken up in the centre of the city, and now nothing was to be seen in any direction but a dashing and a scampering of the mernurial and excitable denizens of the place, each to his lodge or burrow. Far as the eye could reach the city extended, and all over it the scene was the same.

We rode leisurely along until we had reached the more thickly settled portion of the place, when we halted, and after taking the bridles from our horses to allow them to graze, we prepared for a regular attack upon the inhabitants. The burrows were not more than fifteen yards apart, with well trodden paths leading in different directions, and I even thought I could discover something like regularity in the laying out of the streets.

We sat down upon a bank under the shade of a musqueet and leisularly surveyed the scene before us. Our approach had driven every one to his home in our immediate vicinity, but some hundred yards off the small mound of earth in front of each burrow was occupied by a dog, sitting straight upon his hinder legs and coolly looking about him to ascertain the cause of the recent commotion. Every now and then some citizen more venturous than his neighbor would leave his lodge on a flying visit to a companion, apparently exchange a few words, and then scamper back as fast as his legs would carry him.

By and bye, as we kept perfectly still, some of our nearest neighbors were seen poking their heads from out their holes, and looking cunningly and at the same time inquisitively about them. Gradually a citizen would emerge from the entrance of his domicil, come out upon his looking-out place, perk his head and commence yelping.

For three hours we remained in this commonwealth, watching the movements of the inhabitants and occasionally picking one of them off. No less than nine were got by the party, and one circumstance I would mention as singular in the extreme, and which shows the relationship which exists among these animals, as well as the regard they have for one another. One of them had perched himself directly upon the pile of dirt in front of his hole, setting up and exposing a fair mark, while a companion's head was seen poking out of the entrance, too timid perhaps to expose himself farther. A well-directed ball from my rifle carried away the entire top of the former's head, knocked him some two or three feet from his post perfectly dead.—While re-loading the other daringly came out, seized his companion by one of his legs and before we could reach the hole had drawn him completely out of reach, although we tried to twist him out with a ramrod. There was a feeling in the little incident, a something human, which raised the animals in my estimation, and ever after I did not attempt to kill one of them, except when driven by hunger.

The prairie dog is apparently about the size of a rabbit, heavier perhaps, more compact, and with much shorter legs. In appearance it resembles the woodchuck or ground hog of the north, although a trifle smaller than that animal. In their habits the prairie dogs are social, never live alone like other animals, but are always found in villages or large settlements. They are a wild frolicksome set of fellows when undisturbed, restless and ever on the move, and appear to take especial delight in chattering away the time and visiting about from hole to hole to gossip and talk over one another's affairs—at least so their actions would indicate. When they find a good location for a village, and no water is handy, old hunters say that they dig a well to supply the wants of the community.

On several occasions I crept up close to one of their villages without being observed, to watch their movements. Directly in the centre of one of them I particularly noticed a very large dog, sitting in front of his door or entrance to his burrow, and by his own actions and those of his neighbors it really loooked as though he was the president, mayor or chief—at all events he was the 'big dog' of the place. For at least an hour I looked at the operations of this little community. During that time the large dog I have mentioned received at least a dozen visits from his fellow dogs, who would stop and chat with him a few minutes and run off to their domicils. All this while he never left his post for a moment, and I thought I could discover a gravity of deportment not discernable in those by whom he was surrounded. Far is it from me to say that the visits he received were upon business, or as having any thing to do with the local government of the village; but it certainly looked so. If any animal is endowed with reasoning powers, or has any system of laws regulating the body politic, it is the prairie dog.

In different parts of the same village the members of it were seen gamboling, frisking and visiting about, occasionally turning heels over head into their holes, and appearing to have all sorts of fun among themselves. Owls of a singular species were seen among them. They did not appear to join in their sports in any way, but still seemed to be on good terms, and, as they were seen entering and coming out of the same holes may be considered as members of the same family, or at least retainers. Rattlesnakes, too, dwell among them, but the idea that has obtained of their living upon sociable terms of companionship with the dogs is without foundation. The snakes I look upon as loafers, not easily shaken off by the regular inhabitants, and they make use of the dwellings of the dogs as more comfortable quarters than they can find elsewhere. We killed one a short distance from a burrow who had made a meal of a half-grown dog, and although I do not think they can master the larger animals, the latter are willing enough to let them pass in and out without molestation—an evil like many in every society that cannot be got rid of.

The first town we visited was several miles in length, and at least a mile in width. Around and in the vicinity, were smaller villages—suburbs of the larger town to all appearance. We kindled a fire and cooked three of those we had shot, and found the meat exceedingly sweet, tender and juicy—resembling that of the squirrel, only that there was more fat upon it. Thus ended a first visit to one of the numerous dog towns of the West.—Kendall—N. O. Picayune.

From "the Texian."

THE CAMANCHE PEAK.

This curious eminence is situated near the Brazos, on the west side; and is about one hundred and fifty miles from the Great Falls, and near four hundred miles from the mouth of that stream. Its summit, as near as could be judged from occular observation, is about two thousand feet above the surface of the river. Its sides are very precipitous, and in many places projecting; there being only one or two places at which it can be ascended. On almost every side, it presents a front of rugged crags and frightful precipices. Little or no vegetation is to be found in its immediate vicinity, excepting dwarf cedars and brambles, which grow upon its brow and sides; and a coarse, rank species of grass upon its summit. It is of an oblong form, and at a distance presents the appearance of the roof of an extensive barn. Its entire length is about one mile, and its width varies from a thousand to twelve hundred yards. Notwithstanding its brow and sides present so ragged and sterile an appearance, its summit is but little broken, and is susceptible of being cultivated to advantage. In order to render this romantic spot a fit abiding place for that wild and adventurous race of people, (the Camanche,) who once resided in its vicinity, and make its bleak summit a kind of observatory, nature has provided a large and beautiful spring of the purest and clearest water, immediately at its base. This spring is about sixty feet in circumference, and it is the fresh water, in the summer season, within twelve miles of the Peak, the water of the Brazos being salt, and consequently totally unfit to drink.

One of the wildest, grandest, and most varied views in Texas, and perhaps in America, can be obtained from this prodigious observatory. As far as the power of vision can extend the eye rests upon some object of admiration. Mountains and less mounds of earth, of various heights form the most prominent, though not the most beautiful, feature in the landscape. The grandeur and sterness of the mountain scenery, is most enchantingly blended with extensive valleys, whose tranquil bosoms are variegated and perfumed with flowers of every hue and odor.

From the appearance of the Indian trails that lead to the Peak, and which are worn to a very great depth in the earth, this mountain must have been used as an observatory by the red man for hundreds of years, and many a toil-worn warrior has watched with sleepless eye for the distant war-fire of his subtle foe, from the high uplifted, and tempest-beaten summit of the Camanche Peak.

From the New York Sun.

ONE CASE FROM A THOUSAND.

Among the many instances of persons reclaimed from intemperance by the Washingtonians, one which came to our knowledge the other day we record with special interest because the subject was one of the companions of our boyhood. He was a youth of uncommon promise, with a wide circle of fond and admiring friends, and entered upon the stage of active life under the most flattering and auspicious circumstances. He married a lovely and accomplished girl the only daughter of a distinguished and wealthy medical man; and soon after, the father-in-law, retiring from the profession, relinquished his extensive and lucrative practice in favor of the husband of his daughter. Charles, as we shall call the young man, rose immediately to a high rank; wealth and honor flowed in upon him on every hand; and his income soon enabled him to support a most expensive establishment. At this point of time we were separated by business from him, and a number of years elasped without any correspondence or intercourse between us.

Some three years ago, while spending a short time in a country town, we were told that an unknown person, who had evidently known better days, had lately made his appearance there, and was then lying in an almost hopeless condition from the effects of a long debauch, at one of the most degraded grog shops in the town. Feeling an interest in the case, we determined to visit him. Entering the loathsome shanty where he lay, who should we discover but the shattered and blasted form of Charles! There was a little beside the form—the mind seemed flickering forth its last rays. Consciousness appeared to be almost gone. Those who stood about him were unrecognised, we among the rest, and his dull eye wandered objectless around the room. When he last saw him, years before, his attire, his equipage, his domestic establishment would have befitted a millionare or a prince. Now the linen from his back had been pledged for rum; and without a home, a friend, or a farthing in the wide world, the poor infatuate lay before us. We made known something of his former history to a few friends, who determined to do what they could for him. A kind gentleman took him to his own home, clothed him anew, watched him like a father, encouraged him to determine upon reformation, and offered him the aid of his purse and influence to re-establish him in business.

Upon inquiry, we learned that Charles for five or six years had been treading the inebriate's path. A lovely family of six children had been given him: his wife had clung to him fondly, despite all his unkindness and all his neglect, but now for the third time he had abandoned them for the sake of the accursed cup, and they had not heard from him for many months.

The gentleman above referred to persevered notwithstanding, in his efforts to reclaim the poor outcast, and for a time with a fair prospect of success. After several months, Charles was re-engaged in his profession in connection with a young gentleman of excellent character, and a bright prospect seemed to open before them; but after a short time, without any reason or notice given, Charles disappeared. All inquiry respecting him was in vain, and at length his friends concluded that he had perished in some unknown way. Six months passed, when one evening, amid the loud and angry voices that issued from a low grog shop, we thought we heard the voice of Charles. We ventured to look in, and beheld him in the midst of the besotted group. The moment he saw us he fled by a back passage, and upon inquiry we could learn nothing about him, and with a tear to the memories of boyhood, and to his heart-broken wife and children, we returned to our home, numbering Charles among the hopelessly lost.

This was nearly two years ago, since which we have heard nothing of him. One day last week we walked some distance behind a very gentlemanly person, admiring two children who were walking or rather dancing by his side, their bright curls sparkling in the sunbeams, and as we passed we heard a familiar voice, the voice we heard in the grogshop. The lost was found, the dead was alive, and Charles stood before us a man redeemed, a husband restored to the bosom that had throbbed only for him, and to the dear household in which the fire of love and life had seemed to have gone out forever. Charles is a Washingtonian, and once more the happy head of a lovely and rejoicing family.

AN ARTFUL DODGE.—A Paris collector of "chit chat," for the London New Era, furnishes, in a late number of that paper, the following interesting case of a "do," which is too good to be lost:

A lady, having entered one of the large shawl store shops in the Rue St. Honore, desired to be suited with a cashmere shawl: none of your trumpery knick-nacks, but an article to the tune of about 6,000 francs (£240!) This was at last accomplished; when Madame, giving her name and address as the wife of Desirabode, the celebrated dentist, ordered it to be brought by one of the clerks to M. D.'s apartments forthwith. In the meantime the lady started off to the dentist's herself, and, having informed that enlightened Frenchman, that having a brother who was sadly a martyr to the toothache, and who held the "forceps" in unutterable dread, she had prevailed on the youth (who was in business,) by means of a stratagem, to come to his (M. D.'s) abode: at the same time requesting M. D. to divert the youth's attention, at first, by alluding to business, &c., and other topics of the day.

All this was punctually promised on the part of the dentist, and in due time a "rap" was heard, announcing the arrival of the "martyr." The lady, taking the hint, immediately started off, and meeting the shawl and its bearer in the ante-room, laid hold of the former, at the same time telling the clerk to take the bill in to her husband, who would settle it; but on no account to do so until he was asked for it. The lady having walked out, the clerk walked in, when the following scene took place:—M. Desirabode: "Glad to see you, my dear Sir—pray sit down—how goes on business—pretty brisk, eh?" The youth, delighted to find such an agreeable companion, was in no hurry to be off, or to give his "small account," when the matter turned on teeth. Here was a chance for the clerk to have his mouth examined by a first rate dentist for no consideration whatever.

"You have a toothache now and then, I perceive;" continued M. D., edging over to the martyr with the forceps concealed in his hand. "Sometimes, not often;" was the answer of the innocent. "Oh yes: I see, that is the tooth, I think," added M. D., looking at the open mouth of his visitor—"Yes, sir, that is the one that used to ache when I was very young." "Exactly, that one, allow me, a moment, to look." The mouth was again opened. It was the work of half an instant, crack! crash! ! the tooth was in the gripe of the forceps, and that instrument was again deposited on the table with the tooth in its clutches. The scene that now ensued baffles all description; the victim, with his mouth full of blood, could not utter a word for some minutes, but was obliged to content himself by looking daggers at the tooth extractor, and thrusting a bill before him. "Oh! no thing, my dear sir, I won't take a sou," said M. D., fancying the bill to be a bank note. "I have arranged all with your sister."—A denouement followed in due course of time, but the lady had got two hours start and her shawl; and the agreeable companions parted not half so agreeably as they had met.

SILENCE.—There are various kinds of silence. One is the silence of admiration. Thompson invites "expressive silence" to muse the great Creator's praise. The Psalmist was silent from astonishment at the judgments of God. "I was dumb with silence; I opened not my mouth, because thou didst it." There is the silence of deep and overwhelming grief. The friends of Job, when they beheld his grief, held their peace seven days and nights.—There is the silence of stubbornness.—This is very common in all classes of people. There is the silence of submission. There is the silence of hate, and also the silence of nature—inability to speak. Sir Walter Raleigh has a beautiful thought on silence in his "Silent Lover."

Silence in love betrays more woe
Than words though ne'er so witty,
A beggar that is dumb, you know,
Deserveth double pity." I. M. L.

DESOLATION OF THE VICINITY OF ROME.—Miss Sedgwick, the American traveler, presents us, on approaching the "Eternal City," with the following vivid picture of the desolation which surrounds it:

"Our last post was through the dreary waste that encompasses Rome. The Campagne is not as I had ignorantly supposed, a level, but presents an undulated surface without morasses or stagnant water, or any thing that indicates unwholesomeness except its utter desertion. The grass looks rich and rank as if sprung from a virgin soil, and its tints are glowing even at this season. There are scattered here and there large flocks of sheep, with lean, haggard and half clothed shepherds and shepherd's dogs—and there are herds of oxen of a very large and beautiful species, and with horns as beautiful as antlers. But with these exceptions there is no life. From the summit of the hills, and there are considerable hills, the eye stretches over a wide reach of country, extending miles in every direction, and here and there an old barrack-like dwelling, a crumbling tower, a shrine, or a crucifix, but no cheerful habitations, no curling smoke, no domestic sounds—nothing that indicates human life and "country contentment." It is one vast desolation, a fit surrounding for the tomb of nations! As we caught the view of St. Peter's and the domes and spires of the 360 churches of Rome, it seemed as if life was still beating at the heart of the body doomed to die first at the extremities."

'Tom, can you loan me ten dollars?'

'No, I'm quite short; but Dick can, for I just saw him paid a hundred dollars.'

Off you journey to Dick.

'Dick, I want to borrow ten dollars particularly.'

'Very sorry, but I'm moneyless—havn't had a dollar these two days; but Tom has, he told me he was quite flush a little while ago.'

You give it up in despair, finding your credit low, and friends scarce. You are poor. Perhaps if you died next day, they would subscribe to pay for your funeral—'Poor fellow, he's gone; he won't trouble us any more.'—N. Y. Atlas.

A ploughman is not an ignorant man because he does not know how to read; if he knows how to plough, he is not to be called an ignorant man; but a wife may justly be called an ignorant woman, if she does not know how to provide a dinner for her husband. It is a cold comfort for a hungry man, to tell him how delightfully his wife plays and sings; lovers may live on very ærial diet, but husbands stand in need of the solids.

HARVEST DRINK.—Mix with five gallons of good water half a gallon of molasses, one quart of vinegar and two ounces of powdered ginger. This will make not only a pleasant beverage, but one highly invigorating and healthful.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Not 25 or 50 per cent Reward.
S. G. WALKER

HAS received his NEW GOODS, which he is disposed and determined to sell as CHEAP, if not cheaper than can be bought at any other establishment in De Ruyter. Among his assortment may be found Dry Goods, Dry Groceries, Crockery, Hardware, &c. Leghorn and Palm-Leaf hats and a variety of other things too numerous to mention.

Hear ye!! Hear ye!!! all persons wishing to buy goods CHEAP will please call at the Farmer's Exchange, and examine the quality and prices of his goods before purchasing elsewhere; and, Hear ye again!! any one having a little "Safety Fund" and indebted to S. G. Walker, will please call and deposit.

De Ruyter, May 23, 1842.

PROSPECTUS OF THE FARM HOUSE OF THE XIX CENTURY, OR ENCYCLOPEDIA OF PRACTICAL AGRICULTURE, [illegible] the best [illegible] adopted in France, England, Germany and Flanders [illegible]

[illegible]

Of the qualifications of the translator [illegible] his translation of [illegible] printed in England [illegible] could have done it better."

TERMS.—The work will be [illegible] monthly periodical in numbers of 32 pages [illegible] each 25 cents, and when completed will contain forty numbers, at $10.

Five dollars paid in advance for the first 20 Numbers, shall entitle subscribers to the remaining 20 Numbers for four dollars.

Or, nine dollars in small sums [illegible] $1, regularly advanced during the course of publication, shall entitle to the same reduction.

The 1st number will be issued on the 1st of July 1842.

All orders and remittances [illegible] to S. S. HASKELL, Publisher, [illegible] New York.

New York, June 1, 1842.

[illegible] New York Watchman [illegible] to one copy of the work. 18w15

NO IMPOSITION.
NO STATES PRISON WORK!

THOSE wishing to purchase BOOTS and SHOES of superior quality of custom work, will find just the place by calling at the sign of the MAMMOTH BOOT.

De Ruyter, May 23, 1842.

JOB PRINTING.

BOOKS, Pamphlets, Way-Bills, Hand-Bills, Cards Bills, &c. &c., neatly executed at this office.

L. W BLISS' Window Sash
L. Bliss' & Co. " Blinds.
Holme's Sampson & Salisbury Edged Tools consisting of Broad Axes, Hand Axes, Adzes and Chisels, at Factory prices by J. N. ELMORE, Manufacturers' Agent.
October 4.

"A nimble sixpence is better than a slow shilling."

SPRING GOODS! SPRING GOODS!

CHEAP! CHEAP!! CHEAP!!!

THE undersigned are receiving a large assortment of goods suitable for the spring and summer trade, and invite their friends and the public generally to call and examine them at the one price store.

SUTTON & QUINBY.

How to make money,

IS the study of mankind and of the Yankee Nation in particular. The easiest and most practicable plan for accomplishing the desired end in these times is to "Save Money," which can be done by purchasing NEW GOODS, instead of the [illegible] The place to do this is at ELMORE'S whose stock of NEW GOODS is nearly equal to all the rest [illegible] in this village and who is daily dispensing great bargains to "Fortune's Favorites."

May 30.

Of Drugs and Medicines.

THE subscriber keeps a much larger stock and sells much lower than those who advertise two columns.

May 30. J. N. ELMORE.

4 CASES, Superior quality, fashionable Hats, just received, and for sale low at the
May 30. STONE STORE.

NEW TAILORING ESTABLISHMENT.

THE subscriber would inform the citizens of De Ruyter and its vicinity, that he has opened a shop [illegible] S. G. Walker's store, Farmer's Exchange, where he may at all times be found [illegible] New York City.

N. B. [illegible] New York Spring and Summer Fashions just received. W. F. GUEST.

De Ruyter, Apr. 22d, 1842.

FLOUR! FLOUR!! FLOUR!!!

SUPERFINE Flour for sale at the Farmers' Exchange [illegible] in barrels and half barrels. This Flour is made from the best of wheat [illegible] S. G. WALKER.

De Ruyter, Apr. [illegible] 1842.

BLANKS! BLANKS!!

JUST [illegible] Deeds, Mortgages, [illegible]

TEAS! TEAS!

C[illegible] STONE STORE.

500 [illegible] STONE STORE.

AGENTS FOR THE REGISTER.

NEW-YORK.

[illegible]

RHODE-ISLAND.

[illegible]

CONNECTICUT.

Waterford—Lester T. Rogers, Wm. Maxson.
[illegible]

NEW-JERSEY.

[illegible]

PENNSYLVANIA.

[illegible]

VIRGINIA.

Lost Creek—Levi H. Bond.
[illegible]

OHIO.

Bloomfield—Charles Clarke.
[illegible]

MICHIGAN.

[illegible]

WISKONSAN.

[illegible]

IOWA.

[illegible]

ILLINOIS.

[illegible]—James Dunham.

The Seventh-day Baptist Register
IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY,
AT DE RUYTER, MADISON CO., N. Y.,
BY
JAMES BAILEY.

TERMS.—To village subscribers who have the paper left at their doors, $2 25, in advance, or $2 50, at the expiration of the year.

☞To office and mail subscribers, $2 IN ADVANCE.

Each communication, involving facts and intended for insertion in the paper, must be accompanied by a responsible name.

No subscription received for a less term than six months.

☞All subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, will be considered as wishing to continue their subscription, and their paper will be sent to them accordingly. No paper will be discontinued till all arrearages are paid except at the discretion of the publisher.

☞Advertisements inserted on the most reasonable terms.

☞All letters and communications to ensure attention should be addressed to the publisher free of postage.

S. T. Rogers, 2°

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.

VOL. III.---NO 27.] JAMES BAILEY, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.——A. H. BURDICK, PRINTER. WHOLE NO. 131

Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,——The SEVENTH DAY is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.—COMMANDMENT.——If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments.—[illegible]

TWO DOLLARS IN ADVANCE.] DE RUYTER, N. Y., FOURTH-DAY, AUGUST 31, 1842. PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Religious Department.

From the Pastor's Journal.

LETTER FROM MR. BADGER.

Rev. Milton Badger, one of the Secretaries of the A. H. M. S., is now on a tour in the Western States, the results of which will be of great importance in the future operations of the Society. From a recent communication, we take the following notices:

THE MISSIONARY AT HOME.

"I have stopped five nights with missionaries in their own dwellings, and have had in these cases a little opportunity to see how they live. Last night I stayed with brother ——. He has planted himself on a slight elevation in the midst of an extensive and beautiful prairie—quite out at sea—the wild luxuriance of nature all around, with the exception of the little spot which he has under cultivation, blossoming like the rose. There are but one or two dwellings within a mile or a mile and a half of his. A caravan of Fox Indians were encamped for the night near the next house. He lives in a log-cabin, or rather two log-cabins, about 14 feet square and six feet apart, with a roof running continuously over the whole. The logs are simply straitened a little with the axe, and the crevices filled up with mud—no other finish outside or in—one little window in each room, and a very small amount of the plainest furniture. I slept under one of the coverlets sent out in one of the boxes of clothing. And yet I did not see, but that there was just as much happiness in this cabin, the logs of which our brother felled with his own axe, as I have been accustomed to see in the most splendid dwellings of our older settlements. His little prattling "wee things," as I approached the dwelling with him, ran out, jabbering "papa," "dear papa," "my dear papa," as sweetly as they could from a palace.—The wife and mother was as cheerful as the lark. There was no mourning—no exceptions taken to their lot, and they never seemed to think of such a thing as making an apology. Indeed, they congratulated themselves on the contrast between their present dwelling and the one they lived in two years ago last winter, which contained but one room, for kitchen, dining room, parlor, nursery, study and all; and which was so poorly covered, that a heavy storm in the night would drive them all up round a roaring fire.

The emotions that I felt this morning, as I commended this little family to God, and to the word of his grace, and left them in their humble circumstances, in this vast region of destitution, to be as the light of the world, and the salt of the earth—I cannot describe, and I shall never forget.

JOE SMITH AT HOME.

The fourth of July found me at Nauvoo, the city of the Mormons. I saw Joe Smith, in splendid regimentals, in the character of Lieut General, at the head of a thousand troops. He was attended by six of his principal officers on horseback, constituting the front rank as they moved. Directly in the rear, were six ladies, on horseback, with black caps and feathers, constituting the second rank; and in the rear of these, were two ranks of six each, of body guards, in white frocks with black belts. Joe carried a monstrously large tin speaking trumpet, and uttered his prophecies through that, instead of giving his orders to his aids.

The city is a city of log houses and mud cabins, scattered over an area of three miles square—said to contain ten thousand people—a motley, rag-a-muffin crew. Many of them are, I doubt not, poor deluded creatures, and all of them are destined inevitably, for aught I can see, to great suffering; for there is not land enough under cultivation any where around, to feed a tenth part of them.

I visited the temple. It stands on an elevation a mile back from the river. The walls are up just above the basement story, some six or eight feet from the ground, built of hewn lime stone; the length, perhaps, 120 feet, and breadth 90. Every man who comes among them is required to give one tenth of all the property he has at the time, and one tenth of all he may earn afterwards, and to hold the remainder subject to the prophet's order, as God shall reveal. If all evangelical Christians, thought I, were willing to make the sacrifices in the cause of Christ, which these poor creatures are making to a false prophet, how soon, with the ordinary blessing of God, might the earth be filled with his glory!

In the basement of the temple, is a great laver, or baptistry, standing on twelve oxen, wrought out of wood, their heads facing four ways. They baptize here, not only for the living, but for the dead. Individuals are instructed that they can get their friends out of perdition by being baptized on their account. I saw one old man who had been baptized 13 times for his deceased children, because they were not Mormons; and heard of another, about 80 years old, who was baptized for George Washington and La Fayette; then for Thomas Jefferson; and then applied in behalf of Andrew Jackson! but they told him the General was not dead yet, and so he waits awhile."

Show not all the bottom either of your purse or your mind.

He who keeps good men's company, may very well bear their charges.

Let us do what we can and ought, and let God do his pleasure.

Children's Department.

CHRISTIAN EXPERIENCE OF A HEATHEN BOY.

The Rev. William Gill, a Missionary of the London Missionary Society, at Rarotonga, a station on one of the South Sea Islands, writes, March 26th, 1841, as follows:—

Our schools are well attended, and I am happy to state, afford many blossoms of hope. Some of the children were some time since tempted to join in a heathen dance, got up by the "Tuteauri," but the majority are constant in their attendance, and make good progress. Several among the teachers have given pleasing evidence of a renewal of heart; and others, both teachers and elder scholars, are among the inquirers. I could mention the cases of several, but at the present time will refer only to one—that of a young man about 18 years old. I do so the more willingly, because it has some reference to the labors of our departed brother Williamu. It appears before us as the fruit of a word spoken in season by our brother; the result of which yet remains to be disclosed to him in eternity.

My first conversation with the lad was as follows:—

'I have,' he said, 'long wished to converse with you.'

'On what subject,' I inquired, 'do you wish to converse?'

'On the subject of baptism.'

'Tell me first what you think of baptism?'

'I think it to be a sign, by which to show that our hearts are entirely defiled by sin, and that except we are renewed by the Holy Spirit, we cannot be saved.'

'Are all men fit subjects for baptism?'

'No, none but those who hate sin, and who have run to Jesus, and desire to become entirely his disciples.'

'Do you remember being taken by your father to Williamu?'

'Yes, quite well.'

'Have you been a steady, thoughtful lad?'

'No, far from it. I have been a very wicked boy. I would not live at home; I joined, as often as I could, a set of wild lads with whom I used to steal, and commit all kinds of sin.'

'That was, indeed, an awful condition,' I observed.

'I have not told you all,' he replied: 'I cannot. I have been, indeed, a very wicked boy.'

'But,' I continued, 'I am surprised at what you say, because since my residence here, I have known you as a very steady lad in the school. What first wrought a change in your conduct?'

'While I was so wicked, I frequently had thoughts of fear in my heart, but they were not lasting, until one day just before Williamu was going to England, he came here to preach, and afterwards to address the children; being his last address, I was induced to go and hear him. He told us it was an evil and bitter thing to sin against God, and exhorted us to go to Jesus for pardon and salvation. He told us we ought to go at once, and not delay.'

'Well, how did this address affect you?'

'It caused fear to grow in my heart, because I then saw my sin, and it also excited my desire to speak to Williamu.'

'Well, did you speak to him?'

'Yes,' replied the young man. 'I with another went and begged a little book, that I might learn, for I did not then know how to read.'

'How did you succeed?'

'I asked for a book, and Williamu looked at me and said, "Are you come for a book? Why, I know you to be a very wicked boy, and besides, you cannot read; how is it that you are come to beg a book?" I then told him all he said was true. I was a very wicked boy, but from what I had heard that morning, I was full of fear because of my great sins, and now desired to learn, and would try to cast off my former habits.'

'Well,' I inquired. 'what did Williamu say then?'

'He exhorted me to learn to read, and read the good word of God, and to pray for a new heart.'

'But,' I continued, 'this is a long time since, upwards of six years ago. Have you attended to Williamu's advice, and been a praying lad ever since?'

'From that time I have been a steady lad, I have obeyed my father, I have attended schools and the house of prayer.—I used sometimes to pray, but my heart was the same as formerly. I did not hate all evil. I did not desire Jesus with all my heart.'

'But do you think that your heart is interested about these matters now?'

'Oh, yes!' he replied, 'I feel very different inside now to what I did formerly; my heart has become soft, and my eyes are opened.'

'Has this been a sudden change?' I inquired.

'No, it has grown very softly.'

'But are you sure this change has taken place? What are the signs?'

'I think my heart is changed. This, I know, sin is become a very wicked thing to me; I rejoice in private prayer to God; my heart is made light, and I desire to be found in Jesus, that he should be my Lord and Master, and I become his servant."

Will not each of you, my young friends, offer the prayer of David, "Remember not the sins of my youth," and come and make the Savior your friend?—G. Abbot.

Original Papers.

For the Register.

Laying on of Hands.

During the month of January, '42, four articles from the pen of Br. W. B. Maxson, upon the subject of "Laying on of Hands," appeared in the Register. These articles were designed in defense of the rite as practiced in the S. D. Baptist denomination. And he alledged as a reason why they appeared, that there was a difference of opinion existing amongst us, tending to bring the practice into disuse, which was undoubtedly true. It was expected that I should reply to those articles in defense of what he is pleased to call an innovation.—But at the time, besides the feebleness of my health, there were other things which seemed to stand in my way, but since that, they have been so far removed as to enable me to proceed. In considering the whole subject, I have thought best rather than to follow him through the whole of his arguments, to make a statement of the whole question, and then the grounds of difference, and the reasons for the same.

First, it is maintained by those sustaining the practice of "Laying on of Hands" that hands were indiscriminately laid upon newly baptized persons in the Apostle's days, and therefore we ought to continue it in the church. It is not pleaded that there is any command for this, but only Apostolic example. On the other hand, it is contended that hands were only laid on, on particular occasions, and for special purposes, and that where the same objects are to be sought at the present day, the same course should be pursued. It will, therefore, be manifest to all that the whole question rests upon the nature of the passages where it is found, and not upon Eclesiastical History, nor the opinion of divines; with these statements before the mind, let the enquirer read and then judge. As much depends upon a correct understanding of the agency of the Holy Ghost, it may be proper for us in the beginning of this article to pay considerable attention to this part of the subject. This work of the Holy Ghost may be divided into ordinary and extraordinary. The former is that by which He makes men saints, as displayed in conviction of sin, John xvi. 8, 9. "And when he is come he will reprove (convince,) the world of sin, &c. Of sin because they believe not on me." 2. Conversion. John iii. 5, 6. "Jesus answered, verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born of water, and the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." 3. Sanctification. 1 Cor. vi. 11. "And such were some of you, but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God." Rom xv. 16. "That I should be the minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles, ministering the gospel of God that the offering up of the Gentiles might be acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost." 4. Consolation. John xiv. 26. "But the comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things," &c. 5. Direction. "Rom. viii. 14. "For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." 6. Confirmation. Rom. viii. 16. "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit that we are the sons of God." The latter by immediate inspiration making men prophets, and conferring upon them extraordinary powers and gifts. The first passage quoted by Br. M. which he considers as sustaining his views, is found Acts viii. 14—20. "Now when the Apostles which were at Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the word of God, they sent unto them Peter and John, who, when they were come down, prayed for them that they might receive the Holy Ghost: For as yet he was fallen upon none of them, only they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus. Then laid they their hands on them, and they received the Holy Ghost. And when Simon saw, (or perceived,) that through laying on of the Apostle's hands the Holy Ghost was given, he offered them money. Saying, give me also this power that on whomsoever I lay hands he may receive the Holy Ghost. But Peter said, thy money perish with thee because thou hast thought the gift of God may be purchased with money." The question now arises, whether the Holy Ghost in his ordinary or extraordinary influences was sought upon this occasion. If the former be maintained, then it follows that the Samaritans were baptized and rejoicing believers before they were either regenerated or comforted by the Holy Ghost. For it is said that "as yet he was fallen upon none of them." But it is also said, that "when they believed Philip, preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ, they were baptized both men and women."

We argue, then, that the terms and circumstances of the record show that the visible and extraordinary influences of the Spirit were sought, "for as yet he was fallen upon none of them." "Then laid they their hands on them, and they received the Holy Ghost." And when Simon saw that thro' laying on of the Apostle's hands the Holy Ghost was given, &c., and now I enquire, was the ordinary influences of the Spirit ever given through "laying on of hands"? I do not recollect of a single instance. It is argued that the extraordinary influences of the Spirit was not sought in this case, because it is said (by those maintaining the other side of the question,) that hands were laid on both men and women. This however, is by no means certain. For as Dr. A. Clark says, they "probably" laid their hands on some "select persons who were thought proper for public use in the church. They did not lay hands on all, for certainly no hands in this way were laid on Simon." But to allow this would in no wise destroy our argument, for it is said in Acts ii. 17, 18, "And it shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh, and your sons and your daughters shall prophecy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams, and on my servants, and on my hand maids, I will pour out in those days of my Spirit, and they shall prophecy." It would follow, then, if hands were laid on women as well as men, that women as well as men "spake with tongues and prophesied." It is said by Br. M., "From the manner in which this case is related, it is just to infer that it was their usual custom to do so by all other baptized believers." But I by no means see it so, and I have a case in hand by consulting Acts ix. 17, 18. It will be seen that hands were laid upon Paul before he was baptized, and that too that he "might receive his sight, and receive the Holy Ghost." So it seems that hands were laid on in this case before baptism, and not on receiving him into the church. In another instance, Acts x. 44—47, it appears the Holy Ghost fell on some before baptism and without laying on of hands! and that too in his extraordinary influences "For they spake with tongues and magnified God."

As to Acts xix. 6, the case is so plain that in fact it seems almost to exclude all argument. They are first asked if they had "received the Holy Ghost," & the reply was that they had not so much as heard "whether there be any Holy Ghost." Now, I would ask, were the Ephesians converted to God without knowing any thing of the ordinary influences of the Spirit? If so, the Theology taught at the present day, and that which was taught at that time must have been very different, for who would think of converting a man without the influence of the Spirit? It must be, I conclude, that they had not heard of the extraordinary influences of the Holy Ghost. In the course of John's ministry, "he was not given." But when they were instructed in this matter, and understood that "tongues were for a sign." 1 Cor. xiv. 22. and "that tongues should cease," 1 Cor. xiii. 8, then "Paul laid his hands on them, and the Holy Ghost came upon them, and the spake with tongues and prophesied." And in this place I would ask whether it is not recorded as the answer to the Apostle's prayer, that "they received the Holy Ghost, and spoke with tongues and prophesied"? and to say that they only prayed for the spirit in these cases, not having in view either his ordinary or extraordinary influences in particular, seems to me, at least, a novel interpretation. I respect the source, but the interpretation I do not receive. The next and last passage, and that upon which more has been said than upon any other, is in Heb. vi. 1—3. "Therefore, leaving the principle sof the doctrine of Christ, let us go on to perfection. Not laying again the foundation of repentance from dead works, and of faith toward God: of the doctrine of baptisms, (immersions,) and of laying on of hands, and of resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgments, and this will we do if God permit." This, doubtless, is an important passage, and a correct understanding of it will do much towards settling this controversy.—May we be guided in the right way. It will be remembered by those who read Br. M. upon this subject [illegible] in the verse before us the expres[illegible] ral and is parallel to the [illegible] mentioned in chap. ix. 10, which pertained to the Levitical law. King James's version with an eye to pedo-baptism [illegible] has it to read, "divers washings," but the phrase in the original is, "[illegible] [illegible]." These divers baptisms [illegible] doctrine in them to the Jews, [illegible] them the cleansing virtue of the [illegible] Christ, and leading them to it that they might be washed from all uncleanness. But this blood being now shed, they were no more in this way to learn the doctrine of cleansing.

[illegible]

The Laying on of Hands, standing in connection with the foregoing, may in like manner be referred to the Levitical law.—It denotes the laying on of the hands of the priests and the people upon the heads of the sacrificial victims, by which was taught the imputation of sin, Jesus Christ the great "sin offering." But now that Christ has been made sin for us, having borne our sins in his own body upon the tree, they were no longer to learn the doctrine of imputation of sin by this rite and ceremony. A more important doctrine is not found in all the Old Testament scriptures than that which is contained in this rite of "laying on of hands." The resurrection of the dead is a doctrine which does not make its first appearance in the New Testament, but was taught in the Old. Job xix 25, 27. Isa.

[illegible]

such as repentance from dead works, [illegible] towards God, the doctrine of baptisms, and laying on of hands, and of resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment. [illegible] God will only permit me by preserving you from apostatizing till ye have had an opportunity to read and consider this letter, I will give you the more perfect instruction. I am anxious to do it at once. For should you once fall away, renouncing the gospel and returning to Judaism, it will be of no use then to spread my instruction before you, inasmuch as it is impossible to renew unto repentance those who were once enlightened and have tasted of the heavenly gift, &c. I cannot but feel some concern for those who have made so little progress in knowledge as you have lest they should not know how to repel the vain sophistry of the unbelieving, and so being led away with their error should fall from their own steadfastness. Nevertheless, I am persuaded better things of you, things that accompany salvation, though I thus speak."

To the sentiments expressed in the foregoing I not only give my assent as being those I have held for years, but names of the highest consideration, and in great numbers, might be introduced for the support of the same doctrine. It however may be considered more important that I should say something in answer to Br. M.'s arguments, particularly his citations. These I may notice first.

Two writers on this subject are quoted by Br. M., Rev. David Jones and Mr. Keach. As to the former, I know nothing, nor am I certain that I do of the latter, but presume it is Mr. Benjamin Keach, a Baptist minister of Winslow, Bucks, Eng., in the latter part of the seventeenth century, and a man of considerable note. If the subject was left for these authors to decide, I presume it would be supposed that the case was settled, but especially so, if there was nothing in their writings elsewhere that went to oppose it. But in a general way it amounts to about nothing, the quoting of such authors upon subjects like this, for besides the fact that it is extremely doubtful whether we have their precise words; it is only their opinion. And when it is considered what egregious errors most of them taught, and that they pleaded scripture authority for the same, it makes "one doubtful of all they say." Calvin, it seems, is the most important author quoted. In Br. M.'s letters one paragraph is as follows, (speaking of Heb. vi. 1, 2,) "This one place abundantly testifies that the original of this ceremony, viz: Confirmation, or laying on of hands flowed from the Apostles which yet afterwards was turned into superstition. Wherefore unto this day this pure institution ought to be retained, but the superstition to be corrected." Now for an answer to the above, let me quote the same author, as quoted by the Editors of the Comprehensive Commentary: "Let us remember that the laying on of hands was the instrument of God at the time when he gave the visible graces of the Spirit to his people. But since the church has been deprived of such riches, to wit, the visible graces of the Spirit, the laying on of hands would be but an unprofitable image." I ask, are not these passages in direct opposition to each other? The reader will then discover how little is gained by quoting such authors. This last quotation from Calvin contains substantially what I believe. I hold it of the same nature as practiced at the present day, and even for ages past, as Chrism in the Greek and Romish churches, the form is there, but the substance is not found. How singular it would appear for Seventh-day Baptists to perform the ceremony of annointing with oil the sick when they expected no healing power, nor forgiveness of sins in the case! But how comely the rite, if the healing power were there! The Mormons lay on hands, and they speak with tongues. They annoint with oil, and profess to heal, but that the whole is a solemn farce, there is no doubt. But why do they go to that extreme? Because even they see far enough to know that if hands are laid on, they must also "speak with new tongues," and if they can speak with new tongues they can heal the sick, therefore they annoint with oil. And how was it with the ancient church? Though she had lost the power, [whether by its own limitation, or the corruption of the church, I am not about to inquire,] she still continued the form, and then in order to justify the form pretended that she wrought miracles!—And hence that infinite number of lying wonders exhibited by the mother of abominations.

What I have attempted to prove as to the "Laying on of hands," is

1. That hands were laid upon no persons in the Savior's ministry.

2. That hands were only laid on during the age of the Apostles on special occasions, and for special purposes, and that the scriptures are so to be interpreted.

3. That the 6th of Heb. 1, 2, is to be interpreted according to the above, viz., as relating to the first principles of Christ's doctrine as taught in the Mosaic economy.

I object to the "Laying on of hands," as practiced by us because it does not agree with the above, but is general in its objects, and universal in its subjects. I do religiously object to that view of the "Laying on of hands," received by us, wherein in the same breath we declare it to be an ordinance of the church, and then say that candidates for membership may or may not attend to it! For I ask, if it be an ordinance of the gospel, what church has a right to dispense with it? It is indeed a grave matter for us to complain of an apostate church for dispensing with the Sabbath and Baptism, and we ourselves dispense with what we claim to be an ordinance of the gospel! If this is not the very essence of apostacy, I ask what is? Will we oppose the chameleonized baptism of the Methodist, and then have a chameleonized "Laying on of hands?"

But, feeling the force of this inconsistency, I observe that some are for calling it "a church rite," and inasmuch as it is a church rite, then the church may enforce it or not. So she chooses to make a law that lay members may take their choice and submit to it or not, but candidates for the ministry on their examination for ordination must agree to perform it, if required, or be rejected!—Now I ask, from whom has the church received this power to discriminate? We say the church has no power to make laws of this character. If it be an ordinance of the gospel, she has no authority to admit candidates without it; and if it be not a gospel ordinance, she has no business with it, and efforts to enforce it are inconsistent with gospel purity. My hope is that the coming Conference may see proper either to enforce it upon all, or none.

N. V. HULL.

Clarence, Aug. 17, 1842.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, August 31, 1842.

Subjects of Baptism.

The commission given by Jesus Christ to his Apostles contains the measure of duty. If this does not sufficiently define the question, it is no where defined. If it does, then all argument to establish another doctrine is cavilling with the word of God. The commission, as recorded in Mark xvi. 15, 16, is as follows: "And he said unto them, Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." This is sufficiently explicit, and is in no way ambiguous. Hence we come to the conclusion that the baptism of believers is the only baptism contained in the commission. Faith is a pre-requisite. "He that believeth and is baptized." It is clear that none were baptized who did not understand and believe the gospel, as preached by the Apostles of Jesus Christ.

The practice of John the Baptist and the Apostles perfectly agree with this teaching of Jesus Christ. When John was baptizing in Jordan, we have no account of his baptizing [or sprinkling] infants. The first baptism performed by the Apostles, after receiving their commission, was on the day of Pentecost, Acts ii. 42. At this time there were none baptized but such as gladly received the word of Peter. It is not possible for "infants," in the common use of the term, to receive the word "gladly," and then continue steadfastly in the Apostle's doctrine and fellowship, and of breaking of bread, and in prayers. But it is argued by Pedo-Baptists, from Peter's expression in verse 39, "For the promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are a far off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call," that infants are entitled to baptism. This, at any rate, must be a forced and unnatural construction of the passage. The promise referred to is contained either in the 21st or 38th verse. The former of these states, "And it shall come to pass that whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved;" the latter, "Repent, and be baptized every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the Holy Ghost." If it be either, it cannot apply to children until they have exercised repentance towards God and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. If so, there is no shadow of consistency in the argument that "infants" are entitled to baptism from the language of this text.

Acts xxi. 13—40, and xvi. 29—34, and 1 Cor. i. 16, are brought forward as evidence that "infants" were baptized. These passages refer to the baptism of the household of Lydia, the Jailer and Stephanus.—The utmost that can be made of these to prove infant baptism, is nothing but conjecture, for in neither case is there any intimation that there were infants in these families. If conjecture is allowed to govern in this case, it may with the same propriety in all, and then we shall have all the wild vagaries of disordered minds, and the edicts of ecclesiastical councils to establish new doctrines, and introduce new customs into the church. But conjecture is not the law fixed to govern the church, neither is it left with men to ordain, modify, or alter the institutions of Christ's house. There is nowhere recorded in sacred writ an instance of the Baptism of "infants." Before any use can be made of the above passages, it must be shown that there were "infants" in those families. Pedo-Baptists "suppose" there were. What reason have they for the supposition? Why, none in particular, only children belong to families or households, and it is as reasonable to suppose there were as there were not! Well, this is conjecture, unsupported by a single fact. To our mind the evidence is clear that there were none in these families but such as were capable of exercising faith and repentance.—In the case of the Jailer, it is said, Acts xvi. 31, 32, "And they [Paul and Silas,] said, Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house, and they spake unto him the word of the Lord, and to all that were in his house."

Here it is manifest that the Apostles preached faith in the Lord Jesus Christ to the jailer and his family, as a pre-requisite for salvation before baptizing them. Does any one suppose that they preached the word of the Lord to infants? and yet they preached it to all that were in his house. As it regards the household of Stephanus, it is beyond a cavil that there were none in this family but what were capable of understanding the requirements of the gospel; for in 1 Cor. xvi. 15, it is said of them, "that they have addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints."

Again, it is manifest from the Apostle's commission that none but believers were to be baptized. Consequently, they who undertake to prove infant baptism, from these household baptisms, must first set aside the command of Jesus Christ, and then conjecture contrary to the evidence afforded by the passages themselves, and their contexts, that there were infants in these families.

Baptism, by some, is supposed to be a substitute for circumcision, and thereby children are entitled to it; but from the scriptures we find no such substitution, neither have the two any relationship to each other; and, besides, the substitution would include only about one half of the human family, as any one may see by referring to the rite of circumcision.

But there is no need of all the labored arguments of the day to understand the mind of the spirit. If a "thus saith the Lord" is sufficient to determine any thing, it settles the question at once, that the immersion of believers is the only baptism that is gospel-wise.

For the Register.

"Hard Times."

Yes, so far as pecuniary matters are concerned, "hard times" indeed! What will the editors, publishers, and printers do? To encourage them I must pay punctually. That publication which is so well conducted, which maintains such noble principles, must have my name on its subscription list, and I must pay in advance—for I fear that the "hard times" will discourage the editor unless his subscription increases. That debt to the enterprising merchant—that item with the industrious mechanic—that pledge for the support of the gospel at home—and that one too for its dissemination abroad—all these must speedily have attention, because of the "hard times."

August 22. YOUNG HUMPHREY.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

ARRIVAL OF THE BRITANNIA.

Sixteen Days Later from Europe.

The Britannia arrived at Boston on Friday last, bringing papers to the 4th inst. inclusive. The news she brings is of considerable importance and interest. We learn that after the 23d ult.,

The Weather,

Which it was feared would be unpropitious for the harvest, underwent a favorable change, and since that period been exceedingly fine—and, in consequence, the most sanguine hopes are now entertained of a most plentiful grain crop.

As respects the crops—potatoes, turnips, vegetables, and all kinds of fruit, are in great abundance. Oats are particularly promising, whilst wheat and barley, although a good deal was said about thinness of plant, have, under the influence of the continued growing weather, acquired a a health and vigor which augurs a heavy produce from the straw, coupling which with the large breadth of wheat on the ground, a full average of this, the noble grain, may be expected. The crops, particularly in the north and Scotland, are very forward, and it is well known that to begin a fortnight almost implies to finish a month earlier than ordinary seasons. Some Talavera wheat has already been cut, and with a continuance of present weather, wheat cutting in the home counties will be general about the 1st proximo, and in Scotland about a couple of weeks later.

Should, therefore, the present promise be realized, the wheat crop will be secured a month earlier than usual, and yield so heavily from the straw, and, owing to fineness of quality, so favorably from the mill, as to produce more than an average in its ultimate form, "bread."

The effect of this was already perceptible in its influence on trade and commerce, and should the fine weather continue, there is little doubt but that the starvation and distress which have so extensively prevailed throughout the country, will be known only in the remembrance of a calamity that has passed away.

The Liverpool papers likewise state that the new Tariff law had contributed essentially to the revival of trade.

Trade.

The accounts from most of the great seats of manufacture and commerce speak of improvement. This is particularly the case in London, Leeds, Bristol, and Manchester. In Scotland, too, there are marks of revival: while the harvest, everywhere, will be early and abundant. In the money market, such is the overflow of money that lenders discount good paper with avidity at 2 1-2 per cent. And we see in the accounts that the extensive distress in many of the districts is becoming considerably relieved, and a cessation of agitation would soon restore all the depressed interests to their former prosperity. And some of the papers state that it is not so much the dearness of bread, as the want of employment to earn it, which has brought so much suffering to the unfortunate operatives.

The trial of Bean, for the attack on Her Majesty's life, will take place on the [illegible] inst.

England and Portugal.

A commercial treaty has been entered into between these two governments, which it is said will be mutually beneficial to both.

[illegible]

A member of the House of Commons, Mr. Cobden, made some inquiries relative to the destination of [illegible] frigate, and [illegible] the service of the British government.

Sir R. Peel said [illegible] were these—two vessels [illegible] one at Blackwall, and the other at [illegible] pool. It was said that these vessels [illegible] for the Mexican government. Application had been made to the British Government to permit them to be manned with British seamen, and that permission had been refused.

The Hon. member was under the impression that one vessel was to be commanded by an officer who held a commission in Her Majesty's navy. He could state that in consequence of an application from the Texan Minister on the subject, that Minister had been informed that no officer in Her Majesty's navy would be allowed to serve the Mexican Government against Texas. The Texan Government had been informed that if hostilities should take place, it was the intention of the English Government to maintain a perfect neutrality.

Parliament.

The session of Parliament is visibly drawing to a close, and measures, affecting particularly the social interests, are daily brought into consideration. The poor law has been abridged and modified, [illegible] be reconsidered [illegible] Parliament. Some measures will also be taken to prevent bribery at elections, now proved to be too prevalent.

[illegible]

[illegible]

Louis Philippe [illegible]

"Gentlemen, [illegible] sered of that [illegible] sidered destined to replace me on the throne, and who was the glory [illegible] of my old age! [illegible] tive to hasten the [illegible] bling around me. We have together a great duty to fulfil. When it shall please God to call me to himself, it is necessary that France and the constitutional monarchy be secured against being [illegible] exposed to any interruption [illegible] authority. You will, therefore, [illegible]

"The calamity that has [illegible] Providence, which [illegible] my children, [illegible] and of the confidence of France.

"Gentlemen, let us now secure the peace and safety of our country. At a later period I shall call upon you to resume your accustomed labors relative to State affairs."

The reply of the Chambers was [illegible] in the highest degree. [illegible] it upon the lamented Duc d'Orleans is expressed in terms the most fervent and affecting.

It is understood that the Duke de Nemours will be Regent of France. He will be proposed for, and will be elected to that office; but the immediate guardianship of the infant Count of Paris and his brother, the Duke de Chartres will be confided to their excellent remaining parent.

Only a month since, we are assured, a plan for a regency was drawn up and submitted to the King, but of course, without the most remote anticipation that it would be ever requisite. The object which is ascribed to that precaution was to induce the Duchess of Orleans, whom it proposed to become a Catholic. Her Royal Highness has, however, too much character, and too much steadiness in her own religious creed, to justify an expectation that she would ever yield on that point to any entreaties or considerations whatever.

The Paris papers are filled with descriptions of the funeral of the Duke of Orleans, or with discussions on the state of the parties in the Chamber.

An attempt was made to excite among the national guard, a cry of "down with Guizot!" during the funeral procession of Saturday, but it failed.

[illegible]

China [illegible] Singapore papers [illegible] been received [illegible]

[illegible]

The Treaty concluded by Lord Ashburton and the Department of State [illegible] by the Senate [illegible] Treaty are therefore not known. [illegible] understood to embrace, [illegible] several other matters of difficulty—while those growing out of the Creole [illegible] are not known. The country is certainly to be congratulated on the adjustment of these long standing and perilous differences.—N. Y. Evangelist.

Assignment.—The American Life Insurance and Trust Co., located in Baltimore, but with a branch here under the charge of John Duer, Esq., assigned its effects for the benefit of its creditors in July last.—The deed of assignment, with a schedule of bonds, mortgages, notes, checks, stocks, due-bills, real estate, furniture, and all sorts of things, has been printed in a circular, for the benefit of those most concerned, and was circulated in Wall street

[illegible]

The Great Russian Railroad.—Another engineer named Anderson will shortly leave Springfield for Russia to assist Maj. Whistler. The Gazette says the Emperor has obtained his first touch of $10,000,000, at 5 1-2 per cent. to commence his grand work of a Railroad from St. Petersburgh to Moscow, 450 miles by the present traveled road. $40,000,000 it is calculated will finish the work that distance. Then to complete the grand enterprise now contemplated, the road is to be continued in nearly a direct line, 740 miles, to the Caspian Sea, which will be across the heart of the Russian territory, and from boundary to boundary of the Emperor's dominions;

this will furnish a very important facility for the transportation of troops, &c., and give the Emperor an immense advantage. For the execution of this stupendous work, we understand that labor in abundance can be obtained at 30 cents a day, and even less. This is one of the grandest railroad enterprises in the world; one which it is estimated will cost $100,000,000 to accomplish; but presents as strong probabilities of being accomplished as other enterprises which have succeeded.

Border Troubles.—A letter from Houlton, Me., published in the Bangor Courier, states that a British officer, with a party, came across the lines a few days ago to arrest a couple of deserters, and was repulsed by a party of farmers, with pitchforks, &c., leaving behind their horses, a gun, and the captain's cloak.—Sun.

Wool Growing West.—The State of Illinois bids fair to rival and outstrip our Eastern neighbors in the production of wool. The business is yet in its infancy, but the immense prairies of Illinois are capable of feeding innumerable flocks of sheep, at a comparatively trifling cost, and we shall not be surprised, if in a few years hence, much of the wool used in our manufactories at the East should be supplied from that quarter. Seven or eight thousand pounds of wool have been shipped east from Chicago this year. This looks well for a beginning.—Sun.

Steam Navigation,—The late rapid voyage of the Columbia, which performed the passage to England in 9 1-2 days, occasioned great surprise, and drew forth many plaudits of admiration from the British press. But we understand that a project is now under contemplation, with reasonable prospects of success, to effect the passage between the two continents regularly in eight days. A patent has been secured in this country, and in Great Britain, for the invention which is expected to accomplish so desirable results. One of the advantages of this invention, almost equal in importance to the increase of rapidity, consists in the location of the machinery, which is wholly below the surface of the water. In vessels of war this will protect the machinery from the shot of the enemy, an object of the highest importance in a naval contest.

Oberlin Case.—The case of Horace Norton against Horace C. Taylor, and others, brought to recover damages for an assault and battery committed upon him by the defendants, was tried in this county last week, on an appeal from the Court of Common Pleas to the Supreme Court. A verdict was rendered for the plaintiff for $550, being $900 less than he recovered in the Common Pleas.—Elyria Atlas.

Terrific Spectacle.—This forenoon, a horse attached to a buggy in which were two ladies, took fright and ran dashing down the hill full speed, and turning into River street the wheel struck a post, when the ladies were hurled with great violence some ten feet on to the pavement. Strange to say, neither were killed. Both were severely though not dangerously wounded. The ladies were from Brunswick, Medina co. We did not learn their names.—Cleaveland Herald.

Bunker Hill Monument.—Steam Car.—The steam car for conveying passengers to the top of Bunker Hill Monument was put in operation on Tuesday last week, since which time numbers of ladies and gentlemen have gone up and down, each day.—About four minutes are occupied in the ascent, and only about half that time in the descent. The machinery and car are perfectly safe, and the passage up and down very agreeable. This car will accommodate six persons standing. Mr. Savage is particularly polite to visitors, and gives his personal attention to their safety. His efforts to accommodate and gratify the public, who desire to visit this structure and view the unequaled scenery from its top, are highly praiseworthy.—B. H. Aurora.

Desperate Runaway Slaves Taken.—The Annapolis Republican states that five runaway negroes from Calvert co., who had been harbored by a slave on a farm on South River, were taken last week after a desperate encounter. Two of them had been there for a long time. The neighborhood suffered from their thievings for their subsistence, which circumstance led to their detection on Saturday last. Means were instantly taken for their capture, and they fought desperately; the life of a white man who first approached being providentially saved by the point of the scythe, with which a blow was aimed at him, having struck the joist, and being driven into it with such great force that the negro had not time to withdraw it. It became necessary to use summary means to secure them, and one of the men was shot while running, and although traced by the blood from his wound a considerable distance, had not, at last advices, been found. One of the negroes went up the chimney, and on smoking him to make him come down, it was found that he was wedged in, and it became necessary to remove a portion of the chimney to get him out. Much injury was done to the furniture and property about, being broken by the negroes and used by them as defensive weapons. Three of the negroes are secured in the jail at Annapolis.—Sun.

Right.—The first Municipality Council of New-Orleans has passed an ordinance subjecting every person who keeps any gambling-table within the limits of the Municipality after the 1st of August, to a fine of $100 per day.

Gen. Lafayette's last aid-de-camp in our Revolution, Gen. John K. Smith, died at Portland, Me., on the 7th inst., aged 89 years.

Over 4,000 people assembled in the Miller tent at Albany, a night or two ago, when Mr. Fitch spoke for two hours, and endeavored to prove that the 23rd of April, 1843, would be the last day.

The salary of the Mayor of New-Orleans is $6,000; that of the Mayor of Hartford, Conn., is $40.

A son of Mr. Hendixon, about twelve years of age, was accidentally shot by his father in Smith's woods, opposite Chester, N. J., on Monday afternoon.

On Wednesday, the 10th inst., a Mr. Samuel Cornman, in Juniata township, Perry co., Pa., came to his death in a well he was digging, from the effects of foul air.

Twenty-seven deaths, and fifty-eight houses and barns destroyed by lightning, have occurred in the United States since June last.

Dr. Amariah Brigham, now at the head of the Connecticut Retreat for the Insane, has been appointed Superintendent of the New York State Asylum for the Insane, at Utica, and will accept the appointment.

Disputed Territory Fund.—There is a large sum of money, say some $50,000, in the Treasury of New Brunswick, denominated the "Disputed Territory Fund." This fund, levied upon the timber cut on the disputed Territory for the last six or seven years, by the authorities of New Brunswick, is by the terms of the Treaty, to be paid over to the United States, for the benefit of Maine and Massachusetts, and is one of the provisions of the settlement.—Jour. of Com.

Major Raybold, who resides near Delaware City, has made a contract to deliver ten thousand baskets of peaches in New York the present season, at two dollars and fifty cents per basket. He will realize by the speculation $25,000.

There are in the United States 1,552 printing offices, 447 binderies, 148 daily papers, 1,141 weekly, 125 semi and tri-weekly papers, 227 periodicals. These offices employ 18,526 men, and the amount of capital invested is $5,974,816.

A missionary in Illinois remarks that "this farce (Mormonism,) is manifestly drawing to a close."

The St. Louis Republican says, it is stated that Gov. Reynolds has demanded the bodies of Joe Smith and Orin P. Rockwell, of the Governor of Illinois.

The sentence of death which had been pronounced upon Topping, whose execution was fixed for the 26th inst., for the murder of his wife, has been commuted by the Governor to imprisonment for life, on account of mental imbecility, or partial derangement.

There is a biscuit bakery in Philadelphia, in which, it is stated, one hundred barrels of flour can be converted into bread every twelve hours.

A Brussel paper says something extraordinary is this moment passing in the sun; a sort of crater is perceived in it, which emits clouds of smoke, that spread over a portion of its surface like an enormous moveable spot.

A man named Isaac Warren, while in the custody of the Sheriff, at Fitchburg, Me., on Saturday, for an assault, cut two terrible gashes in his own throat for the purpose of killing himself; but missing the great veins and arteries, he failed in his attempt.

A new Mormon paper has recently been established in Baltimore; S. C. Brown editor. Mr. Brown avows his intention to do all he can to aid his master's kingdom. A contemporary asks if he means by his "master's kingdom" Joe Smith and the city of Nauvoo?

Charles G. McHattan, special agent of the post office department, has detected James Brown, the postmaster of Londonderry, O., in embezzling a money letter mailed at Columbus for Cadiz, O., and has caused him to be arrested, examined, and committed for trial.

The diminution of canal tolls in this State up to the 14th inst. as compared with those of the same period of last year, is $161,000.

Sir Robert Peel's father was an apprentice at Crayford in Kent. A fellow apprentice declared that Peel and himself had frequently sold skimmed milk together at a penny a quart in the streets of Crayford.

Cast Iron Building.—Buildings of cast iron (according to an English paper) are daily increasing at a prodigious rate in England, and it appears that houses are about to be constructed of this material. As the walls will be hollow, it will be easy to warm the buildings by a single stove placed in the kitchen. A three story house, containing ten or twelve rooms, will not cost more than five hundred dollars, regard being paid to the manner in which it may be ornamented. Houses of this description may be taken to pieces and transported from one place to another, at an expense of not more than one hundred and fifty dollars. It is said that a large number of cast iron houses are about to be manufactured in Belgium and England, for the citizens of Hamburg, whose habitations have been burnt.

Commutation of Sentence.—Governor Seward has commuted the sentence of death passed upon Thomas Topping, for the murder of his wife under circumstances of peculiar atrocity, to imprisonment for life in the State Prison. It was satisfactorily shown by a commission appointed for that purpose, that he suffered some time since a sun stroke, since which time he has exhibited the appearance rather of an idiot than of a rational and responsible human being. We understand that to Mrs. Ann S. Stephens, of this city, is due the credit of having saved the life of a fellow creature, of too weak mind to be responsible for his acts, to understand the terrible nature of the deed he had committed, or of the punishment which awaited him; and too friendless to secure in his own behalf, by any interposition, the clemency to which he was entitled. Incited by the extraordinary circumstances of the case, this lady procured the testimony of eight persons in this city, which convinced her that the man was not in a condition to be responsible for his acts. She went to Albany, and read this testimony to the Governor, who was thus induced to appoint the Commission of inquiry. Their investigation discovered eight other witnesses, whose evidence was completely decisive, and would, upon trial, have forbidden the idea of a conviction. The report of the Commission was sent to Albany, and Mrs. Stephens soon had the pleasure of receiving the commutation from the Governor.

On being told that he was not to be hung, Topping acted like a child—evincing great concern lest they should whip him in prison. He was told that if he would behave well, he might perhaps, at some time, obtain a release. He said he would, and thought that they would let him out in about five weeks. This may show in what a state of wretched imbecility this man was awaiting his execution.—Tribune.

Gov. Carlin and Joe Smith.—We received per Glaucus yesterday evening, a communication from Quincy, Ill., dated the 9th inst., which from the lateness of the hour cannot be inserted entire this morning. The substance is about this:—Since the election, Gov. Carlin has resolved to comply with the requisition of the Gov. of Missouri, and deliver up Joe Smith and A. P. Rockwell. The Sheriff of Hancock county, elected at the recent election, being a Mormon, the writ was placed in the hands of the Sheriff of Adams county.—The Sheriff repaired to Nauvoo and arrested Smith and Rockwell, when a habeas corpus was issued by some of the Nauvoo authorities, and the prisoner taken out of the Sheriff's custody and released. The Sheriff has just returned to Quincy and reported the facts. Our informant says, that it is currently reported, while he was writing, that Gov. Carlin was then in the act of issuing orders calling out the military to enforce the arrest, and it was expected they would march on the day following for Nauvoo. Our correspondent, however, expresses the confident belief that when the troops reach the city, Joe and his colleague will be among the missing.—St. Louis Republican.

Return of Governor Arnold.—Gov. Arnold reached this city by the cars from Boston, this morning. He waited upon Gov. Hubbard of N. Hampshire, in obedience to his instructions, with a requisition from Gov. King, for a warrant to arrest Thos. W. Dorr, now in the state of New Hampshire. Gov. Hubbard respectfully, but firmly and decidedly declined obeying the requisition, and stated to Gov. Arnold that he would forward by mail, his reasons for so declining, addressed to "Samuel W. King, acting Governor of Rhode Island."

We understand that Gov. Arnold was well treated by the authorities of New Hampshire, though he was in respectful language told that he did not represent the legal Governor of Rhode Island. There is, of course, much anxiety to see Gov. Hubbard's letter, justifying his course. It will probably appear in the organ of Gov. King to-morrow morning.

Rev. Samuel L. Southard has accepted the unanimous call of the Vestry of Christ Church, Belleville, N. J., as Rector of that church, and has established his residence in that town.

For the third time within as many weeks, the Residence of Julius Rhodes, Esq., at Albany, was on Sunday fired by an incendiary. Fortunately each attempt was discovered in time to prevent the destruction of the building.

The packet ship Virginian, which sailed for Liverpool last week, carried out over 200 steerage passengers.

The Bombay Times estimates the British loss of soldiers and camp followers by the Affghan war, down to the 1st of March last, at 15,000, and the cost of the war to same date, $15,000,000.

Among the recent army appointments conferred by the President, with the consent of the Senate, Col. Worth has received the well-earned brevet of Brigadier General.

By the failure of their agents in Calcutta, the American Baptist Board are likely to lose the sum of $9,347 in their hands, for the use of their missionaries at the time of the failure.

Com. Lavallette has assumed the command of the Navy Yard at Pensacola.

Notices.

Traveling Agent.

Br. Daniel Babcock, of Scott, is now engaged as a traveling agent for the Register. We request agents and all friends of the press, to aid him in extending our circulation, and in settling the accounts for the present and past volumes. He will visit first Oneida, Jefferson, Lewis, Otsego, and Madison counties.

General Conference.

Br. John Whitford, of Berlin, wishes us to give information to those proposing to attend the General Conference, that as there is no public conveyance from Albany or Troy to that place, that teams will be provided and be at Congress Hall in Troy, on Sept. 2d, at 10 o'clock, A. M., to convey all that may meet them there at that time.

General Conference.

The S. D. B. General Conference will hold its next session with the Church in Berlin, Rensselaer co., N. Y., commencing on the first day of the week before the second Sabbath in September next, at 10 o'clock, A. M. Introductory discourse by Eld. W. B. Gillett, or N. V. Hull, substitute.

JAMES BAILEY, Cor. Sec.

☞The A. S. D. B. Missionary Society will meet on the second day of the Conference at the call of the President; and the Evangelical Board for disseminating Religious Truth among the Jews, on the fourth day, at 10 o'clock, A. M.

☞The 7th Anniversary of the A. S. D. B. Tract Society will be held in Berlin on the 5th day of the week before the 2d Sabbath in September next, (Sept. [illegible]) at 10 o'clock, A. M.

PAUL STILLMAN,
General Agent.

TEMPERANCE HOUSE.

Mr. Asa C. Potter has opened a Temperance House at the State Bridge, in Verona, where he will be ready at all times to wait on those who give him a call, in good style, and on reasonable terms.

PROPOSALS
For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, [illegible] an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished [illegible], together with a history of their [illegible] operations and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as [illegible] will be given, of their origin and [illegible].

The size of the work, price, and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead,) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞All communications on this subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

ALFRED ACADEMY,
AND
TEACHER'S SEMINARY.

W. C. Kenyon, Principal.
Miss Caroline B. Maxson, Preceptress.

LECTURERS.

On Phrenology and Physiology—Drs. J. R. HARTSHORN, and E. RIDER.

On School Teaching.—LUKE G. MAXSON.

On Chemistry and Geology.—W. C. KENYON.

Lectures on other subjects as occasion may require.

This Institution is pleasantly located in the county of Allegany, thirteen miles South-East of Angelica, and six miles South of Almond. From its retired and quiet situation, it presents a favorable opportunity to parents to place their sons and daughters under a moral influence that will not be counteracted by those with whom they may associate.

The patronage which it has hitherto enjoyed, has been so liberal as to warrant very considerable expenditures in rendering it still more worthy of a more extended patronage; and it is hoped that it will, under its present organization, be rendered inferior to no similar Institution in Western New York.

The qualification of Common School Teachers will receive particular attention, so as to render them thorough and practical instructors of youth.

The Academic Year,—Is divided into three terms of fifteen weeks each. 1st, Commencing Wednesday 17th August; 2d, 7th December; 3d, 4th April, 1843.

Vacations.—At the expiration of the first and second Terms, one week each; at the expiration of the 3d Term, five weeks.

Tuition.—Varying with Instruction, from $3.50 to $4.75 per term.

Board.—From $1 to $1.50 depending on accommodations. Rooms in the Institution, furnished with Cook Stoves, can be had at a moderate expense.

SAMUEL RUSSELL, [illegible]
[illegible]

LIST OF LETTERS

REMAINING in the Post Office at [illegible] June 1st, 1842.

Allen Britton
Bentley E. A. Mrs.
Baker Sally A. Miss
Barnard Daniel
Bogardus Isaac R.
Babcock Thos. E.
Curtis Lurana Mrs.
Carr Thomas
Derbashire James
Griswold Sherman S.
Hagan Jane
Holmes Arza
[illegible]
Lewis L. E. Mrs.
Snow Harvey
[illegible]
Sherwood [illegible]
[illegible]
Stever Harvey
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]

M. SPEAR, P. M.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Berkshire Hogs.

[illegible]

Economy [illegible]

BOOTS! BOOTS! SHOES! SHOES!

AT the sign of the [illegible]

FLOUR, PROVISIONS, GROCERIES, and [illegible]
May 11. [illegible]

IMPORTANT WORK [illegible]
Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.
[illegible]

STOVES.
COLD WINTER IS COMING.
[illegible]
Fancy Parlor Stoves,
[illegible]
BRASS AND TIN WARE
[illegible]
LOW PRICES
[illegible]
JUST RECEIVED
[illegible]

50 [illegible]

Notice.
[illegible]
JAMES H. LEWIS.

BOOK BINDING.
THE [illegible]
[illegible] JAMES BAILEY.

POETRY.

From the Episcopal Recorder.

Prayer.

Come let us pray; 'tis sweet to feel
That God himself is near:
That while he at his footstool kneel,
His mercy deigns to hear.
Though sorrows crowd our dreary way,
This is our solace—let us pray!

Come let us pray!—the burning brow—
The heart oppressed with care—
And all the woes that throng us now,
Will be relieved by prayer.
Jesus will smile our griefs away—
Oh, glorious thought—come, let us pray!

Come, let us pray! the sin-sick soul
Her weight of guilt must feel—
But hark! the glorious tidings roll,
Whilst here we humbly kneel—
Jesus will wipe that guilt away,
And pardon grant—then let us pray!

Come, let us pray! the mercy seat
Is now prepared and free,
And Jesus ready stands to greet
Sinners like you and me—
Oh, loiter not, nor longer stay
From him who loves us—let us pray!

Hymn.

We ask not that the slaves should lie,
As lies his master, at his ease,
Beneath a silken canopy,
Or in the shade of blooming trees.

We mourn not that the man should toil;
'Tis nature's need,—'tis God's decree;
But let the hand that tills the soil,
Be, like the wind that fans it, free.

We ask not "eye for eye," that all,
Who forge the chain and ply the whip,
Should feel their torture; while the thrall
Should wield the scourge of mastership.

We only ask, O God, that they,
Who bind a brother, may relent;
But, GREAT AVENGER, we do pray
That the wrong doer may repent.

Miscellaneous Department.

CONVERSATION,

BY MRS. H. E. BEECHER STOWE.

'For every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of Judgment.

'A very solemn sermon,' said Miss B., shaking her head impressively, as she sat down to table on Sunday noon; then giving a deep sigh she added, 'I am afraid if an account is to be rendered for all idle words, some people will have a great deal to answer for.'

'Why, cousin Anna,' replied a sprightly young lady opposite, 'what do you mean by idle words?'

'All words that have not a strictly useful tendency, Helen,' replied Miss B.

'I don't know what will become of me then, answered Helen, 'for I never can think of anything useful to say. I sit and try sometimes, but it always stops my talking. I don't think any thing in the world so doleful, as a set of persons sitting round, all trying to say something useful, like a parcel of old clocks ticking at each other. I think one might as well take the vow of entire silence, like the monks of La Trappe.'

'It is probable,' said Miss B., 'that a greater part of our ordinary conversation had better be dispensed with. "In the multitude of words there wanteth not sin." For my own part, my conscience often reproaches me with the sins of the tongue.'

'I'm sure you can't sin much that way, I must say,' said Helen; but cousin, I really think it is a freezing business, sitting still and reflecting all the time when friends are together; and after all I can't bring myself to feel as if it were wrong to talk and chatter away a good part of the time, just for the sake of talking; for instance if a friend comes of a morning to make a call, I talk about the weather, my roses, my Canary birds, or anything that comes uppermost.'

'And about lace, and bonnet patterns, and the last fashions,' added Miss B., sarcastically.

'Well, supposing we do, where's the harm?'

'Where's the good?' said miss B.

'The good! Why it passes time agreeably, and makes us feel kindly towards each other.'

'I think, Helen,' said Miss B., 'if you had a higher view of Christian responsibility, you would not be satisfied with merely passing time agreeably, or exciting agreeable feelings in others. Does not the very text we are speaking of, show that we have an account to give in the day of Judgment for all this trifling useless conversation?'

'I don't know what that text does mean,' replied Helen, looking seriously; 'but if it means as you say, I think it is a very hard, strait rule.'

'Well,' replied Miss B., 'is not duty always hard and strait?—"strait is the gate, and narrow is the way," you know.'

Helen sighed—

'What do you think of this, uncle C.?' she said after some pause. The uncle of the two young ladies had been listening thus far in silence.

'I think,' he replied, 'that before people begin to discuss, they should be quite sure as to what they are talking about; and I am not exactly clear in this case. You say, Anna,' said he, turning to Miss B., 'that all conversation is idle which has not a directly useful tendency; now, what do you mean by that? Are we never to say anything that has not for its direct and specific object, to benefit others or ourselves?'

'Yes,' replied Miss B., 'I suppose not.'

'Well then, when I say "Good morning, sir, 'tis a pleasant day," I have no such object. Are these then idle words?'

'Why no—not exactly,' replied Miss B., 'in some cases it is necessary to say something, so as not to appear rude.'

'Very well,' replied the uncle. 'You admit then that some things, which are neither useful or instructive in themselves considered, are to be said to keep up the intercourse of society.'

'Certainly—some thigs,' said Miss B.

'Well, now, in the case mentioned by Helen, when two or three people with whom you are in different degrees of intimacy, call upon you, I think she is perfectly right, as she said, in talking of roses, and Canary birds, and even of bonnet patterns, and lace, or any thing of the kind for the sake of making conversation. It amounts to the same thing as Good morning and Good evening, and other courtesies of society. This sort of small talk has nothing more instructive in it, but it may be useful in its place. It makes people comfortable and easy—promotes kind and social feelings—and making people comfortable by any innocent means, is certainly not a thing to be despised.'

'But is there not great danger of becoming light and trifling if one allows this?'—said Miss B., doubtfully.

'To be sure, there is always danger of running every innocent thing to excess.—One might eat to excess, or drink to excess; yet eating and drinking are both useful in their way. Now, our lively young friend Helen, here, might perhaps be in some temptation of this sort; but as for you, Anna, I think you are in more danger of another extreme.'

'And what is that?'

'Of overstraining your mind, by endeavoring to keep up a constant, fixed state of seriousness and solemnity, and not allowing yourself the relaxation necessary to preserve its healthy tone. In order to be healthy, every mind must have variety and amusement; and if you would sit down at least one hour a day, and join your friends in some amusing conversation, and indulge in a good laugh, I think, my dear you would not only be a happier person, but a better Christian.'

'My dear uncle,' said Miss B., 'this is the very thing that I have been most on my guard against—I can never tell stories, or laugh and joke, without feeling condemned for it afterwards.'

'But my dear you must do the thing in the testimony of a good conscience, before you can do it to any purpose. You must make up your mind that cheerful and entertaining conversation—conversation whose first object is to amuse, is useful conversation in its place, and then your coscience will not be injured by joining in it.'

'But what good does it do, uncle?'

'Do you not often complain of coldness and deadness in your religious feelings—of lifelessness and want of interest?'

'Yes, uncle.'

'Well, this coldness and lifelessness is the result of forcing your mind to one set of thoughts and feelings. You become worn out—your feelings exhausted—deadness and depression ensues. Now, turn your mind, off from these subjects—divert it by a cheerful and animated conversation, and you will find after a while, that it will return to them with new life and energy.'

'But is not foolish talking and jesting expressly forbidden?'

'That text, if you will look at the connections, does not forbid jesting in the abstract, but jesting on immodest subjects—which are often designated in the New Testament by the phraseology there employed. I should give the sense of it, "Neither filthiness, nor foolish talking, no indelicate jests." The kind of sprightly and amusing conversation which I referred to, I should not denominate foolish by any means, at proper times and places.'

'Yet people often speak of gaiety as inconsistent in Christians—even worldly people,' said Miss B.

'Yes, because in the first place, they often have wrong ideas as to what Christianity requires in this respect, and suppose Christians to be violating their own principles in indulging in it. In the second place there are some, especially among young people, who never talk in any other way, to whom this kind of conversation is not an amusement, but a habit—giving the impression that they never think seriously at all. But I think that if a person is really possessed by the tender, affectionate, benevolent spirit of Christianity—if they regulate their temper and their tongue by it, and in all their actions show an evident effort to conform to its precepts, they will not do harm by occasionally indulging in sprightly and amusing conversation—they will not make the impression that they are not sincerely christians.'

'Besides,' said Helen, 'are not people sometimes repelled from religion by a want of cheerfulness in its professors?'

'Certainly,' replied her uncle, 'and the difference is just this; if a person is habitually trifling and thoughtless, it is thought that they have no religion; if they are ascetic and gloomy, it is attributed to their religion; and you know what Miss E. Smith says—that "to be good and disagreeable is high treason against virtue." The more sincerely and earnestly religious a person is the more important it is that they should be agreeable.'

'But uncle,' said Helen, 'what does that text mean that we began with? What are idle words?'

'My dear, if you will turn to the place where the passage is—Matt. xii. and read the whole page, you will see the meaning of it. Christ was not reproving any body for trifling conversation at the time, but for a very serious slander. The Pharisees, in their bitterness, accused him of being in league with evil spirits. It seems, by what follows, that this was a charge which involved an unpardonable sin. They were not, indeed, conscious of its full guilt—they said it merely from the impulse of excited and envious feeling—But he warns them that on the day of judgment, God will hold them accountable for the full consequences of all such language, however little they may have thought of it at the time of uttering it. The sense of the passage, I take to be—God will hold you responsible in the day of judgment for the consequences of all you have said in your most idle and thoughtless moments.'

'For example,' said Helen, 'if one makes unguarded and unfounded assertions about the Bible, which excite doubt and prejudice.'

'There are many instances,' said her uncle, 'that are quite in point. Suppose in conversation either under the influence of envy or ill-will, or merely from love of talking, you make remarks and statements about another person which may be true or may not—you do not stop to enquire—your unguarded words set reports in motion, and unhappiness, and hard feeling and loss of character is the result. You spoke idly it is true, but nevertheless you are held responsible by God for all the consequences of your words. So professors of religion often make unguarded remarks about each other, which lead observers to doubt the truth of religion; and they are responsible for every such doubt they excite. Parents and guardians often allow themselves to speak of the faults and weaknesses of their ministers, in the presence of children and younger people—they do it thoughtlessly—but in so doing they destroy an influence, which might otherwise have saved the souls of their children; they are responsible for it. People of cultivated minds and fastidious taste often allow themselves to come home from church and criticise a sermon, and unfold all its weak points in the presence of others on whom it may have a very serious impression.—While the critic is holding up the bad arrangement, and setting in a ludicrous point of view the lame figures—perhaps the servant behind his chair, who was almost persuaded to be a Christian by that very discourse, gives up his purposes, in losing his respect for the sermon;—this was thoughtless—but the evil is done, and the man who did it is responsible for it.'

'I think,' said Helen, 'that a great deal of evil is done to children in this way—by our not thinking of what we are saying.

'It seems to me,' said Miss B., 'that this view of the subject will reduce us to silence, almost as much as the other. How is one ever to estimate the consequences of their words—people are affected in so many different ways by the same thing.'

'I suppose,' said her uncle, 'we are only responsible for such results, as by carefulness and reflection we might have foreseen. It is not for ill-adjudged words, but for idle words, that we are to be judged—words uttered without any consideration at all, and producing bad results. If a person, really anxious to do right, misjudges as to the probable effect of what they are about to say on others, it is quite another thing.'

'But, uncle, will not such carefulness destroy all freedom in conversation?' said Helen.

'If you are talking with a beloved friend, Helen, do you not use an instinctive care to avoid all that might pain that friend?'

'Certainly.'

'And do you find this effort a restraint on your enjoyment?'

'Certainly not.'

'And you, from your own feelings, avoid what is indelicate and impure in conversation, and yet feel it no restraint?'

'Certainly.'

'Well, I suppose the object of Christian effort should be so to realize the character of our Savior, and conform our tastes and sympathies to his, that we shall instinctively avoid in all our conversation, what would be displeasing to him. A person habitually indulging jealous, angry or revengeful feelings—a person habitually wordly in his spirit—a person allowing himself in skeptical and unsettled habits of thought, cannot talk without doing harm—this is our Savior's account of the matter in the verses immediately before the passage we were speaking of. "How can ye, being evil, speak good things? for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. A good man out of the good treasure of his heart bringeth forth good things, and an evil man out of the evil treasure of his heart bringeth forth evil things." The highest flow of animal spirits would never hurry a pure-minded person into saying any thing indelicate or gross, and in the same manner, if a person is habitually Christian in all his habits of thought and feeling, he will be able without irksome watchfulness to avoid what may be injurious, even in the most unrestrained conversation.—N. Y. Evangelist.

JOHN BULL AND BROTHER JONATHAN,

OR, THE COCKNEY TOURIST.

A young sprig of the London press happened about six months ago, to be traveling in a stage coach in which a raw Vermont youth was also a passenger. The young boy was not one of your "real cute" fellows, but a shy, diffident stripling, traveling from a distant school to spend his vacation at home. To the Londoner, he was an object of great curiosity, being the first sample he had seen, and he pestered the boy with questions touching his mode of life, studies, employment, etc., thinking to amuse himself, gather items for his journal, and at the same time impress the other passengers with a profound idea of his importance. The boy, although evidently annoyed, answered politely, and displayed none of the characteristics of Green Mountain youths; so the Englishman thought that he could boast as he pleased with impunity. He told the passengers that he had heard much of Yankee tricks, and Yankee shrewdness, but "for his part, he had never seen any thing in them that he could call clever, and indeed he wished very much to be made the subject of one of their tricks, for if they could fool him, he could then believe in what he had heard of their character."

This hint was not thrown away upon young Jonathan. He thought he would set his wits to work, for the honor of "down east," and soon hit upon a scheme. He had heard the Englishman inquire the direction, from the town where the coach was to stop, to a residence some five miles distant. This direction happened to be the very path the boy was to take home, but he said nothing.

The coach stopped. Little Jonathan trotted off towards home, and Johnny Bull, after having deposited his luggage in the tavern, soon followed. There was a Lunatic Asylum near the town we mentioned. Jonathan told every soul he had met that one of the madmen had escaped and was coming along the road, and that they would know him by his perpetually inquiring for the residence of Mr. Brown. Not contented with this, he turned aside to every farm house, and told the inmates in great alarm, that a madman had escaped from the asylum, and to be on their guard against a man who would inquire for the residence of Mr. Brown. The thing succeeded to a miracle. Johnny Bull had not advanced far on his way, before he perceived a man plant himself on one side of the road, brandishing a thick cudgel, and assuming the attitude of one who expects danger, and was resolved to defend himself to the last. Johnny thought it was singular, but nevertheless put the question:

"Sir, can you direct me to the residence of Mr. Brown?"

"Yes, I thought you was the man.—Now look here, stranger, you just conduct yourself respectfully, and keep your own side of the road, for if you come near me, I swan to man I'll smash you."

Johnny's eyes opened, and his mouth too. "My dear friend, I don't want to approach you. I honly vish to know vere Mr. Brown lives."

"Well, now, you just follow your nose and don't molest nobody, you tarnal varmint. You'd better go home, and get on your waistcoat."

The man, who seemed in a hurry, passed on. Johnny gazed after him an instant, quite confounded, and then proceeded on his way, saying to himself, "Vell, upon my vord, that person's conduct was werry singular!" He turned off to a farm house. A woman was sitting at the door sewing. When she perceived him, she started from her seat, and darting in at the door, held it for an instant, while she returned to gaze at the stranger.

"Madam, vill you be so kind as to hinform me vether I ham in the road to Mr Brown's house?"

"I thought so!" exclaimed the woman, slamming the door fast, and bolting it, and the next minute she was seen peeping suspiciously from the upper window.

"Vot is the matter, madam? I merely vant to know."

"Oh, go away, you unfortunate wretch! Don't you attempt to cut any tantrums here. Go away now, do—that's a good fellow!"

The woman disappeared, and Johnny paused an instant to ascertain if there was any thing frightful about him. He then proceeded, and encountered a good humored countryman, coming whistling along the road.

"Pray sir," said Johnny, "can you direct me to Mr. Brown's?"

The thoughtless countryman had forgotten little Johnathan's warning, but when he heard the question, it recurred to him, and without saying a word, he took to his heels in such a hurry that he tumbled over a log; but picking himself up again, and was out of sight in an instant.

"Vell," said Johnny to himself "this is certainly wery hextraordinary!" He began to feel strange sensations, and walked on for half a mile, ruminating awfully upon the unaccountable treatment he had received. Here he met another traveler, and with very doubtful feelings about getting an answer propounded his question.

The stranger paused right before Johnny, and his hat seemed to be rising on his head. To judge from his looks, his feelings must have been like those of a bird fascinated by a rattlesnake. Johnny noticed the frightful appearance of the stranger, and terror now took possession of him. He imagined something dreadful was going to occur, and forthwith took to his heels into the woods.

"Bless my art," he exclaimed aloud, "vot can be the matter with the people! Vy, these inhabitants are vild! They are Wallentines and Horsons! Hourang houtangs!—Regular vild men of the voods!"

He was now completely lost in a thick wood. When he found the road again, he was afraid to ask any more questions, and finally got back to the town, when the next day our hero visited him with, "Look here stranger, Mr. Brown's house is just where it was yesterday. When you see him, tell him what you think of Yankee tricks."

A GOOD ILLUSTRATION.—At a temperance meeting in Western New York, some one alluded to the plea, so often urged by the Society of Friends, that it is not well to aid in the reformatory movements of the day, because it leads to "mixing with the world." The speaker was followed by Henry Colman, of agricultural celebrity. In the midst of his remarks, he stopped suddenly, pointed out of the window, and looking at a Friend opposite to him, exclaimed, in a tone of alarm, "Dr. Robinson! is that your house, that's on fire?"—Instantly the whole audience were on their feet. "Stop, stop!" "Nobody must go but the Quakers. Don't mix with the world! Nobody must go but the Quakers." The fire was, of course, a hoax; but we trust a serious use will be made of its witty application.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Not 25 or 50 per cent Reward.

S. G. WALKER

HAS now [illegible] NEW [illegible] Hardware, &c. [illegible] goods CHEAP [illegible] S. G. Walker [illegible]

De Ruyter, May 20, 1842.

PROSPECTUS [illegible] THE NEW [illegible]

[illegible]

TERMS.—[illegible]

[illegible] 1842.

[illegible] S. S. HASKELL, Publisher, 138 Fulton st. New York.

New York, June [illegible] 1842.

[illegible] New York [illegible] one copy of the work. 18w15

NO IMPOSITION.

NO STATES PRISON WORK!

THOSE wishing to purchase BOOTS and SHOES of superior quality of custom work will find just the place by calling at the sign of the MAMMOTH BOOT

De Ruyter, May 20, 1842.

JOB PRINTING.

BOOKS, Pamphlets, Way, Hand-Bills, Cards Bills, &c. &c., neatly executed at this office.

L. W BLISS' Window Sash
L. Bliss' & Co. " Blinds.

Holme's Sampson & Salisbury Edged Tools consisting of Broad Axes, Hand Axes, Adzes and Chisels, at Factory prices by J. N. ELMORE,
October 4. Manufacturers' Agent

"A nimble sixpence is better than a slow shilling."

SPRING GOODS! SPRING GOODS!

CHEAP! CHEAP!! CHEAP!!!

THE undersigned are receiving a large assortment of goods suitable for the spring and summer trade, and invite their friends and the public generally to call and examine them at the one price store. SUTTON & QUINBY.

How to make money,

I[illegible] of the Yankee Nation [illegible] The easiest and most practicable [illegible] the desired end in [illegible] "Save Money," which can be [illegible] NEW GOODS, instead of the [illegible] many shops and many [illegible] at ELMORE'S [illegible] NEW GOODS is nearly equal to [illegible] and who is daily [illegible] Fortune's Favorites

Of Drugs and Medicines,

TH[illegible] larger stock and [illegible] than those who advertise [illegible] J. N. ELMORE

[illegible] fashionable Hats, [illegible] at the STONE STORE

[illegible] ESTABLISHMENT

T[illegible] citizens of De [illegible] S. G. Walker's store [illegible] New York City [illegible] F. GUEST

[illegible] 1842.

S[illegible] Farmers Ex[illegible] barrels and [illegible] from the best of [illegible] S. G. WALKER.

[illegible]

AGENTS FOR THE REGISTER

NEW YORK.

[illegible]

PENNSYLVANIA.

[illegible]

VIRGINIA.

[illegible] F. Randolph.

[illegible]

OHIO.

[illegible]—Charles Clarke.
[illegible]—Simeon Babcock, B. C. Church.
[illegible]—Lewis A. Davis.
[illegible]—Joel [illegible]
[illegible] N. Swinney.
[illegible] M. Todd.

MICHIGAN.

[illegible] Church.

WISKONSAN.

Milton, Rock Co.—Joseph Goodrich, F. M. Stillman.

IOWA.

[illegible]—M. Wheelock.

ILLINOIS.

[illegible]—James Dunham.

The Seventh-day Baptist Register

IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY,
AT DE RUYTER, MADISON CO., N. Y.,
BY
JAMES BAILEY.

TERMS.—To village subscribers who have the paper left at their doors, $2 25, in advance, or $2 50, at the expiration of the year.

To office and mail subscribers, $2 in ADVANCE.

Each communication, involving facts and intended for insertion in the paper, must be accompanied by a responsible name.

No subscription received for a less term than six months.

☞All subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, will be considered as wishing to continue their subscription, and their paper will be sent to them accordingly. No paper will be discontinued till all arrearages are paid except at the discretion of the publisher.

☞Advertisements inserted on the most reasonable terms.

☞All letters and communications to ensure attention should be addressed to the publisher free of postage.

A. T. Rogers 2

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.

VOL. III.---NO 28.] JAMES BAILEY, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.——A. H. BURDICK, PRINTER.

Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,——The SEVENTH DAY is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.—COMMANDMENT.——If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments.—JESUS CHRIST. [WHOLE NO. 132.

TWO DOLLARS IN ADVANCE.] DE RUYTER, N. Y[illegible]RTH-DAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 1842. PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Religious Department.

From the Western Christian Advocate

IDENTITY OF THE HUMAN BODY IN THE RESURRECTION.

MR. EDITOR:—In all ages of the church men have differed not only on the comparatively non-essential doctrines of divine revelation, but on those of the most vital importance. True charity is unwilling and can not accurately set bounds beyond which, if a man go in theological opinions that are erroneous, his salvation is rendered impossible.

Though the doctrine of the identity or sameness of the human body is, as I think, clearly taught in the scriptures, I am not disposed to affirm that it is so essentially a part of a Christian creed that its belief is fatally dangerous. By the phrase "identity of the human body in the resurrection," we are to understand that the precise particles of matter contained in the human body at death, will be raised by the power of God, completely purified from all physical evil, (at least the bodies of the righteous will be thus purified,) being made a fit vehicle for an immortal spirit. This I think will appear reasonable if we attend to the following considerations:

1. It appears to be a part of the divine economy, that pure, intelligent, immortal, spirits should possess material vehicles or bodies, by which to hold intercourse with the objects of creation. We ourselves, Adam in his innocence, and perhaps angels, are examples of the connection of spirits with material bodies. It may be objected. "Who maketh his angels spirits," &c. But does not this mean, "Who maketh his angels like to spirits, and his ministers like to a flame of fire"? So thinks Dr. Dick. Surely no Christian will urge the doctrine of the philosophy of Greece and Rome, that God is incapable of making matter a fit residence for the soul.

2. It was the Creator's design that Adam and his happy offspring, if unfallen, should never die eternally, possessing the bodies given them. Now, if the body is not restored at the resurrection, the original design is frustrated. It is not the object of redemption to place man on entire new grounds to his Maker; we are essentially under the same law that Adam was in paradise. The scheme of redemption, as Watson has shown, "is not a provision of law, but made to consist with law." It nullifies no law, i. e., no moral law. It was designed to build up what Adam threw down. As, therefore, Adam's sin destroyed the identical body given him, Christ's righteousness will restore the same in the resurrection, otherwise the original design of the eternal union of soul and body will be frustrated.

3. The translations of Enoch and Elijah were, doubtless, designed as instructive examples to former ages, showing that soul and body should ultimately enter heaven. Their bodies underwent a great change, but the identity of matter was preserved.

4. The resurrection of Christ and those who were raised and "came out of their graves" after his resurrection, is a proof of identity. The very same body that was crucified, handled by Thomas, and seen forty days, was taken up from Olivet to heaven. Is it not said that he shall come "in like manner," i. e., with the same body? Are not our bodies to be fashioned "like to his glorious body"? Doubtless the same body that was crucified, John saw, and thus describes: "His head and his hairs were white like wool, as white as snow, and his eyes were as a flame of fire, and his feet like fine brass, as if they were burned in a furnace."

5. The identity of the body is further proven by those who are found alive at the general judgment. Their bodies are simply to be "changed in the twinkling of an eye," i. e., instantly. The matter of their bodies is not annihilated or left behind, but "changed." Is it probable that the millions found alive when the "great white throne" appears, will preserve or keep their bodies, while all who have died experience what is improperly called a resurrection, but preserve not the identity of their bodies?

Physiology has shown that the human body undergoes great changes during life—old matter flying off and new accessions perpetually making. But the doctrine of the scriptures is that the body found at death is raised. See Watson's Institutes. "It is sown,"&c., "it is raised." &c. Only what is sown is raised.

Those who deny the identity do not, as they think, deny the resurrection. But if the same body is not raised, how can it be called a resurrection? They seem to think that some part is raised, but so changed as to lose all the essential properties of matter. But the natural properties of matter, as philosophy has demonstrated, can not be changed without annihilating it. The resurrection body must possess all the properties of matter, or else, as Drew has proven, it is not a body, but a distinct substance. The scripture doctrine is "it is raised a spiritual body," that is, a body having all the inherent properties of matter, as, impenetrability, extension, figure, divisibility, &c., being completely adapted to a spirit that shall eternally exist.

R. GILBERT.

DIVINE PROVIDENCE.

To a mind established in this truth, there is a source of peace and joy which no accumulation of trials and disappointments can destroy. It was to this refuge that the Savior fled, when the arrows of persecution were aimed against him. 'The cup that my heavenly Father giveth me, shall I not drink it?' Could that bitter cup have been separated in his mind from the hand of his Father in heaven, and no agency been seen in dispensing it, except that of his blood-thirsty enemies, how inconceivably aggravated would have been the [illegible]tion to his soul! When he had thrice prayed that that dreadful cup might pass from him, he recollected that it was the will of God he should drink it, and therefore submissively said, 'Father, glorify thy name.' 'Not my will, but thine be done.' This shall be 'as an hiding-place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest,' to all who make God their refuge. On this rock they may stand, and see the waves of trouble break harmlessly at their feet.

What though Satan and his host rebel, and lay waste the paradise of human innocence and blessedness! What though he succeed in his hellish designs, and blot out the hope of a blissful immortality from the soul of man! Jehovah reigns upon his throne, and no sooner is the fatal deed accomplished, than a remedy is found, which sheds new glory on the character of God, and swells the notes of praise to a higher pitch than ever.

Not less fruitful of joy is this doctrine, under all the varieties of trials through which we must pass in the present world. For a time, sin is permitted to rage. Kingdom rises against kingdom, and nation against nation. Passion and pride, violence and blood, spread misery far and wide.—Nevertheless, God will bring all these things into judgment, and even here, make them the means of advancing his kingdom and glory. Let, then, kingdoms be overturned, and thrones subverted; let all earthly hopes and prospects be cut off.—'The Lord liveth, and blessed be our Rock.' 'Though clouds and darkness are about him, justice and judgment are the habitation of his throne.' If he deprive us of our comforts; if he take from us the friends whom we love, and put the companions of our joys, the partners of our life, into darkness, we bow with submission, because it is the decree of infinite wisdom and goodness. Often we are led through the mazes of a mysterious providence, and are compelled to say, 'Thy way is in the sea, and thy path in the great waters, and thy footsteps are not known.' 'How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out.' But why should we despond though 'we walk by faith and not by sight,' while a voice from above assures us, 'What I do, thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter.' Here is peace with which the world 'intermeddleth not,' a tranquility that nothing can destroy. Our post is that of duty. Events and consequences belong to God. On this foundation the believer may abide in safety, 'when the heavens and earth shall pass away,' and fire shall melt down the elements.—Here he will stand, and hail with unutterable joy the advent of the Redeemer, as he shall 'come in the clouds of heaven,' 'with an innumerable company of angels,' and the 'sound of a trumpet,' to judge the world. And when the wicked shall 'call to the rocks and mountains to fall on them,' and hide them from the glory of his power,' they shall be 'caught up' with songs of joy, 'to meet him in the air.' Here is the end of him who trusts in God as Universal Sovereign, and rejoices that himself and all which he possesses will be disposed of in time and eternity according to the purpose of him 'who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will.'—Cornelius.

PRAYER.

"A house of prayer."

The following extract from "The Golden Censer," by Harris, the author of "Mammon," can not be read without profit. Let it be read again and again, and it can not fail to do you good, if you have a spark of love to the Savior, or the slightest regard for your best interests:

Did Jesus pray? Oh, in a sense more than figurative, he saved the world by prayer! Portray a mountain-top, and Jesus on it, prostrate, alone, wet with the dews of night, praying to God with strong cries and tears. And next, a garden—Gethsemane—and Jesus there praying in an agony, which baptizes him in his own blood. And next, the place called Calvary, for "there they crucified him"; and Jesus died, offering that great sacrificial prayer which still pleads above—still fills the ear of God, and for the sake of which all other prayers are heard! Can the cloven tongues of fire be portrayed? Forget not to represent the apostles on whom they rest assembled in prayer! Elsewhere, let an angel be seen despatched from divine presence to liberate Peter from prison; but forget not to represent the apostles in a neighboring house in prayer! But oh! there is a vision no human eye but one has seen, a heavenly scene which sums up all, an angel standing at the altar, having a golden censer; and there is given him much incense, that he may offer it with, mark, the prayers of all saints, upon the golden altar which is before the throne; and the smoke of the incense, blending with the prayers of the saints, ascending up before God out of the angel's hand. Yes, draw near; it is the summing up of man's instrumentality. Of all the various ways in which he employs himself here, look into that censer, and mark which of them it is that reaches heaven. Only that which was sanctified by prayer. When the clamors of a turbulent zeal have subsided and the undevout means which have dazzled and astonished men have spent their force, mark what is left in the censer. Only that which partook of the nature of prayer. This is all that lives to reach the skies, all that heaven receives from earth, all that is ever permitted to ascend before God. Nothing but prayer shall be in that censer, and nothing will ever find a place in that censer but that which ascends on the breath of prayer.

Again, here every thing is to be done with the view of leading to prayer. As we have been proceeding with our remarks, the question may have arisen in some minds, What, is our piety to take no other form than that of prayer? Is it to show [illegible] by prayer? Such a question could be entertained only where there existed a misapprehension of the nature of prayer, or of the way in which prayer blends with all the [illegible] and methods of instrumentality by which God works. Confine yourself to prayer? No; not even in the house of prayer itself. Only see that whatever you do, you do it with an ultimate view to prayer. If you preach the gospel, for instance, you are to bear in mind that that is the most successful preaching which brings man prostrate before God for mercy. This is the very end of the gospel ministry; and the more vividly you can set forth Jesus Christ crucified among them, the more effectually this end will be answered. Yes, let every place of prayer have a Calvary in the midst of it, and on that Calvary let there be a cross, and on that cross a bleeding Savior; and on that sight, that spectacle of love, let the eyes of the people be kept perpetually fixed. As preachers of the gospel, our great distinction is that we are the ministers of the cross, we have to wait on the cross, to walk around the cross, and to point out to the people the wonders of the cross. Have we any pathos? It should be kept for telling them of the cross. Have we any affection for their souls? It should gush forth when we are pointing to the cross. Have we any tears for them? When shall we shed them, but when we have led our people to the cross—when we are there saying to the sinner, "Behold him! look upon him! He is wounded for your transgressions! he is bruised for your iniquities, the chastisement of your peace is upon him, that with his stripes you might be healed. Draw nearer to him; it is of you that he is thinking; that blood is to wash away your sins; that life which he is pouring out is the ransom which he is giving for your souls. Draw nearer still; look into his heart; read the names which are written there; your name is among them." And while we are thus entreating the sinner, does he relent? Does he look upon him whom he has pierced, mourning? Does he smite upon his breast, crying, "God be merciful to me a sinner"? Then the end of the ministry is answered. "Behold he prayeth."

THE OMNIPRESENT GOD.

A dark consciousness of this truth has gone through all the inhabitants of the heathen world. They indeed did not suppose themselves surrounded, on all sides, by the Being before whom their knees bowed, and who, in his external manifestations, was at all time equally near them. From the deep vale they climbed to the mountain top, that they might approach nearer to the all-cherishing Power, which holds and conducts the universe. They hastened from their homes to the distant holy places, where the heaven bends down lower to the suppliant. And yet none the less on this account did a dark consciousness say to them, that he whom they sought was with them, even before they went out after him. In the power of conscience, have all the people of the earth paid homage to the omnipresent God. Deep in the breast is it planted, that inexplicable power—a spirit so mild, so dim-sighted, so delicate, which can be reduced to silence so easily; and yet again, a power, which, whenever it raises its menacing finger, prostrates the affrighted mortal upon the earth. In your own breast, in that which you call your inmost me, it has established its throne, and still it accosts you from that [illegible] as Thou, and you must serve it. How [illegible] that celestial power find its way into your inward nature? What a wonder, that in this secret place of the bosom of all men who dwell on the earth, the mystery of the omnipresent God should have been foreboded and felt?

The heart, which is dead to divine truth, is one to which divine truth is also dead.—But the truth of God's omnipresence is such, that no mind, at least in our Christian community, is entirely dead to it.—There may, perhaps, be some among us, who declare with the mere lips, that they know nothing of the Omnipresent One, because they do not see him with their corporeal eyes, and cannot touch him with their hands. It is with them as with those fools, who do not believe in the existence of the air around them, because they do not see it with their eyes, and cannot grasp it with their hands; but let the strong wind awake, and the invisible Power is suddenly invested with a form before their eyes! let the strong wind awake, and the invisible Being assumes a form before the atheist; and oh! it is a form so mighty and so true, that every thing, which in the visible world, had previously appeared to him as a reality, now appears to him as a shadow; and over against every shadow, there will stand before his soul naught but this solitary truth—there is a God. Man has power to forget only, but not to disbelieve that there is a Being every where present. Thus the hundreds and the thousands, who wander over the earth, and are content to sport in the radiance of the material sun, have forgotten him. But as the wretched one, whom to-morrow's sun-rising wakes to the gallows, slumbers for a while in forgetfulness, but all on a sudden rouses up, at the striking of the death-clock; so the man who forgets God, suddenly awakes, as the voice all at once strikes upon his ear—"Man! I the Holy One of Israel, am"—Tholuck.

OBLIGATIONS TO THE HEATHENS.

The Christian does not occupy an enviable situation, who says he submits the fate of the heathen to God. It is not submission, but the feelings of a heart regardless of its obligations. Why is not the same [illegible] when a beloved son or daughter is prostrated by some unrelenting disease? He is then all anxiety. Every effort is employed to rescue the object of his affections. It is evident, then, that he considers it important to be found in the use of means, when objects which are dear to him are endangered.—Hence, we conclude, it is want of love to the heathen, and not, (as he would have it supposed,) a submission of their fate to God, which is the cause of his guilty indifference. Has God ever acted in the conversion of the world, without the means of grace? Has any nation ever been thus converted? None. Missionaries must go amongst them. How can they believe in him of whom they have not heard, and how shall they hear without a preacher, and how shall he preach except he be sent? They must be sent, and they must be supported by the Christian world. The heathen cannot be expected to do it. And there is none upon whom this responsibility rests with more force, than upon American Christia[illegible]

Some C[illegible]stians suppose, that when they can support a certain style of life, when they have acquired sufficient to set out their children, and live in a style of luxury, that then they will contribute for the conversion of the heathen. Could such Christians but see the things of the world, and the inestimable worth of the soul, as they view them amidst the scenes of the last day, such suppositions would be forever banished from their minds. It will then be their grief, that they have not first sought the kingdom of God and his righteousness. Can we, Christians of America, be regardless of the heathen? Let us [illegible] wasting their way to destruction, for want of that light which we are in possession of. Soon they, with us, will stand in the judgment. Then they will know that we possessed that which would have saved them from their state of woe.—How will they rail us for our selfishness and insensibility? It must not be. Who will not give his goods, or his life, that he may not appear on the last day, with the stain of heathen blood upon his garments. Let us have the consolation in heaven, that we have done all that we could, to rear the standard of the cross upon every shore. —Christian Index.

"ASK, AND YE SHALL RECEIVE."—An heir to a great inheritance has only to come to his guardian with his wants, and they are supplied. A child of a rich and benevolent parent lives with the perpetual consciousness that every real want will be joyfully met, on his making known his request. But the Christian is both an heir and a child. He is an 'heir with God and joint heir with Christ to a heavenly inheritance.' He is a child of God. His Father is his guardian also. The ability and willingness of his covenant God are absolutely infinite. 'No good thing will he withhold from those that love him.' The heir of God, then, who has 'an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away,' may look up steadfastly for a blessing. He may press his way through every discouragement, and lodge his petition in the ear, yea, in the very heart of God.—He asks not simply because he is commanded to pray, but because he loves to pray. He asks not ceremoniously, but because he is needy, and cannot live without a supply from the bounty of his Guardian Father. He asks not doubtingly, but confidently: because he knows that his Father loves to give according to his great necessities. He asks not presumptuously, but submissively; confiding in the wisdom of his Father to give what is needful, whether sorrow or rejoicing, sickness or health, life or death. Where God has specified his will he asks in accordance with that specified will; for it is no submission to attempt to alter God's established will.—But where He has not so specified his will, he asks with most entire submission, 'not my will, but thine, O Father, be done.'—Appoint my circumstances; give me what thou seest best; withhold what thou pleasest. And then, the entire confidence, that what we receive is the very best we could have. It is sweet thus to rest the soul in God—thus to mingle our will all up in God's will—thus to become nothing, and make God all in all.—Oberlin Evangelist.

Beware and govern well your appetite, and watch over every evil propensity, lest sin surprise you, and its black attendant, death, make you a prisoner.

The most common things are the most useful; which shows both the wisdom and the goodness of the great Lord of the family of the world.

Children's Department.

From the [illegible]

LUCY MAITLAND.

Lucy Maitland was a little girl who had many good qualities, but one pretty bad fault. She was so desirous of approbation, and so afraid of reproof, that she was often betrayed into a want of ingenuousness, and even into direct equivocation. Her mother had taken great pains to correct this fault, and to make her child thoroughly honest and ingenuous. She hoped that she had succeeded in this, and that Lucy had become thoroughly convinced of the sinfulness of equivocation and concealment. But this hope was destroyed for a time by the following incident.

Lucy was left one afternoon for an hour with the care of her little brother, a baby of six months old. She was commonly very well pleased to tend him, but just now she felt exceedingly desirous of looking at some fine colored drawings in a work her father had just brought home. After playing with the baby a little while, she seated herself with him at the table, and spread the book open before her, endeavoring to keep her little brother's hands from the delicate pages. Lucy knew that she was doing wrong, but she thought it was not very wrong, and she would only look at a few of the pictures. Poor excuses!

But there were tales in the book too, and these had even a greater attraction for Lucy than the pictures, and presently she became absorbed in one of them. The baby kept stretching out his hands to see what he could get hold of, and at last he reached a vase which stood on the table, full of flowers, and overturned it. The vase was not broken, but the discolored water drenched the pages of the new book. Now was Lucy distressed indeed; she placed the baby on the floor while she ran for a cloth, dried the wet and soiled leaves as well as she could, wiped the water from the table and [illegible] the vase, and finally, with no very pleasant feelings, resumed the care of her little brother. She knew that the book was a very expensive one, and [illegible]

When her mother returned, she [illegible] that Lucy [illegible] a reply in the negative. [illegible] more of the [illegible]

[illegible]

"Why, what [illegible] what can have [illegible] Maitland. "What a pity! [illegible] almost spoiled!"

"Yes, [illegible] would not have had it [illegible] Lucy, my child, [illegible]

"No sir," answered Lucy [illegible]

[illegible]

less pungent than the day before. It was a bright and pleasant morning. [illegible] had the feeling of enjoyment [illegible] common to [illegible] persons [illegible] especially [illegible] children, on awaking from sleep.

She dressed herself and went down stairs—rather slowly, as she thought of meeting her father again. But when her mother's voice called to her from the room below, 'Come here, Lucy, I have something to say to you,' her heart sunk within her. She thought her mother had found out the truth in some way, and that sense of oppression, that leaden weight which she had experienced the night before, returned. "The way of transgessors is hard."

Her mother, however, met her with a smiling face, and led her towards a table on which stood a small, but very pretty writing desk. 'I bought this for you yesterday afternoon, my dear Lucy,' said her mother, because I heard you wish for such a one, and because I wanted to express to you in some way, the pleasure which your improvement, for the last few months has given to your father and myself. We have witnessed this improvement in your character, my dear child, with pleasure and gratitude—gratitude to Him who is the source of all good.'

Lucy had stood during this address with feelings very different from those which her mother intended to awaken. At the [illegible] she burst into an agony of tears, and threw herself into her mother's arms.

[illegible] but she could get [illegible] It was not till after repeated [illegible] that she could articulate amidst [illegible] sobs—'I am so wicked—you [illegible]—oh mother, you never can [illegible]

[illegible] Her mother [illegible] was sufficient, if [illegible] But she now [illegible] encouragement, more [illegible] her mother had prayed [illegible] told the whole occurrence just as it had happened. She begged her mother to keep [illegible] Her mother did so, and Lucy kept the resolution which she formed at that time, never, by the grace of God, to be guilty of concealment or equivocation.

From [illegible]

THE LAST [illegible]

"I feel very well, mother, I'm sure it [illegible]," said little Jane Caldwell, as she broke [illegible] of a small cake, made from the remnants of a peck of meal.

"Although our bread is coarse, Jane, it is better to live so, than to possess all the riches of this world, and to be strangers to that God who careth for the poor, and forsakes not those who put their trust in him."

Mrs. Caldwell was now encompassed with affliction. But she had seen better days, when she was encircled by friends, and sorrow was a strange word with her, and then she dreamed not that dark days and cloudy skies would so soon shroud the fairest prospects of her life. On a kind husband and an infant daughter, she lavished her warmest affections—she loved them as life; but in an unexpected hour, Mr. Caldwell was removed from her forever, and [illegible]

[illegible] by her Father above, [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] the good [illegible] our prayers were [illegible] Bless the Lord, O our souls, and all that is within us bless his holy name.'

They kneeled again in humble devotion.

Tell me not of the palaces of the rich, or esteemed among men; but in the poor and lonely cottage—there, O! there true pleasures are to be found, when parents teach their children the fear of that God whom they serve, and walk together in the footsteps of piety. In sorrows they are comforted—in distresses and trials they rejoice—and poverty itself can not exclude them from a rich inheritance in the care and friendship of the Almighty.

So to live as to disarm malice of its venom, as to honor our Saviour, as to promote his cause, as to overcome the world, as to rob death of its sting, as to secure an imperishable crown of glory in brighter worlds on high, are maxims of great wisdom and great value.—Western Reserve Cabinet and Family Visiter.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, September, 1842.

The Hope of the Christian.

Hope is to the soul what a beautiful meteor is to the natural eye; it is lovely, because it reminds us of a covenant between God and man, and tells us, in words fraught with sweetness, that we are born for an immortality beyond the grave. Indeed, the profession of Christianity, and the enjoyment of religion in the soul, gives a character to hope of which it is otherwise destitute. There is no person, whatever his circumstances and station in life may be, but whose bosom swells with lively emotion at the mention of hope. What is hope but the solace and stay of those whom it deludes the most? To the poor invalid, stretched upon a bed of pain and anguish, it kindly whispers of future health, and promises better days to his dejected and cast-down spirit. In the long catalogue of human griefs, there is seldom one of so crushing a nature that hope loses its elasticity, and becomes unable to soar upward and bring down fresh laurels from some rare object of its own creation. And yet while hope is the great inciter to every enterprise of the day, and to every exertion put forth by mortals here, who knows not that it ordinarily allures but to deceive? And [illegible] it crowd the future with glorious resting-places and sunny hours, thus tempting us to bear up for a season under accumulated griefs and diverse circumstances, its splendid palaces erected in some far-off domain curtained with the richest profusion of luxury, vanish as we approach, even like the early dew and the fading flower, and we are kept from despair only because hope yet lingers, as we descry the pinnacles and forests of another bright scene fringing the horizon in the dim distance of the future.

But the hope of the christian is not subject to such airy flights. It is a firm hope which rests not for security on fancy's airy vision. It proves man deathless. It is the struggle of the soul, breaking loose from her mortality and attesting her eternity.—And when the mind views Christ, "delivered for our offenses, and raised again for our justification," the unsubstantial and deceitful character is taken away from hope. Hope tells the christian that he is destined, unless he sepulchre his greatness, to the highest honor and the noblest happiness enjoyed by Angels in the celestial world. It is one of the prime pieces of that armor of proof in which the believer is arrayed; for St. Paul bids us take "for an helmet the hope of salvation."

It is beneath the dignity of the christian to hope for wealth or the honors of the world, since "riches profit nothing in the day of wrath," and the "mean and the mighty go down to the same burial;" but it is noble to hope for salvation; the meteor then gathers, like a golden halo, around his head; and, as he presses forward in the battle-time, no weapon of the evil one can pierce through that helmet.

It is a glorious hope, then, which the christian enjoys. It is that which is like an anchor to the soul both sure and steadast, and that reaches within the veil. What but the hope of being eminently useful to his fellows, and abundantly blessed of God, would urge the christian forward when darkness, disappointment and gloom surround him at every step? Who would spend his breath and wear himself out in the cause of his Redeemer, were it not for the sweet consolation, the glorious hope of salvation from sin? Who would contend for the faith that is in Jesus, were it not for the all-consoling hope which springs up in the soul of pointing sinners to Him who died to redeem them? It is good, then, that the christian hope, with the confident expectation of that hope being merged in fruition.

The hope of the christian is very much strengthened by exercising patience in waiting upon God. The Scriptures abound in promises to such as wait upon God with a pure heart and holy aspirations. But men wish an immediate answer to prayer, and think themselves forgotten if the answer is delayed. The delay in answer to prayer is often the best part of the answer. It exercises faith, and hope, and patience; and what better thing can be done for us than the strengthening of those graces to whose growth shall be proportioned the splendors of our immortality? It is a good thing then to wait for the answer to prayer.—"They that wait on the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary, they shall walk and not faint."

The hope of the christian is priceless.—It brings life and immortality to light in the gospel, and prompts the christian to deeds of noble daring in the great field of christian enterprize. It begets a spirit of philanthropy and zeal in behalf of our race which is commensurate with the dignity of our natures. It bespeaks for all the benefits which we hope will result to ourselves from filial obedience to our Maker. It cherishes the fondest anticipations of the future, and paints with a magic hand the deplorable condition of those who live and die reckless of all moral obligation to God.

While all things earthly are as evanescent as the morning dew, let us not fail to form within our bosom the "hope of the christian" that fails not, for "it is yet a little while, and He that shall come, will come; the night is far spent and the day is at hand." As yet there has been no day to this creation, since rebellion wove the sackcloth into the over-head canopy. But the day comes onward. Death advances, while ETERNITY, like a pendulum, vibrates continually through space, saying, (in the language of the eloquent Bridaine,)—"ALWAYS—EVER—EVER—ALWAYS!" There is that edge of gold on the snow-mountains of a long darkened world, which marks the ascending of the Sun in his strength.—"Watchman, what of the night? The watchman said the morning cometh, and also the night." Strange that morning and night should come hand in hand. But the morning to the righteous, as bringing salvation, shall be the night to the wicked as bringing destruction. On then, still on, let the morning break! ere hoping and waiting have wrought their intent. Who will sleep, when as he slumbers, bright things glide by, which, if wakeful, he might have added to his portion? Who will put off the armor, when, by stemming the battle-tide, he may gather every instant spoil and trophies for eternity? Who will tamper with carnal indulgences, when, for the poor enjoyment of a second, he must barter some ever-during privilege? While there is the strongest instituted connection between attainment here, and enjoyment hereafter, we need not parley upon terms, but may summon you to holiness by the certainties of happiness.

Common Honesty.

To subscribe for a religious paper, and receive it for a year or two, and then order it discontinued without ever paying a farthing for it! This is not a rare occurence in these "hard times," as two or three letters before us would indicate. But for the benefit of such gentlemen, we say, once for all, that "No paper will be discontinued until arrearages are paid," unless better 'reasons' occur to us than the following:

PITCHER, Aug. 29, 1842.

Sir—The 'S. D. B. Register,' addressed to J—— S. B————, is not taken from the Office. REASON—"Does not want it!"

Your friend,

E. C. LYONS, P. M.

We are obliged to the Post Master for his kindness; but we think our subscriber ought to have recollected that "common honesty" would have dictated the payment of the small balance of $3,82. This is but one instance among the many. We hope this may be the last.

In connection with the foregoing, we alter the following from the Weekly Messenger, for the benefit of those who are in want of "Reasons" for stopping a religious paper. It is quite to the point.

"Short and Practical."

Text—"Stop my Paper!"

This text you will find recorded in some of the letters sent to the Editors of religious newspapers, by discontented subscribers.—The text is an injunction, which in an 'editorial' point of view deserves consideration. We invite your attention to the following exposition of the text.

We notice,

I. The paper to be "stopped." It is termed the "Seventh-Day Baptist Register;" and,

1. It is a large, interesting and useful sheet, published weekly at "Mechanic's Hall," De Ruyter, N. Y.

2. It is a religious paper, aiming at the extension of Christ's kingdom, the edification of saints, the conversion of sinners, and the promulgation of evangelical truth.

3. It is published at $2,00 per annum in advance, or even if paid within three months of the time of subscribing. The profits accruing from its publication are pledged to the dissemination of truth.

This is the paper concerning which it is said, "stop" it. This leads us to enquire,

II. Who are the persons who say "stop my paper."

1. Sometimes those who can easily afford to pay the subscription price.

2. Or those who acknowledge it to be a "good paper;" one which they like to read, or "think a great deal of."

3. Or those who are church members, and "willing to uphold the church, or missionary societies, at all costs."

4. Or those who profess to be Christians, and lament over the apathy and indifference manifested by the world towards religious periodicals. Such are very often the persons who threaten or terrify Editors with "stop my paper."

III. The "Reasons" for stopping the paper. These are numerous, but we have room only for about "a dozen," which we leave with the intelligent reader to judge of their weight.

1. One, not very much engaged, says he has "no time to read it."

2. Another, not at all poor, says "it costs so much."

3. Another, feeling no pressure, says "the times are too hard."

4. Another, with plenty of cash, says "money is so scarce."

5. Another, a good church member, "prefers a political paper."

6. Another, a professing Christian, thinks "there are most too many religious matters in it."

7. Another, because it speaks "too much in favor of Temperance."

8. Another, because "it had a piece" that he "didnt like."

9. Another, because the Editor would not publish what he could not read.

10. Another, because the "compositor" made a few blunders, or turned some letters upside down.

11. Another, because the Editor "cropped" off some of the "long ears," in the communications forwarded to him for publication.

12. Another, because the Editor called on him for the pay of three or four years' standing.

13. Another, because the Editor, or his correspondents, told him the truth, through the columns of the press.

Such are some of the "Reasons" given for stopping the "paper;" but they are certainly very unreasonable reasons, for they look more like the shadows of excuses than the realities of truth; and it is to be hoped that no subscriber may ever be tempted to fly to them for refuge, when he feels disposed to say, "STOP MY PAPER!"

New Discovery in Philology.

A Pedo-Baptist writer in the Boston Recorder, has discovered that the Greek word Βαπτιζω, [Baptizo] may be rendered to immerse, to wash, to sprinkle, and to "keel haul!" Such impiety is only to be attributed to a studied ignorance of the Scriptures!

The Mails and the News.

An Agent writes us that he wishes we would mail their papers on Wednesday morning, &c. If he knew under what embarrassments we are placed in regard to the mails, we think he would not see much cause for complaint. Our Northern and Eastern Mails, which usually bring the city papers of Friday and Saturday preceding our publication, only reach us on the morning and evening of Tuesday. In the absence of these mails, we are left destitute of News, Congressional and Foreign, and nearly all of a Domestic character; so that we are under the embarrassing necessity of holding our paper from the Press until Wednesday morning, or sending it out destitute of News. Under such circumstances, our utmost exertions will be directed towards managing the business in the best possible manner, and we hope to give satisfaction to all concerned.

For the Register.

"The Mind wants something new."

It was noon, not a cloud obscured the fair face of Heaven. The sun shone upon the earth with all his meridian brightness. No poisonous breath was mingled with the atmosphere. The luxuriant fields diffused their odors, and presented a rich variety of colors, foretelling the coming harvest; indeed, beauty and sublimity were completely blended in a scene presented in a clear summer's day, when it would seem that the wildest imagination would not be wearied in gazing upon the surrounding prospect.

But the mind of man is so constituted that it is never satisfied, but in search of something new. For this purpose, I wandered through fields and gardens, gleaning from every thing I met something which I ardently, but vainly hoped would satiate my vacant wandering mind. I pursued my course until wearied, and sat down to rest, regretting that I was toiling without any recompense; for I could see nothing that gave me any emotion of pleasure.

After recovering from my fatigue, I began to look to ascertain whither I had fled. I found myself seated beneath the shade of a wide-spreading tree, which at once bore marks of familiarity, as it shielded me from the scorching rays of the sun. I saw at a little distance from me a thicket, curtained on one side by a beautiful grape vine. I gazed at it, until memory aided me in recognizing it, as being my most loved retreat in early childhood. I sprang upon my feet and hurried to the spot. I looked around with wild astonishment that so slight a change should have taken place during an absence of several years. The vine was still towering to the tops of the tallest trees, its delicate tendrils were yet coiling around the branches as if too weak to support themselves. The carpet was fresh and green as though it had never been exposed to a colder season. But where, thought I, where are those who were the happy sharers of my merriment, with whom I interchanged my thoughts, and paid my devotions to the God of nature in this secluded spot, in by-gone days? gone! A moment I indulged in sadness.

Finding no one to answer my inquiry, I turned to the records of mortality, but alas, what a picture! Most of those names were blotted out which made up the catalogue of my associates, whose images are still dear to me. My thoughts were vivid. Well, thought I, I will return, for who can find comfort here? As I was preparing to leave, the aged "son of the forest" broke the solemn silence; to his voice I listened with attention. Stranger, whither art thou come, and what is thy history? Where is the sad change of which thou art complaining, and for which thou art bedewing thy cheeks with tears? Not here, not here, but in the society of my loved ones. Astonishment seized his venerable form as he replied, dost thou think thyself IMMORTAL? Look at yonder grave-yard and read there thy DESTINY! I looked, and was speechless.

'Twas not a dream, 'twas not a fiction, only as fancy had conducted me thither.—There reposed the sleeping dust of a fond parent whose society I enjoyed but a little while, but even there my imagination could not be confined, but leaped to a far distant spot where she sleeps, who was the guardian of my youth and the pride of my life, (though unconscious of it then.) I scanned the history of the past, and on many of its consecrated pages I found sad memorials. Friend after friend had departed till I found myself floating upon the broad ocean of life, without a guide or protector, not knowing whither to flee, and why should I think myself immortal? I resolved to take instruction from this worthy friend who had introduced me to myself, and return satisfied, for I had formed a new acquaintance.

As I took my leave, he said, with his arms extended aloft, woo only that which thou mayest hope to win, on earth pleasure is sought in vain.

A CONTRIBUTOR.

For the Register.

The young Ladies and Gentlemen, friendly to the cause of Temperance, having assembled on the evening of Aug 2[illegible], for social recreation, at the Temperance Hall kept by A. C. Potter, at the State Bridge, Verona, and after the preliminaries were settled by passing around a glass of lemonade, the house was called to order by Justus H. Potter, when Thomas F. West was called to the Chair, and Wm. S. Potter, chosen Secretary. Whereupon Mr. H. H. Baker, of Jefferson, arose and made some very pertinent remarks relating to the cause of Temperance, and closed by offering the following resolution which was unanimously adopted:—

Resolved, That in our opinion we deem it the duty of Temperance men to patronize houses kept on Temperance principles, and any man who has taken the Total Abstinence Pledge, and prefers the house where intoxicating liquor is sold, is unworthy the name of a Temperance brother.

On motion of Robert T. Lawton,

Resolved, That a copy be forwarded to the S. D. B. Register, and to the Sackets Harbor Journal for publication.

THOMAS F. WEST, Ch'n.

WM. S. POTTER, Sec'y.

Congressional News.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

WASHINGTON, AUGUST 27, 1842.

The closing week of the session is always a busy and exciting scene; and, unless in the heat of a pending Presidential contest, where every thing but party is lost sight of, a large amount of previously matured business is commonly disposed of. It has been so, during the week past, as your readers may judge, from the number of important measures that have been passed upon.

Militia Claims.

Bills to pay the Florida Militia, the regiment of Louisiana Militia, and the four companies of Missouri Volunteers, for their services (?) in the Florida War, have become laws. The Florida War is at last ended, in good faith; simply because the Government has agreed to allow the few remaining Indians to remain unmolested in their retreats. And the bills are mostly paid, with the exception of the countless private claims for "losses" during the war, which will form a topic for rainy days, for fifty years to come, like "Amy Darden and her horse Romulus," in the past half century!

A bill to establish an United States District Court at Wheeling, Va., has also become a law.

The "Contingent" Bill, of one thousand particulars, has also become a law. Its scope I have before explained, so far as it can be done in a brief notice. It is one of the most comprehensive measures of reform ever adopted by Congress.

Post Offices and Roads.

The Annual Post Route and Office bill has also become a law. It establishes a large number of new offices [illegible], chiefly in the West and South. This is a measure of very great [illegible] labor is all done in the committee [illegible] and it attracts little attention except [illegible] the thousands who are immediately [illegible] fited by it.

Public Credit.

The Government has [illegible] wholly, in its an[illegible] authorized [illegible] sion. Unable to meet [illegible] which the treasury [illegible] partment last week [illegible] should be given to [illegible] issue of treasury [illegible] terday passed the H[illegible] authorizing [illegible] the extent of $[illegible] will [illegible]

The M[illegible]

The [illegible] day passed [illegible] President [illegible] sion. It was [illegible] cratic party, [illegible] are supposed [illegible] by a considerable [illegible] full House, I think it would [illegible] ed. Few measures have ever been considered by Congress more [illegible] lates to the relative powers of the State and National Governments, [illegible] preservation of the p[illegible] It is in utter contra[illegible] ed the "State Rights" [illegible] permanent effect on the character of our Government will be great.

Navy [illegible]

The bill to regulate the pay [illegible] of pursers in the navy [illegible] It cuts off a host of [illegible]

Another bill [illegible] mathematics [illegible] consolidate and amend [illegible] laws, have been passed. [illegible] resolution [illegible] test effect [illegible] Colt's submarine battery, [illegible] a vessel [illegible] 10 feet [illegible] Colt was [illegible]

The C[illegible]

It has passed the Senate [illegible] next Congress [illegible] al ticket system was [illegible] time to change [illegible] will probably pass the House [illegible] signed as a sort of compromise [illegible] for the general [illegible] system, which the party [illegible] House has [illegible] spirit [illegible] strugg[illegible]

The [illegible]

[illegible] year on [illegible]

The [illegible]

The [illegible] already [illegible] the [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] McKennan's [illegible] reduced [illegible] a square yard [illegible] es. [illegible] by a vote of [illegible] ayes to [illegible]—Mr. [illegible], of New-York, and [illegible] democrats, voting [illegible] Senators were absent, two of whom would have voted against the bill. The House will concur in the amendments [illegible] been made. It was a very severe struggle in the House. Twice the bill was [illegible] by a tie, or the Speaker's casting vote. It passed by a vote of [illegible]. Mr. Tyler can hardly do otherwise than approve it, though it is hardly safe to predict.

Conclusion.

I am not prepared to-day, to give an analysis of the legislation now about to close. Nearly [illegible] bills have passed, of which about a hundred are public acts, and many of them of the highest importance to the welfare of our country. The ordinary appropriation bills have been rendered more important than they have been for 20 years past, by the comprehensive reforms, and the great reductions in the military service of the country, introduced by, or connected with them.

The hand of judicious reform has been applied to almost every branch of the Administration, in reducing the public expenses, limiting the "discretion" of public officers, and regulating their responsibilities.

The encroachments of the Slave Power have been met with unexampled boldness, and resisted in the majority of instances; chiefly by the energies of a very few men, whose names and acts are familiar to your readers.

[illegible] has [illegible] triumphed; [illegible] private property has in a few instances [illegible] gratified by the force of pur[illegible] influence. But on the [illegible] of the Session has [illegible] Nearly [illegible] has been [illegible] so much [illegible] Congress is [illegible] of the people [illegible] and for the [illegible] May [illegible] and our [illegible] world with [illegible] Yours truly, [illegible]

News of the Day.

[illegible]

[illegible]—The Hon. [illegible] Congress [illegible] made affidavit before [illegible] that an Italian of [illegible] named Ozano de Atel[illegible] had published a gross, wil[illegible] libel against him, [illegible] a "Circular to the W[illegible] page of which was [illegible] McRoberts more [illegible] Honorable Mitchell" [illegible] pamphlet Mr. Mc[illegible] a warrant was [illegible] and he was arrested [illegible] by officer A. M. C. [illegible] The magistrate ordered him to [illegible] $10,000, which he gave;—Messrs. S[illegible] and [illegible], of No. 130 Broadway, [illegible] his bail to appear and answer.

Mr. Samuel Colt made an experiment with his terrible Explosive Engine at Washington, on Saturday, which is said to have been completely successful. A vessel prepared for the purpose was shivered to atoms at a distance of five miles. It was a repetition, on a larger scale, of the experiment he performed off the Battery on the 4th of July. The Intelligencer says that there was an immense concourse of spectators present, including the President, Heads of Departments, and Mayor of Washington. Mr. Colt was near Alexandria; a signal gun was fired at Washington, and in about twenty seconds thereafter a huge column of water rose suddenly into the air, and when it descended not a trace of the vessel was to be seen.

An Editor's Mail.—Mr. Wickliffe, Postmaster General, has directed separate mails to be made up at the Boston Post Office daily, (except Sundays,) to contain letters and newspapers for editors only, to be forwarded to New York and the South. This will greatly facilitate editors in getting their papers, the clerks in discharging their duties, and the public in getting their news. The plan should be extended in the mail arrangements between all the principal cities.

Battle with the Mormons.—The Madisonian, dated this (Monday) morning, contains the following paragraph.

The following note was written on the outside of a letter received on Saturday, at one of the public offices, from Chicago, Illinois. "A battle has been fought between the Mormons and Anti-Mormons. The extra says, thirty or forty were killed or wounded. The Governor has gone down with 200 men."

Sweating Gold.—The teller of the Northern Liberties Bank showed to us yesterday a five dollar piece, (half eagle,) which had been submitted to the sweating process, the loss upon which had been about twenty per cent. The appearance of the piece is slightly evened, having rather the look of having been cast than struck with a die. A slight roughness and indistinctness of the figures were observable. It will be well for those who take gold to be on the look out, as the hard times drives the rogues to strange expedients.—U. S. Gazette.

Rabbi Isaac Leeser is about to establish in Philadelphia a periodical, to be entitled "The Occident, and American Jewish Advocate."

By the recent census of Wiskonsan, it appears that the Territory has seven thousand three hundred and forty-one more male than female inhabitants.

Wm. S. Derrick, Esq., of the Diplomatic Bureau in the Department of State, will proceed immediately to England with the ratified Treaty, and is expected to bring back the formal ratification of it by the Queen of Great Britain. The Treaty will then be officially proclaimed and published.

The one day election law of New York goes into operation on the 8th of November. Town and Ward officers were required to meet on the first Tuesday in September, and proceed to apportion the towns and wards into districts of not more than 500 electors to each district.

Dr. Strauss, the celebrated German infidel author of the life of Jesus, has recently married an actress, Mlle. Schebert. All in character.

About 50,000 acres of land, (the property of bankrupts,) situated in different parts of the State of Maine, were sold at auction in Portland last week. It was a portion of the wreck of the speculations in 1834 and 1835.

The Madisonian announces the ratification by the Senate of the Treaty concluded at Buffalo last March by the Hon. Ambrose Spencer, in behalf of the United States. The Senecas cede about 70,000 acres of good land, and retain two reservations.

Mr. Colman, of the Genesee Farmer, says the largest tree that ever came under his observation, is an oak in the meadow of Mr. Wadsworth, in Geneseo, being full eight feet in diameter, standing out in its majesty as the contemporary of other generations, and the mute historian of departed centuries.

Returning Home.—Quite a number of emigrants are returning to Europe, being unable to obtain employment in this country. The ship Hottinger, which sailed from New York recently, carried back nearly 300.

Of the emigrants who arrived at New York, this year up to the 17th of May, it was ascertained that 10.000 emigrants had not one shilling each left on his arrival.

History.—We might be taught many useful lessons from history, were we disposed to learn from it. But the light which experience gives, is too often like a lantern on the stern of a boat, which shines only on the waves behind.

Canada.—We are informed that it is the intention of the government of Canada, with the approbation of the Queen's ministers in London, to grant an unqualified amnesty to all persons who were concerned in the recent frontier disturbances and insurrections, without any exceptions. This will be a proof of internal peace and quietness among the Canadians.

The Kings of the Earth.—It is said that a great meeting of the Kings and potentates will take place on the Rhine, in the autumn, and that the Emperor of Russia will be present.

Platt City, in Missouri, was, two years and a half since, a forest! It has now a hundred substantial dwellings, and fine public buildings.

New Cavern in Schoharie.—Another cavern has been recently discovered about 4 miles north of Schoharie, N. Y. It has been explored for 5 miles, and the end not yet reached. It is said that it will successfully compete with the celebrated cave discovered in Schoharie a few years since.

Hats off!! Make Room.—We understand that Dr. Palmer has resigned the editorial management of the Transcript, and that it will hereafter be conducted by Miss Walter, sister of the late Lynde M. Walter.—Boston Transcript.

From Nova Scotia.—The Boston Daily Advertiser has received the following intelligence by St. John's papers of the 24th inst.:

St. Stephens, N. S. Aug. 17.—Distressing and Fatal Accident.—It is our painful duty this week to record the most melancholy accident that has ever happened in this section of the country. On Wednesday morning last, as Mr. Haley Morrison was preparing to go out with his gun for pigeons, and in the act of rising from his chair with the fusee across his arm, it accidentally was discharged, and awful to relate, the whole contents, (a heavy charge of shot,) entered the breast of his wife, passing thro' the heart, and causing immediate death. Mrs. Mary Morrison was 22 years of age—daughter of Mr. Clarke Hanson, of Lincoln, Maine, and had been married about four years.

The Attempt of Col. Edwards to Escape Prison.—Towards the latter part of the week certain circumstances induced the the police authorities to suspect individuals as being concerned in aiding and abetting Col. Monroe Edwards' escape, and two of those, James L. Winfree and Samuel A. Suydam, were arrested by officer P. B. Walker, and after a full investigation into the circumstances, the former was held to bail to answer in the sum of $1,000, and the latter in $2,500. Others are said to have been particips in crimine with the above, but no further arrest has yet been made, but it is yet quite clear that Suydam and Winfree had a knowledge of what was passing.

Since writing the above we have seen an affidavit made by a young man named Napoleon Wooldridge, who was in the habit of conveying from his mother's refectory in Centre street to the cell of Col. Edwards, his meals. He states that he conveyed letters from Edwards to Suydam at Smith's Hotel in Park Row, and that in return Suydam gave him packages to be given to Edwards, and which contained various articles, brace bitts, &c; that he also got a key made for Edwards from a wax mould that he gave for a pattern. Edwards also through him corresponded with Winfree, the latter sending to Edwards an iron grapling which he delivered to him.—Edwards also gave him letters to Miss Phillips, directed to Philadelphia, and thus the matter rests for the present.

Important from Florida.—The following is an extract of a letter from Gen. Worth, dated Cedar Keys, Aug. 12:—

"I have now to report the thorough pacification of the Territory. Holacta Emathlachee (Bowlegs,) accompanied by two noted sub chiefs, representing the Southern Indians, met at Tampa on the 5th inst., and, in their behalf, gladly accepted the concession reported in my despatch on the 24th ultimo. Coming with me to this place, they proceeded in search of the Creeks and returned on the 10th with Getiarti, Tigertail, and others, representing those people.

"The former are to pass within the designated limits immediately; the latter as soon as they can be collected. Some have already crossed the Suwanne, and the whole will have done so in ten or twelve days. Many have already signified a wish to be sent to their friends in the West;—Tigertail particularly, is urgent to go immediately, but I have represented the importance to himself to take a respectable band with him."

The human skeleton which Mr. Stephens brought home as one of the trophies of his researches among the ruins of the ancient cities in Central America, he presented to Dr. Morton, President of the Academy of Natural Science in Philadelphia, and it was exhibited at the meeting of that Institution on Tuesday evening, 9th instant. It appears to have belonged to a man; the age at which he died was about 20; the bones are small, and some of them exhibit marks of disease. It is said that this skeleton was found in a situation that shews that it was placed there by the founders of these ancient temples—a circumstance of importance, when taken in connection with the fact, ascertained by Dr. Morton, that the skull is precisely similar to that of our aborigines.

Steamboat Explosion.—The steamboat North Bend on the 17th ult., while passing North Bend, Ohio, burst the connecting pipes of her boilers. Most of the passengers were on the upper decks, gazing at the mound where the remains of the illustrious Harrison repose, and to this may be attributed their escape. A number of the crew were scalded; the cook very badly. In his fright he jumped overboard, and was recovered with difficulty. Mrs. Harrison promptly despatched offers of any assistance in her power to the afflicted, which were gratefully received.

Rhode Island.—Gov. King recently despatched ex-Governor Arnold to New Hampshire, to demand the surrender of Dorr, who is known to be secreted in that State. Gov. Hubbard very courteously, but flatly refused to give the prisoner up, and intimated to the messenger his intention to send Gov. King his reasons. A letter franked by Gov. Hubbard was received last week in the Providence P. O., which was supposed to be the letter which Gov. King returned to his New Hampshire Excellency unopened and unread. These are dignified proceedings for such exalted functionaries.

Earthquake.—Capt. Meacom, of the bark Olof, arrived on Saturday from Canton, reports having experienced a severe shock of an earthquake on the 25th of May, in Lat. 07 13, Lon. 102 East. The vessel shook violently, and trembled as if the masts would fall out. They immediately threw the lead over the deep sea, but found no bottom, although they let out 120 fathoms line. So that it could have been no shoal.

Ten Days Later from Brazil.—Somewhat Important.—We have in our possession, the Jornal do Commercio, published at Rio de Janeiro, to the 10th ult., being ten days later than received by us a few days since. The insurgents at Tamandua had been defeated by 300 Imperial troops. Orders had been issued by the Government to put every rebel to the sword and burn the property.

After the rebels in Menas Gareas destroyed the bridge at Parahybuna, they entrenched themselves in a valley near by, where the Imperialists attacked and completely routed them. They fled precipitately, leaving behind them arms, money and provisions.

All the northern provinces were quiet at the last accounts. It appears by this intelligence, that the Empire of Brazil is far from being in a settled state, although to the latest dates the Imperalists had obtained all the advantages.

By our advices from Montevideo to the 17th June, we learn that a French ship from Bayonne, had been lost at Castihos on the 16th, and two hundred lives lost.—Herald.

The First White Settler.—The New-Bedford Gazette says that Thomas Macy was the first white person that settled on the Island of Nantucket, of whose history it relates the following incidents: In 1665, King Philip, the sachem of Mount Hope, went to Nantucket with his suite in pursuit of one of his tribe, who was guilty of the crime of sacrilege, inasmuch as he had taken the name of a deceased Sachem in vain. The name of the fugitive was Assassam and the impious act which he committed had aroused the indignation of the whole tribe. Philip and his retinue landed from their canoe, on the west end of the Island and traveled to the settlement on the east end, where the criminal had taken refuge. On his arrival there, Assassam fled to good old Thomas, implored his protection, and was concealed. Philip demanded him, and became so warlike that an assembly of the white inhabitants took place, when a treaty was entered into by the parties, one condition of which was, that Philip should have all the money on the island, if he would release Assassam. A collection took place, nineteen shillings were raised for Philip, and he returned to Mount Hope satisfied.

Prospects of Mormonism.—A missionary in Illinois remarks that "this farce (Mormonism) is manifestly drawing to a close." Great excitement exists in the community. If blood be shed, it need not excite surprise. "I presume Nauvoo is as perfect a sink of debauchery and every species of abomination as ever was Sodom or Nineveh."

Notices.

Traveling Agent.

Br. DANIEL BABCOCK, of Scott, is now engaged as a traveling agent for the Register. We request agents and all friends of the press, to aid him in extending our circulation, and in settling the accounts for the present and past volumes. He will visit first Oneida, Jefferson, Lewis, Otsego, and Madison counties.

NOTICE.

A Quarterly Conference of the Universalists will be held at the Union Meeting-house in this Village, on the 14th and 15th days of the present month, at which several distinguished ministers are expected to be present. Published by request of

Rev. Z. COOK.

De Ruyter, Sept. 5, 1842.

TEMPERANCE HOUSE.

Mr. Asa C. Potter has opened a Temperance House at the State Bridge, in Verona, where he will be ready at all times to wait on those who give him a call, in good style, and on reasonable terms.

PROPOSALS

For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead,) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

ALFRED ACADEMY, AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY.

W. C. Kenyon, Principal.
Miss Caroline B. Maxson, Preceptress.

LECTURERS.

On Phrenology and Physiology.—Drs J. R. HARTSHORN, and E. RIDER.

On School Teaching.—LUKE G. MAXSON.

On Chemistry and Geology.—W. C. KENYON.

Lectures on other subjects as occasion may require.

This Institution is pleasantly located, in the county of Allegany, thirteen miles South-East of Angelica, and six miles South of Almond. From its retired and quiet situation, it presents a favorable opportunity to parents to place their sons and daughters under a moral influence that will not be counteracted by those with whom they may associate.

The patronage which it has hitherto enjoyed, has been so liberal as to warrant very considerable expenditures in rendering it still more worthy of a more extended patronage; and it is hoped that it will, under its present organization, be [illegible] inferior to no similar Institution in Western New York.

The qualification of Common School Teachers will receive particular attention, so as to render them thorough and practical instructors of youth.

The Academic Year [illegible] three terms of fifteen weeks each: 1st, Commencing Wednesday 17th August; 2d, 7th December; 3d, 4th April, 1843.

Vacations.—At the expiration of the first and second Terms, one week each; at the expiration of the 3d Term, five weeks.

Tuition.—Varying with Instruction, from $3,50 to $4,75 per term.

Board.—From $1 to $1,25 depending on accommodations. Rooms in the Institution, furnished with Cook Stoves, can be had at a moderate expense.

SAMUEL RUSSELL, Esq., Presi.

Alfred, July, 1842.

MARRIED.

In West Edmeston, August 31, by the Rev. S. B. Crandall, Mr. SAMUEL WILLIAMS Jr. of Sangerfield, and Miss ELEANOR E. SHELDON, of the former place.

In Alfred, by Eld. J. R. Irish, ASA C. BURDICK, and TACY E., daughter of J. W. Greene.

In Alfred, by Eld. J. R. Irish, Mr. PAUL M. VINCENT, and Miss MARY ANN, [illegible] Dea. Amos Crandall.

DIED.

In Scott, on the 25th inst., Mr. JAMES K. [illegible]TON, aged 35. Mr. E. [illegible] subject to fits, [illegible] creek and drowned.

In Milton, Wiskonsan, [illegible] HORACE, son of John Stillman, aged 6 years.

Also, in Milton, on the 5th ultimo, NEWMAN S., son of Russel [illegible] Carpenter, aged [illegible] months.

In Scott, on the 31st ult., of [illegible], LUCINDA, wife of Clark Barber, [illegible]. Sister Barber [illegible] and united with the S. D. Baptist church [illegible], of which she remained a member [illegible]. She bore her last illness with Christian [illegible] and died in hope of a blessed immortality [illegible] this vale of tears.

In Alfred, July 16th, [illegible], CATHARINE MARIA, wife of Thomas [illegible], formerly of Berlin. Her death was peaceful [illegible] her faith in Jesus strong.

In Alfred, CATHARINE, [illegible]. She gave evidence that [illegible].

LIST OF LETTERS.

Joseph Goodrich, P. M., [illegible] Babcock, F. W. Leonard, P. M., [illegible] other column in regard to stopping papers [illegible] rearages are paid. We send you a bill of [illegible] debtedness.) E. C. Lyons, P. M., [illegible] H. Cochran, (we will write the gentleman in Rochester on the subject.) E. Maxson.

LIST OF RECEIPTS.

Of Rev. J. R. Irish, $8, cr. M. Stillman [illegible], R. Saunders, Charles Maxson, and Lester D. Lewis, each $2, vol. 3. of Joseph Goodrich, $5, cr. Oliver M. Crandall, $2, vol. 3. self $3.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Berkshire Hogs.

THE subscriber has a fine lot of Berkshire Hogs, which he offers for sale at prices to suit the times. Enquire of the subscriber for further particulars on Fabius East Hill.

ABNER WRIGHT.

Fabius, Aug. 23, 1842. [illegible]

LOTS OF HATS & CAPS on hand—Fashionable and Old Fashioned, Bell Crowned and Low Crowned; and, to crown all, and not be out of Fashion, Cash and most kinds of stuff received in payment, by HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

SILK! SILK!! SILK!!!

A BEAUTIFUL assortment of plain, figured and striped, just received and for sale very cheap at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

FLOUR, PROVISIONS, GROCERIES, and six hundred other things, for sale by 11tf

May 11. HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

NO IMPOSITION.

NO STATES PRISON WORK!

THOSE wishing to purchase BOOTS and SHOES of superior quality of custom work, will find just the place by calling at the sign of the MAMMOTH BOOT.

De Ruyter, May 20, 1842.

Christian Review.

A GOOD PROPOSITION.

THE importance of the Christian Review is admitted. It was commenced twelve years since in obedience to [illegible] and a spontaneous call from different parts of the [illegible] and in compliance with [illegible] through six successive volumes [illegible]

[illegible]

GOULD, KENDALL & LINCOLN [illegible]

What is Economy?

RANDOLPH & DUNHAM [illegible]

Economy is the road to Wealth.

JAMES [illegible]

[illegible]

BOOTS! BOOTS! SHOES! SHOES!!

AT the sign of the Mammoth Boot, manufactured invariably of leather tanned in "cold liquor." Please call.

AN IMPORTANT WORK.

[illegible] DICTIONARY OF Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

[illegible]

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings.

[illegible]

STOVES.

COLD WINTER IS COMING.

[illegible]

Fancy Parlor Stoves.

[illegible]

BRASS AND TIN WARE

LOW PRICES

[illegible]

Eave Troughs

JUST RECEIVED

JOB WORK

[illegible]

"Hard times and money scarce."

[illegible]

S. C. WALKER.

Notice.

[illegible] JAMES M. LETTS.

BOOK BINDING.

THE subscriber having connected a BINDERY with his printing establishment, is now ready to execute all kinds of Binding in a neat and durable manner, on as reasonable terms as at any other establishment in this section of country.

JAMES BAILEY.

De Ruyter, June 8th 1841.

POETRY.

From the Northern Light.

The Falling Star.

BY E. G. SQUIER.

What art thou, brilliant star?
From whence, to where, wing'st thou thy silent flight?
Why shoot'st thou o'er the bosom of the night?
Why gleams thy ray afar!

Art thou a spirit, sent
From Heaven's empyrean to the slumb'ring earth,
Like that which lingered at a Saviour's birth,
High in the firmament!

Art thou a ruby bright,
Dropt from the ringlets of an angel's hair,
And falling through earth's crystal air,
With thy celestial light!

Art thou an arrow, hurled
By the dread monarch of the yawning grave,
In mercy sent, to free the writhing slave,
The stricken of the world!

Or is thy errand, now,
To still the throbbings of a monarch's heart—
To blight the joy of youth; the loved to part;
Or chill the laurel'd brow!

Perchance thou art a ray
From off the alter of the living God;
A burning radiance to our lowly sod,
To light the perfect way!

Perchance, thou fleeting one,
Thine is the gleaming of that holy fire,
Which bids the spirit to its home aspire,
Its earthly sojourn done.

* * *

Whate'er thou art, thy ray,
Like hope's fair star, o'er life's dark pathway streams,
Like that, alas! but for a moment gleams,
And ever dies away!

Bright star! the dreamy spell
That bound my soul, as thou did'st swiftly pass,
Like a sweet dream o'er Fancy's fairy glass,
Is broken now; farewell!

Albany, July, 1842.

Miscellaneous Department.

THE WIFE OF THE INTEMPERATE.

BY MRS. SIGOURNEY.

Jane Harwood, with her husband and children, made one among the many families who removed to the unplanted, western wild. The change from the manner of life in which she had been brought up in New England was great. But she never complained, and busied herself with those duties which befit the wife of a lowly emigrant.

One of her principal cares was an invalid boy. The charge of his health and of his mind occupied her most anxious thoughts. She supplicated that the pencil which was to write upon his soul, and which seemed to be placed in her hand, might be guided from above. She spoke to him in the tenderest manner of his Father in heaven and of his will respecting little children.

She pointed out almighty goodness in the daily gifts that sustain life—in the glorious sun rejoicing in the east—in the gently-falling rain, the frail plants and the dews that nourish them. She reasoned with him of the changes of nature till he loved even the storm and lofty thunder because they came from God. She repeated to him passages of scripture, with which her memory was stored, and sang hymns until she perceived that if he was in pain he complained not if he might but hear her voice. She made him acquainted with the life of the compassionate Redeemer—how he took young children in his arms, though the disciples forbade them. And a voice from within urged her never to desist from cherishing that deep-rooted piety, because, like the flower of grass, he must soon pass away.

Jane Harwood had a different and a still deeper trial in the intemperance of her husband. In his fits of intoxication there was no form of persecution which distressed her so much as unkindness to the feeble and suffering boy. On such occasions it was in vain that she attempted to protect him. She might neither shelter him in her bosom nor control the frantic violence of the father. The timid boy, in terror of his natural protector, withered like a crushed flower. It was of no avail that neighbors remonstrated with the unfeeling parent or that hoary-headed men warned him of his sins. Intemperance had destroyed his respect for man and his fear of God.

The wasted and wild-eyed invalid shrank from the glance and footstep of his father as from the approach of a foe.—Harshness and the agitation of fear deepened a disease that might else have yielded. Returning spring brought no gladness to the declining child. Consumption laid its hand upon his vitals and his nights were restless and full of pain.

"Mother, I wish I could once more smell the violets that grew upon the bank by our old, dear home."

"It is too early for violets, my child; but the grass is growing bright and beautiful around us, and the birds sing sweetly, as if their little hearts were full of praise."

The mother knew that his hectic fever had been recently increasing, and saw that there was a strange brightness in his eye. Seating herself on his low bed she bowed her face to his to soothe and compose him.

"Mother, do you think my father will come?"

Dreading the alarm which, in his paroxysms of coughing, he evinced at his father's approach, she answered, "I think not, love; you had better try to sleep."

"Mother, I wish he would come. I am not afraid now. Perhaps he would let me lay my cheek to his once more as he used to do when I was a babe in my grandmother's arms. I should be glad to say a kind 'good by' to him before I go to my Savior."

Gazing earnestly in his face, she saw the work of the destroyer. "My son! my dear son! say 'Lord Jesus, receive my spirit."

"Mother," he replied, with a smile upon his ghastly features, "he is ready for me. I am willing to go to him. Hold the baby to me that I may kiss her once more. That is all. Now sing to me; and oh! wrap me closer in your arms, for I shiver with cold."

He clung, with the death grasp, to that bosom which had long been his sole earthly refuge. "Sing louder, a little louder, dearest mother, I cannot hear you."—Tremulous tones, like those of a broken harp, rose above her grief to comfort the dying child. One sigh of icy breath was upon her cheek, as she joined it to his, one shudder, and all was over.

She streched the body on the bed, and, kneeling beside it, hid her face in that grief which none but mothers feel. It was a deep and sacred solitude—alone with the dead. Only the soft breathings of the sleeping babe were heard.

Then the silence was broken by a piercing voice of supplication for strength to endure. The petition, which began in weakness, closed in faith. It became a prayer of thanksgiving to him who had released the dove-like spirit from its prison house of pain to share the bliss of angels.

She arose from her knees and bent calmly over the dead. The placid features wore the same smile as when he had spoken of Jesus. She smoothed the shining locks around the pure forehead, and gazed long on what was to her so beautiful. Amid her tears was an expression, chastened and sublime, as of one who gives a cherub back to God.

The father entered carelessly. She pointed to the pale immovable brow.—"See, he no longer suffers." He drew near and looked with surprise on the dead. A few natural tears forced their way and fell upon the face of the firstborn, who was once his pride. He even spoke tenderly to the emaciated mother, and she who a few moments before felt raised above the sway of grief wept like an infant as those few affectionate tones touched the sealed fountains of other years.

James Harwood returned from the funeral of the child in much mental distress.—His sins were brought to remembrance, and reflection was misery. Sleep was disturbed by visions of his neglected boy. In broken dreams he fancied that he heard him coughing from his low bed as he was wont to do. With a strange disposition of kindness, he felt constrained to go to him; but his limbs refused their office. Then a little, thin, dead hand would be thrust from the dark grave, and beckon him to follow to the unseen world.

While conscience thus haunted him with terrors, many prayers arose from pitying and pious hearts that he might now be led to repentance. There was, indeed, a change in his habits, and she who was above all others interested in his reformation, spared no effort to win him back to the path of virtue, and to soothe his accusing spirit into peace with itself and obedience to its God.

Yet she was doomed to witness the full force of the conflict of grief and remorse against intemperance only to see them suddenly overthrown. The reviving goodness, with whose promise she had so solaced herself as to give thanks that her beloved son had not died in vain, was transient as the morning dew. Habits of industry, which seemed to have been springing up, proved themseves to be without root.

The dead, and his cruelty to the dead, were alike forgotten. Disaffection to that tender trusting wife, who "against hope had believed in hope," resumed its habitual sway. The friends who had alternately reproved and encouraged him, felt that their efforts were of no avail. Intemperance, like the "strong man armed," took final possession of a soul that lifted no prayer for aid to the Holy Spirit, and ceased to stir itself up to struggle with the destroyer.

To lay waste the comforts of his wife, seemed now the principal object of this man. Day after day did she witness for herself and for her household, the fearful changes of his causeless anger and brutal tyranny. She felt the utter necessity of deriving consolation and the power of enduring wholly from above.

She was faithful in the discharge of the difficult duties that devolved upon her, and especially careful not to irritate him by reproaches or a gloomy countenance. Yet she could not sometimes prevent from rising mournfully to her view her sweet native village—the peaceful home and fond friends of her childhood so far away—and the constant endearing attentions which won her early love for one whose ill treatment now strewed her path with thorns.

In this new and solitary settlement she had no relative to protect her from his insolence; she felt that she was completely in his power—that it was a power without generosity—and that no tyranny is so entire and terrible as that of an alienated and intemperate husband.

Still, looking to her Father in heaven, she found her courage revive and deepen into a child-like confidence. After putting her children to bed, as she sat alone, evening after evening, while the joys of early days, and sorrows of maturity, passed in review before her, she questioned her heart what had been her gain from heaven's discipline, and whether she was to sustain that greatest of all losses, the loss of the spiritual benefit intended by affliction.

The absence of her husband grew more frequent and protracted. Once during the third night of his departure, she knew not where, she lay sleepless, listening for his footsteps. Sometimes she fancied she heard his shouts of wild laughter, but it was only the shriek of the tempest. Then she thought she heard the sounds of his frenzied anger ring in her ears. It was the roar of the hoarse wind through the forest

All night long she listened to these tumults, and hushed and sang to her affrighted babe. Early in the morning, her eye was attracted by a group coming slowly from the river which ran near her dwelling. A terrible foreboding came upon her. She thought they bore a corpse. It was, indeed the corpse of her husband. He had been drowned, as it was supposed, during the darkness of the preceding night, while attempting to cross a bridge of logs, which had been broken by the swollen waters.

Utter prostration of spirit came over the desolate mourner. Her energies were broken, and her heart withered. She had sustained the hardships of emigration and the privations of poverty, the burdens of unceasing toil and unrequited care, without murmuring. She had laid her first born in the grave with resignation, for faith had heard the Redeemer saying, "Suffer little children to come unto me."

She had seen him, in whom her heart's young affections were garnered up, become a prey to vice the most disgusting and destructive. Yet she had borne up under all. One hope had lingered with her as "an anchor of the soul," the hope that he might repent and be reclaimed.—But now he had died in his sin. The deadly leprosy which had stolen over his heart, could no more be "purged with the sacrifice or offering forever.

She knew not that a single prayer for mercy had preceded the soul on its passage to the judge's bar. There were bitter dregs in this cup of wo, which she had never before tasted. With the heaviness of an unspoken and peculiar nature, was the victim of intemperance borne from the house that he had troubled, and buried by the side of his son, to whose tender years he had been an unnatural enemy.—Among those who surrounded his grave, there was sorrow, bearing the features of that fearful "sorrow which is without hope."

SLEEPING IN CHURCH.

We copy the following article, thinking that it may possess some value to Seventh-day Baptists, especially to those who have the charge of our houses of worship; for it is no doubt true that there are those in our congregations who are very unfortunate in this particular. Houses well ventilated and cleared of a long pent up surplus of nitrogen and carbon, may do much for the relief of the numerous class of "sleepy-heads" who throng our churches on the Sabbath.—Ed. S. D. B. Reg.

From the Boston Register and Observer.

CHURCH SLEEPINESS----ITS CAUSE AND CURE.

I perceive that a writer in the last Register complains sadly of the appearance of people in many of our churches on the Sabbath. Some are listless, some stupid, and some fast asleep. For myself I do not wonder that the congregation feel like sleep, and the preacher like despair, within the walls of not a few houses of public worship. The truth is, people are complained of for doing what they can scarcely help, any more than a mouse can help dying within an exhausted receiver. Can we expect the brain will do its duty, when we let nothing but venus blood, as lifeless as poppy juice, go up there to keep the nerve-strings in action? Just consider the condition of the majority of our churches on the Sabbath.—Soon after the congregation have left for the day, the house is shut up, and there is shut up in it the atmosphere which has been bereft of a large portion of its vitality by the many lungs that have been sucking it out for hours. These deoxygenated, unhealthy remains, continue growing more corrupt till the next Sabbath morning, two hours—and more generally, it is probably, one hour—before the assemblage of the worshipers.—If proof is wanting, just go within the doors at the first opening and see, or rather smell and feel. Is the element of life now let in from the great, pure temple of nature, thro' all possible avenues? By no means. The doors are set open, it may be—and possibly a window or two, if the sexton thinks of it, but in a majority of cases he does not, for the specific and absolute duty of "opening and ringing" appertains not to these last—Well, is this scanty income through the door-way sufficient to dislodge this week-old poison? Week-old? Months-old I might say. The congregation walk into this nauseous immobility of gas from the midst of heaven's wholesomeness without. They are tolerably awake or only beginning to go to sleep, during the getting up and sitting down of the earlier exercises.—But when the hearers have fairly settled down into the steady composure of sermon time, then alack! although the poor souls want the preaching, yet the poor brains which envelope them want blood and oxygen to give these same souls strength to take hold of the preaching that keeps lodging at the tympanum of the ear. "If I should die I can't keep awake," saith the spirit. "Die you must then," groan lungs, arteries and nerves faintingly, "for we can't help you; all that eloquence has no oxygen in it." So the spirit, nolens volens, [illegible] into sleepy oblivion, or just makes out to keep a half a thought above it. Thus it is, until the close of the discourse the more sleep resisting constitutions, startle the less fortunate, to downright, or rather upright consciousness by rising for the next exercise. In the ancient era of doubly and even trebly long discourses, there was a wisdom in slamming the seats up against the pew side in rising, though we never thought of it before. The sounding jar stirred the stagnant, stupefying atmosphere, and shivered and shook the little vitality remaining, into the reach of gasping respiration. In the hundred and fifty or half a thousand thunders too, there was a noisy grandeur that lifted the soul up with the body, and drove the drowsiness away.

The noon has come, and the church is cleared of the assemblage; but are any means now taken to clear it of the bad and still worse air? Worse we say, for the breathings of the morning cannot but have made it so, or would have made it, had not a few windows been opened by those sitting near them. Then, the afternoon exercises are laboriously hard, hopelessly languished thro', or hopelessly slept thro', like those of the forenoon. At length the congregation are dismissed, and the dead air is quickly boxed up and kept in good deadening order for the next time that good Christian folks go through and out of the pure breath of nature to be edified, or rather dulled.

There is another life-killing circumstance which should not be forgotten. Every adult in ordinary health exhales through the skin in twenty-four hours at least a pound and a quarter of worn out disorganized and decaying matter. Now take the three hours that a numerous congregation continue in church, and how must they impregnate the atmosphere with this? It is invisible to be sure, yet none the less existing. It is absolute putrefaction. This is boxed up with the rest and is [illegible] in proportion to its seven day's continuance.

As for ourselves, we will not complain of our neighbors for drowsiness, until we stir them up to call a society meeting, and there in "Resolve, that the atmosphere was made to breathe, and forty miles above every pair of lungs that they might have enough of it, and that it is absolute folly if not wickedness to try to live in so much nitrogen and carbon, when there is such a mighty sea of oxygen all round the globe." Let them put these philosophical "resolutions" into practice, and then we will see what preaching can do. Can we wonder at the power and success of Wesleyanism, at field preaching, with the great exuberant angel of health there to help it?

Saturday [Friday] is not too soon to begin to ventilate a church in the warm season of the year, especially if the few preceding days have been very damp and thereby kept the elastic air from stealing into the building, or the unelastic from oozing out of it. At any rate, let the earliest morning of the day peep in at the lifted windows and the earliest breezes sweep out the temple.—Then all the sweet influences of the Sabbath will have entrance to help the sacred service. We wish now that every religious newspaper in the country would set up the shout of air! air! and that every other paper would give at least one strong echo to the cry—air! air! Help us, gracious editors. If we must some day die for the lack of breath, do not let us go to sleep and lose a fair Sabbath reputation and our sermonless souls besides, for the want of it.

A GASPER.

PRINTERS.

There seems a natural affinity between printing and learning. Most of the early printers were men of great erudition and acknowledged abilities, the lights of the age in which they lived, and who, through the medium of their presses, did much to scatter the darkness of the middle ages in Europe. Erhard, Bodolt, of Augsburg. Uldrick Han. of Rome, Vandelin de Spira and Adus Mauritius, of Venice, Gering, of Paris, Anthony Koburger, of Newremburg, Ulric Tel, of Cologne, Tarotus, of Milan, Caxton, in England, with many others, were eminent as men of learning, the associates of the great, respected and honored by kings and princes.

The Stephens, Robert and Henry, were two of the most distinguished printers and scholars of the sixteenth century. Their services in the cause of classic literature can not be overrated; they were giants in learning.

Many instances might be cited corroborative of the fact, that there is an intimate connection between printing and knowledge, and that printers have frequently been celebrated as authors, and have risen from the manual labor of the press, to the most elevated rank in society.—Bayle mentions a printer who printed a book from his head, setting up the types as fast as he composed his sentences without the intervention of manuscript, or committing his thoughts to paper.

Sir Wm. Blackstone, the eminent jurist and commentator on English laws, was a printer by trade. Franklin was brought up to the same art; and George III., king of England, was so pleased with it, that he learned the trade, and frequently set up types after he ascended the throne.

In the United States, the memory of almost every man who has moved much in society, will furnish him instances in which practical printers have risen to great eminence, in the church, at the bar, in the halls of legislation, and in the cabinet of the executive.

The art of printing is indeed a noble art, and every little type or letter which the compositor arranges, seems like a ray of knowledge sent out to dissipate ignorance. So, by reflex influence, they enlighten his own mind, inspire a thirst for learning, while at the same time they furnish the only living waters that can satisfy his desires.—Savannah Georgian.

Eloquence of Bridaine.—"Many persons still remember his sermon on Eternity, and the terror which he diffused thro'-out the congregation. Whilst blending, as was usual with him, quaint comparisons with sublime transports, he exclaimed:—'What foundation, my brethren, have you for supposing your dying day at such a distance? Is it your youth? Yes, (you answer,) I am as yet but twenty, but thirty! Sirs, it is not you who are twenty, or thirty years old, it is death which has advanced twenty or thirty years towards you. Observe, eternity approaches. Do you know what this eternity is? It is a pendulum whose vibration says continually—always—ever—ever—ever—always—always! In the meanwhile, a reprobate cries out, 'What o'clock is it?' And the same voice answers—'Eternity!'"—Northern Light.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Not 25 or 50 per cent Reward.

S. G. WALKER

HAS received his NEW Goods, [illegible]

[illegible]

S. S. HASKELL, [illegible] New York.

New York, June 1, 1842.

 All editors who will give the above [illegible] teen insertions, [illegible] them to the New York [illegible] entitled to one copy of the work.

JOB PRINTING.

BOOKS, Pamphlets, Way, Hand-Bills, Cards, Bills, &c. &c., neatly executed at this office.

L. W BLISS' Window Sash
L. Bliss' & Co. " Blinds.

Holme's Sampson & Salisbury Edged Tools consisting of Broad Axes, Hand Axes, Adzes and Chisels, at Factory prices by J. N. ELMORE,
October 4. Manufacturers' Agent

"A nimble sixpence is better than a slow shilling."

SPRING GOODS! SPRING GOODS!

CHEAP! CHEAP!! CHEAP!!!

THE undersigned are receiving a large assortment of goods suitable for the spring and summer trade, and invite their friends and the public generally to call and examine them at the one price store. SUTTON & QUINBY.

How to make money,

IS the study of mankind and of the Yankee Nation [illegible]. The easiest and most practical [illegible] accomplishing the desired end in [illegible] "Save Money," which can be [illegible] NEW GOODS, instead of the [illegible] of many shops and many [illegible] ELMORE'S [illegible] NEW GOODS is nearly equal to [illegible] this village and who is daily [illegible] "Fortune's Favorites."

Of Drugs and Medicines.

T[illegible] much larger stock and [illegible] those who advertise

J. N. ELMORE

[illegible] Hats [illegible] STONE STORE

[illegible] ESTABLISHMENT [illegible]

[illegible] WALKER

[illegible] Mortgages, &c. [illegible]

500 [illegible] STONE STORE

AGENTS FOR THE REGISTER

[illegible]

NEW JERSEY.

PENNSYLVANIA.

[illegible]

WISKONSAN.

IOWA.

ILLINOIS.

The Seventh-day Baptist Register
IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY,
AT DE RUYTER, MADISON CO., N.Y.,
BY
JAMES BAILEY.

TERMS.—To village subscribers who have the paper left at their doors, $2 25, in advance, or $2 50, at the expiration of the year.

☞ To office and mail subscribers, $2 in ADVANCE.

Each communication, involving facts and intended for insertion in the paper, must be accompanied by a responsible name.

No subscription received for a less term than six months.

☞ All subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, will be considered as wishing to continue their subscription, and their paper will be sent to them accordingly. No paper will be discontinued till all arrearages are paid except at the discretion of the publisher.

☞ Advertisements inserted on the most reasonable terms.

☞ All letters and communications to ensure attention should be addressed to the publisher free of postage.

Lester T. Rogers

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.

VOL. III.—NO 29.] JAMES BAILEY, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.—A. H. BURDICK, PRINTER. [WHOLE NO. 13[illegible]

Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,—The SEVENTH DAY is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.—COMMANDMENT —If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments.—[illegible]

TWO DOLLARS IN ADVANCE.] DE RUYTER, N. Y., FOURTH-DAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1842. PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Religious Department.

From the Protestant and Herald.

REFORM AMONG THE JEWS IN LONDON.

Although the Jews, as a body, are believers in the divine authority of the Mishna and Talmud, yet they are by no means agreed as to the authority and inspiration of many parts of these productions. Whilst those on the European Continent have "endless definitions and discussions about the degree of authority which the Talmud possesses, and the extent to which it ought to be considered as binding," the venerable rabbies of London maintain boldly and firmly, with a consistency that does them honor, the authority of the oral law. And the British Jews, with equal frankness and decision, reject its authority altogether—not making any distinction between the the doctrinal and historical parts of the system; not maintaining its authority as an inspired commentary of the Bible; and rejecting it when it treats of matters not maintained in the O. T., but confining themselves simply and strictly to that which God has been graciously pleased to reveal to mankind through "Moses and the Prophets." This last, you are aware, is a recent movement among the Jews of London, the importance of which it is impossible to estimate. A number of Jews, chiefly of Portuguese extraction, became convinced, by some means, of many improprieties in their mode of worship, and of the necessity of a thorough reform. Having made known their views and wishes to the body of their brethren, without, however, securing that countenance and support for which they had hoped, they determined, as a last resort, to secede and form themselves into a separate congregation, and build a new Synagogue. They disclaim all intention to produce schism, or to excite ill feelings between the different communities of the Jews, as they were charged by the members of the "Parent Synagogue." Their views of the Oral Law, and the necessity of improvements upon the old Synagogue worship may be gathered from the following extracts from a sermon preached at the opening of their new Synagogue, Jan. 27, 1842, by Rev. Mr. Marks, minister of their congregation, and editor of their Prayer-Book; and from a letter written by them to the "Gentlemen and Elders of the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue," the body from which they seceded:

"Let it not be supposed, that it is the intention of myself or of any member of this congregation, to vilify, in any way, the character of the traditional records. On the contrary, we recognize in them a valuable aid for the elucidation of many passages in Scripture; we feel proud of them, as a monument of the zeal and mental activity of our ancestors; we hold it our duty to reverence the saying of men who, we are convinced, would have sacrificed their lives for the maintenance of that law which God vouchsafed to deliver unto us; but we must (as our conviction urges us,) solemnly deny, that a belief in the divinity of those traditions written in the Mishna, and Jerusalem and Babylonian Talmuds, is of equal obligation to the Israelite with the faith in the divinity of the law of Moses. We know that these books are human compositions; and though we are content to accept with reverence from our post-biblical ancestors, advice and instruction, we cannot unconditionally accept their laws. For Israelites there is but one immutable law—the sacred volume of the Scriptures, commanded by God to be written down for the unerring guidance of his people until the end of time."

The spirit with which this remarkable reformation was undertaken, and the necessity for it, may be observed in the following remarks from the same source:

"We are happily emerging from the darkness into which persecutions of unparalleled intensity and duration had banished us. Our domestic, social and political life is assuming a brightness, which, we feel assured, will continue to become even more cheering. Shall then, my brethren, the life of the Synagogue alone remain darkened by the shadows of a sad, sad time? Is that most cherished part of our edifice to continue hung with the drapery of the deepest mourning and despair, whilst every other part on which our eyes dwell is decked with colors of the brightest hue? Too long has this evil endured; too long have we lamented the alarming progress of withering indifferentism, sapping the very foundations of our faith. We could no longer remain inactive; but resolved to merge every consideration of labor, time, difficulty, and even opprobrium, in the absolute necessity of establishing this temple of prayer. Who can reflect on the older days, and not arrive at the painful conviction of the degeneracy of our modern houses of prayer; where we find the men's synagogue but partially attended, and the women's gallery almost solitary, the pulpit mute, and religious instruction totally exiled? In endeavoring to trace the causes which have produced this painful contrast, we shall not discover them in the insufficiency of our holy religion, for that is eternal and immutable as its Almighty Founder; but in the abuses engendered by ages of darkness, superstition and intolerance. Eastern customs, totally at variance with the habits and dispositions of an enlightened people, have been associated with our religious practices.—Woman, created by God as a "help-meet for man," and every way his equal; woman, endowed by the same parental care as man, with wondrous perceptions, that she might participate in the full discharge of every moral and religious obligation, has been degraded below her proper station.—The power of exercising those exalted virtues which appertain to her sex, has been withheld from her; and since equality has been denied to her in other things, as a natural consequence, it has not been permitted to her in the duties and delights of religion. Another serious evil may be discovered in the extreme length of the prayers, and in the blending with them heterogeneous opinions and metaphysical disquisitions, that can have no affinity with prayer."

Some of the regulations of this new Synagogue are the following. The entire congregation, men, women and children, are to assemble prior to the commencement of prayer, on Sabbaths and holy days, at half-past nine in summer and at ten in winter. The prayers will be read aloud by the minister only; appropriate psalms and hymns will be chanted by the choir, and responses made by the congregation. Prayer will be offered in the Hebrew language only, and in order that every member may perfectly understand the supplications made, it is urged upon all as a solemn duty to cultivate a knowledge of the sacred language. The service, including the reading of the portions of Scripture, singing, and a religious discourse, which is to be in English, principally for the benefit of the young, will not exceed two hours and a half, except on the Day of Atonement. Children of both sexes, having been properly instructed in the principles of the Jewish faith, will be publicly confirmed at the age of thirteen. The holy festivals will be celebrated only on those days commanded in the law of Moses; and the days commemorative of the great events in Jewish history will also be observed. Offering are to be made on the occasion of the three great festivals, and will be confined to two essential objects—the relief of the poor and the support of the establishment. The Hebrew is to be pronounced after the Portuguese manner, though the members of the new Synagogue are not exclusively of this extraction. One of the objects contemplated by them is to do away with that useless and hurtful distinction which exists between Portuguese Jews, and German Jews, "who, in fact, are neither Portuguese nor German, but natives, and in many instances descendants of natives of the British empire"—hence they call their synagogue, "The West London Synagogue of British Jews." They remark to the members of the old body.—"We are firmly convinced that the effect of these improvements will be to arrest and prevent secession from Judaism, an overwhelming evil, which has at various times spread so widely among many of the most respectable families of our community—to inspire a deeper interest and stronger feelings towards our holy religion, and to restrain the youth of both sexes from wavering in their faith, in contemplating for a moment the fearful step of forsaking their religion, so that no "Israelite born" may cease to exclaim, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God, the Lord is one!" In conclusion, we earnestly implore Almighty God, who searcheth the inward workings of the heart, to shed his blessing upon every member of the house of Israel, and so to implant his Spirit amongst us, that love, charity, and kindness may ever distinguish the conduct of one Israelite to another.—May he cause us ever to bear in mind that we are all sprung from one stock, that we embrace one faith, acknowledge one law, one God, one common Parent. To all who may doubt the purity of the intentions that have led us to open our Synagogue, we are content to reply in the words of Scripture, 'The God of gods, the Eternal, he knoweth, and Israel shall know, if in rebellion, or if in transgression against the Lord, may we not be saved this day.' Josh. xxii 22."

From the Christian Watchman.

SEALING WITH THE HOLY SPIRIT.

From the general tenor of the Holy Scriptures, it is evident that God has revealed himself to the world in the threefold character of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, whom we are required to worship as the only living and true God. The same allusion to this mysterious, unexplained Name, is made in the commission which Jesus gave to his first ministers, commanding them to go into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature, baptizing believers in the Name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. In the language of an enlightened scribe, who conversed with our Lord, there is but one God, and to love him with all the heart, and with all the soul, and with all the understanding, and to love our neighbor as ourself, is more than all whole burnt offerings and sacrifices.

God is a Spirit, and all who worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth. A special work of the Holy Spirit which we now consider, is that by which he is declared to seal his servants. Paul to the Ephesians says, "After that ye believed, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession." The allusion here made is to the custom of sealing legal instruments, or official documents of governments, which have the appropriate seal affixed to them. The seal ratifies its legal authority and gives it a regular currency. The sealing by the Holy Spirit communicates to the individual sealed the moral likeness of the Spirit, and is said to be impressed on those who believe. This peculiar blessing conferred on the true believer distinguishes him as destined for eternal salvation, and gives him the animating hope of blessedness in the future life. The peculiar language of the Scripture, sealed with the Holy Spirit, presents the idea that the holy nature of the Spirit is communicated by the sealing, and gives the character of the change which is produced in the heart by regeneration and progressive sanctification, evidencing a growth in grace. It is said to be an earnest of the Christian's inheritance, on which he will enter when released from the body of sin and death.

This view of the high privilege of being sealed with the Holy Spirit, gives to the religion of Christ a dignity unequalled by any thing known among mortals. It is a favor imparted to a sinner, communicating to his heart a prefibation of the blessedness of heaven. It transforms all his conceptions of the things of this present world, convincing him at once of the insufficiency of all those pursuits of happiness which most generally interest mankind. The Bible directs the prospects of the spiritual man beyond the limits of the visible creation. Its promises elevate his thoughts to the inestimable blessing of the favor of God, and to an interest in the redemption of his Son, that redemption which was effected by his atoning sacrifice on the cross, and which is assured to the believer by his intercession in Heaven.

In the entire process by which God saves men from the effects of sin, delivering them from its guilt and power, we see his wonderful condescension, which is a peculiar glory of his character. With men, condescension is considered degrading; not so with God. Whilst he knows the proud afar off, the humble is his delight. We observe this in all the conduct of the Savior while on earth. Who were they on whom he conferred the tokens of his love? His apostles were chosen from the fishermen of Galilee, whom he sent forth to preach his Gospel. He gave them no promises of high distinction among men, but candidly assured them that the rich and great would treat them with sovereign contempt. But while he gave them this assurance, he informed them that the discharge of their duty would be rewarded with immortal glory. The like great and precious promises are now made to forego the sinful delights of the world, and to centre their prospects of happiness in the service and love of God.

Thus is it seen that the faith of God's elect is an operating principle, in perfect contrariety to all the pursuits in which wicked men place their happiness. These pursue honor, wealth and pleasure as the chief good, renouncing a desire for the approbation of God, casting contempt upon all the blessings which he promises to the obedient subjects of his grace. Is there any thing plainer than the inference, that as the two characters are so diverse in the present state, there must be an endless diversity in their condition in the world to which they are tending?

The sealing of the Holy Spirit is better understood by its effects than by any attempt at accurate delineation. It gives to the person sealed a well-grounded assurance of an interest in the favor of God, attended by a clear and distinct apprehension of the excellence of divine things.—It is said to take place after believing. The original exercises of the young Christian are variable, from different causes, and it may be a considerable time before he will attain that stability which is produced by the sealing of which we speak. The faithful discharge of the believer's duty and the growth of his spirituality, will be his best evidence that he is sealed to the day of redemption. As he proceeds in the Christian course, his mind will be more clearly enlightened on all the subjects presented in the Gospel. He will better apprehend the glory of the Divine perfections, and the wisdom displayed in the method of salvation through the mediation and atonement of the Son of God. The character of Christ as a prophet to instruct him, as the high priest to atone for his sins, and as his intercessor in heaven, will be increasingly precious to his soul. His thoughts and affections will be absorbed in the contemplation of heavenly things, and he will know that to be spiritually minded is life and peace.

If so invaluable a blessing as being sealed with the Holy Spirit can be communicated to a sinner, with what earnestness should it be sought! An apostle has admonished believers thus: "Grieve not the Holy Spirit, whereby ye are sealed to the day of redemption. Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamor, and evil speaking, be put away from you, with all malice;" as if he had said, these are the things which grieve the Holy Spirit; "and be kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake has forgiven you." Beloved in the Lord, as ye would participate in the happiness of the glorified in heaven, obediently listen to the kind admonition.

Some seek to accomplish their purposes by flattery, lying, and deception. The devil does the same—such, therefore, are but the servile copyists of satan.—Cab. and Visiter.

Some affect to be what they are not, to accomplish what they would. The devil often transforms himself into an angel of light.—Ib.

From the Boston Recorder.

ARE YOU A BACKSLIDER?

Then let me beseech you, dear reader, not to pass over this article as you read its title. It is for you that I write, and your attention I beg for a few moments. You are a backslider—from what? From God! from heaven! from holiness! Like Demas, you love this present world so well that you cannot prepare for a better. Like Hymeneas and Alexander, you have lost your first love, and, perhaps, like them, denied the faith. O, it is sad, indeed, to the Christian at least, that you are in such a state. We remember, beloved friends, the tearful eye, the anxious inquiry, the heaving emotion, when you felt the burden of sin, and, with us, sought forgiveness. Nor have we forgotten the heavenly smile, the grateful thanks, the tear of joy, the rapturous love which caused us to rejoice with you, with joy unspeakable, when you first hoped you had obtained the long-sought pardon. Then, we met together at the prayer-meeting, and sat together in the sanctuary. Then we came out before the world, and boldly acknowledged our God and our Savior. Yes, and then we gathered around the table of our Lord, and with sweet, unearthly fellowship and joy, our hearts flowed together in affection, as we thought of that redeeming love which invited us thither.

> "Before our Father's throne
> We poured our ardent prayers;
> Our fears, our hopes, our aims were one,
> Our comforts and our cares."

No, wandering, erring brother, we have not forgotten those scenes. They are among the sweetest ones which memory brings back to our view—and we love often to linger among them.

But, alas, where now are those happy days? Gone—forever gone! For ever, did I say? Nay, we hope it is not so, for we are unwilling to give you up. Yes, we do hope to see them renewed. But at present their recollection can only increase our sorrow, when we compare the present with the past. A giant, but tottering oak, with faded leaf and withering branches, can awaken no pleasant feeling in our mind.—But if we remember the day when that decaying, trembling pillar of the forest stood erect in majesty and beauty, and shaded us with its deep green leaves and thick branches, then is our melancholy tinged with a far deeper [illegible] to behold a barren desert, where no flower blossoms, no green leaf appears. But how is our sadness increased, if memory brings before us the image of the past, when that desert was a delightful garden, fair, refreshing to behold. So, beloved friends, when we think of you as the anxious inquirer and promising convert, and are now compelled to look upon you as "an oak whose leaf fadeth, and as a garden that hath no water"—our heads are indeed bowed in sorrow. And well may we weep, for the "crown is fallen from your head," and "the silver is become dross." We [illegible] that the thoughtless and vicious crowd [illegible] the path that leads to heaven. But O, this sorrow is small, compared with that which we feel when we see those we love, those who appeared to set out in the heavenly way, and whom we hoped would be our fellow pilgrims in the upward path, turning their backs to us, the voice of praise and prayer dying from their lips, and the celestial spark on the altar of their hearts apparently expiring. Say, wanderer, is not this enough to touch an angel's heart with sorrow, could sorrow enter heaven? Think not that we have forgotten you, or cease to care for you.

You are a backslider! Sad, humbling confession! O, that you could honestly deny the charge! But, alas, in your own eyes, and in the eyes of God and your fellow men, you are a recreant soldier, a deserter from the Lord's hosts. [illegible] sinner, will you remain so? Do you think you have wandered too far, and too long, to come to the resolution, "I will arise and go to my father?" Think you he will not accept your confession, and restore you his salvation? O, do not limit his mercy, while he is so ready to bless you. Others, whose wanderings have been stained with greater guilt, perhaps, than yours, have returned to their Savior, and been welcomed with joy. One instance only I will relate. Several years ago, in a neighboring state, there lived a man who appeared to be a very devoted and sincere Christian. He was always an active Christian, and had charge of a Sabbath school, though obliged to walk several miles each Sabbath to perform his duty. At length he removed to a town in this State, where he quickly declined in his religious life, and formed the habit of intemperance. He threw away his hope, became a bar-keeper, and plunged into the common vice of Sabbath-breaking, disregard for religion, &c. By christians, he was considered as in a hopeless state, and no one thought of reclaiming him. The parable of the prodigal son sounded in his ear, and it moved him to make one effort to extricate himself from his dreadful condition. He made that effort. He was successful. And, if you can imagine the surprise of those Christians who had given him up, when they heard from his own lips, that he was a backslider—that he was once a professor of religion! And also imagine, if you can, his own joy and peace, when he publicly acknowledged that Savior whose name he once bore, but whom he had dishonored, yea, disowned.

ment. Let me entreat you [illegible]

[illegible]

Children's Department.

[illegible]

He who is rich in Christ [illegible]

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, September 14, 1842.

Notes by the Way.

PUBLIC HOUSES—CHERRY-VALLEY.—Whoa! "WASHINGTONIAN HOUSE."—It is time to feed, so we wheeled up, and after providing for our horse, with high anticipations of good cheer, we entered the "house," and having no one to guide us to the "sitting-room," we walked into the "bar-room." Being seated, we cast a glance around on its paraphernalia. The Stove first attracted our attention. It was a large Franklin Stove, and was used as a receptacle for divers sorts of Tobacco, worked into undescribed and indescribable masses, half-burned, half-masticated, half-liquid, and half-solid, most loathsome to the sight and offensive to our olfactories. Next the "Bar" met our eyes. This, from all appearances, had seen better days, and hard service. But we will not describe it. Its furniture consisted of about thirty bottles of ——, (but we did not examine their contents,) we cannot say what, three or four segar boxes, four tumblers, three lemons, two lamps, and a small bit of "ginger bread." This is all that is worthy of notice in the "Bar," save the window, the lower part of which was strongly guarded with a wide board nailed across. Turning away from this to find either book or paper to amuse us, (for you should know Editors are always reading,) we could see nothing but hand-bills, &c., on the wall. Walking up to them we commenced reading, and might have enjoyed ourselves well, had we not accidentally espied standing in one corner of the room two—may be they were oars, but we were so afraid that they were "battle-clubs," that we turned upon our heels, and made for the door. But recollecting that there was no one present to use them, we paused before making our exit, to examine the door. It was a strong one. Before the days of Washingtonians all its pannels had "stepped out," (as was the case with several other doors we saw,) but now they were well secured by strips of boards, nailed across both ends, on both sides of the door, eight in all, to prevent the like occurrence again. Having, ere we were aware, found ourselves on an exploring tour, we just walked into the broad hall, through which we had entered. Directly in front was a door labelled "Ladies' Cabin." As we were no lady, and hardly know how to act in their presence, we turned away from this, and finding nothing here but bare walls, from which the plaster was falling, sad and crest-fallen we walked to the front door. Lucky for us that our eyes were down cast, for we now discovered a danger into which we might have fallen on our first entrance, had we not, like "Washingtonians," stepped "high," viz. an opening in the floor. This, with a "bound" we left behind; and now being safe in the street and invigorated with fresh air, we turned around to take an "external view" of the "Washingtonian House."—There it stood, two stories high, once white, but now ———, with eight windows in front to let in the air, as well as light of this world. In seven of the eight we counted about twenty broken panes of glass, and in the other we could find only six that were unbroken, where there should have been twenty-four.

But you ask us to stop talking so about a "Washingtonian House," for I thought you liked them; you are describing an old "groggery," and not a "Temperance House." "Look here," readers, don't get wrathy; we do like "Temperance Houses." We are proud of the two noble ones in De Ruyter. "Mine host" of "THE NEW ERA," and "HE" of the village house are "at your service." We thought just as you did that this was not a "Temperance House," till we looked again at the sign, and read again and again,—"WASHINGTONIAN HOUSE." Well, notwithstanding the 'sign' did not compare with the substance, (in the house, bar, &c.,) yet all that we have said is true. If any of you doubt it, we invite you to call and see. We shall not tell you where it is; you may know it by our description, and by the fact that where there should be at least six window curtains, there are but three.

We left the house and comforted ourself with the reflection, that there must be a genuine article in order to a counterfeit. The tide of the Temperance reform had doubtless destroyed the custom of the house, and the "Washingtonian" sign was elevated to catch custom. It is said "there is but a step between the sublime and the ridiculous." This is illustrated in the two characters, the true hearted Temperance man, and the heartless time server.

Two more signs we will just notice, and then close our remarks on Public Houses. Beside the name of the landlord the signs bore the head and "HORNS" of an Ox. We looked into the door to see what this could mean, and behold we saw the identical ox, of which the above was a sign, corked up in sundry decanters, bottles, &c. From what we have heard of his spirit, we advise all to keep out of the dens where he is kept.—By the way, we suggest is it not advisable for those who keep a Temperance House to raise their sign, so that they may be known.

CHERRY-VALLEY.—We stopped to rest and feed our horse at this beautiful village, and while we were waiting for this, we sauntered into the village burying ground. Among the usual variety of such a place, we noticed the tomb-stone of a most celebrated Physician, who came down to the grave in middle age a victim to the intoxicating cup. Here, too, we saw two weather-beaten stones, bearing the following inscription,—"COL. ICHABOD ALDEN, a native of Danbury, Mass., was murdered by savages at this place, Nov. 11, 1778, in the 52 year of his age." Also, "Elizabeth Dickson, barbarously murdered by savages, Nov. 11, 1778, aged 48 years and 5 months, wife of William Dickson." This brought to our recollection that most barbarous massacre of the Revolution, led on by the British partizan Butler, and the Mohawk chief Brandt, with a force of refugees and Indians.—There was a fort erected on a part of the now village burying ground. Early in the morning of that memorable day, the gun of the fort announced to the sparse population of the surrounding country that the enemy was near. Those who could fled to the fort and were saved. Between thirty and forty were killed, and several were carried away prisoners. Col. Alden, the commander of the fort, was among the number that were slain. The next day the slain were gathered together and buried in a common grave. A full account of this most cruel massacre may be found in the history of the Revolution. We left the yard much affected, while recollecting the inhuman butcheries of the Revolution by British soldiers and hired savages. Just as we were leaving the village, the brave COMMODORE HULL, whose memory is cherished by every true hearted American, came into town.—We regretted that our time would not allow an interview. But enough of this.

After travelling nearly two miles we obtained a most delightful view of the Mohawk Valley, celebrated not only for its fertile soil, but also for bearing on its bosom the Erie Canal and the Utica and Schenectady Rail-Road—two most noble works, along which millions of merchandize, and thousands of travelers are annually transported. From this place the eye can take in almost at a glance a large portion of this Valley, the Sacondaga mountains on the north, and far away in the north-east the Green mountains of Vermont.

"OTSGORAGE CAVERN"—"How's CAVE," or the "GREAT GALLERY CAVE," situated in the town of Schoharie, Schoharie Co., was first explored in May last.—Since that time it has been explored five miles by actual measurement. Want of time only prevents us from visiting it. We will at some other time give a full account of it.

Church struck by Lightning.

The Seventh-day Baptist Church in this village was struck by lightning, on the evening of the 11th inst. As the rod for conducting the electric fluid was rather displaced at the bottom, leaning very near to the house, the charge went through the wall, and exploded, probably, under the floor, part of it passing out of the wall on the north side, and part of it on the south side, tearing up the floor under both stoves. The damage, however, was very slight.

For the Register.

The Trustees of De Ruyter Institute would announce to the public that the fall term will commence on the 16th inst., with advantages which cannot fail to give satisfaction to those wishing to attend said school. The Trustees have taken great pains to procure a Principal and other Teachers eminently qualified to fill their several stations, with credit to themselves, and they hope with profit to the school.

It remains now for the patrons to decide whether the school shall be sustained or not. I know every friend to the prosperity of the Institute will try to help, either by sending a scholar himself, or trying to use his influence to encourage his neighbor who has scholars to send to school, to patronize this school as far as is consistent.

Does every Trustee know that he is responsible to a greater or less degree whether the school is sustained or not? Does every Trustee use his influence in favor of the school? It seems to me that if they are, we shall see the school well sustained in every department.

If every Stockholder would furnish one scholar, at least one term in each year, with what now attends the school, the walls, though spacious, would be filled to overflowing, and De Ruyter Institute, instead of being crippled as she now is, would be amongst the first Academies in the State. It is admitted on almost every hand that the expense of attending this school is much less than it is for attending similar institutions elsewhere. Will the ministers of our denomination use their influence to promote the interests of the school? Much may be done by them, and if ever help was needed, it is now. The times, for money, to be sure, are hard, but cannot some superfluities be dispensed with better than the interests of the school, and the education of our youth? B.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From the N. Y. Evening Post.

FOURTEEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE

The Caledonia, arrived at Boston, about 5 o'clock Friday morning. She brings London and Liverpool dates to the 19th ult. For a speedy reception of the news, we are indebted to Harnden & Co., and to Wilmer's agency in Liverpool.

Dreadful riots have broken out in England and Scotland. The manufacturing districts are like a disturbed volcano.

The Acadia steamer arrived at Liverpool on Saturday, the 13th, in nine days and fifteen hours from Halifax. The Acadia carried out answers to letters received by the Columbia, and those answers were received in twenty-five days from the date of the Liverpool letters.

Parliament was prorogued on the 12th of August, by the Queen in person.

The Royal family are about to visit Scotland.

The Nottingham, Ipswich, Southampton, and Belfast elections have all taken place, and in each place have the Conservative or Ministerial Members been returned by large majorities.

Lord Hill has resigned the post of Commander-in-chief of the army, and the Duke of Wellington has been appointed in his place.

The weather continues extremely fine for the harvest, and there is not the slightest doubt but that the crops will exceed an average.

Money was abundant; the demand for most descriptions of produce was good; and the cotton market had decidedly improved in demand and in price.

The Great Western Steamship Company, is shortly to become extinct. At a meeting of the directors, ten persons were authorized to dispose of the whole concern. It is understood to have been a ruinous speculation.

The terms of the recent treaty, in relation to the Northeastern Boundary, so far as they have been made known in England, are very unpopular. It is probable, however, that they are incorrectly known. The idea of paying three hundred thousand dollars, and also reimbursing Maine for her expenses, is scouted. This is, evidently, a false impression of the terms of the treaty.

Correspondence of the Eve. Post.

LONDON, Aug. 18, 1842.

Queen's Speech.—Manufacturing Disturbances.—Parliament was prorogued on the 12th of June by the Queen in person. Her Majesty, (who, by the by, is said to be once more in an "interesting situation,") according to some accounts, looked "pale," whilst others assert that she was in excellent health and spirit. Her speech is of a sufficiently common-place character. Her ministers congratulate themselves on the work they have performed; lament the reverses in Affghanistan; reflect with satisfaction on the defense of Jellallabad; continue to receive friendly assurances from foreign powers; are thankful for a good harvest, and trust to the revival of manufacting industry. At the very time, however, that they were, through the mouth of her Majesty, congratulating the country on the "indications of gradual recovery from that depression which has affected many branches of manufacturing industry," business in those very seats of industry was totally suspended, and an angry mob and the military were watching each other!—Her speech was delivered on the Friday, and on the Saturday orders were sent to Woolwich to despatch a park of artillery and 1,000 soldiers, by the Birmingham railway to Manchester.

The manufacturing districts are in an alarming state. "Turn-outs" for higher wages have already taken place in a variety of places, and large masses of men proceed from one town to another, augmenting their forces, by enticing some workmen, and compelling others to join with them.—Various mills have been attacked in Manchester, and other towns, the machinery stopped, and the men ordered to quit the premises

From the number of contradictory and recriminatory statements, you will find it difficult to glean from the English papers, an accurate idea as to the cause of the riots, and who are the parties implicated.

The Times heads its accounts "Riots of the Anti-Corn-Law-League." Nothing can be more at variance with fact or common sense. Nearly all the "Leaguers" are mill-owners, and have every thing to lose and nothing to gain by the presence of infuriated mobs in the vicinity of their property; and incitements to violence, on their part, would be the certain course to insure their own ruin. The "Leaguers," on the other hand, attribute the riots to the Corn Laws. This is only partially correct. The Corn Laws may be at the bottom of the mischief, they are not the immediate cause of the disturbances: that is, the men are not banded together for a repeal of those laws, but for an advance of wages. The manufacturers, who allege that they have been long carrying on business at a loss, have attempted to reduce wages, the men will not submit to the reduction, and have struck work. But it is not among the cotton manufacturers where the dispute originated. It commenced amongst the coal miners in Staffordshire, Shropshire, &c., spread to the rail-makers, and other workers in iron, then took in the potters, and has now reached Lincolnshire and Yorkshire, the great seats of cotton and woollen manufacturing industry. Scotland too has had her "turn-outs," and where all this will stop it is difficult to conjecture.—Mixed up with this rising for higher wages, are emissaries of different kinds, who aim at giving to the whole a political complexion.

Collisions, it is true, have taken place at Preston, in Lancashire, and at other places, and the soldiers have fired upon the people; but the act partook of the character of self-defense. At Preston, the rioters were extremely violent: several acts of outrage had been committed and, if unchecked, they might have sacked the town. The magistrates, some police, and about thirty soldiers, went to quell the disturbance. One of the magistrates proceeded to read the riot act, when it was knocked out of his hands by a stone, a captain of police was knocked off his horse, and kicked when on the ground, and then orders were given to fire over the heads of the people. This was done, but did not produce the least impression: showers of stones continued to fly, and as the magistrates and soldiers were likely to be hemmed in by the mob, the word was again given, and a few shots were fired among the people. About eight or ten took effect, and four persons were seriously or mortally wounded (two [illegible]) and [illegible] others slightly. This dispersed the crowd, and the town was soon comparatively quiet. It is, however, [illegible] work when [illegible] come to this pass.

By the latest accounts from the Shropshire and Staffordshire districts, it appears that the colliers have overpowered the police, burned down several houses, [illegible] others, and have otherwise done considerable damage.

Postscript.—The intelligence just received, is, that there has been formidable rioting in the mining and pottery districts. The military had been again obliged to fire, and three persons were killed, and nine wounded. They have also fired some shots at other places, but no loss of life ensued. At a place called Elland, the mob closed in upon a small body of [illegible] and ill-used two of the soldiers so much, that they are not expected to recover. By far the most serious disturbances have been in the mining districts, although the working people are much better off.—one collier being able to make as much in a week as a hand-loom weaver in a month. Indeed, the terms which they demand before resuming work, are four shillings, or nearly a dollar per day; one day, and coals for their own use.

A large government war steamer, called the "Great Northern," of 1750 tons, and 380 horse power, and to carry 44 guns on her upper deck, has been launched in Ireland.

The news brought by the last steamer, that the long disputed Northeastern boundary question is likely to be comfortably settled gives great satisfaction here.

I am uncertain whether the last India news would catch Cunard's packet of the 4th of August. If so, it would only [illegible] few items, though the subsequent arrival of the overland mail did not bring particulars of much importance. There are, indeed, rumors that Lord Ellenborough, the new Governor General of India, had given orders for the British troops to evacuate Affghanistan and to recross the Indus, but they require confirmation. Such a course cannot be taken until the prisoners in the hands of the Affghans are liberated and things settled either by negotiation or the sword, on something like a satisfactory basis.

£1,000 had been offered for the dead body of Gen. Elphinstone, which had been brought to Jellallabad, and there buried.

There had been a dreadful hurricane at Calcutta, which had torn up trees, swept away houses, and wrecked about 10 vessels in the river; and at Bombay, two of the old East India Company's ships the Vansittart and Cornwallis, had been burnt. It is supposed they had been set on fire by some Lascars, and were valued at £100,000.

The Anglo-Indians are about to present a sword, valued at two hundred guineas, with "Jellallabad" engraved on it, to Sir Robert Sale, the gallant old veteran, who successfully defended that town.

The news from China gives an account of another of those easy and profitless victories, where poor John Chinaman as usual went to the wall. At Ningpo, 1,100 British had, with the loss of 3 men, routed 6,000 and killed 600 Chinese.

In France the poor young Duke of Orleans has been "quietly inurned," and political parties have resumed their squabbles. Both Legitimists and Republicans have been beaten in the election of President of the Council, M. Sauzet, the ministerial candidate, being elected by a large majority, and there is now no doubt but that the Duc de Nemours will be Regent. Guizot is looked upon as safe for the present.

There has been a "talk" of a war between Spain and Portugal, but there will be a vast deal more talk before there is any fighting. O. P. Q.

Another "Boy Jones" affair has taken place at Windsor Castle. The intruder this time was a man forty years of age, named Quested, who pretended to be crazy, and said he was entitled to a peerage.—When discovered in the Castle he was fast asleep on a couch in the footmen's waiting-room; and when asked how he obtained admittance, he said that he followed a "pot-boy." It appears that the unfortunate man left Maidstone, or the neighborhood, on Friday, and walked to Woolwich, where he stopped a short time, and then proceeded to Windsor, [illegible] Castle, when, from [illegible] one of the [illegible], and was [illegible]. He then went back to W[illegible] arriving there he [illegible] "brighter," that he retraced his steps, and [illegible] obtained in the most extraordinary manner an entrance into the Castle [illegible] waiting-room, where he was [illegible]. After a lengthened examination [illegible] remained but that he was [illegible] was conveyed to Bethlehem Hospital, there to remain during Her Majesty's pleasure.

The Exchequer bill frauds have been examined into by a commission, who have reported. The [illegible] result [illegible] be that the country will have to [illegible] the payment of [illegible] 000 of the bills [illegible] that either £37[illegible] which amount [illegible] £7,77[illegible] diated as being [illegible] received them [illegible] giving value for them.

News of the Day.

[illegible]

[illegible] through to Syracuse, [illegible] soon after starting, and [illegible] a bit of white pasteboard [illegible] ures thereon. The [illegible] casion to stop at Geneva [illegible] formed by the agent [illegible] till the night train came [illegible] agent this pasteboard, [illegible] receive, stopped the [illegible] man, and threw him out [illegible] have been outrageously [illegible] cars. It is expected that the company or its agents will be duly prosecuted for these outrages in your courts of justice. [illegible] little wholesome discipline in the newspapers may not be amiss. I will only add I have found the packet-boats on the canal exceedingly comfortable, the officers and hands respectful and accommodating, the fare excellent, and the price low.

Utica, Sept. 5, 1842. J. M. [illegible]

P. S. If Mr. Birdseye desires to [illegible] the names of the persons who witnessed the outrage committed on me, he can have them by writing to H. W. [illegible], Esq., Pitcher, Chenango Co., N. Y. J. M. [illegible]

From [illegible]

WINTERING SHEEP.—[illegible] some of my neighbors [illegible] must sell off their sheep [illegible] plow more, [illegible] pursuing my method of wintering sheep, they might avoid the necessity of throwing their sheep in market at this time, as they would have to sell at a great sacrifice owing to the depression in the wool market, brought about by the want of a proper protecting duties.

My method is as follows:—About the middle of November last year, I got up my sheep from the fields, and put them together; they consisted of Saxony ewes, and half blood South Down lambs. I shut them up in a yard that was provided with a warm shed, (which I deem very essential,) and fed them on oats in the straw, for about four weeks, until it was gone: (a more economical way would be to thrash the oats and feed each separate.) I then commenced feeding them on sheaves and wheat straw. I [illegible] the one hundred sheep one bushel of [illegible] in the morning and one bushel in [illegible] and [illegible] fed them with wheat [illegible] three times a day, in the morning and [illegible] the sheaves. The [illegible] me 75 cents per bushel and [illegible] 2 shillings per bush. The [illegible] was [illegible] for 100 sheep. [illegible] straw I commenced, as the manure [illegible] than the straw and labor of [illegible]. The oats was fed dry to the [illegible] made for the purpose. [illegible] a week, and [illegible]. The [illegible] an unhealthy [illegible] to wean [illegible]. I find [illegible] much [illegible] necessary to reduce [illegible] very particular in se[illegible] that they keep [illegible] none [illegible] their farms [illegible] in that [illegible] will be improving [illegible] a good quality that [illegible] of raising at present.

E. CORNELL

[illegible]—A column of newspa[illegible] Why then should [illegible] The man who [illegible] living twenty [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] Herkimer and Montgomery
[illegible] St. Lawrence and Lewis
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible] Madison and Oswego
[illegible] Onondaga
[illegible] Cayuga and Cortland
[illegible] Tompkins, Chemung and Yates.
[illegible] Seneca and Wayne.
[illegible] Monroe
[illegible] Ontario and Livingston.
[illegible] Steuben and Allegany
[illegible] Chautauque and Cattaraugus.
[illegible] Erie
[illegible] Genesee and Wyoming
[illegible] Niagara and Orleans

Lord Ashburton.—His reception and departure.—On the 1st inst. Lord Ashburton was received by the Common Council of New York at the Governor's room in the City Hall. He was welcomed to the city by a speech from the Mayor to which he made a brief and sensible reply. He was afterwards introduced to some 3,000 citizens. His Lordship is said to have looked fresh and vigorous, and, for a man of his years, remarkably well. He must now have attained the good old age of 68 or 9, yet would easily pass as being 20 years less than that. His complexion is somewhat florid, and he seems to have rather the air and bearing of a well-bred American than the generally robust and strong-feeling manners of those from "our father land." In person, he is above the middling hight, though not tall, and stands firm and erect, being rather of hearty-looking habit than otherwise.

On the same day a dinner was given in honor of his Lordship, at the Astor House, which was well attended. The room was splendidly decorated. Over the centre of the table, at the head of the room, was an eagle bearing a scroll, inscribed "Great Britain, United States, Ashburton, Washington, Webster. The Treaty of 1842."

At the foot of the room was a beautiful transparency of the British Arms. The British, American, and Tri-colored flags were gracefully entwined, and hung in well-arranged festoons round the hall.

Thirteen toasts were drank, to the first of which, viz: "The President of the United States," there was no response given, but was drank in utter silence. The second was, "The Queen of Great Britain," which was enthusiastically cheered. This marked disrespect of the President has occasioned some talk, and is generally disapproved—the office, at least, being worthy of respectful regard. Lord Ashburton, Mr. Evans, and others made addresses.

Lord Ashburton took his departure for England on the 3d inst. in the Warspite.—He was appropriately saluted.

The Explosion of Syracuse.—Saturday the 27th ult., was the anniversary of the gunpowder explosion, by which twenty-five of the citizens of that village were hurried into eternity. The shops and stores on that day were closed from half past 9 A. M., until 1 P. M., during which time the stores were dressed in mourning. Several Fire Companies met at their respective houses at 9 1-2 o'clock, and at 10 o'clock marched to the ground where the explosion occurred. A procession was then formed, which marched to the Presbyterian church which was filled to overflowing. Dr. Adams then delivered a discourse, recapitulating the events of the night of the 27th of August, 1841, in a manner which drew forth from the large audience one universal feeling of admiration. After the close of the exercises of the church, the procession re-formed and marched to the place of assembling, where the procession was dismissed.

Still more Remarkable Ruins in Central America.—We have lately looked over some drawings made by a traveler, recently returned from Central America, representing the ruins of an ancient city, not yet visited by any traveler, which are, perhaps, more remarkable than even those visited by Stephens and Catherwood. They have the same general character, but their preservation in some respects is more perfect. The principal of these ruins are at a place called Chichen, situated in the midst of a vast plain, almost midway between the two oceans. On the tops of the pyramids, resembling those which Mr. Stephens met with in other places, and which he conjectured to be the bases of public buildings, this traveler actually found massive edifices in a state of tolerable preservation.—Among them was one differing from the rest, in possessing a circular form, and in being round at the top, in a manner somewhat resembling a dome. He found walls, vaults and floors, covered with a hard composition bearing a high finish, colored interior walls, sculptures in bas relief, stone rings for the hanging of large doors, and various other evidences of art and skill in the construction of habitations. We understand that it is the intention of Mr. Norman, the traveler in question, to publish an account of his visit to Yucatan, and a description of these curious remains.—Eve. Post.

The Belfast Signal, after noticing the arrival at that port of the steamship Missouri, says—"Should she remain over the Sabbath, the officers and crew will find a welcome to our houses for worship, where we are sorry to say many of our inhabitants are seldom to be seen."

A Lowell paper states that two men in that city have been fined, for making so much noise nights as to wake up a watchman.

Mrs. Dewey, who attended the toll bridge at the Falls, six miles from Philadelphia, destroyed by fire on Friday morning, died in course of 24 hours after the fire, from the effects of fright. So the incendiaries have the crime of murder upon their consciences, as well as arson.

The last Southern Pioneer, (published at Carrolton, Miss.,) contains 35 columns of Collector's sales. The publisher has had to issue an extra sheet to contain the advertisements. The printer's fee for advertising is attached to each advertisement, and amounts to $6,737.

"Number One."—The Congress of the U. S., with an eye to economy in the Indian branch of the public services, have fixed the traveling allowance of commissioners to treat with the Indians, at ten cents a mile, or ten dollars the one hundred miles. In the supply bill for their own per diem, &c., they have voted themselves eight dollars for every twenty miles travel, or forty dollars the hundred miles!

Rifles.—At St. Albans, Vt., they are now manufacturing cast iron rifle barrels, equal to wrought. They will stand a nine inch charge of powder, without the least appearance of fracture or strain.

Death of Col. Reeside.—James Reeside, so well known as an extensive mail contractor in the United States, died at his residence in Philadelphia, on Saturday evening about ten o'clock.

Mormons.—We understand that forty Mormons arrived in this city yesterday, on board the Rosalie, from Nauvoo. The absurdities or villanies of Joe Smith, are getting too outrageous for even his misled followers.—St. Louis Bulletin.

Lead Pipes.—Dr. Dana has lately made a report to the City Government of Lowell in relation to the use of lead pipes in wells, and the conclusion to which he comes after much scientific investigation is, that all the water in Lowell is more or less impregnated by the use of such pipes, and that baneful effects in a greater or less degree, will eventually follow the use of water so impregnated.

"The Beginning of the End."—Stephen Smith, the owner of the building known as "Smith's Beneficial Hall," and the Trustees of the Second African Presbyterian Church—the buildings destroyed by fire by the mob during the late riots—entered a suit against the County of Philadelphia, in the Supreme Court, lately, for the full amount of damages accruing from the destruction of the same.

Return of Missionaries.—In the ship Washington, Capt. Taylor, from Calcutta and Madras, which arrived at Philadelphia on Thursday, 11th inst., came passengers Rev. Dr. Scudder, lady, and five children. Dr. S. is one of the oldest Missionaries of the American Board.

The New Orleans Picayune of the 6th inst., announces the arrival of Capt. Elliott, renowned for his contests with long-tailed Commissioner Lin and cunning Commissioner Keshen, in the war with China. He landed on the 15th ult. at New Orleans, being on his way to Texas, where he was appointed consul-general some time ago.

The organ of Millerism claims that there are at this moment "seven hundred clergymen engaged in preaching the principles of Miller, and the number of persons who profess to believe that Christ will make his second advent next year, is estimated to be not less than one million." This is a rather large estimate, it will be found.

The Democratic Review states that Gen. Jackson has committed all his papers, &c., to the hands of Mr. Amos Kendall, who is to edit and publish them with a biography.

All Ladies.—In Queen Anne's reign, the Lord Bateman married three wives, all of whom were his servants. A beggar woman, meeting him one day in the street, made him a very low courtesy. "Ah, bless you," said she, "and long life to you; if you do but live long enough, we shall all be ladies in time."

The Number of Fools.—Dupertier, the French poet, exclaimed in a pet, one day, "It is only fools that do not admire my verses." M. d'Herbelot overheard him, and immediately replied, "Solomon has said the number of fools is infinite."

A Reason for Wearing Mourning.—A lady paying a visit to her daughter, who was a young widow, asked her why she wore the widow's garb so long? "Dear mamma, don't you see?" replied the daughter; "this saves me the expense of advertising for a husband, as every one can see I am for sale by private contract."

Useful Discovery.—A Russian merchant, the son of English parents, has invented a system of filtration, which, by one machine of five feet square clear, filters no less than two millions and a half gallons per day, so thoroughly and effectually, as to have astonished Lord Brougham, and the numerous scientific gentlemen who have witnessed the experiment. He has been waiting in England since last January, in expectation that the Marquis of Westminster was to bring forward the motion of which he had given notice at the last session, to revive the select committee on the supply of water for London. Professor Phillips has tested and certified the purity of the water this gentleman (Mr. Starkey,) has filtered, and the invention is now, we believe, about to be offered to parliament for the public benefit.—English paper.

The Hamburg Fire Committee in New York announce the total amount of their receipts from New York, Washington, Richmond, and Cincinnatti, to be $9,017 70, of which $7,732 were contributed in N. Y., which has been duly transmitted.—A letter of thanks, warmly expressed, has been received from Hamburg.

An old picture represents a king sitting in state, with a label, "I govern all;" a bishop with a legend, "I pray for all;" a soldier with a motto, "I fight for all;" and a farmer, drawing forth reluctantly a purse, with the superscription, "I pay for all."

A Good one.—The following is selected from the toasts given in Lowell:

"A moderate drinker—a guide board, showing the slow but sure way to the gutter."

Awfully Sudden Death.—A case of awfully sudden death occurred in Thistle street Baptist Chapel, Bristol, England, on Sunday morning. As Mr. Brown was giving out the hymn to be sung, and repeating the following words—

"The bruised reed he'll never break,
Nor quench the smoking flax," he fell back and instantly expired.

Commencing Early.—Captain Crawley, of the Royal Engineers, has been ordered by the British Government to survey the line of the canal which shall unite the waters of the St. Lawrence with the Bay of Fundy.

Notices.

NOTICE.

The De Ruyter Lyceum will meet at the District School House in this village on Monday evening next at 6 1-2 o'clock.

We hope there will be a general and punctual attendance, not only of all its members, male and female, but of all who are the friends of Education and improvement. Let the farmer, the mechanic, the clerks of our village, our business men, our doctors, ministers and lawyers attend; and by their presence and participation in the exercises of the association, contribute to sustain its laudable efforts. Let not De Ruyter village be behind other places, in regard to such an enterprise. Let it not be said, we have not public spirit and energy enough among our citizens to sustain a Village Lyceum. Attend one, attend all.

Question. "Do the present signs of the times indicate the perpetuity of our government?"

Affirmative, A. N. Annas. Negative, Ira Spencer.

A. V. BENTLEY, Sec'y.

PROPOSALS
For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead,) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

ALFRED ACADEMY,
AND
TEACHER'S SEMINARY.

W. C. Kenyon, Principal.
Miss Caroline B. Maxson, Preceptress.

LECTURERS.

On Phrenology and Physiology.—Drs. J. R. HARTSHORN, and E. RIDER.

On School Teaching.—LUKE G. MAXSON.

On Chemistry and Geology.—W. C. KENYON.

Lectures on other subjects as occasion may require.

This Institution is pleasantly located, in the county of Allegany, thirteen miles South-East of Angelica, and six miles South of Almond. From its retired and quiet situation, it presents a favorable opportunity to parents to place their sons and daughters under a moral influence that will not be counteracted by those with whom they may associate.

The patronage which it has hitherto enjoyed, has been so liberal as to warrant very considerable expenditures in rendering it still more worthy of a more extended patronage; and it is hoped that it will, under its present organization, be rendered inferior to no similar Institution in Western New York

The qualification of Common School Teachers will receive particular attention, so as to render them thorough and practical instructors of youth.

The Academic Year,—Is divided into three terms of fifteen weeks each. 1st, Commencing Wednesday 17th August; 2d, 7th December; 3d, 4th April, 1843.

Vacations.—At the expiration of the first and second Terms, one week each; at the expiration of the 3d Term, five weeks.

Tuition.—Varying with Instruction, from $3,50 to $4,75 per term.

Board.—From $1 to $1,25 depending on accommodations. Rooms in the Institution, furnished with Cook Stoves, can be had at a moderate expense.

SAMUEL RUSSELL, Esq., Pres't.
Alfred, July, 1842.

MARRIED,

In Brookfield, on the 7th inst., by Rev. S. B. Crandall, Mr. LEANDER BABCOCK, and Miss ROXANIE WILLIAMS, of the above place.

In Plainfield, by the Rev. S. B. Crandall, Mr JOSHUA CLARK, of Watson, and Miss ESTHER LANPHEAR, of Plainfield.

LIST OF LETTERS.

E. Southworth, P. M., (You neglected to "frank" your letter, and thereby charged us with 18 3-4 cents postage for this attention) Clark Rogers, (Nathan Rogers 1st. was credited at the time.) Milton Barrett, J. H. Lupton, P. M., (we send no paper to your office addressed to "E. Davis," we send one to "Enoch J. Davis," at Shiloh P. O.

LIST OF RECEIPTS

Of Clarke Rogers, $6,44, cr. H. H. Rogers $1,50 vol. 3, Clark Truman, $1,94, vol. 2, J. D. Rogers $1, vol. 3, self, $2, vol. 3, of Daniel Babcock, $15,-12 1-2, cr. Nelson Satterlee, Waite Williams, J. A. Potter., each, $2, vol. 3, Clark Burdick, $1, vol. 3, Caleb Green, $1, vol. 3, B. B. Barker, ,50, vol. 2, Jabish Brown, jr., G. R. Babcock, each $2, vol. 3, Samuel Whitford, $2,50, vol. 2. Dea. A. Maxson, $1,12, vol. 2, ($1, was credited to Dea. A. Bellows, and paper sent)

ADVERTISEMENTS.

New Arrangement.

GEORGE W. SUTTON, having this day purchased the interest of W. H. QUINBY, in the Dry Goods and Shoe business, will continue the Trade and the Manufacture of Boots and Shoes as usual at the NEW YORK CASH STORE, where he would solicit the continuance of the liberal patronage heretofore received.

Sept. 14, 1842.

Dissolution.

THE Co-partnership heretofore existing under the firm of SUTTON & QUINBY, is this day dissolved by mutual consent. All notes and accounts will be left with Geo. W. Sutton for settlement.

GEO. W. SUTTON,
WM. H. QUINBY.
De Ruyter, Sep. 14, 1842.

Christian Review.
A GOOD PROPOSITION.

THE importance of the Christian Review [illegible]

☞The publishers having a number of the past volumes on hand, propose, in order to interest [illegible] who may be desirous of possessing it, yet feel unable to subscribe, to exert their influence to obtain new subscribers, and by so doing not only secure it for themselves, but, by increasing its circulation, extend its usefulness, and help also [illegible] its perpetuity—to offer a PREMIUM for new subscribers, as follows.

☞Any person obtaining TWENTY NEW SUBSCRIBERS and remitting the publishers [illegible] shall be entitled to a complete set of the Review, seven volumes, the subscription price of which is TWENTY ONE DOLLARS!

☞For FIFTEEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS, the last five volumes will be given—subscription price FIFTEEN DOLLARS!

☞For TEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS, the last two volumes, subscription price, SIX DOLLARS!

For FIVE NEW SUBSCRIBERS, either of the last [illegible] volumes, subscription price, THREE DOLLARS!

It is hoped that this very liberal premium may induce many of the friends of the Review to [illegible] renewed efforts in its behalf, and thus [illegible] benefit themselves, [illegible] the great object the Review is intended to sustain.

SUBSCRIBERS are reminded of the terms of subscription, [illegible] Have you paid your subscription? The money is much needed.

GOULD KENDALL & LINCOLN, Publishers,
59 Washington Street.

N. B. The publishers of any religious newspaper who shall give the above advertisement [illegible] their columns and send a copy to the publishers, shall be entitled to a selection of either two of the last four volumes.

Boston, August 10th.

What is Economy!

RANDOLPH & DUNHAM, take pleasure in informing their customers, and the public generally, that they continue the Tailoring business in "Mechanic's Hall," in rooms adjoining the "Register Office," in all its various branches, where they will be happy to wait on customers on the shortest notice. Thankful for the patronage already bestowed on this establishment, they would say, that all work entrusted to them shall be done up in a style not surpassed by any of the "Craft" in this "village or county;" and at prices that will suit their customers, and tend to that "Economy" which has been advertised to be the "road to wealth."—Cutting done at sight, and warranted to fit if properly made up. Finally, all work done at this Establishment will be warranted to fit or no sale.

S. F. RANDOLPH,
J. V. DUNHAM.
De Ruyter, August 3, 1842. 23tf

Economy is the road to Wealth.

JAMES M. LETTS, would inform his friends and customers, and the public generally, that he has removed his Tailoring Establishment to the building occupied by Eli A. Gage as a Hat Store, where he will be ready at all times to attend to cutting and making all manner of clothing as well as it can be done in the village or county. Military work done in the latest and most approved fashion. Ladies Habits, and Coat Dresses Cut to order, at short notice. All work done at this establishment, shall be warranted to fit.

De Ruyter, July 1st 1842.

IN CHANCERY, before the Vice Chancellor of the 5th Circuit.

William D. Cochran, and Catharine Euphemia Cochran, vs.
Anna Burdick, Jason L. Burdick, Jared Burdick, William R. Burdick, Benjamin I. Burdick, Harman Burdick, Peace Burdick, Sally Ann Smith, and William H. Smith.

Z. T. BENTLEY,
Solicitor.

IN pursuance of a decretal order of this Court made in the above cause and bearing date the 12th day of July, 1842, will be sold at public auction by or under the direction of the subscriber one of the masters of this Court at the House of Wm. C. Gage, in the town of De Ruyter, county of Madison, on the 23d day of September next at one o'clock., P. M., of that day, all that certain piece or parcel of land lying in the town of De Ruyter, county of Madison, and bounded as follows, beginning on the west line of lot No 57 just nineteen chains and fifty links from the south west corner of said lot. Thence East one hundred and twenty eight rods and five feet to lands lately owned by Richard Worth now deceased. Thence south on said Worth's line, so far that a line from thence west to the west line of said lot No. 57, and from thence on said line north to the place of beginning as will make just thirty two acres.

Dated August the 4th 1842.

JOHN THOMAS.
Master in Chancery.

☞IMPORTANT WORK!
NOW IN THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION,
A DICTIONARY OF
Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.
Containing a clear exposition of their
PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE
By ANDREW URE, M. D., F. R. S., M. G. S., M. A. S., Lond., Mem. Acad. N. S. Philad., S. Ph. Soc. N. Germ. Hanov., Mulii, &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings.

THIS is unquestionably the most popular work of the kind ever published, and a book most [illegible]

STOVES.
COLD WINTER IS COMING.

L[illegible]

Fancy Parlor Stoves,

[illegible]

BRASS AND TIN WARE

Of every description [illegible]

LOW PRICES

[illegible]

Eave Troughs

[illegible]

JUST RECEIVED

[illegible]

JOB WORK

[illegible]

De Ruyter, Oct. 17, 1841.

REMOVAL.

JAMES M. LETTS [illegible]

20 [illegible]

"Hard times and money scarce."

IS the general [illegible] SUTTON & QUINBY [illegible]

May 24. SUTTON & QUINBY.

BOOKS & STATIONERY.

SCHOOL BOOKS, of all descriptions, Miscellaneous Books & Stationery, at the Book Store of HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

De Ruyter, May 10, 1842.

50 PIECES BROAD CLOTHS, CASSIMERES, SATINETTES, at reduced prices at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

THE FARMER'S EXCHANGE is the place to buy Goods CHEAP. Oct. 20, 1841.

S. G. WALKER.

Notice.

ALL persons who are indebted to the subscriber, either in accounts or notes, are requested to call and settle immediately and save cost.

De Ruyter, June 20, 1842.

JAMES M. LETTS.

BOOK BINDING.

THE subscriber having connected a BINDERY with his printing establishment, is now ready to execute all kinds of Binding in a neat and durable manner, on as reasonable terms as at any other establishment in this section of country.

JAMES BAILEY.
De Ruyter, June 8th 1841.

Not 25 or 50 per cent Reward.
S. G. WALKER

HAS received his NEW GOODS, which he is prepared and determined to sell CHEAP, [illegible] cheaper than can be bought at any other establishment in De Ruyter. Among his assortment may be found, Dry Goods, Dry Groceries, Crockery, Hardware, &c. Leghorn and Palm-leaf hats and a variety of other things too numerous to mention. Hear ye! Hear ye!! all persons wishing to buy goods CHEAP will please call at the Farmer's Exchange [illegible]

De Ruyter, May 24, 1842.

PROSPECTUS of the FARM HOUSE OF THE XIX CENTURY, or ENCYCLOPEDIA of Practical Agriculture, containing the best [illegible]

Berkshire Hogs.

T[illegible]

ABNER WRIGHT.

BOOTS! BOOTS! SHOES! SHOES!

A[illegible] Mammoth Boot [illegible]

SILK! SILK!! SILK!!!

A BEAUTIFUL assortment of plain, figured and striped, just received and for sale very cheap at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

FLOUR, PROVISIONS, GROCERIES, and a thousand other things, for sale by 11tf
May 11. HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

NO IMPOSITION.
NO STATES PRISON WORK!

THOSE wishing to purchase BOOTS and SHOES of superior quality of custom work, will find just the place by calling at the sign of the MAMMOTH BOOT.

De Ruyter, May 20, 1842.

JOB PRINTING.

BOOKS, Pamphlets, Way, Hand-Bills, Cards, Bills, &c. &c. neatly executed at this office.

POETRY.

From the United States Gazette.

The Journeyman Printer.

A mental lamp hung out by life's wayside,
Unnoticed, yet his unpretending ray
Shines clearly on man's intellectual way
And proves to pilgrims an unfailing guide.
He has within him a worthy sort of pride,
And knows his worth, though some allow it not:
A heart, and thinking mind, above his lot
'Mong men are his. His coffers ill supplied,
Yet want and virtue seldom ask in vain:
Nor is his life exempt from various pain;
Few days are his—the rose that freshly bloom'd
On boyhood's cheek assumes the hue of death;
The oil of life within him soon consumed,
E're two score years and ten he yields his vital breath.

Philadelphia, Aug. 18, 1842. TAM.

Miscellaneous Department.

INDUSTRY AND IDLENESS.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

THE MARRIED SISTERS.

"Come William, a single day out of three hundred in a year is not much."

"True, Henry Thorne. Nor is a single drop of water that first finds it way through the dyke much; and yet the first drop but makes room for a small stream to follow, and then comes a flood. No, no, Henry, I cannot go with you to-day; and if you will be governed by a friend's advice, you will not neglect your work for the fancied pleasures of a sporting party."

"All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy. We were not made to be delving forever with tools in close rooms.—The fresh free air is good for us. Come, William, you will feel better for a little recreation. You look pale from confinement. Come; I cannot go without you."

"Henry Thorne," said his friend William Moreland, with an air more serious than that at first assumed, "let me in turn urge you to stay."

"It is in vain, William," his friend said interrupting him.

"I trust not, Henry. Surely, my early friend and companion is not deaf to reason."

"No, not the right reason."

"Well, listen to me. As I said at first, it is not the loss of a single day, though even that lost, is a serious waste of time, that I now take into consideration. It is the danger of forming a habit of idleness. It is a mistake, that a day of idle pleasure recreates the mind and body, and makes us return to our regular and necessary employments with renewed delight. My own experience is, that a day thus spent causes us to resume our labors with reluctance, and makes irksome what before was pleasant. Is it not your own?"

"Well, I don't know; I can't altogether say that it is; indeed, I never thought about it."

"Henry, the worst of all deception is self-deception. Don't, let me beg of you, attempt to deceive yourself in a matter so important. I am sure you have experienced this reluctance to work after a day of pleasure. It is an universal experence. And now that we are on this subject, I will add, that I have observed in you an increasing desirire to get away from work. You make many excuses, and they seem to you to be good ones. Can you tell me how many days you have been out of the shop in the last three months?"

"No, I cannot," was the reply, made in a tone indicating a slight degree of irritation.

"Well, I can, Henry."

"How many is it, then?

"Ten days."

"Never."

"It is true, for I kept the count."

"Indeed, then, you are mistaken. I was only out a gunning three times, and a fishing twice."

"And that makes five times. But don't you remember the day you were made sick by fatigue?"

"Yes, true, but that is only six."

"And the day you went up the mountain with the party?"

"Yes."

"And the twice you staid away because it stormed?"

"But, William, that has nothing to do with the matter. If it stormed so violently that I couldn't come to the shop, that surely is not to be set down to the account of pleasure taking."

"And yet, Henry, I was here, and so were all the workmen but yourself. If there had not been in your mind a reluctance to coming to the shop, I am sure the storm would not have kept you. I am plain with you, because I am your friend, and you know it. Now, it is this increasing reluctance on your part, that alarms me. Do not, then, add fuel to a flame that if thus nourished, will consume you."

"But, William—"

"Don't make excuses, Henry. Think of the aggregate of ten lost days. You can earn a dollar and a half a day easily, and do earn it whenever you work steadily. Ten days in three monts is fifteen dollars. All last winter, you know, Ellen went without a cloak, because you could not afford to buy one for her; now the money that you could have earned in the time wasted in the last three months, would have bought her a very comfortable one—and you know that it is October now, and winter will soon be again upon us. Sixty dollars a year buys a great many comforts for a poor man."

Henry Thorne remained silent for some moments. He felt the force of William Moreland's reasoning; but his own inclinations were stronger than his friends arguments. He wanted to go with two or three companions a gunning, and even the vision of his young wife shrinking in the keen winter wind, was not sufficient to conquer this desire.

"I will go this once, William," he said at length, with a long inspiration; "and then I will quit it. I see and acknowledge the force of what you say; I never viewed the matter so seriously before."

"This once may confirm a habit now too strongly fixed," urged his companion.—"Stop now, while your mind is rationally convinced that it is wrong to waste your time, when it is so much needed for the sake of making comfortable and happy one who loves you, and has cast her lot in life with yours. Think of Ellen, and then be a man."

"Come, Harry!" said a loud cheerful voice at the shop door; we are waiting for you!"

"Ay, ay," responded Henry Thorne.—"Good morning, William, I am pledged for to-day. But after this, I will swear off! And so saying, he hurried away.

Henry Thorne and William Moreland were workmen in a large manufacturing establishment in one of our thriving inland towns. They had married sisters, and thus a friendship that had long existed, was confirmed by closer ties of interest.

They had been married about one year, at the time of their introduction to the reader, and, already Moreland could perceive that his earnings bought more comforts for his little family than did Henry's. The difference was not to be accounted for in the days the other took in pleasure taking, although their aggregate loss was no mean item to be taken from a poor man's purse. It was to be found, mainly, in a disposition to spend, rather than to save; to pay away for trifles that were not really needed, very small sums, whose united amount in a few weeks would rise to many dollars. But, when there was added to this constant check upon his prosperity, the frequent recurrence of a lost day, no wonder that Ellen had less of good and comfortable clothing than her sister Jane, and that her house was far less neatly furnished.

All this had been observed, with pain, by William Moreland and his wife, but, until the coversation recorded in the opening of this story, no word of remonstrance or warning had been ventured upon by the former. The spirit in which his words had been received encouraged him to hope that he might exercise a salutary control over Henry, if he persevered, and he resolved that he would extend thus far towards him the offices of a true friend.

After dinner of the day during which her husband was absent, Ellen called in to see Jane, and sit the afternoon with her.—They were only sisters, and had loved each other much. During their conversation, Jane said in allusion to the season—

"It begins to feel a little chilly to-day as if winter were coming. And, by the way, you are going to get a cloak this fall, Ellen, are you not?"

"Indeed, I can hardly tell, Jane," Ellen replied, in a serious tone; "Henry's earnings, some how or other, don't seem to go far with us; and yet I try to be as prudent as I can. We have but a few dollars laid by, and both of us want warm underclothing, and Henry must have a coat and pair of pantaloons to look decent this winter.—I must try to do without the cloak, I think."

"I am sorry for that. But keep a good heart about it, sister. Next fall you will surely be able to get a comfortable one; and you shall have mine as often as you want it, this winter. I can't go out much, you know; our dear little Ellen, your namesake, is to young to leave often."

"You are very kind Jane," Ellen said, and her voice slightly trembled.

A silence of some moments ensued, and then the subject of conversation was changed to one more cheerful.

That evening, just about nightfall, Henry Thorne came home, much fatigued, bringing with him half a dozen squirrels and a single wild pigeon.

"There, Ellen, is something to make a nice pie for us to-morrow," he said, tossing his game bag upon the table.

"You look very tired, Henry," his wife said, tenderly; "I would'nt go out any more this fall, if I were you."

"I don't intend going out any more, Ellen," he replied, "I'm sick of it."

"You don't know how glad I am to hear you say so!" his wife said, in an altered and cheerful tone. "Somehow, I always feel troubled and uneasy when you are out gunning or fishing, as if you were not doing right."

"You shall not fell so any more, Ellen," he replied; "I've been thinking all the afternoon about your cloak. Cold weather is coming and we hav'nt a dollar laid by for anything. How I am to get the cloak, I do not see, and yet I cannot bear the thought of your going all this winter again without one."

"O never mind that, dear," Ellen said in a cheerful tone, her face brightening up. "We can't afford it this fall, and that's settled. But I can have Jane's whenever I want it, she says; and you know she is so kind and willing to lend me any thing that she has, I don't like to wear out her things, but then I shall not want the cloak often."

Henry Thorne sighed, at thoughts his wife's words stirred in his mind.

"I don't know how it is," he at length said, despondingly; "William can't work any faster than I can, nor earn more a week, and yet he and Jane have every thing comfortable, and are saving money into the bargain, while we want many things that they have, and are not a dollar ahead."

One of the reasons for this, to her husband, unaccountable difference trembled on Ellen's tongue. But she could not make up her mind to reprove him; and so bore in silence, and with some pain, what she felt as a reflection upon her want of frugality in managing househould affairs.

Let us advance the characters we have introduced, a year in their life's pilgrimage and see if there are any fruits of these good resolutions.

"Where is Henry Thorne, this morning?" asked the owner of the shop, of Moreland, one morning, an hour after all the workmen had come in.

"I do not know really," Moreland replied. "I saw him yesterday, when he was well."

"He's off gunning, I suppose again. If so, it is the tenth day he has lost in idleness during the last two months. I am afraid I shall have to get a hand in his place, upon whom I can place more dependence. I shall be sorry to do this for your sake, and for the sake of his wife. But I do not like such an example to the workmen and apprentices, and besides, being away from the shop often disappoints a job."

"I could not blame you, sir." Moreland said; "and yet, I hope you will bear with him for the sake of Ellen. I think if you would talk to him, it would do him good."

"But why don't you talk to him, William?"

"I have talked to him frequently, but he has got so that he won't hear it any longer from me."

"Nor would he bear it from me, either, I fear, William."

Just at that moment, the subject of conversation came in.

"You are late this morning, Henry," said the owner of the shop to him, in the presence of the other workmen.

"It's only a few minutes past the hour," he replied, moodily.

"It's more than an hour past."

"Well if it is I can make it up."

"That is not the right way, Henry.—Lost time is never made up."

Thorne did not understand the general truth intended to be expressed, but supposed at once, that the master of the shop meant to intimate that he would wrong him out of the lost hour, notwithstanding he had promised to make it up. He therefore turned an angry look upon him, and said—

"Do you mean to say that I would cheat you sir?"

The employer was a hasty man, and tenacious of his dignity as a master. He invariably discharged a journeyman who was in the least degree disrespectful in his language or manner towards him, before the other workmen. Acting under the impulse that at once prompted him, he said:

"You are discharged," and instantly turned away.

As quickly did Henry Thorne turn and leave the shop. He took his way homeward, but he paused and lingered as he drew nearer and nearer his little cottage, for troubled thoughts had now taken place of angry feelings. At length he was at the door, and lifting slowly the latch, he entered.

"Henry!" said Ellen, with a tone of surprise. Her face was paler, and more care-worn than it was a year before; and its calm expression had changed into a troubled one. She had a babe upon her lap, her first and only one. The room in which she sat, was far from indicating circumstances improved by the passage of a year, was far less tidy and comfortable; and her own attire, though neat, was faded, and unseasonable. Her husband replied not to her inquiring look, and surprised ejaculation, but seated himself in a chair, and burying his face in his hands, remained silent, until, unable to endure the suspense, Ellen went to him, and taking his hand, asked, so earnestly, and so tenderly, what it was that troubled him, that he could not resist the appeal.

"I am discharged!" he said, with bitter emphasis. "And there is no other establishment in the town nor within fifty miles!"

"O, Henry! how did that happen?"

"I hardly know myself, Ellen, for it all seems like a dream. When I left home this morning, I did not go directly to the shop; I wanted to see a man at the upper end of the town, and when I got back it was an hour later than usual. Old Ballord took me to task before all the shop, and intimated that I was not disposed to act honestly towards him. This I cannot bear from any one; I answerd him in anger, and was discharged on the spot. And now, what we are to do heaven only knows! Winter is almost upon us, and we have not five dollars in the world."

"But something will turn up for us, Henry, I know it will," Ellen said, trying to smile encouragingly, although her heart was heavy in her bosom.

Her husband shook his head doubtingly, and then all was gloomy and oppressive silence. For nearly an hour, no word was spoken by either. Each mind was busy with painful thoughts, and one with fearful forebodings of evil. At the end of that time, the husband took up his hat and went out. For a long, long time after, Ellen sat in dreamy, sad abstraction, holding her babe to her breast. From this state, a sense of duty roused her, and laying her infant on the bed,—for they had not yet been able to spare money for a cradle,—she began to busy herself in her domestic duties. This brought some little relief.

About eleven o'clock, Jane came in with her usual cheerful, almost happy face, bringing in her hand a stout bundle. Her countenance changed in its expression to one of concern, the moment her eyes rested upon her sister's face, and she laid her bundle on a chair quickly; as if she half desired to keep it out of Ellen's sight.

"What is the matter, Ellen?" she asked with tender concern the moment she had closed the door.

Ellen could not reply; her heart was too full. But she leant her head upon her sister,s shoulder; and, for the first time since she had heard the sad news of the morning, burst into tears. Jane was surprised, and filled with anxious concern. She waited until this ebullition of feelling had in some degree abated, and she then said in a tone still more tender than that in which she had first spoken,—

"Ellen, dear sister! tell me what has happened."

"I am foolish, sister," at length Ellen said, looking up, and endeavoring to dry her tears. "But I cannot help it. Henry was discharged from the shop this morning and now what are we to do? We have nothing ahead, and I am afraid he will not be able to get anything to do here, or within many miles of the village."

"That is bad Ellen," Jane said, while a shadow fell upon her face, but a few moments before glowing and happy. And that was nearly all she could say; for she did not wish to offer false consolation, and she could think of no genuine words of comfort. After a while, each grew more composed in mind, and less reserved, and then the whole matter was talked over, and all that Jane could say, she did say, that seemed likely to soothe and give hope to Ellen's mind.

"What have you there?" at length asked Ellen, glancing towards the chair upon which Jane had laid her bundle.

Jane paused a moment, as if in self-communion, and then said—

"Only a pair of blankets, and a couple of calico dresses that I have been out buying."

"Let me look at them," Ellen said, in as cheerful a voice as she could assume.

A large, heavy pair of blankets, for which Jane had paid five dollar, were now unrolled, and a couple of handsome chintz dresses displayed, of dark rich colors, suitable for the winter season. It was with difficulty that Ellen could restrain a sigh, as she looked at these comfortable things, and thought of how much she needed, and of how little she had to hope for. Jane felt that such thoughts must pass through her sister's mind, and she also felt much pained that she had undesignedly thus added, by contrast, to Ellen's unhappy feelings. When she returned home, she put away her new dresses and her blankets. She had no heart to look at them, no no heart to enjoy herown good things, while the sister she somuch loved was denied like present comforts, and worse than all, weighed down with a heart sickening dread of the future.

We will not linger to contrast, in a series of domestic pictures, the effects of industry and idleness on the two married sisters and their families,—effects, the cause of which, neither aided materially in producing. Such contrasts, though useful, cannot but be painful to the mind, and we would a thousand times, rather give pleasure than pain. But one more striking contrast we will give as requisite in showing the tendency and end of good or bad principles, united with good or bad habits.

Unable to get any employment in the village, Thorne, hearing that steady work could be obtained in Charleston, South Carolina, sold off a portion of his scanty furniture, and his cow, by which he received money enough to remove there with his wife and child. Thus were the sisters separated; and in that separation, gradually estranged from the tender and lively affection that presence and constant intercourse had kept burning with undiminished brightness. Each became more and more absorbed, every day, in increasing cares and duties; yet to one those cares and duties were painful, and to the other full of delight.

Ten years from the day on which they parted in tears, Ellen sat, near the close of day, in a meanly furnished room, in one of the southern cities, watching, with a troubled countenance, the restless slumber of her husband. Her face was very thin and pale, and it had a fixed and strongly marked expression of suffering. Two children, a boy and a girl, the one about six, and the other a little over ten years of age, were seated listlessly on the floor, which was uncarpeted. They seemed to have no heart to play. Even the elasticity of childhood had departed from them.—From the appearance of Thorne, it was plain he was very sick; and from all indications the room in which he lay afforded, it was plain that want and suffering were its inmates. The habits of idleness he had suffered to creep at a slow but steady pace upon him, and idleness brought intemperance, and intemperance reacting upon idleness completed his ruin, and reduced his family to poverty in its most appalling form. Now he was sick with a southern fever, and his miserable dwelling afforded him no cordial, nor his wife and children the healthy food that nature required.

"Mother!" said the little boy, getting up from the floor, where he had been sitting for half an hour, as still as if he were sleeping, and coming to Ellen's side, he looked up earnestly and imploringly in her face.

"What, my child?" the mother said, stooping down and kissing his forehead, while she parted with her fingers the golden hair that fell in tangled masses over it.

"Can't I have a piece of bread, mother?"

Ellen did not reply, but rose slowly and went to the closet from which she took part of a loaf, and cutting a slice from it, handed it to her hungry boy. It was her last loaf, and all their money was gone. The little fellow took it, and breaking a piece off for his sister, gave it to her; the two children then sat down side by side, and eat in silence the morsel that was sweet to them.

With an instinctive feeling, that from no where but above could she look for aid and comfort, did Ellen lift her heart and pray that she might not be forsaken in her extremity. And then she thought of her sister Jane, from whom she had not heard for a long time, and her heart turned towards her with an eager and yearning desire to see her face once more.

And now let us look in upon Jane and her family. Her husband, by saving where Thorne spent in foolish trifles, and working when Thorne was idle, gradually laid by enough to purchase a little farm, upon which he had removed, and there, industry and frugality brought its sure rewards. They had three children: little Ellen had grown to a lively, rosy-cheeked, merry-faced girl of eleven years; and George who had followed Ellen, was in his seventh year, and after him came the baby, now just completing the twelfth month of its innocent happy life. It was in the season when the farmer's toil is rewarded, and William Moreland was among those whose labor had met an ample return.

How different was the scene in [illegible] Ellen [illegible] sad[illegible].

The table was spread for the evening meal, always [illegible] bright [illegible] the supper was not yet [illegible] ken their places [illegible] Moreland [illegible] drawn up with the [illegible] he was amusing with an apple from a well-filled basket, the product of his own orchard.

A hesitating rap [illegible] tidy maiden who assisted Mrs. Moreland in her duties.

"It is the [illegible]," she said, in a tone of [illegible] as she opened the door.

[illegible]

"O, but that looks [illegible] Ellen, peeping into the dish [illegible] paused, to smile [illegible] ing the coming [illegible].

The [illegible]

"SAVANNAH, [illegible]

"My Dear Sister Jane,—[illegible]

[illegible]

ELLEN."

Jane hand[illegible]

[illegible]

* * * * * *

In one month [illegible] ter was [illegible] inmates of Moreland's [illegible]. Gra[illegible] the [illegible] of the former [illegible] ment to her cheek. [illegible] weeks were as gay and happy as any.—The delight [illegible] William Moreland, as he saw [illegible] change, was a [illegible] he had sacrificed in making them happy.—Nor did Ellen [illegible] entire burden upon her sister and her husband: her activity and willingness found enough to do that needed doing, and Jane often used to say to her husband.

"I don't know which is the gainer over the other, me or Ellen; for I am sure, I can't see how we could do without her."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

L. W. BLISS' Window Sash
Bliss' & Co. " Blinds.
Helme's Sampson & Salisbury Edged Tools consisting of Broad Axes, Hand Axes, Adzes and Chisels, at Factory prices by J. N. ELMORE.
October 4. Manufacturers' Agent.

"A nimble sixpence is better than a slow shilling."

SPRING GOODS! SPRING GOODS!

CHEAP! CHEAP!! CHEAP!!!

THE undersigned are receiving a large assortment of goods suitable for the spring and summer trade, and invite their friends and the public generally to call and examine them at the one price store. SUTTON & QUINBY.

How to make money,

IS the study of mankind and of the Yankee Nation in particular. The easiest and most practicable plan for accomplishing the desired end in these times is to "Save Money," which can be done by purchasing NEW GOODS, instead of the trashy accumulations of many shops and many years. [illegible] this, is at ELMORE'S whose stock of NEW GOODS is nearly equal to [illegible] village and who is daily dispensing great bargains to "Fortune's Favorites."
May [illegible]

Of Drugs and Medicines,

THE [illegible] a much larger stock and [illegible] lower than those who advertise [illegible].
May 26. J. N. ELMORE.

[illegible] fashionable Hats, [illegible] low at the
STONE STORE.

NEW TAILORING ESTABLISHMENT.

THE [illegible] inform the Citizens of De [illegible] that he has opened a [illegible] S. G. Walker's store [illegible] New York City [illegible] warranted if made by [illegible] New York Spring and Summer [illegible] W. P. GUEST.
[illegible] 1842.

FLOUR! FLOUR!! FLOUR!!!

SUPERFINE [illegible] for sale at the Farmers' Ex[illegible] good order in barrels and [illegible] Flour is made from the best of western wheat at one of the best mills in the state.
S. G. WALKER.
De Ruyter, [illegible] 1842.

BLANKS! BLANKS!!

JUST [illegible] Deeds, Personal Mortgages, &c. [illegible] at this office
[illegible] 1842.

TEAS, SUGARS

C[illegible] NEW YORK CASH STORE.

500 [illegible] for sale at the STONE STORE.

AGENTS FOR THE REGISTER.

NEW-YORK

[illegible]

MICHIGAN

[illegible]

WISKONSAN.

Milton [illegible] F. M. [illegible]

IOWA.

[illegible] C. M. Wheelock

ILLINOIS

[illegible] James [illegible]

The Seventh-day Baptist Register

IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY,

AT DE RUYTER, MADISON CO., N. Y.,

BY

JAMES BAILEY.

TERMS.—[illegible] subscribers who have the paper left at their doors, $2 25, in advance, or $2 50, at the expiration of the year.

☞ To office and mail subscribers, $2 IN ADVANCE.

Each communication, involving facts and intended for insertion in the paper, must be accompanied by a responsible name.

No subscription received for a less term than six months.

☞ All subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, will be considered as wishing to continue their subscription, and their paper will be sent to them accordingly. No paper will be discontinued till all arrearages are paid except at the discretion of the publisher.

☞ Advertisements inserted on the most reasonable terms.

☞ All letters and communications to ensure attention should be addressed to the publisher free of postage.

L. T. Rogers 2

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.

VOL. III.—NO 30.] JAMES BAILEY, Editor and Proprietor.——A. H. BURDICK, Printer. [WHOLE No. 134.

Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,——The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.—Commandment.——If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments.—Jesus Christ.

Two dollars in advance.] DE RUYTER, N. Y., FOURTH-DAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1842. [Published weekly.

Original Papers.

The Committee appointed by the General Conference to devise some plan by which the benevolent enterprises of the denomination may be promoted with the greatest possible efficiency, would respectfully report:

That they are deeply impressed with the fact, that in regard to those great movements which directly tend to the building up of the Redeemer's kingdom, we are far behind what the spirit of our holy religion requires. Our Missionary Societies are so crippled in their operations, that their influence is scarcely felt, and their existence hardly known beyond the precincts of our own denomination.

Our Tract operations amount to almost nothing. In the cause of Education we are doing but little; and no regard to Bible distribution, Foreign Missions, and other efforts which characterize the present advanced state of the Christian world, we are completely dead. Notwithstanding this lamentable state of things, the signs of the times are loudly calling upon us as a people for some vigorous effort towards the moral renovation of the world. We cannot but "discern the signs of the times," and we feel that it is high time to awake out of sleep, and enter into such organizations as will enable us to exert the greatest moral power for the conversion of the world to God.

Our General Conference, under its present organization at least, does not seem to be adapted to carrying forward with vigor the benevolent operations to which we have referred. And any such organization of it as would give it an entire new character, would, we fear, be regarded with jealousy. Many of our aged brethren, whom we regard with fond affection, are not prepared for any great change in its features, and we would not without the sternest necessity recommend any course that would be to their grief.—For the same reason, we would not recommend the dissolution of the Conference.—before that he was [illegible] with those feelings which find a place in the breasts of our aged fathers and spiritual counsellors, who have watched over the interests of the connection with all the yearnings of parental fondness. They have experienced the advantages of a Conference in former years, and if any farther advantages can be reaped from its continuance, or any solid satisfaction afforded to those whom it is our duty to love, let it be continued.

The Committee, after a free interchange of views with one another, are of opinion that our organizations for benevolent efforts should be as simple as possible. The less complicated the better. On this account we would not recommend that the General Conference, or any other single organization, have the control of all the benevolent enterprizes of the denomination. These different enterprizes, requiring to be variously modified according to their nature, cannot well be combined together under the control of a single Society, without rendering its machinery too complicated to be understood by our brethren at large. And we are confident that if the plan of operation is not perfectly understood, their liberalities cannot be secured, nor their sympathies enlisted. On the contrary, they will look on it with a suspicion fatal to its prosperity.—With this view of the case, we would proceed to give some general outlines of a plan for promoting the cause of Domestic Missions.

We recommend, first,—That each church in the denomination consider itself a Missionary Society, raising in the course of each year, such an amount of available funds for the Missionary cause, as their circumstances will warrant, and adopting such a plan to effect this as they may in their judgment think best.

Second—Let the Association to which such churches belong become a Central Missionary Society, to which these churches shall be auxiliary. Let the church Societies annually transmit their funds to this Central Society to be taken charge of.—Let this Central Society have its Treasurer and other officers as they may think necessary, that every thing may be managed orderly, and with a view to the sure accomplishment of the final result contemplated.

Third—Let a General Society be organized, to which all these Central Societies or Associations shall be auxiliary. Let this General Society meet annually, and receive and take charge of the funds contributed by the various auxiliary Societies, and of all such donations as they may receive from any other sources. Let this Society have its Executive Board, who shall appoint all its Missionaries, select their fields of labor, disburse the funds of the Society, receive and take charge of reports of Missionaries, and perform generally such business as may be assigned to it—subject, however, to such restrictions as may be imposed by the Society, to which it shall be held amenable, and at each annual meeting of the Society submitting a written report of all its operations during the past year.

Fourth—Should an individual church, not belonging to an Association, wish to bear a part in the operations of the Society, let such church become a Missionary Society, after the same plan recommended to churches that are associated; and after having collected their funds, let them send them directly to the General Society, where they shall be represented in such manner as the Constitution of the Society shall require.—Or, should an individual church, though belonging to an Association, choose for reasons satisfactory to themselves, not to transmit their funds through the medium of the Associational Society, but directly to the General Society, let it be done, and let the Constitution of the General Society be so framed as to allow full liberty in this respect. We think, however, that associated churches will generally choose to be represented through the medium of their Associations. It will commonly be less expensive for them to do so.

Fifth—There may be instances where a number of brethren are located in a neighborhood by themselves, remote from a church. They may desire to combine together for the promotion of the missionary cause, and to send their funds directly to the General Society. Let the Constitution be so framed as to meet such cases.

Sixth—At each annual meeting of the General Society, let a sermon be delivered by some one who shall have been previously appointed, with special reference to the great design of the Society. Also, let persons be appointed to deliver short and spirited addresses during the progress of the meeting, so as to render it as interesting an occasion as possible.

In regard to the proper basis of representation in such a General Society as is here contemplated, your committee are hardly prepared to offer any thing definite. Perhaps it does not belong to us to say any thing on the subject. We are aware that some of our brethren are opposed to any representation upon the basis of dollars and cents contributed, while others are of opinion that it is the only plan that will give efficiency to the operations of the Society.—This matter, however, may be fully discussed when the Society is organized and the constitution framed.

The outlines of the foregoing plan have reference particularly to the cause of Domestic Missions. But the same general course may be taken with regard to other benevolent efforts. Should it be deemed expedient at any time to organize a Foreign Mission Society, we have only to proceed in the same manner, only let the General Society be distinct and separate from that of Domestic Missions, having its own organization, its own officers, its own distinct Executive Board, &c. The same may be said of the Hebrew Mission Society. Also of the Tract effort,—and in general of whatever enterprises we may engage in, care being taken that there be such modifications of each as the nature of the case may demand.

Your Committee would recommend that the Anniversaries of the General Societies be held annually during the same week, and all at one place, such as shall have been previously determined. They would also recommend that in the selection of the place, an eye be had to its central situation, or its convenience of access, and the influence that may probably be exerted from such place in favor of the interests of the denomination.

Should the plan submitted in this Report be adopted by the General Conference, your committee hopes that measures will be taken towards the earliest possible organization of such Societies—and that the Societies now in existence will wind up their operations in the most judicious manner, with a view to becoming merged in the new organization as soon as practicable.

THOS. B. BROWN,
ELI S. BAILEY,
ALEX. CAMPBELL,
PAUL STILLMAN,
DAVID DUNN,
JAS. R. IRISH,
W. B. MAXSON,
JOEL GREENE,
AZOR ESTEE,
DANIEL COON,
WM. SATTERLEE,
Committee.

Religious Department.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

THE DUTY OF COMPARISON.

From the German of J. G. Alberti.

BY ELIHU BURRITT.

If we look into Revelation, it preaches unto us love to our neighbors, and the approbation and good pleasure of God which those secure who practice that virtue. I will not here repeat all the testimony which the scriptures furnish upon this point, but only remind you that it was the chief object of the gospel to make us more intimately acquainted with the love which God has shown to man, and which should be our only model of imitation. When the love of God, which extends to the evil and ungrateful, is proclaimed in our ears, we are admonished to be perfect as our Father who is in heaven is perfect. When we are taught the great institution which he has ordained for our salvation, and that, to this end, he has not withholden any thing, "not even his only begotten Son, but he has delivered him up for us all," next follows the admonition: "If God so loved us, we ought also to love one another." When it is recorded of this Son of God, that he gave himself up for us, out of love to men, this love is brought before us as an example for us to follow, and in consideration of which we should not count our own lives dearer, in many cases in which we may be called to sacrifice them to the service of our neighbors. "Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us: and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren." Is it then our duty to lay down our lives for the brethren? how much less should we esteem the goods of this world, which are so evanescent, which innumerable accidents may rob us of, which we cannot take with us when summoned away by death, and which, notwithstanding, may be the means of promoting the best good of our neighbors.

Add to this also, that God will look upon what we expend for this noble object, as a return for those manifold gifts by which he has preferred us before thousands of our brethren. "He that hath pity upon the poor," says Solomon, "lendeth unto the Lord, and that which he hath given will he pay him again." Yes, what can be plainer than that Jesus will look upon what we do to his brethren, his redeemed, as done to himself! On that great day he will declare before the assembly of angels and men, "verily, I say unto you, inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

And yet how can men of an unmerciful heart flatter themselves that they love God! How can they contradict the declaration of John in our text: "Whoso hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" a declaration which proves that their own imaginary love of God is a miserable self-deception. And this is what we would particularly show you.

But after all, of what utility is this knowledge? Does it give any among you a secret dread to hear, that your hearts are void of the love of God, just in proportion as they are shut against a beneficent love towards your neighbors? If so, then your fancied security is gone, your knowledge, faith, and hope must perish like the hope of the hypocrite. Then may you never expect to enter that realm of love and bliss, where our happiness will principally consist in loving God with a perfect heart. O, if you who have hitherto shut your hearts against the wants of your neighbors, and seen them with indolent indifference struggling with penury and diversified wretchedness—if you have been convinced of the truth of any thing we have now said, then let it sink deep into your minds, and awaken you to inquire, whether the least spark of love to God is glowing in your souls. And as your eternal salvation hangs upon this question, it is of infinite moment that you decide it correctly.—Rest not this decision upon those signs which have hitherto constituted the basis of your conclusion; not upon your assiduity in the exercises of devotion; not in the observation of the public worship of God; not upon the desire you manifest to attain a farther knowledge of religion; nor upon the consciousness of deriving a species of satisfaction in discharging the obligation of justice. Love, and love, too, towards your neighbor, must here decide the whole.—Perhaps there are those persons who are entirely wanting in this latter love, who have never expended any of their fortune to this noble end; there are others who have indeed given, but not because it was a blessing, but a necessity. Their little charities bear no proportion to the increase, the abundance of good things which God has given them. Whenever you find this disposition existing, then it is time to reform. Henceforward ask not, how large is my fortune? but, what use have I made of it? not, "how much must I yet gain to leave my children the capital which shall enable them to lead the same splendid manner of life which I lead?" but "how much must I spend of this fortune which I possess by the divine blessing, in order to make up what I have hitherto lacked in works of love?" How many poor families must I support; how many tears must I dry up; how much sorrow must I alleviate, if I would not belong to the unmerciful, who shall be judged without mercy! An occasion is not wanting. There are a multitude of poor who need your assistance. True, we would not have you scatter your benefits without discrimination or choice, nor support the begging vagabond with your alms. We would have you give to him who deserves it, who would almost perish without your help; to the houseless, to the artisan who, with all the briny sweat of his brow, is unable to earn what is necessary for the support of his numerous friends; to the poor widow who eats her bread with her tears, because she has not wherewith to still the hunger of her children or cover their nakedness; to that man whom you can place by your free gift in a station to resume his business, and thus to support himself and his family. See what a wide field for your beneficence opens before you! See how many objects for that instinctive sympathy which God has implanted within you, and which you have hitherto stifled in servile avarice!—What incentives and ways to show your love to God in good works! But if all this cannot move you, O! ask us not to place any longer the least confidence in your love to God, nor to recognize you as his true worshipers. Above all, ask this not of God, who looks through all the habiliments of hypocrisy; ask it not of your future Judge, who will receive those alone into his kingdom who have done good, who have fed the hungry, and clothed the naked, and relieved the wretched.

But ye humane souls, for we recognize to our joy those among our hearers who find their happiness in good works—be ye not weary therein. Let not the ingratitude of those you have assisted, dishearten you from following farther that admonition of Jesus. "Do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again; and your reward shall be great, and ye shall be the children of the Highest." Yes, who shall name the reward which is prepared for you, when you go hence to take possession of that treasure, which you have laid up here on earth by your good works; not these fugitive goods, but the kingdom of your Father, that incorruptible inheritance reserved for you in heaven! This great hope will strengthen you in death. It will help you conquer in the last conflict. O may we all have this hope to accompany us in our last hours!

IMPORTANCE OF THE PASTORAL RELATION.

Could all our ministers and churches have a deep and intelligent conviction of the exceeding importance of the regular pastoral relation, we believe the most delightful effects would be speedily manifest. Every church needs a pastor. She needs to have a man of God, chosen most deliberately, and set apart by his brethren to the great work of taking charge of her spiritual interests as the business of his life. He should be pledged to devote his toils and best efforts to her spiritual edification. He should publicly covenant to give himself to the service of the church, and feel that he cannot be at liberty to pursue any other work requiring much of his attention or care. For this purpose, let the church engage to support him, to defend him, and to receive instruction from his lips. Let him mature his main plans of action, and by so doing seek permanent results for many years. Let him commit himself to the study of divine truth, striving constantly to learn, that he may grow in grace himself, and most effectually impart the glorious knowledge to others.

The connection thus formed will be the source of countless blessings. Means and sources of holy influence will be continually occurring and augmenting. More and more will the pastor find, demanding and rewarding his vigilance, toil, and care.

Let every church have a pastor. Let them, if they are feeble, do all they can for the comfortable support of their pastor. Let him, if there is no other way, devote a part of his time to a large garden, or a small farm, thereby earning a part of his support, rather than to have the church left destitute of a pastor. Let the church be aided by sister churches, and the expedient just mentioned will seldom be necessary.—Let all parties lay aside mere worldly pride, and give themselves to every act of self-denial and every necessary effort for the maintenance, unbroken, of the tender and strong pastoral relation.

The more we consider the state of the churches and the condition of the ministry, the more do we feel obligated to protest against the miserable system of stated supplies. It forbids the minister to feel at home. It discourages him from forming any foreseeing plans, and from prosecuting any thorough course of study. It encourages among the people the habit of idle criticism, rather than of docile seeking of instruction. It fails to bind the church together, diminishes her benevolent resources, exposes her to the spirit of division, and makes her liable to various disorders.

Let every church have a pastor. When the pastoral relation is formed, let it be permanent. If the pastor, ardent and eager in the study of the word of God, lays hold of its strong truths, he will interest his people in his preaching, and preserve their interest for many years. The system of divine truth is so deep, and large, and rich, that it will supply him and his people with the amplest instruction, and leave enough for his successor. All that is needful is study—unceasing, laborious and persevering study. Let him cultivate a pleasing manner; but most of all, let him obtain great, vital, earnest thoughts, and utter them in his own natural manner, only with earnestness of heart corresponding to their importance. His people will forget to criticise the manner. They will respect, love, and reverence his faithful, earnest and powerful soul. So he will be permanent.

Let not young men be too anxious in the selection of a place. Any place will furnish work enough for a pastor. Resolve, when the place is chosen, to do all in the power of mortal consecration towards making a full experiment of the Gospel in the place. To this, bend all your thoughts, and be contented with it. Be not looking out for better places. Resolve to make your own better, always better—if possible, best—most universally intelligent, devoted, benevolent, and happy.

These thoughts are written hastily. But they are the fruit of observation and reflection continued for a number of years. More and more do we deprecate changes. More earnestly than ever do we say to all churches who have not pastors, give no sleep to your eyes till you obtain one, and to all who have pastors, hold on and seek for mutual improvement, opposing all unnecessary change.—N. Y. Evangelist.

From the Protestant and Herald.

STRANGE CONTRARIETIES.

1. The Savior says—My kingdom is not of this world. If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight; but now is my kingdom not of this world. It is a mistake, says the Pope, I am the head of the Church, and I am a temporal Prince; I levy armies, fight battles, and do all other things which earthly sovereigns may of right do.

2. Marriage is honorable in all, says the Apostle Paul. Oh no! says the Pope—not in all; for it is not lawful for priests to marry.

3. A bishop must be the husband of one wife, says Paul. He shall be the husband of no wife at all, says the Pope. I will suffer no such thing—not I.

4. Have I not a right to lead about a wife, or a sister, as well as Cephas and the other apostles of our Lord? says Paul.—No, says the Pope; you may lead about a concubine, but a wife or sister you shall not.

5. By faith are ye saved, says the Apostle—not by works. Paul! says the Pope, this is a grand mistake: by works, to be sure. Why, we have had saints with us who have had more good works than were necessary for their own justification; and the surplusage is left at my disposal for the notable offenders in all time to come.

6. Call no man Father on earth, [in Eclesia,] says the Savior. But is not the Bishop of Rome emphatically called Papa, Pope? Holy Father?

7. Search the Scriptures, says Christ.—You shall do no such thing, says the Pope, without my express permission.

8. Now these [the Bereans] were more noble than those of Thessalonica, in that they searched the Scriptures, says Luke. O no! says the Pope, Luke you are wrong. The Bereans had no business to search the Scriptures. It is very dangerous for Laymen to be permitted to do any such thing.

9. The Savior, in giving the sacramental cup, said, Drink ye all of it; but the Pope says, all of you shall not drink of it. None of the Laity shall ever taste it. It is for the Clergy only.

10. There is one Mediator between God and man—the man Christ Jesus—says Paul. There are at least a thousand, says the Pope; and at the head of them stands not Christ Jesus, but the Virgin Mary.

11. Who can forbid water, says Peter, that these should not be baptized? Peter, says the Pope, your views are very defective; you should have said, who can forbid water, and oil, and salt and spittle.

12. I had rather speak five words with the understanding, than ten in an unknown language, says Paul. My liturgy is in latin; it is an unknown language to many, and is much better, says the Pope.

13. Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image or the likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath. Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them. In Roman Catholic cathedrals and chapels, there are images and likenesses of many things both in heaven and in earth; and who can tell how many times the priests, who minister at the altar, bow down before them?

14. Preach the word, says Paul. You will excuse me, says the Pope. I don't like to do it.

15. And daily in the temple, and in every house, they ceased not to teach and to preach Jesus; but the Pope preaches once a year, and not sure of that.

16. Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy, says the Bible. The Sabbath day is not half so holy, says the Pope, as All Saint's day.

17. Our Savior has taught us to pray, Lead us not into temptation; but the Pope has framed a systematic plan of temptation, in linking these three things together—auricular confession, the celibacy of the clergy, and the power of absolution.

18. Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them. They are not blessed, says the Pope; for they must go to Purgatory; neither can they rest until many masses are said for the repose of their souls.

19. In the Bible, the Bishop of Rome is called "the man of sin." In the Papal Church he is called His Holiness.

20. The ministers of Christ are forbidden to lord it over God's heritage; but the Pope of Rome lords it over both God and man's heritage. He claims to be universal Bishop, and deposes monarchs.

Here are twenty strange contrarieties—but it must be confessed there is one coincidence. Diotrephes loveth to have the preeminence, says the Apostle John; and so do I, says the Pope. He receiveth not the brethren, and forbiddeth them that would, and casteth them out of the Church, adds John, and this also is exactly what I do, says the Pope. One coincidence and twenty contrarieties!

THE DYING HOUR.

If the experience of the dying hour could be faithfully written, the thoughts that then fill the brain, like the last inhabitants of a crumbling temple, and the feelings that then occupy the chilled heart, be revealed to the eye of sense, what a view would be displayed! The period of dissolution brings with it emotions of a peculiar character. There are at that time operations through which the soul never passed. Nothing appears in its old aspect. Like a a splendid hall which has been hung in new drapery, each object wears a different dress. Opinions that the strongest force of argument could not repel or withdraw from the mind, then hastily depart; prejudices that rooted themselves more and more deeply at every attack, then bend before the blast; cherished feelings that the bosom had ever clung to, then are hated; and desires that had ever found a home beside affection's altar, then are banished. What fearful change is this, that then befalleth the spirit? Are the faculties then so weakened as to prevent it from thinking and feeling aright? No, it now sees things as they are. Falsehood has ceased to obscure its vision. Truth, long deprived of her authority, long forced to crouch like a slave, obtains her rightful station, and shows that the pretended nature of the world is very unlike its real character. O what an hour is this! when the soul is aroused to the true relations of objects—when mistakes are seen, but alas, too late for correction—when eternity's importance and awe enter into the decision, wishes, and feelings of the mind!

The hour of death! In this brief space the past is reviewed. However treacherous memory may have been on a thousand occasions, she now acquits herself with fidelity. Omits she now to unroll the record, which her hands had so often clasped? Is she like the trumpet, that bloweth an uncertain sound? Life's history her tongue now repeats—scenes, forgotten scenes are recalled; and buried events are brought up before the eye. Over the long path which we have made, she leads us; here she stops to meditate on some dark deed; there she shows another way into which passion hurried us. Have we injured friends? Have the true and fond bosoms on which we rested, been pierced by the darts of unkindness? Memory presents it. Have we performed actions of generosity? Have the desolation of the widows been cheered, and the lone misery of the orphan been relieved by us? Has the path of one individual lost a thorn by our instrumentality, or the wreath of love had one rose added by our hands? Delighted with the occurrence, memory repeats it in strains of exultation! Crowded into this narrow period, the moments resemble the waves, that now dance in the sunlight to the music of the breeze, and now flow on in solemn silence beneath the shade of over-hanging boughs. But does the past alone employ the fugitive hour? That hour imagination also makes her own; whatever may have hindered its operation, is now removed. Loftier and freer than ever soars its wings, over the highest summit it easily rises, borrowing life from death itself!

The dying hour! It is then that time and we are parted. Though he may led us over a diversified way, we then forsake him; he continues to travel on in his own course, but we are ushered into a new condition. Cares cease to distress; the last tear falls from the eye, the last sigh escapes from the bosom, darkness gathers upon the earth, relieved only by that pure light which, proceeding from heaven, hath power to gild the closing scene. Mortality, shrink not from this hour. Pursue virtue—let religion be thy study, O man, and whenever and wherever this event occurs, it shall find thee happily prepared. Whether death meet thee at the door when midnight reigneth; or mid-day pour its tide of glory on the world;—whether it meet thee amid the consolations of home, or the privations of a stranger's country;—whether it meet thee on the uprising billows, or in the fruitful plain;—its stern brow shall bear a soft and holy expression, and its angry voice shall speak no tones but those of peace and love!"

Ah! in that hour how shall conscience answer the fearful query,

How many souls
Whom thou hast caused to worship God, on earth,
Shall be thy crown of endless joy in Heaven!

To be misunderstood by the multitude, to be misrepresented by the many, and to be maligned by the few, will ever be the fate of those who embark in any subject matter of reform, which aims a blow at the sinful practices, the blind prejudices, the corrupt propensities and inordinate selfishness of mankind.—Cab. and Visiter.

To be great is not always to be good, as notoriety is not always fame.—Ib.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, September 21, 1842.

☞Circumstances, for which our readers are not accountable, have prevented us from doing much with the quill "editorial" this week. It may be we shall do better in future.

General Conference.

The last session of the Conference was one of more than common interest. We publish this week a report of that body.—In accordance with that report a Constitution for a domestic Missionary Society was formed and referred to churches and brethren till next year, when it is hoped the organization will be completed on a basis that will ensure efficiency and permanency.—We shall publish the Constitution soon.—Br. Brown was appointed to address the denomination on the subject through the medium of the "Register." Hear what he has to offer, before condemning the plan.

The Minutes will be published soon.—A previous pressure of business in the office may delay them a little. An extra number will be published for any who may order them. Orders should be sent immediately if any person or church wish them.

Ministerial Conference.

The Minister's Conference of the Central Association will hold a session with the 1st Church in Verona on the second Tuesday in October next, at 10 o'clock, A. M.

Subjects for Essays to be read on the occasion were assigned as follows:

Eld. Eli S. Bailey, Depravity.
" Joel Greene, Divinity of Christ.
" S. B. Crandall, Christian Benevolence.
" W. Greene, Deadness to the world.
" J. Bailey, Doctrine and Subjects of Baptism.
" C. M. Lewis, Importance of gravity with the Ministry.
" E. Robinson, Humility.
" R. G. Burdick, God's wisdom displayed in the Institution of the Ministry.
" V. Hull, Respect to the aged.

All Ministers and Licentiates in the Association are constitutionally members of the Conference. All others are invited to attend, as the exercises will be public.

The object of the Conference is to harmonize the views of its members, and concert the best means of carrying forward the work assigned them in God's vineyard.

J. BAILEY, Sec'y.

Daring Burglary.

The Jewelry Shop of Mr. I. R. Cook, of this village, was entered by means of false keys on the night of the 18th inst., and property to the amount of some $300, was stolen. Mr. Cook very liberally offers a Reward of Fifty Dollars for the detection of the thief. We trust our citizens will not suffer Mr. C. to pay the reward unassisted for these midnight desperadoes, if they are apprehended. Every citizen ought to be interested in bringing the guilty to punishment, and in the suppression of vice in our community.

For the Register.

The Western Mission.

Mr. Editor—Sir—That our denomination take a deep interest in the brethren scattered throughout the vast regions of the west, has been witnessed during the past year, in the satisfaction with which the communications of Elder Scott have been received, and that there exists a hearty desire to aid these destitute brethren, has been demonstrated by the liberal contributions obtained by Elder Griswold in the eastern and central sections of the denomination, for the support of Elder Scott. In view of the circumstances of our brethren in the far west, the success of Elder Scott, and the response of the churches; it was anticipated by many that the Misssionary Society would devise some means whereby a Missionary, or Missionaries could make a permanent location in that region, and that a work so auspiciously begun, would be prosecuted to a happy issue.

To abandon for the present our favorable prospects, or prosecute them in a state of indebtedness, it seems to me were not the alternatives before the Society. Had means been devised, whereby the churches could have had the privilege of deciding the question in regard to the future and immediate occupation of the field, which God seems to have laid open before them; their course already referred to gives the best assurance that they would not have hesitated for a moment, but that promptly and liberally, they would have responded in the affirmative.

I believe it is generally bad policy to undertake disjointed and unconnected efforts in a denomination who have a regular medium of united effort; yet perhaps the circumstances are an adequate apology for the adoption of such a course in the present emergency. If no irregular effort is made by the churches, their obligation to God and their brethren; their cherished hopes, and the anxious expectation of the infant churches in the west, over whom we had but just begun to rejoice, must be deferred, and very many a heart, through "hope deferred, made sick."

Permit me to suggest for your consideration, and that of the churches, that at the next concert of prayer, on the evening of the first Sabbath of October, or on some other early occasion, each church take this subject into consideration, and if they deem it their duty and the duty of the denomination to prosecute the western mission, that they ascertain how much can be contributed by them to this end, during the ensuing year, and forward a statement of the same, with an expression of their views, to the Executive of the Missionary Society. In this way that Committee might act, not as the Executive of the Missionary Society, but as brethren, to whom a special trust has been committed. I name them, merely because from their appointment by the Society, they would be a body in whom the churches could confide. A small sum from each church would be sufficient to answer the proposed end.

W. D. C.

The above proposition we commend to the churches as worthy of consideration.—The peculiar circumstances of the Missionary Society forbid the incurring any expense the coming year. The Executive Committee were therefore instructed accordingly. If any thing is done, it must be by voluntary contribution, and for a specified purpose. And so far as we are acquainted with the feelings of the brethren, we are assured there is not wanting a benevolent spirit and that there is a readiness to meet the expenses of a Western Mission for the year. In the true christian there is a benevolent spirit that is ever seeking objects on which to exert its influence, and a field in which to labor. To us a field large and inviting is opened in the Western States.—The past year shows what may be done, and in a manner which calls on us for the exercise of our benevolence. Everywhere we look, the door of usefulness is opening and inviting our efforts.

The question now to be decided is, will we this year, by our voluntary contributions, sustain missionary operations in the west? How else can we, as a community of Christians, so efficiently labor in the vineyard of the Lord. A few shillings, or we may say pennies, from each of our number would furnish the necessary funds for the Mission. These contributions, accompanied with the Christian's fervent effectual prayers would doubtless bring a most cheering report to all who might participate in the labor. Will our brethren entertain the proposition?—If so, (and we see not why) let pledges be immediately sent from those disposed to act so that the work may immediately commence.

News of the Day.

From the New York Tribune.

THE NEW TARIFF.

Now that this important Bill has become a law, we publish the following list of duties it imposes upon each important article of import, adopting always the amendments of the Senate. The act is to take effect immediately.

Names of Articles.		Duties by Act 1832.	Bill passed.
Flannels, and baises,	square yard	16	14
Carpeting, Brussels, &c.	"	63	55
do Venetian, &c.	"	35	30
do floor cloth pat	"	43	35
Oilcloth furniture	"	12 1-2	10
Cotton bagging	"	3 1-2	4
Vinegar	gallon	8	8
Beer in casks	"	15	15
Beer in bottles	"	20	20
Oil, fish, &c.	"	—	15
Oil, olive	"	25	20
Oil, Castor	"	40	—
Oil, linseed	"	25	25
Oil, raposeed	"	25	25
Sugar, brown and clayed,	pound	2 1-2	2 1-2
Sugar, white clayed	"	3 1-2	4
Sugar, loaf	"	12	6
Sugar, lump & and other refin	"	10	6
Sugar, candy	"	12	4
Sugar, sirup	"	2 1-2	5
Chocolate	"	4	4
Cheese	"	9	—
Tallow candles	"	5	4
Lard	"	3	3
Beef and pork	"	2	2
Bacon	"	3	3
Butter	"	5	5
Saltpetre, refined	"	3	2
Oil of vitriol	"	3	1
Dry ochre	"	1	1
Ochre in oil	"	1 1-2	—
Red and white lead	"	5	4
Whiting	"	1	1 1-2
Litharge	"	5	—
Sugar of lead	"	5	4
Lead, pig, &c.	"	3	3
Lead, pipes	"	5	4
Lead, old scrap	"	2	1 1-2
Cordage, untarred	"	5	4 1-2
Twine, pack thread, &c.	"	5	6
Corks	"	12	30 p c
Copper rods and bolts	"	4	4
Copper nails and spikes	"	5	4
Wire, cap or bonnet	"	12	12
" iron & steel nov adv 14	"	4	5
" " " above No. 14	"	2	8a11
Iron nails	"	5	3
Iron spikes	"	4	2 1-2
" cables, chains and parts	"	3	2 1-2
" anchors	"	2	2 1-2
" anvils	"	2	2 1-2
" blacksmiths' ham'rs, &c.	"	2 1-2	2 1-2
" castings, vessels, &c.	"	1 3-4	1 1-2
" all other	"	1	[illegible]
" round and braziers' rods 3-16 a 8-16 dia.	"	3	2 1-2
" nail or spike rods	"	3	2 1-2
" sheet, or hoop	"	3	2 1-2
" band, &c.	"	3	2 1-2
" in pigs	ton	10 00	9 00
" old scrap	cwt.	62 1-2	50
" bar rolled	ton	30 00	25 00
" bar hammered	"	18 00	17 00
Hemp	cwt.	2 00	2 00
Alum	"	2 50	1 50
Copperas	"	2 00	2 00
Wheat flour	"	50	70
Salt	bush.	10	8
Coal	"	6	1 75
Wheat	"	25	25
Oats	"	10	10
Potatoes	"	10	10
Paper, folio and qr p'rt	lb.	20	17
" foolscap, &c.	"	17	15
" printing cop'pt, &c.	"	10	10 1-2
" sheathing, &c.	"	3	3
" all other	"	15	15
Books prior to 1775	vol.	4	4
" other than English	"	4	4
" Greek and Latin bound	"	15	15
" " " unbound	"	13	13
" all other bound	"	30	—
" " unbound	"	26	—
Apth's vials under 6 oz.	gr.	1 75	1 71
" " 6 to 16 oz.	"	2 25	2 25
Demijohns	No.	25	15a20
Glass bottles to 1 quart	"	2 00	3 00
Glass bottles over 1 quart	"	2 25	4 00
Playing cards	pack	30	25
Window glass not over 8 by 10, per 100 feet		3 00	2 50
Window glass over 8 by 10 and not over 10 by 12, 100 square feet		3 50	3 50
Window glass over 10 by 12, 100 square feet,		4 00	6 00
Fish, dried or smoked,	quintal	1 00	1 00
Fish, salmon	barrel	2 00	2 00
Fish, mackerel	"	1 50	1 50
Fish, all other	"	1 00	1 00
Shoes and Slippers, silk,	pair	30	—
Shoes, prunella	"	25	25
Shoes, leather, &c.	"	25	30
Shoes, children	"	15	15
Boots and Bootees	"	1 50	1 20
Merino shawls	per cent.	50	40
Cloths and Cassimeres	"	50	40
Other woolen manufactures	"	50	30
Clothes, ready made	"	50	50
Wool, over 8 cts. per lb.		40 per ct. and 4 cts.	30 per ct. and 3 cts.
Woollen yarn per lb.		50 per ct. and 4 cts.	30 per ct.
Glass, cut per lb.		30 per ct. and 3 cts.	25a42
Glass, plain and other per lb.		20 per ct. and 2 cts.	10
Silk goods—pongees and plain white do.	per lb.		1 50
all other	"		2 50
Watches and diamonds			7 1-2
Gems, pearls, &c.			7
Molasses, 4 1-2 mills per lb. instead of 5 cts. per gallon
Wines—Madeira, Sherry, San Lucar, Canary, per gall.			60
Champagne			40
Port, Burgundy, and Claret in bottles			35
" " " in casks			15
Teneriffe and Claret in casks			6
White, not enumerated, of France, Austria, Prussia, Sardinia, Portugal, in casks			7 1-2
" in bottles			20
Red, of do. in casks			6
" do. in bottles			25
White and Red of Spain, Germany, and the Mediterranean, not enumerated, in casks			12 1-2
do do in bottles			20
Wines of Sicily—Madeira and Marsala			25
Other wines of Sicily			15
All other wines and other than those of France, Austria, Prussia, Sardinia and Portugal, in bottles			65
do. in casks			25

The following list comprises all the important articles.

1. All articles imported for the use of the United States.

2. All goods, the product of the United States, exported and brought back, and books and personal and household effects of citizens of the United States dying abroad.

3. Paintings and statuary, the production of American artists residing abroad.

4. Wearing apparel in actual use, and other personal effects, and tools of trade, of persons arriving in the United States.

5. Philosophical apparatus, instruments, books, maps, and charts, statues, statuary, busts and casts, paintings, drawings, engravings, etching, specimens of sculpture, cabinets of coins, medals, gems and all other collections of antiquities, provided the same be specially imported in good faith for the use of (and by the order) of any society, incorporated or established for philosophical or literary purposes, or for the use and by the order of any college, academy, school, or seminary of learning in the United States.

6. Anatomical preparations, models of machinery, and of other inventions and improvements in the arts; specimens in natural history, mineralogy, and botany; trees, shrubs, bulbs or roots, and garden seeds, not otherwise specified; berries, nuts, and vegetables, used principally in dyeing or composing dyes; all dyewoods in stick; whale and other fish oils of American fisheries, and all other articles the produce of said fisheries; animals imported for breed; fish, fresh caught, imported for daily consumption; fruit, green or ripe, from the West Indies in bulk; tea and coffee, when imported in American vessels from the places of their growth.

7. Adhesive felt for sheathing vessels, aloes, antimony, crude argol, assafœdita, ava root, barilla, bark of cork tree manufactured; bells of bell metal, and chimes of bells; brass in pigs or bars, and old brass; Brazil wood, crude of brimstone and flour of sulphur, bullion, burr stones unwrought, cochineal, coins and gold and silver, copper imported in any shape for the use of the mint; copper, in pigs, or bars, and copper ore; old copper, cream of tartar, flints, ground flint, gold bullion, gold epaulettes, grindstones, gum Arabic, gum Senegal, gum tragacanth, India rubber, oakum, lac dye, leeches, madder, mother of Pearl, nicked nux vomica, palm leaf manufactured, palm oil, Peruvian bark, [illegible], ivory, plaster of Paris, ratans and reeds, saltpetre when crude, sarsaparilla, shellac, silver epaulettes and wings, stones called rotten.

These duties are imposed by the first nine sections of the law to be admitted free of duty:—

Section 10, enacts that on all unenumerated articles shall be imposed a tax of 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Section. An additional 10 per cent shall be levied on all goods which shall be imported in vessels not of the United States—when no specific discriminations is made by the bill: and 10 per cent. additional on all goods except those brought from beyond the Cape of Good Hope in foreign vessels—provided no treaty stipulations be infringed thereby.

Section 12. All duties shall be paid in cash—or the goods will be sold after [illegible] days detention.

Section 13, prescribes the method of selling, and means for the owner to recover the overplus.

Section 14 allows a drawback on foreign sugar refined in and exported from the United States, equal in amount to the duty paid on the foreign sugar: of 5 cents per gallon on spirits distilled from molasses till 1843, when it shall be only 4, and annually reduced 1 cent.

Section 15 enacts that no drawback shall be allowed to goods entitled to debenture, unless exported within three years after their import.

Section 16 provides the mode of valuation of all goods paying ad valorem duties, enacting that all costs, charges, and commissions, except insurance, shall be added to the market value.

Section 17 empowers collectors and appraisers to take testimony necessary for valuation.

Section 18 provides for cases of disagreement on appraisal.

Section 19 enacts penalties for attempts to evade the payment of duties.

Section 20 imposes on non-enumerated articles the same duties as those enumerated which they most resemble shall pay.

Section 21 directs the method of appraisal.

Section 22 provides for ports where there are no appraisers.

Section 23 directs the Secretary of the Treasury to make necessary rules for faithful appraisals.

Section 54 directs collectors to follow the Secretary's instructions.

Section 25 provides that the act shall not apply to vessels that shall leave their last port East of the Capes Good Hope and Henlopen, Sept. 1, 1842.

Section 26 provides that the penalties of the law of June 30, 1842, shall be continued.

Section 27 (Land Distribution) omitted.

Section 28, 29, 30, (Struck out in the Senate.)

Section 31 requires the Secretary annually to ascertain and report what articles have paid a duty of more than 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Section 32 prohibits the importation of indecent prints and books.

Section 33 establishes a ton at 20 hundred weight—at 112 lbs. each.

A new Section is added in the Senate, enacting that while the Distribution of the Public Lands is suspended, the 10 per cent. allowed to the Western States shall also be suspended.

From the Albany Journal.

STATE OF NEW-YORK, Secretary's Office, [illegible]

[illegible]

III. Art. 3, §18 of the Act [illegible] tions, &c. passed April 5th, 1842. The doubt which has been suggested is, whether, in the case where a town is not divided into election districts, more than three inspectors can be appointed by the town board to hold the election?

As this doubt may exist in other quarters, and as there is now no mode so eligible of giving advice to the boards of town officers on this subject as through the public press, it is deemed expedient to make this communication.

Every board of town officers must divide the town, if it contain more than five hundred electors, into election districts; and if it contain less than five hundred electors, they may, in their discretion, divide it into election districts. By the eighteenth section they are required to "assign at least three of their number to hold the election in each district;" and if there is not a sufficient number of the board for that purpose, "they shall assign one or more of their number to each district, and shall select from among the Justices of the Peace, the Commissioners of Common Schools and the Commissioners of Highways of such town, as many as shall be necessary, in addition to those previously assigned, to constitute at least three inspectors [illegible]

The Supervisor, Assessors and Town Clerk [illegible]

[illegible]

The [illegible] all directions. The New York [illegible] were never more ready [illegible] good notes than at present.

The Philadelphia Ledger states that G. W. Dixon performed the feat of walking and standing on a platform from Tuesday morning, 6th inst., night and day, until Friday noon, 9th inst., a period of 78 hours. His time expired on Thursday evening, being 60 hours. But with the view of testing physical endurance, he undertook to walk on 18 hours longer.

Ohio has 10 colleges and 80 academies and grammar schools, and 5,000 students, and about 5,000 primary and common schools, with 220,000 pupils.

It is said that 3 Lt. Colonels, 4 Majors, 17 Captains, 11 First and 19 Second Lieutenants, 1 Surgeon and 5 Assistant do. have been killed by the enemy, or have died from disease in Florida, since the commencement of the war.

Camp Meeting.—A great [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] Baptist associations.

[illegible] Mass., who [illegible] Government for [illegible] has been notified that [illegible] of the number only contracted [illegible] required. The notification has been received since the signing of the [illegible] Treaty." War stock is on the decline.

Very valuable salt springs have been found at Dundee, Yates county, on the lands of Mr. Smith Page. The brine is supposed to be as strong as that of the Onondaga saline.

A rattlesnake was killed in Winston county, Mississippi, some days ago, about ten feet in length, with thirty-eight joints in its rattle.

A company, composed of about three hundred individuals, left St. Louis, Mo., on the [illegible] ult., for the Rocky Mountains.

More Depravity.—Two lots of obscene books and prints were seized at the shops of two booksellers in Boston, on Tuesday. They were discovered by accident. The abominable publishers or venders, had employed the apprentice of a respectable bookbinder to bind some of the volumes—of course secretly, and at off-hours. The master chanced to find him at the work, and communicated the fact to the District Attorney, under whose advice the boy was arrested, and disclosed the names of his employers.

The punishment for dealing in such vileness is severe in Massachusetts—imprisonment for not more than five nor less than two years, and a fine of $1,000.—Com. Adv.

A Lesson to Blasphemers.—One day last week, says the N. Y. Sun, a man was employed ricking hay in his master's field, near Ivybridge, Devon, Penn., when a circumstance took place of a most awful nature. The atmosphere, which had been sunny, became clouded, and a heavy shower of rain fell. The man continued his work, throwing the hay from the ground to the top of the rick, but in a moment of passion he raised the fork high in the air, and swore that God Almighty might come and rick the hay, for he would not. At that instant a flash of lightning, attracted by the iron prong of the fork, struck him to the earth, and on being raised, the unhappy man was dead.

The Best Yet.—An old gentleman (who attended more to teaching his son the method of accumulating riches than knowledge) lived sometime since in one of the Eastern States. From application and industry, he had amassed a property of about twenty thousand dollars. Although not able to read and write, he never had a clerk, but had always been in the habit of keeping his own books. He had invented some new characters for the purpose of conveying his ideas to himself and others; they were formed as nearly similar to the articles sold as the nature of the circumstance would admit. One day a customer of his called for the purpose of settling his account; the hieroglyphics were handed down, and our merchant commenced with—"such a time you had a gallon of rum and a pound of tea; such a time a gallon of molasses, and such a time a cheese." "Stop here," said the customer. "I never had a cheese." "You certainly must have had it," said the merchant, "it is down in my book." The other denied ever buying an article of that kind. After a sufficient number of pros and cons upon recollection, he informed him he had purchased a grindstone about the time. "'Tis the very thing," said the merchant, "and I must have forgotten to put the hole in the middle!"

[illegible] Colt's submarine before that [illegible] stated by a correspondent of the Philadelphia Ledger to be as follows:

The battery consists of a light sheet iron box filled with gunpowder, and having two copper wires wound around with cotton, then varnished over with a mixture of gum shellac, alcohol, and venice turpentine, and extending through tight corks in one side of the box, having a piece of Platina wire extending between them in the box amongst the gunpowder, and the two copper wires extending off from this box, which may be anchored in the channel of a river, to a large one of Grant's Electricity Collecting Machines, electrified by a galvanic battery, which may be seven or eight miles distant from the box, and where the operator is, having one of the wires in his hand, and another person having the other wire in his hand, ready to attach them to the collector the instant the signal is given to explode the box. Now when an enemy's vessel is over his box, and the wires are that instant attached, positive electricity immediately passes along one wire and negative electricity immediately passes along the other wire, and these two kinds of electricity concentrate on the Platina wire, instantly heat it red hot, and it fires the gunpowder, the explosion of which blows the vessel to fragments.

Button Business.—This is no small matter. One million four hundred thousand dollars are invested in it, and one million five hundred thousand dollars worth of buttons are said to be sold annually. The manufacture of this one article has given direct employment to 2,580 souls, there being dependent on it in all about 10,000!—Yet but for the tariff this manufacture would have stopped!—Express.

An Old Man.—Louis Wolham, aged 118 years and 7 months, pound keeper on part of the lands of Clogher, near Domeral, to Mr. Nagel, of Ballinamour Castle, Ireland. He was married to his first wife more than 50 years, and had no offspring. He married a second wife at the age of 100, by whom he had a son, a very fine boy, and very like the father. From his great age, Mr. Nagel gave him his house and the parish pound many years rent free, which made him comfortable and prolonged his life. He never lost a tooth, nor had he a gray hair on his head.

Is this a Good Bank?—The Bank of France has in her vaults 800 barrels of five franc pieces, each barrel containing fifty thousand francs, or about ten thousand dollars. The gold is packed away in leaden cases, containing twenty thousand bags of one thousand francs each, in the neighborhood of four million of dollars in each case; and it is represented that an entire apartment in the vaulted department is filled with these cases, some of which have not been opened for forty years.—Express.

The cotton crop of Texas is estimated, for the present year, at about eighty thousand bales.

Singular Obstruction.—The Croton water in one of the leather factories in Ferry street, stopped running on Friday. This morning an examination was made, and an eel, which had come down all the way from Dutchess co., and had threaded all the passages of the aqueduct and its pipes, was found close to the cock. It was the size of a man's thumb, and was taken away in three parts. There is a strainer of copper wire at the distributing reservoir, but its openings are too large, and a finer one must be substituted.—Eve. Post.

A few days since an eel was thrown from one of the hydrants in the vicinity of this office, and swam down the gutter briskly enough to show that he was not much inconvenienced by his subterranean voyage.—Com. Adv.

Desperadoes at the South.—There are several islands in the Mississippi river, between the States of Arkansas and Mississippi, which have been long noted as harbors for the most desperate villains that infest the Southern country. Not unfrequently has it happened that boats loaded with produce, have been decoyed to the shore, their crews murdered, and the boats sunk to prevent detection. The Anawan, on her passage up from New-Orleans, observed, as she passed Montgomery's Point, four dead bodies floating by. They were evidently murdered, as large and ghastly wounds were seen upon their bodies.—They were so offensive, that they were not taken up. These men were doubtless the victims of the desperadoes of these islands.

The Ashburton Dinner in Boston.—The festival in honor of the Treaty in Boston, was enlivened by many sallies of genuine wit, at which the Yankees are no bunglers. The name of the distinguished guest was used with republican freedom in the construction of several choice puns. It will be remembered that his lordship's name is Alexander Baring. After the President's speech, which had many beautiful allusions, he gave as a toast,

'International Questions easily settled when once brought to their proper Barings.'

Then followed a rapid succession of sentiments from the chair, which called up successively and elicited speeches and sentiments from President Quincy, Lord John Hay, Mr. Justice Story, W. B. Reed, Esq., (orator of the day,) Mr. Grattan, Mr. Bancroft, Rev. Dr. Bethune, Mr. Peter, British Consul at Philadelphia, and a host of others.

Lord John Hay made a brief acknowledgement, when called on by a sentiment, to this effect:

'The Commander of the Warspite—he has brought the Herald of Peace, in the Spite of War.'

Mr. Hillard, at the close of one eloquent and graceful remarks, gave

'England and America—may the peace between them be as firm as the cliffs of their coast, and every element of estrangement be as evanescent as the bubbles that break on their shores.'

Dr. Bigelow was called up by a proposition to bestow "pro honoris causa," a doctorate in medicine on their distinguished guest, on the ground that one who had healed the differences between the two countries, was worthy to be considered a professor of the healing art.

The learned Doctor concluded a most witty address by giving for a sentiment, the lines of Horace:

——————"Sed levius fit patientia
Quidquid corrigere est nefas."

Which he paraphrased thus:—'There is not in the world an evil which is past Baring.'

The following allusion to the Christian name of Lord Ashburton was received with great applause,

'True greatness—Which shall the Christian historian place first; the Alexander who severed nations by the sword—or the Alexander who united them by peaceful negotiation?'

Among the volunteers sent to the chair, was the following:

'Virgil sung of the 'penitus,' divisos orbe Britannos.' We rejoice, that, if they were seperated from the 'Orbis Romanus,' they are so near to us as to need the most illustrious statesmen on earth to 'settle the boundary;' and that, if they had no representation in the Roman Senate, and no place among 'Greek Letters,' they have so noble a representative here."

Recent Session of Congress.—The recent session of Congress is the longest ever held under the Government, extending through a period of 269 days. The session of Congress next to the present in duration, was the second long session under Mr. Van Buren, which lasted 229 days.

If the business done by the House at these two sessions be contrasted, it will stand thus:

At the second long session under Mr. Van Buren there were—

Reports made, 716. Bills reported, 524. Bills passed the House, 211.

At the present session there were—

Reports made, 1093. Bills reported, 610. Bills passed the House, 299.—Nat. Intel.

Death of Mrs. Tyler.—The mails of this morning bring us intelligence of the death of Mrs. Letitia Tyler, wife of the President. She expired on Saturday evening, about 8 o'clock, at the White House in Washington, after having suffered for a long time from the consequences of a paralytic stroke. She is represented as a very estimable and amiable person—kind, disinterested and religious. Her husband and his family are thrown by this calamity into the deepest sorrow.—N. Y. Evening Post.

A late number of the Quincy Herald represents that Gov. Carlin has been fairly whipped out in his attempts to arrest Smith and Rockwell; and adds that the Mormons will not give them up, but fight to the last.

Cast Steel.—The Pittsburgh papers state that the Messrs. Shoenbergers of Pittsburgh, have commenced the manufacture of Cast Steel from American Iron.—Heretofore not much, if any thing, has been done in this country in the manufacture of this article.—Express.

Foreign Airs.—The brig Gazelle, which arrived at Salem, on Sunday last, brought a female Chimpanse, (incorrectly called an Ourang-Outang.) It is of small statue, with a black face, resembling a very ugly human being.

The finest quality of wool is sold in Vermont for 23 cts. per pound. Three years ago it sold for 40, 50, and 60 cts. a pound.

Flour—Going Down.—The best flour is now advertised in the Rochester Evening Post, for only $3 75 per barrel. The lowest notch, says the Post, for many a long year at Rochester.

Severe But Just.—Benj. F. Demyer, late postmaster at South Durham, Green Co., has been sentenced to ten years imprisonment for abstracting from the mail, a letter containing $245. The law of the United States is imperative on this subject, and the prisoner received the lightest sentence allowed, there being in his case some mitigating circumstances. The section under which he was sentenced is given in Kinne's abstract of the Criminal Laws of the United States:

"If any person employed in any of the departments of the post office establishment, shall secrete embezzle, or destroy, any letter, packet, bag, or mail of letters, which he or they shall be entrusted, or which shall have come to his or her possession, and are intended to be conveyed by post, containing any bank note or bank post bill, bill of exchange, warrant of the treasury of the United States, note of assigement of stock in the funds, letters of attorney for receiving annuities or dividends, or for selling stock in the funds, or for receiving the interest, etc. Or if any such person, employed as aforesaid, shall steal or take, any of the same out of any letter, packet, bag, or mail of letters, that shall come into his or her possession, such person shall, on conviction for any such offence, be imprisoned not less than ten years, nor exceeding twenty-one years.—Act 3d March, 1825 Sec. 21."

This abstract of the criminal law to which we have referred, is published as an appendix to Kinne's Blackstone, third edition. It adds a great deal to the value of a work which is fast finding its way not only into every lawyer's office, but every private library.—Brother Jonathan.

Returning Good for Evil.—A gentleman in Norwich, whose garden was entered and plundered on Sunday night, gives notice in the Courier of that city, that if the depredator will call on him any morning during the week, "he shall receive two days supply of fresh vegetables and a copy of the Holy Scriptures, and no questions asked."

Great Ox.—The Empire Ox, raised in Syracuse, New York, by P. N. Rust, is the largest ever known in the United States, and weighs 4,100 pounds.

Notices.

De Ruyter Lyceum.

The next meeting of the Lyceum will occur on Monday evening next at the village School-house, commencing at half-past 6 o'clock. Question for discussion—"Ought the proceeds of the sales of the Public Lands to be distributed among the several States according to the present ratio of representation?"

DISPUTANTS—Affirmative, Daniel G. Mitchell. Negative, Jas. D. Tripp.

A. V. BENTLEY, Sec'y.

ALFRED ACADEMY, AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY.

W. C. Kenyon, Principal.
Miss Caroline B. Maxson, Preceptress.

LECTURERS.

On Phrenology and Physiology.—Drs. J. R. HARTSHORN, and E. RIDER.

On School Teaching.—LUKE G. MAXSON.

On Chemistry and Geology.—W. C. KENYON.

Lectures on other subjects as occasion may require.

This Institution is pleasantly located, in the county of Allegany, thirteen miles South-East of Angelica, and six miles South of Almond. From its retired and quiet situation, it presents a favorable opportunity to parents to place their sons and daughters under a moral influence that will not be counteracted by those with whom they may associate.

The patronage which it has hitherto enjoyed, has been so liberal as to warrant very considerable expenditures in rendering it still more worthy of a more extended patronage; and it is hoped that it will, under its present organization, be rendered inferior to no similar Institution in Western New York

The qualification of Common School Teachers will receive particular attention, so as to render them thorough and practical instructors of youth.

The Academic Year,—Is divided into three terms of fifteen weeks each. 1st, Commencing Wednesday 17th August; 2d, 7th December; 3d, 4th April, 1843.

Vacations.—At the expiration of the first and second Terms, one week each; at the expiration of the 3d Term, five weeks.

Tuition.—Varying with Instruction, from $3,50 to $4,75 per term.

Board.—From $1 to $1,25 depending on accommodations. Rooms in the Institution, furnished with Cook Stoves, can be had at a moderate expense.

SAMUEL RUSSELL, Esq., Pres't.
Alfred, July, 1842.

PROPOSALS
For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead,) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

MARRIED,

In Fayetville, on the 16th inst., by the Rev. John Smitzer, DELFORD CARPENTER, Esq., and Miss HANNAH PEASLEY, both of De Ruyter.

LIST OF LETTERS.

W. H. Potter, Thomas Sargent, Oran Vincent, (thank you,) W. B. Brand, (much obliged,) J. Randall, (it is done,) Daniel Babcock, (we will write you.)

LIST OF RECEIPTS

Of A. Babcock, $3, cr. Albert Clark, $2, vol. 3, $1, for advertising, of Hamilton Clark, $2, W. Satterlee, $2, Isaac Clawson $2,

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Election Notice.

SHERIFF'S OFFICE, }
Madison County, ss. }

I, ISAAC BROWN, Sheriff of said county, do hereby give notice that an election is to be held on Tuesday succeeding the first Monday of November next, for the election of the several officers mentioned in a notice received by me from the Secretary of State, a copy of which is hereunto annexed.

Morrisville, Sept. 7, 1842.
ISAAC BROWN, Sheriff.
By W. B. BRAND, Under Sheriff.

STATE OF NEW-YORK, Secretary's Office, }
Albany, August 31, 1842. }
To the Sheriff of the county of Madison:

SIR: Notice is hereby given, that at the next general election, to be held on the Tuesday succeeding the first Monday of November next, the following officers are to be elected, to wit:

A Governor and Lieutenant Governor of this State;

A Senator for the Fifth Senatorial District, to supply a vacancy which will occur by the expiration of the term of service of Joseph Clark, on the last day of December next;

Also, the following county officers, to wit: three Members of Assembly, and one Coroner in the place of Allen Davis, who has removed from the county, and whose term of service would have expired on the last day of December, 1843.

Yours respectfully,
S. YOUNG, Secretary of State

STATE OF NEW-YORK, Secretary's Office, }
Albany, Sept. 7, 1842. }
To the Sheriff of the county of Madison:

SIR: Notice is hereby given, that at the next general election, to be held on the Tuesday succeeding the first Monday of November next, a Representative in the twenty-eighth Congress of the United States is to be elected for the twenty-third Congressional District, consisting of the counties of Madison and Oswego.

Yours respectfully,
S. YOUNG, Secretary of State.

I certify that the above is a true copy of the notice received by me from the Secretary of State.
Morrisville, September 9, 1842.
ISAAC BROWN, Sheriff.
By W. B. BRAND, Under Sheriff. 30w7

BOOTS! BOOTS! SHOES! SHOES!!

AT the sign of the Mammoth Boot, manufactured invariably of leather tanned in "cold liquor." Please call.

SILK! SILK!! SILK!!!

A BEAUTIFUL assortment of plain, figured and striped, just received and for sale very cheap at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

L. W. BLISS' Window Sash.
Bliss' & Co. " Blinds.
Holme's Sampson & Sailsbury Edged Tools consisting of Broad Axes, Hand Axes, Adzes and Chisels, at Factory prices by J. N. ELMORE,
October 4. Manufacturers' Agent

New Arrangement.

GEORGE W. SUTTON, having this day purchased the interest of W. H. QUINBY, in the Dry Goods and Shoe business, will continue the Trade and the Manufacture of Boots and Shoes as usual at the NEW YORK CASH STORE, where he would solicit the continuance of the liberal patronage heretofore received.
Sept. 14, 1842.

Dissolution.

THE Co-partnership heretofore existing under the firm of SUTTON & QUINBY, is [illegible] dissolved by mutual consent. All [illegible] counts will be left with Geo. W. Sutton [illegible] tlement.
GEO. W. SUTTON.
WM. H. QUINBY.
De Ruyter, Sept. 14, 1842.

Christian Review.

A GOOD PROPOSITION.

THE importance of the Christian Review [illegible]

The work is put at the low price of three dollars per annum, in order to bring it within the means of as large a number as possible. Yet [illegible]

[illegible]

GOULD KENDALL & LINCOLN, Publishers,
59 Washington Street.

N. B. The publishers of any religious paper who shall give the above advertisement [illegible] shall be entitled to a selection of either two of the last four volumes.
Boston, August 10th.

What is Economy?

RANDOLPH & DUNHAM, take pleasure in informing their customers and the public generally, that they continue the Tailoring business in [illegible]
[illegible]
De Ruyter, August 3, 1842.

Economy is the road to Wealth.

JAMES M. LETTS [illegible]
De Ruyter, July 1st, 1842.

IN CHANCERY, [illegible] the Vice Chancellor of the 5th Circuit.

William [illegible] and Catharine [illegible]
vs.
Anna Burdick, Jason L. Burdick, Jared Burdick, William R. Burdick, Benjamin F. Burdick, Harmon Burdick, [illegible] Burdick, Sally Ann Smith and William H. Smith.

IN pursuance of a decree or order of this Court made in the above cause and bearing date the 12th day of July, 1842, will be sold at public auction by or under the direction of the subscriber one of the masters of this Court at the House of Wm. C. Gage, in the town of De Ruyter, county of Madison, on the 23d day of September next at one o'clock, P. M. of that day, all that certain piece or parcel of land lying in the town of De Ruyter, county of Madison, and bounded as follows, beginning on the west line of lot No. 57 [illegible] chains and fifty links from the south west corner of said lot. Thence East one hundred and twenty-eight rods and five feet to lands lately owned by Richard Worth now deceased. Thence south on said Worth's line so far that a line from thence west to the west line of said lot No. 57, and from thence on said line north to the place of beginning as will make just thirty two acres.
Dated August the 4th 1842.
JOHN THOMAS,
Master in Chancery.

FLOUR, PROVISIONS, GROCERIES, and six hundred other things, for sale by 11tf
May 11. HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

IMPORTANT WORK!
NOW IN THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION,
A DICTIONARY OF
Arts, Manufactures, and Mines,
Containing a clear exposition of their
PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.
By ANDREW URE, M. D., F. R. S., M. G. S., M. A. S., [illegible]

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings

THIS [illegible] popular work [illegible]

[illegible]

STOVES.
COLD WINTER IS COMING

L[illegible] J. N. E[illegible] La Fayette [illegible] the largest and best assortment of STOVES ever before offered in this [illegible] every desirable pattern of [illegible] Plate and

Fancy Parlor Stoves,

[illegible] Wholesale & Retail, on as favorable terms as can be purchased in this TOWN COUNTY or STATE. Most kinds of Produce [illegible] CASH [illegible] will not be refused in payment for any article in his line of business.

The subscriber [illegible] all kinds of Stove [illegible] Copper,

BRASS AND TIN WARE

Of every description which he keeps constantly [illegible] at

LOW PRICES

[illegible] as any other man [illegible] warranted, made [illegible]

Eave Troughs

[illegible]

JUST RECEIVED

[illegible]

JOB WORK

[illegible]

REMOVAL.

JAMES M. LETTS [illegible] tailoring [illegible] 2 doors [illegible]

29 [illegible]

"Hard times and money scarce,"

I[illegible] economy is the [illegible]

GEORGE W. SUTTON has just opened a large assortment of [illegible] Groceries, Crockery, [illegible] Persons wishing to [illegible] to call as we feel con[illegible] Goods must [illegible]
Sept. 14 GEORGE W. SUTTON.

BOOKS & STATIONERY.

SCHOOL BOOKS, of all descriptions, Miscellaneous Books & Stationery, at the Book Store
HART, ACKLEY, & CO.
De Ruyter, May 11, 1842. 11v3tf

50 PIECES BROAD CLOTHS, CASSIMERES, SATINETTES, at reduced prices at the NEW YORK CASH STORE

THE FARMER'S EXCHANGE is the place to [illegible] Goods CHEAP Oct. 29, 1841.
S. G. WALKER.

Notice.

ALL persons who are indebted to the subscriber, either on accounts or notes, are requested to call and settle the same [illegible] and save cost.
De Ruyter, June 29, 1842.
JAMES M. LETTS.

BOOK BINDING.

THE subscriber having connected a BINDERY with his printing establishment, is now ready to execute all kinds of Binding in a neat and durable [illegible] on as reasonable terms as at any other establishment in this section of country.
JAMES BAILEY.
De Ruyter, June 8th 1841.

POETRY.

For the Register.

Broken Ties.

The broken ties of happier days,
How often do they seem
To come before our mortal gaze
Like a remember'd dream;
Around us, each dissever'd chain
In sparkling ruin lies,
And earthly hand can ne'er again
Unite those broken ties.

The parents of our infant home,
The kindred that we loved,
Far from our arms, perchance they roam,
To distant scenes removed;
Or we have watched their parting breath,
And closed their weary eyes,
And sigh'd to think how sadly death
Can sever human ties.

The friends, the loved ones of our youth,
They, too, are gone or changed,
Or worse than all, their love and truth,
Are darken'd and estranged;
They meet us in the glittering throng,
With cold averted eyes,
And wonder that we weep our wrongs,
And mourn our broken ties.

Oh! who, in such a world as this,
Could bear their lot of pain,
Did not one radiant hope of bliss
Unclouded, yet remain!
That hope the sovereign Lord has given,
Who reigns beyond the skies;
That hope unites our soul to Heaven
By faith's enduring ties.

Each care, each ill of mortal birth
Is sent in pitying love,
To lift the lingering heart from earth,
And seek its flight above;
And every pang that rends the breast,
And every joy that dies,
Tells us to seek a safer rest,
And trust to holier ties.

CONSTANCE.

Miscellaneous Department.

ARCHITECTURE OF THE HEAVENS.

Who has not gazed with admiration upon the starry firmament? And whose heart does not respond to the sentiment of the devout Psalmist, that "the heavens declare the glory of God." Verily, there is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard. The voice is heard by all men. Yet all do not equally understand its import. To the rudest intelligence it probably is not without some meaning. It intimates with more or less distinctness the existence of a Divine Being, and fills the imagination with a dim and shadowy conception of his power; while, to the cultivated mind, it not only proclaims the existence of God, but, in the ascertained order, and harmony, and extent of the universe, unfolds the most impressive manifestations of his attributes.

Let us collect together under one view, the conclusions of astronomers upon the distances of the fixed stars,—their arrangement, and the consequent vastness of the stellar firmament. It is absolutely certain that the diameter of the earth's orbit, equal to about 190,000,000 of miles, would dwindle to a mere point, if seen from the nearest of the fixed stars. Of this fact, there is not, in the judgment of astronomers, the shadow of a doubt. And though we cannot here spread before our readers all the evidence, upon which this conclusion rests, we can assure them that no evidence short of a mathematical demonstration can be stronger. We are sure that every one, who examines the subject, must admit its validity. But the distance, at which the diameter of the earth's orbit would become a mere point, that is to say, less than one second of angular space (which is about the least quantity directly and certainly measurable by the best instruments,) cannot be less than 19,200,000,000,000 miles, or such that light moving at the rate of 192,000 miles in a second, must be, at least, three and a half years in coming to us.

From these undoubted facts, the necessary inference is, that the stars are so many suns; and many of them far greater than our own, and shining with an intrinsic splendor, in comparison with which ours would fade into a minute star, scarcely if at all visible to the naked eye. But, have we any means of knowing, it may be asked, what would be the visible magnitude and brightness of our sun, seen from the distance of a star? Two principles of undoubted truth will enable us to form a definite opinion upon this point: first, that the visible diameter is inversely as the distance; and secondly, that the brightness is inversely as the square of the distance, the sun would have half the visible magnitude and one quarter the brightness which it now has. Pursuing this principle, we are altogether sure that if our sun were seen at 200,000 times its present distance, which at most would only equal that of the nearest star, its visible magnitude would be reduced to the 200,000th part of one second; and its brightness would equal only the 40,000,000,000th part of its present splendor. We are aware that numbers so vast furnish but a very inadequate means of forming a definite conception, but we have nothing better to take their place. It is ascertained, with a good degree of certainty, by direct measurement, that the solar brightness, diminished in the ratio expressed by those figures, would only equal that of a star of the second magnitude. The conclusion, therefore that the stars are, in fact, resplendent suns, is not only admissible, but one which can no longer be resisted.

But the supposition which we have here made with regard to the distance of the stars, is the least whhich the facts allow. The stars may be—and there are very strong analogical reasons for believing that many of them are—immeasurably beyond the limits here assigned.

Reflect for a moment upon the amazing extent to which we are enabled, with the aid of the telescope, to penetrate the depth of the stellar space, so as to pick up and examine a single star, 192 times further than the remotes which can be seen by the naked eye! or such, that light must occupy more than 12,000 years in coming to us! And does this fix the limit of creation?—Can it be believed that at this distance, inconceivable as it is, we have reached a point beyond which there is nothing, and where the wearied energies of creative power could do no more? Have our eyes beheld the last solitary orb, situated on the very verge of creation, and looking into the vacuity which stretches onward to absolute infinity beyond it? This we should hardly be prepared to admit, much less to assert, even though our vision could go no further. But we are not in doubt on this point. The spots of diffused nebulous light which are thickly scattered in many parts of the heavens have been examined.—Some of them were resolvable into stars, with the use of the lower powers of the telescope. Others, which the lower powers could not resolve, yielded to the higher. And thus, using powers which varied from 4000 to over 6000, it was found that the higher the power the greater the number of those faintly shining spots which were resolved into distinct stars. It is computed that many of these nebulous clusters must contain at least twenty thousand stars, in a space not more than one-tenth of that covered by the moon's disc. Then, besides these resolvable clusters, there are very many others, which as yet remain irresolvable. After many efforts to determine the reach of his instrument, Herschel concluded that with its highest powers, "he could descry a cluster of 5000 individuals, were it situated three hundred thousand times deeper in space than Sirrius probably is."—Light from such a cluster must have occupied at least one million of years in coming to us! Is this impossible? Does it contradict any known law of the system?—Does it conflict with any analogies which we are able to trace in the physical universe? Startling and incredible as this conclusion may at first appear, no astronomer would have the hardihood to pronounce it impossible. Nay, further; every sound mind would doubtless admit the separate probability of every step in the chain of evidence upon which it depends. It is clearly possible, then, that Herschel, on some clear evening, when the starry firmament was rejoicing in its utmost splendor, may have caught glimpses of light which ten thousand centuries had only sufficed to transmit from its remote origin to our system? We say nothing of the bearing of this fact, such allowing it to be, upon the chronology of the creation.—We regard it merely as illustrative of the vastness of the material universe. And in what commanding tones does it speak to us of the all pervading presence and the ineffable glory of that Being, who, from his lofty throne, looks down upon this vast domain, this boundless range of worlds, and covers them all with the shadow of his wing!

How impressive are the teachings of science! And how evanescent are the days and years, and ages of man's chronology, compared with the prolonged annals of the skies! And how ennobling is the thought that the being of an hour, whose life is precarious as the tempest's breath, should be able thus by the aid of science to surmount the heavens, wander among the stars, and note those vast cycles by which alone the ages of eternity are shadowed forth! Surely the deep impress of immortality is upon the spirit of man!—Athenaeum for July.

THE POETRY OF THE BIBLE.

The Bible is replete with poetry. The Hebrew poets rouse, warm, and transport the mind in strains the sweetest and boldest that bard ever sung; in numbers, the loftiest that imagination ever dictated. No poetry extant equals that which comes to us from the rapt patriarch of Idumea and the inspired prophets of Salem; from the schools of Bethel and Jericho. The Bible is the prototype; the unrivaled model and inspirer of all that is elevated in poetry.—It has been a fountain from which later poets have drawn their richest thoughts, their boldest figures, their grandest imagery.

The Psalms of David are an elegant specimen of poetic literature. The character of their diction and expression is vivid, the thoughts animated, passionate.—They communicate truths which philosophy could never investigate, in a style which uninspired poetry can never equal. The Hebrew literature itself contains nothing more lovely.

Among the prophetic writers, Isaiah stands unrivalled. His language possesses surprising beauties. His triumphal song upon the fall of the Babylonish monarch is replete with imagery, diversified and sublime. The conception is bold, the characters are introduced with wonderful art — Nothing is wanting to defend its claims to perfect beauty. In every excellence of composition it is unequaled by any specimen of Greek or Roman poetry.

The strains of Ezekiel break forth like the gushing of a mighty fountain. He is deep, vehement, tragical. He rouses every energy of the soul; overwhelms the mind by his bold figures, abrupt transitions, fervid expressions. But he who astonished us by his graphic images, possesses, at the same time, the loveliness of the sweetest poet. For invigorating the imagination, for giving energy of thought and boldness of expression, the writings of Ezekiel are unequaled.

At this fountain the most distinguished poets and orators have drank deepest. What but the literature of the Bible has rendered immortal the writings of Milton and Young? or those of Chatham and Burke, the models of modern eloquence; What else has given interest and power to the writings of Jones, Butler, Hall, and Edwards, the admiration of every scholar? It is the literature of the Bible which has sent out a redeeming influence through our whole literary system—an influence which pervades and strengthens the whole public mind.—There is a spirit in the literature of the Bible, before which the lurid fires of impure passion, kindled at the shrine of heathen literature, go out. The whole atmosphere of the Bible is pure and salutary; its clime a region of strong thought, the place for giants mind to thrive in. It is an inexhaustible treasury of truths—

"Truths that have power to make
Our noisy years seem moments in the being
Of eternal silence: truths that wake
To perish never."

Let the Bible be studied in its original, as we study the Iliad of Homer, or the history of Livy, and giants in intellect will rise up, to surpass the loftiest geniuses of past ages. Let the student study the incomparable histories of Moses and Luke, and the sententious writings of Solomon—men of wonderful grasp of mind, of strong massive style, of deep reflection—also the writing of Paul, another name for the perfection of condensed eloquence—the unrivaled poetry of David, Isaiah, Ezekiel, Habakkuk; and he will find such a discipline adapted to indurate his mental constitution; to give it muscle and energy; to gird the intellect with power; and to aid him in concentrating its energies so as to bring vast regions at once to the mind; to comprehend almost the infinite in the finite, as the "cope of heaven is imagined in the dewdrop."—E. C. Cogswell.

EARLY FORMATION OF GOOD HABITS.—If a child is neglected till six [illegible] of age, no subsequent education can recover it. If to this age it is brought up in ignorance and dissipation, in all the baseness of brutal habits, in that vacancy of mind which such habits create, it is in vain to reclaim it by teaching it reading and writing. You may teach it what you choose afterwards, but if you have not prevented the formation of bad habits you will teach in vain.

An infant is in a state of perpetual enjoyment from the mere intensity of curiosity. There is no one thing which it does not learn sooner or better than at any other period of life, and without any burthen to itself or the teacher. But learning is not all, nor the principle consideration—moral habits are acquired in these (infant,) schools; and by their means children are kept out of the nurseries of obscurity, vulgarity, vice, and blasphemy.

In the establishment at Westminster, none but children between three and five years are admitted, and there they are kept out of the streets, and taken care of by a paternal, indulgent dame, while their mothers are set at liberty to go out and work.—Whether the children learn less or more, is of little consequence. The moral principle is the great consideration.—Lord Brougham.

"HE IS ONLY A MECHANIC!"—How frequently is this remark made by aristocratic upstart, who have nothing to recommend them, save money and impudence, when the name of an honest and intelligent mechanic happens to be mentioned in their presence. They consider it degrading to converse, and contamination to associate with those who do not like themselves possess wealth! even though that wealth was obtained by the most dishonest and rascally means. Nothing is so disgusting to well informed, well bred people, as to hear an ignorant, conceited, puffed up, long haired, brainless, impudent dandy, talk about mechanics as if they were no better than brutes. No true lady or gentleman would be guilty of such littleness. It is only the ignorant, spoiled beauty—the worthless and contemptible soap-lock who would do so. Show us the man or woman who would conceive it to be a disgrace to associate with honest, well-informed mechanics, and we will show you a poor, worthless, ignorant, contemptible creature, useless to themselves and the world, and a disgrace and encumbrance to their friends.

THE DAUGHTER.

The daughter has much in her power. She has youth, vivacity, generally the grace of form, always the charm inseparable from youth, often the irresistible attraction of beauty, and she may have the still more enduring endowment of amiable temper and mental accomplishment. And she may move in the sacred sphere of home as a ministering spirit of peace, and love, and joy.

But it may likewise be otherwise. Because the path of duty to her is comparatively easy, is dictated to her by her affections, is demonstrated to her by every day's experience, it does not follow that she will walk in it. She may prove false to her obligations. And what a desolation does she make in the domestic circle.—How can she wring the hearts of those she is bound by every obligation to love and cherish! Instead of acquiescing with cheerfulness in whatever her lot may be, she may annoy her parents by perpetual reflections and complaints. Instead of taking her share of cares and the toils which are inseparable from a family, she may refuse them all, and choose to spend her time in idleness, or in dress, or company, and consider herself born for a higher lot than ordinary mortals. By the indulgence of a bad temper, instead of being the delight and pride of the domestic circle, she may keep her home in a perpetual broil.—Alas! for that house that is under the tyranny of a termagant. There is no dagger so sharp as the tongue of an insolent, disobedient, ungrateful daughter. If any eyes could weep tears of blood, it would be the eyes of parents, who have brought up a daughter to be their terror, their torment, and their scourge.—Burnap.

PRAYING WITH THE UNDERSTANDING.

A few evenings since I was with my children as they were preparing for bed.—They kneeled to offer their evening prayer; and I observed one of my little girls to be very serious and reverential in her manner, while engaged in this exercise of devotion. She rose from her knees and stood by my side a moment without speaking, when she said, 'Mother, is it wicked to alter the Lord's prayer?'

'In what way do you mean, my child?' said I.

'Why mother,' she replied, 'I always repeat the Lord's prayer in the moring and at night, besides a prayer of my own words. In the morning I say it just as it is; but in the evening instead of saying,—'Give us this day our daily bread,' I say 'Give us, O Lord our needful rest.' I think if it is not wicked to alter it I would rather say it so, because when we go to bed we should not say, 'Give us this day,' and at night we want rest, not bread.'

Is the child who is reading this account, as careful as this little girl was to pray with the spirit and with the understanding also? When he says, 'I pray thee, O Lord, to give me a new heart,' does he think what a great gift he is asking for—that to have a new heart means to have the love of sin taken away, and the love of holiness placed in its stead. Does he think that he prays for these feelings which God is willing and able to give him if he asks for them; and that if God does grant his request, he will be owned for his child, and taken to dwell forever in heaven. Is this then a gift to ask for in a careless manner? Will he ask for such a gift with less earnestness than he would ask his earthly father for a new toy?

VALUE OF A GOOD TRADE.—A conjurer and a tailor once happened to converse together. 'Alas!' cries the tailor, 'what an unhappy poor creature am I. If people should ever take it into their heads to live without clothes, I am undone; I have no other trade to have recourse to.' 'Indeed friend, I pity you sincerely,' replied the conjurer; 'but thank heaven, things are not quite so bad with me; for if one trick should fail, I hundred tricks for them yet. However, if at any time you are reduced to beggary, apply to me and I will relieve you.' A famine overspread the land; the tailor made a shift to live, because his customers could not do without clothes—but the poor conjurer with his hundred tricks, could find none that had money to throw away. It was in vain that he promised to eat fire or vomit pins; no single creature would relieve him, till he was at last obliged to beg from the very tailor whose calling he had formerly despised.

CURIOUS APPEARANCE OF THE EARTH.—Clayton recently made successful ascension in a balloon from Columbus, Ohio. Among the remarks of his journal of the aerial trip, we were struck by the following:

From the questions that I am frequently asked, an idea seems to exist with many that æronauts lose sight of the earth when at great heights. This is a mistake; they never do, except when clouds intervene, or night appears. On the contrary, the earth is always like an immense concave map, painted different colors, which designate not the different townships or counties, as the coloring of maps generally do, but the various products of the soil. That the earth, which in reality, is convex, should appear to the æronaut to be concave, may at first seem strange to many, but a moment's reflection will render it clear. His horizon is frequently upwards of a hundred miles from him. Draw a right-angled triangle, and make the base line fifty or sixty times as long as the perpendicular, the hypothenuse and base will then be nearly in the same line. The horizon appears to the æronaut to be on a perfect level with car of the balloon; but the part of the earth directly underneath him seems at a great distance from him, consequently the whole surface of the scene must appear concave.

"A STRAIGHT WAKE."—A few evenings since, at a prayer meeting in Baldwin Place, a gentleman, who had been a mariner, while giving an account of his recent conversion, said, "I have been like a vessel in a storm upon a lee shore; but now that by the grace of God, I have weathered the point of danger and have a plenty of sea room, I intend to make a straight wake."

Beautiful idea! A voyager to immortality, making a straight wake through life's tempestuous sea! A straight wake notwithstanding all the winds, currents, fogs, false lights, and other perils that he meets in his heavenward course! If he execute his purpose, he will do better than many who have made the voyage before him.—He will keep a better look out, better mind his helm, better study his chart, better obey his captain's orders.

Beloved shipmates, bound to the land of rest, are we all making a straight wake?

When Thebes was burnt, Alexander saved only the house of the poet Pindar. When Buffalo was burnt, the British officer saved only the house of an old woman, as a reward for her brave defense of it with a broomstick.

Think before you speak, and it may save you a great deal of thinking after speaking.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

PROSPECTUS [illegible] FARM HOUSE OF THE XIX CENTURY. [illegible]

[illegible]

1842.

[illegible]

N. S. HASKELL [illegible]

New York [illegible]

[illegible] 1842.

Not 25 or 50 per cent Reward.
S. G. WALKER

HAS [illegible] NEW GOODS, [illegible] CHEAP, [illegible] Hardware, &c. [illegible] a variety of other things too numerous to mention.

Hear ye! Hear ye! all persons wishing to buy goods CHEAP will please call at the Farmer's Exchange, [illegible] before purchasing elsewhere, [illegible] Hear ye again! [illegible] "Safety Fund" [illegible] S. G. Walker, will please call and [illegible]

De Ruyter, May 23, 1842.

"A nimble sixpence is better than a slow shilling."

SPRING GOODS! SPRING GOODS!

CHEAP! CHEAP!! CHEAP!!!

THE subscribers are receiving a large assortment of goods suitable for the spring and summer trade, and invite their friends and the public generally to call and examine them at the [illegible] store.
SUTTON & QUINBY.

LOTS OF HATS & CAPS on hand—Fashionable and Old Fashioned, Bell Crowned and Low Crowned; [illegible] to crown all, and not be out of Fashion, Cash and most kinds of [illegible] received in payment, by HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

NO IMPOSITION.
NO STATES PRISON WORK!

THOSE wishing to purchase BOOTS and SHOES of superior quality of custom work, will find just the place by calling at the sign of the MAMMOTH BOOT.

De Ruyter, May 20, 1842.

JOB PRINTING.

BOOKS, Pamphlets, Way, Hand-Bills, Cards Bills, &c. &c., neatly executed at this office.

How to make money.

I[illegible] of mankind and of the Yankee Nation in particular. The easiest and most practicable [illegible] for accomplishing the desired end is [illegible] "Save Money," which can be [illegible] NEW GOODS, instead of the [illegible] of many shops and many [illegible] ELMORE'S [illegible] NEW GOODS is nearly equal to [illegible] in this village and who is daily [illegible] great bargains to "Fortune's Favorites."
May 8.

Of Drugs and Medicines,

THE subscriber keeps a much larger stock and [illegible] much lower than those who advertise [illegible]
May [illegible] J. N. ELMORE.

4 CASES [illegible] quality fashionable Hats, [illegible] at the
May [illegible] STONE STORE.

NEW TAILORING ESTABLISHMENT.

THE subscriber would inform the Citizens of De Ruyter [illegible] that he has opened a [illegible] S. G. Walker's store [illegible] where he may at all times be [illegible] those who are pleased to favor him [illegible] their garments made as well as [illegible] west of New York City. [illegible] warranted [illegible] New York Spring and Summer [illegible] W. P. GUEST.
[illegible] 1842.

FLOUR! FLOUR! FLOUR!!!

S[illegible] at the Farmers' Exchange [illegible] in barrels and [illegible] from the best of [illegible] the state.
S. G. WALKER
[illegible] 1842.

BLANKS! BLANKS!!

J[illegible] Mortgages, & [illegible]

[illegible] SEGARS.

C[illegible] STONE STORE.

500 [illegible] at the STONE STORE.

AGENTS FOR THE REGISTER.

NEW-YORK.

[illegible] H. H. Baker, J. J. Spencer
[illegible] Maxson, Greene, Gran
[illegible]
[illegible] Babcock, Silas Bailey, [illegible]
[illegible] L. Scott
[illegible]
[illegible] Samuel E. Lan-
[illegible] E. P. Cran-
[illegible]
[illegible] Wm. G.
[illegible]
[illegible] P. Burdick
[illegible] James Hubbard, Hi-
[illegible]
[illegible] Stillman, William B
[illegible]

RHODE-ISLAND.

[illegible] Jacob D. Bab-

CONNECTICUT.

[illegible] Wm. Maxson.
[illegible]

NEW-JERSEY.

[illegible]
[illegible] Estee.

PENNSYLVANIA.

[illegible]

VIRGINIA.

[illegible]

OHIO.

[illegible] Clarke
[illegible]—Simeon Babcock, B. C. Church.
[illegible]—Lewis A. Davis
[illegible] Loofbourrow.
[illegible] G. N. Swinney
[illegible] M. Todd.

MICHIGAN.

[illegible] Tyler.
[illegible]—Bethel Church.

WISKONSAN.

Milton, Rock Co.—Joseph Goodrich. P. M. Stillman Coon.

IOWA.

[illegible] Co.—M. Wheelock.

ILLINOIS.

[illegible] Co.—James Dunham.

The Seventh-day Baptist Register
IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY,
AT DE RUYTER, MADISON CO., N. Y.,
BY
JAMES BAILEY.

TERMS.—To village subscribers who have the paper left at their doors, $2 25, in advance, or $2 50, at the expiration of the year.

☞To office and mail subscribers, $2 in ADVANCE.

Each communication, involving facts and intended for insertion in the paper, must be accompanied by a responsible name.

No subscription received for a less term than six months.

☞All subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, will be considered as wishing to continue their subscription, and their paper will be sent to them accordingly. No paper will be discontinued till all arrearages are paid except at the discretion of the publisher.

☞Advertisements inserted on the most reasonable terms.

☞All letters and communications to ensure attention should be addressed to the publisher free of postage.

S. L. Rogers, 2

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.

VOL. III.---NO 31.] JAMES BAILEY, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.——A. H. BURDICK, PRINTER. [WHOLE NO. 135.

Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy.——The SEVENTH DAY is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.—COMMANDMENT.——If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments.—JESUS CHRIST.

TWO DOLLARS IN ADVANCE.] DE RUYTER, N. Y., FOURTH-DAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1842. [PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Religious Department.

LAST HOURS.

I was surprised to find that the condition of mind in the case of those who were dying, and of those who only thought themselves dying, differed very widely. I had supposed that the joy or the grief of death, originated from the fancy of the patient; (one supposing himself very near to great happiness, and the other expecting speedy suffering,) and resulted in pleasure or apprehension. My discoveries seemed to overturn this theory. Why should not the professor of religion who believes himself dying, when he really is not, rejoice as readily as when he is departing, if his joy is the offspring of expectation? Why should not the alarm of the scoffer, who believes himself dying and is not, be as uniform and as decisive as when he is in the river, if it comes of fancied evil or cowardly terrors? The same questions I asked myself again and again. I have no doubt but that there is some strange reason connected with our natural disrelish for truth, which causes so many physicians, after seeing such facts so often, never to observe them. During twenty years of observation, I found the state of the soul belonging to the dying was uniformly and materially unlike that of those who only supposed themselves departing. This is best made plain by noting cases which did exist.

There was a man who believed himself converted, and his friends, judging from his walk, hoped with him. He was seized with disease, and believed himself within a few paces of the gate of futurity. He felt no joy, his mind was dark, and his soul clouded. His exercises were painful and the opposite of every enjoyment. He was not dying. He recovered. He had not been in the death-stream. After this he was taken again. He believed himself dying, and he was not mistaken. All was peace, serenity, hope, triumph.

There was a man who mocked at holy things. He became seriously diseased, and supposed himself sinking into the death slumber. He was not frightened. His fortitude and composure was his pride, and the boast of his friends. The undaunted firmness with which he could enter futurity was spoken of exultingly. It was a mistake. He was not in the condition of dissolution. His soul never had been on the line between two worlds. After this he was taken ill again. He supposed as before that he was entering the next state, and he really was; but his soul seemed to feel a different atmosphere. The horrors of these scenes have been often described, and are often seen. I need not endeavor to picture such a departure here. The only difficulty in which I was thrown by such cases was, "Why was he not thus agonized when he thought himself departing? Can it be possible that we can stand so precisely on the dividing line, that the gale from both this and the coming world may blow upon our cheek? Can we have a taste of the exercises of the next territory before we enter it?" When I attempted to account for this on the simple ground of bravery and cowardice, I was met by the two following facts.

First, I have known those (the cases are not unfrequent,) who were brave, who had stood unflinchingly in battle's whirlpool. They had resolved never to disgrace their system of unbelief by a trembling death. They had called to Christians in the tone of resolve, saying, "I can die as coolly as you can." I had seen those die from whom entire firmness might fairly be expected. I had heard groans, even if the teeth were clenched for fear of complaint, such as I never wish to hear again; and I had looked into countenances, such as I hope never to see again.

Second, I had seen cowards die. I had seen those depart who were naturally timid, who expected themselves to meet death with fright and alarm. I had heard such, as it were, sing before Jordan was half-forded. I had seen faces where, pallid as they were, I beheld more celestial triumph than I had ever witnessed any where else. In that voice there was a sweetness, and in that eye there was a glory, which I never could have fancied in the death-spasms, if I had not been near.

The condition of the soul, when the death-stream is entered, is not the same with that which it becomes (oftentimes,) when it is almost passed. The brave man who starts on the ladder across the dark ravine, with eye undaunted, and haughty spirit, changes fearfully, in many cases, when he comes near enough to the curtain to lift it. The Christian who goes down the ladder, pale and disconsolate, (oftentimes,) starts with exultation, and tries to burst into a song when almost across.

Then is the time when many who enter the dark valley cheerless, begin to see something that transports; but some are too low to tell of it, and their friends think they departed under a cloud, when they really did not. It is at this stage of the journey that the enemy of God, who started with look of defiance and words of pride, seems to meet with that which alters his views and expectations, but he cannot tell, for his tongue can no longer move.

My attention was awakened very much by observing the dying fancies of the servants of this world, differing with such characteristic singularity from the fancies of the departing Christian. It is no uncommon thing for those who die to believe they see, or hear, or feel, that which appears only fancy to bystanders. Their friends believe that it is the overturning of their intellect. I am not about to enter into the discussion of the question, whether it is, or is not, always fancy. Some have a different view of the case: but inasmuch as in many instances the mind is deranged whilst its habitation is falling into ruins around it; and inasmuch as it is the common belief that it is only imagination of which I am writing, we will look at it under the name of fancy.

The fanciful views of the dying servant of sin, and the devout friends of Christ, were strangely distinct as far as my observation extended. One who had been an entire sensualist and mocker at religion, whilst dying, appeared in his senses in all but one thing. "Take that black man from the room," said he. He was answered that there was none in the room. He replied, "There he is standing near the window. His presence is very irksome to me, take him out." After a time, again and again, his call was, "Will no one remove him? There he is, surely some one will take him away!"

I was mentioning to another physician my surprise that he should have been so much distressed if there had been many blacks in the room, for he had been waited on by them day and night for many years; also that the mind had not been diseased in some other respect; when he told me the names of two others, (his patients,) men of similar lives, who were tormented with the same fancy, and in the same way, whilst dying.

A young female, who called the Man of Calvary her greatest friend, was, when dying, in her senses, in all but one particular. "Mother," she would say, pointing in a certain direction, "Do you see those beautiful creatures?" Her mother would answer, "No, there is no one there, my dear." She would reply, "Well, that is strange. I never saw such countenances and such attire. My eye never rested on anything so lovely." Oh, says one, this is all imagination, and the notions of a mind collapsing, wherefore tell of it? My answer is, that I am not about to dispute, or to deny that it is fancy: but the fancies differ in features and in texture. Some in their derangement call out, "Catch me, I am sinking; hold me, I am falling:" others say, "Do you use that music? O, were ever notes so celestial!" This kind of notes, and these classes of fancies belonged to different classes of individuals, and who they were, was the item which attracted my wonder. Such things are noticed by few, and remembered by almost none; but I am inclined to believe that if notes were kept of such cases, volumes of interest might be formed.

My last remark here, reader, is that we necessarily speak somewhat in the dark of such matters, but you and I will know more shortly. Both of us will see and feel for ourselves, where we cannot be mistaken in the course of a very few months. —Cause and Cure of Infidelity.

From the Springfield Gazette.

The Burning up of the World in 1843.

Mr. Miller's wild, fanatical scheme is not to be received, unless,

1. He can prove, that the 2300 days in Daniel mean years; which he cannot prove. The expression in Hebrew is not days, but evening—morning; and not 'evening and morning,' as in Gen. 1; whence some learned men conclude, that the evening and morning are to be taken separately, being 2300 in all,—meaning that the evening and morning sacrifices should be interrupted, as they were, by Antiochus, 2300 times, or during 1150 days. Professor Stuart and other learned men, however, maintain, that the expression means literal, whole days, not years—although he admits, that there is no similar expression in the Bible. He asserts, that the period extends from Aug. 5, 171 before Christ, to Dec. 25, 165 B. C., when Judas Maccabæus cleansed, justified, restored, purified the temple—it being 2300 days since Antiochus began his aggressions on the priesthood and temple. The first explanation is most probably true; but Mr. Miller must overturn both, before his scheme can be received by a lover of truth.

2. Nor unless he can prove, that the 2300 days begin at the same time with the 70 weeks or 490 years; which he cannot prove. The chapters in which these two periods are mentioned, were written fifteen years apart from each other; and each chapter finishes its own subject. The visions are distinct visions. Still another vision is mentioned in the 10th chapter. It is absurd to pretend that they begin at the same time.

3. Nor unless he can prove, that the 70 weeks begin in the 7th year of Artaxerxes; which he cannot prove. There were four decrees of Cyrus, Darius, and Artaxerxes, relating to the temple and Jerusalem. Mr. Miller, it seems, fixes on the third decree; but the fourth is more likely to be the one intended in the prophecy. The third decree may be read in Ezra, 7th chapter. It relates to the temple. But the 70 weeks (Dan. ix. 25,) are to date from the decree "to restore and to build Jerusalem." Now it appears, that Nehemiah (ch. xi. v. 5,) asked leave to build the city. Accordingly Artaxerxes issued his decree in his 20th year. This is probably the decree referred to by Daniel; and Mr. Miller's theory is therefore unfounded.

4. Nor unless the 70 weeks end with the death of Christ; which cannot be proved. For Daniel says (chap. ix. v. 25,) that from the decree "unto the Messiah, the Prince, shall be 7 weeks and 62 weeks," or 69 weeks, or 483 years. If this relates to the birth of Christ, then it was nearly 5 weeks longer to his death, or 33 years added to 483, equal to 516 years. If it relates to his death, then his death was to be 69 weeks after the decree, and not 70.

5. Nor unless Daniel's years mean solar years of 365 days; which cannot be proved. At a later period, when the science of astronomy was improved, the Jews intercalated some days, or added a new month; but in the time of Daniel, it is impossible for Mr. M. to show, that the months were not months of 30 days, and the years of 360 days.

6. Nor unless the end, spoken of by Daniel, relates to the end of the world; which he cannot prove. Daniel speaks (ix. 26,) of the end of the city and the end of the war; neither of these means the end of the world.

7. Nor unless he can prove that to cleanse the sanctuary, or Jewish temple (Dan. viii. 14,) means the burning up of the world.

8. Nor unless he can prove that Anti-Christ or Popery is overthrown, and Babylon is fallen, when the Pope is still seated on his throne at Rome.

9. Nor unless he can prove, that the Jews have been converted, and the fullness of the Gentiles brought in, when neither event has taken place.

10. Nor unless he can prove, that Satan has been bound a thousand years, and the great battle of Gog and Magog has been fought. For all these things must precede the burning up of the earth. (Read Rev. chs. xviii. xix. xx.)

In the whole history of fanaticism, there is scarcely anything so wild and unfounded, and destitute of argument, as the scheme of Mr. Miller. His great map or chart, with pictures on it of the Image or Man of the prophetic vision, of rams, and horses, and beasts, and dragons, with long columns of figures, all ending with 1843, is not quite a demonstrative proof that the world will be burnt up in 1843.

If Mr. Miller has persuaded any Baptist ministers to embrace his theory, as they will be brought to shame next year, we would say beforehand to their people. If your ministers are humble and faithful preachers of the gospel, do not cast them away on account of their weakness of judgment in this particular. It may be a good lesson to them for the future, not to run after a new prophet or preacher of the marvelous.

And as to the good people themselves, who follow the scheme of Mr. Miller—when their delusion in a few months shall come to an end, we say to them: 1. Do not then reject the Bible, when you shall find that you have been deceived by a false interpreter, a bold and presumptuous prophet. 2. Do not say that all religion is vain, because you have been deceived. Religion does not consist in believing that the world is to be burnt up in 1843. Read the New Testament, and learn from it the religion of the gospel. 3. If you are possessed with the love of the marvelous—if you must fix your eyes on pictures of rams, and dragons, and beasts—and must congregate in a great tent, instead of a convenient meeting-house—and must hear the loud and confident tones of some prophet—without doubt you will be able in 1844 to find a new prophet, equally learned, and wise, and confident, and disinterested with Mr. Miller; some Ann Lee, or Jemima Wilkinson, or Cochran, or Joe Smith, or Matthias, the prophet; or Mr. M. will be able to assure you, that he had made a mistake of a few years; and fixing on a new period, you may be able to go on still under his guidance. However it may well be worth a little inquiry by every man of good common sense, whether he will not be wise to content himself with his own faithful preacher, of whatever denomination, instead of running after a wandering modern prophet—such as was never appointed and cannot be approved by the Great Head of the Church.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

AMERICAN SOCIETY FOR MELIORATING THE CONDITION OF THE JEWS.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors of this Society, held in this city on the 17th inst., an abstract of their proceedings since their Anniversary in May last, was ordered to be prepared and published.

It has already been mentioned in the Society's Annual Report, that in consequence of difficulties attending the employment of their present funds, a new fund has been opened, having for its object the melioration of the condition of the Jews in any way, and by any course of measures which the circumstances of that people and the exigences of the times might seem to warrant or require, without being confined to the peculiar object contemplated at the original formation of the Society. The monies which may be contributed to this fund, are intended to be employed in the support of a missionary among the Jews in the United States, in occasional temporal aid to deserving Jews in distress, and in the circulation of appropriate tracts and books among them, &c.

An agent was commissioned and sent out by the Board in February last, to make known the plans and intentions of the Society, to solicit contributions from churches and individuals in aid of the proposed fund, and to establish Auxiliary Societies.

An invitation was at the same time sent to a distinguished Jew missionary on the continent of Europe, to act as the Society's missionary in this country; the announcement of which, the Board were pleased to hear, gave great satisfaction to the friends of Israel. Learning, however, soon after, that the circumstances of that gentleman were such as to preclude his acceptance of their offer, they lost no time in addressing themselves to another highly gifted and successful missionary among the Jews on the continent, whose answer they are now daily expecting to receive.

In the meantime their agent, Mr. Matthew A. Berk, has made a report of his proceedings in behalf of the Society, from which the following particulars are extracted.

The objects of this mission were first announced to the congregation of the Rev. Mr. Towne, of Boston, in which one hundred and fifty-two annual subscribers were soon obtained, and the subscriptions transmitted to the Board. The agent also received much encouragement from the Rev. Dr. Jenks, and the Rev. Messrs. Rogers, Adams and Winslow, of Boston. He next visited Salem, where a warm interest was [illegible] Ladies' Jews' Society, [illegible] upwards of one hundred members, was formed, auxiliary to the American Society. From Salem the agent proceeded to Newburyport, where a [illegible] Society had been established [illegible] year.— Here he addressed a large audience, and the next day met with the [illegible] just formed, who [illegible] themselves auxiliary to the American Society for [illegible] years, and determined to appropriate [illegible] collections in aid of our proposed [illegible].— The agent next visited Lowell, Mass. where also a female Society had already been formed. The first anniversary of this Society was celebrated during his stay there, and was very numerously attended. Appropriate and interesting addresses were delivered by clergymen of the Congregational, Episcopal and Baptist denominations, and the objects of the American Society were also made known by the agent. The occasion was altogether one of much interest, and appears to have made a permanent impression in that quarter. [illegible] of four hundred subscribers were in a short time obtained in aid of the Society's [illegible]. The agent next proceeded to Providence, R. I. where the Ladies' Society [illegible] annual meeting, and determined to appropriate their collections in promoting the objects of the Society, and [illegible] was afterwards made up and transmitted to the Board. At Warren, R. I. the agent found a female Society established in St. Mark's church, who had collected a considerable amount of funds, and had resolved to become auxiliary to the American Society for the next three years. At Bristol, R. I., the agent met with a very cordial reception from the Rev. Messrs Fales and Bristed. Great interest was awakened in behalf of Israel in the congregations of these two gentlemen, [illegible] two gentlemen, and two Societies were soon established. The disturbed condition of Rhode Island induced their agent to return to Boston without visiting other parts of the State, as he had contemplated.

In addition to the places above enumerated, Societies have been either formed or are about being formed at Portsmouth, N. H., and Charlestown and Chelsea, Mass.

For the success which has thus attended their first effort to revive the usefulness of the once popular institution which they represent, the Board would express their devout acknowledgements to the God of Israel, whose guardian care they have already so often experienced, amid circumstances of the deepest depression and discouragement, and who is now, they trust, once more opening and enlightening their path before them.

To their Christian brethren and sisters who have so generously responded to their call in behalf of the persecuted remnant of a once favored people, they would return their heartfelt thanks, and they feel emboldened on this occasion to commend the example of so noble a spirit to the imitation of Christians in other parts of the Union. Whatever may have been their doubts before, they cannot now resist the conviction that their plans need only to be effectually made known to the public to ensure the collection of ample means, not only for the support of one, but of two or more missionaries, besides carrying into effect the other benevolent designs they have in view. They are obliged, however, to announce, unexpectedly, the termination of their connection with Mr. Berk, their late agent, whose health has induced him to decline remaining longer in their employ. This circumstance has left them for the moment without the means of personally addressing the Christian public, and of receiving additions to their funds. They are able to announce, however, that arrangements are in progress for the appointment of a suitable agent whose name will be made known at the earliest practicable opportunity.

The Board have also determined that their customary Annual Discourse shall be delivered before the Society on the last Sabbath in November next. The Rev. Professor Bush has been selected for the performance of that duty, and the Rev. Dr. Brownlee, the President of the Society, has consented to act as alternate on the occasion.

Communications may be addressed to the Rev. Dr. Brownlee, President; the Rev. George Bush, Secretary for Domestic Correspondence; or A. M. Burrill, Recording Secretary of the Society, at the city of New York.

THE WILD MEN OF THE JUNGLE.—In the interior of the island of Ceylon there is a tribe of wild men called Veddahs.— When first visited by the Wesleyan missionaries, they seemed to be the lowest specimen of human nature that had been found in all the dark regions of heathenism. [illegible] short of [illegible] the [illegible] They [illegible] —they have never heard of [illegible] They wear scarcely [illegible] no houses. [illegible]

[illegible]

The man carried in one hand a fowl, for [illegible] and with the other led a little [illegible] six years old, who had on his shoulders [illegible] about three [illegible] cocoa [illegible] brass plate, [illegible]

[illegible]

Children's Department.

The Dying Child's Request.—A Fact.

[illegible]

In Dr. [illegible] Exeter Hall in February last, [illegible] a plan which I could not [illegible] prove and admire. It was to form a [illegible] society, in which the names of children, as soon as they could understand, were to be enrolled, and continue until they arrive at their majority. He said, "I believe there are thousands of [illegible] throughout the country, of both sexes, who would be glad to be enrolled for [illegible]." Now, I could not help thinking at the time I read it, that in this respect the poor deluded idolaters here afford a striking example, worthy the imitation of Christians. I scarcely ever remember meeting a procession for idolatrous worship, that there was not a number of children bearing some part of it. On one occasion I met a man and a woman, with three children, on their way to Amoor's temple. I asked them where they were going. They said, "To make pooja," or worship. I asked, "Why?" They said, "Our child had been sick; they did make a vow, and were going to pray." I said, "Why, for such a little child?" They smiled and said, "Why not?"

[illegible] He sat [illegible] Henry, what [illegible] read so [illegible] expressed surprise, [illegible] When [illegible] Henry and went [illegible]

MY MOTHER.

[illegible] How little do we appreciate a mother's tenderness while living—how heedless are we in youth of all her anxieties and kindness. But when she is dead and gone, and when the cares and coldness of the world come withering to our hearts, when we find how hard it is to find true sympathy, how few love us for ourselves, how few will befriend us in our misfortunes, then it is we think of the mother that we have lost. It is true I had always loved mother even in my most heedless days; but I felt how inconsiderate and how ineffectual had been my love. My heart melted, and I retraced the days of infancy, when I was led by a mother's hand, and rocked to sleep in a mother's arms, and was without care or sorrow.—"Oh! my mother," exclaimed I, burying my face in the grass of the grave, "oh, that I was once more by your side, sleeping never to awake again on the cares and troubles of this world."

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, September 28, 1842.

Alvah G. Greene, of Adams, is requested & authorised to act as agent for the Register.

American Board for Foreign Missions.

The Board held its Thirty-third Annual Meeting at Norwich, on the 13th to the 16th ult. More than four hundred members were present. The total receipts for the last year are $318,396,53. Expenditures $261,147,02. The Board is now in debt to the amount of $559,40. During the year there has been a large increase in the contributions to the Board.

Thirteen Missionaries and assistant Missionaries have died, viz: Rev. A. E. Wilson, Rev. George Champion, Rev. C. C. Mitchell, and J. P. Striker, and Mrs. Mitchell, Mrs. Wolcott, Mrs. Eli Smith, Mrs. J. C. Smith, Mrs. Walker, Mrs. Powers, Mrs. S. Johnson, Mrs. Munn, and Mrs. Allen.—Twenty-five Missionaries and assistants have been sent out to various stations.

The number of missions, is 26; of stations, 85; of ordained missionaries, 134, seven of whom are physicians. There are 11 physicians not preachers, 13 teachers, 9 printers and bookbinders, and 10 other male and 179 female assistant missionaries. The whole number of laborers from this country, is 356, or twenty-eight less than were reported last year. To these we must add 4 native preachers, and 128 native helpers; a number less than was reported last year, owing to imperfect returns from the missions—and the whole number of laborers sustained through the treasury of the Board, is 488. Eight ordained missionaries, and 4 male and 12 female assistant missionaries, in all 24, have been sent forth during the year.

The number of mission churches is 59, and of church members in regular standing 21,261, of whom 1651 were received the past year.

There are 17 printing establishments, 31 presses, 4 type founderies, and 49 founts of type in the native languages. The printing for the year, was 64,499,767 pages; and the amount of printing from the beginning, is 354,333,077 pages.

Eight of the boarding-schools are denominated seminaries, and these contain 526 boys; the other twenty-two boarding-schools contain 212 boys and 386 girls; making the whole number of boarding scholars 1124. The number of free schools is 618, containing 27,298 pupils.

The missionary spirit is represented as deficient in spiritual vigor and self-devotion, and but few candidates for the ministry have the missionary life in view.

A paper was presented from the Prudential Committee in relation to the marriage of Missionaries. The object is not to discourage Missionaries from marrying, but to suggest that it is not necessary for the Missionary, (as has formerly been supposed) to be married in order to render himself more useful; but on the contrary that in many cases they can be abundantly more useful unmarried. Chancellor Walworth took ground against the measure as impolitic and unwise.

Memorials respecting the relation of the Board to Slavery were presented from various parts of New-England. The three Churches of Medway adopted the memorials unanimously. The memorialists represented Slavery as an evil that ought to be reprobated by all Christians. They ask not the Board to turn aside from its appropriate object—the giving the gospel to the heathen, but that in doing this it should be done by Christian methods only. Therefore it should not solicit, or knowingly receive the gains of oppression at home, as a means of sending the gospel abroad. This sounds like the doctrine of the gospel of Jesus, that his disciples should have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness. If chattelizing man, made in the image of God, and making merchandize of souls is not contrary to godliness, we know not what is. The gospel requires love to all men. Slavery requires love to some and not to others. The Board were asked to take the same ground against Slavery as against Intemperance, Sabbath-breaking, Indian oppression and idolatry.

Extracts from letters of several missionaries were read, showing the want of re-inforcements. The following schedule shows the number wanted at the various stations:—At S. Africa, 3, W. Africa, 3, Ahmednuggur, 3, Madras, 3, Madura, 20, Ceylon, 3, Nestorians, 5, Constantinople, 2, Ind. Arch. 2, China, 4, S. Islands, 12, Cherokees, 2, Choctaws, 2, Pawnees, 2, Sioux, 2; total 68.

De Ruyter Institute.

The fall term of this school opened unusually small. There are probably several reasons for this of an adventitious nature. If all are of this character, we may hope to see the school again filled. There is one reason against which we have spoken, and are inclined to speak, and that is, the indifference or opposition of its former friends. Now we know that there is not good occasion for this. Teachers have been, and are now employed, who are every way competent to teach, and those under their tuition are satisfied and even gratified. And we know of no cause that renders this school inferior to others. We therefore say what we have often said, that there is nothing wanting to make the school prosperous, but the co-operation of its friends. This want of co-operation is more than culpable, it is cruel, because it leaves the Trustees and a few friends to stem the tide alone—a tide that will increase so long as its friends do not yield it a desirable support. One more thing connected with those who have labored for the school, is unpleasant, viz: after having done all they can, unmerited and unmerciful blame is given them as their reward. But we wish not to be censorious; we will however say, if the school sinks, it will not be by the agency of Trustees and those who have acted, but the blame and shame will rest with those who have an equal interest in its prosperity, but have done little or nothing for its support, and with those who, for reasons that were no reasons have acted against it. Let the patrons and friends in every place send on scholars and it lives. Let them fail to do it, and it dies. Which will you have?

Cooper and his Libels.

J. Fennimore Cooper, the Novelist, has obtained a verdict of $200 against the Editor and Publishers of the Albany Evening Journal for two libels. He laid his damages at $5000. His estimation of his character differs somewhat from that of the jury. Cooper exhibits some human nature in this estimate. Unless Cooper's Novels are of more value than any we have read or heard of, he absolutely does no good in writing them, but inflicts an injury that money in untold sums can never atone for. Believe, and know this, that there is no more withering curse than Novels. We never knew a Novel to make any one better or wiser, but have known them to make fools of many, and, in fact, this is all they accomplish. Those young ladies or gentlemen that have yielded to the influence of these things, have driven all correct views of human life and accountability from their hearts, and in their stead placed the wild imaginings of a depraved heart and perverted understanding. If he who plunders property is punished by law, then he who plunders minds is still more worthy of punishment, and in the same ratio as mind is more valuable than property. Novel writers we count the worst pests of community.

The Sabbath in the 13th Century.

It is supposed by many that the Sabbath of the commandment ceased to be observed soon after the resurrection of Christ, and that Seventh-day Baptists are of modern origin. This is an entire mistake. The observation of the seventh-day can be traced from Christ to the year 1203. In the year 1203, William, king of Scotland, called a council of the principal persons of his kingdom, in which it was decreed that Saturday, from the 12th hour at noon, should be holy. Before this the entire day was regarded according to the commandment. How long the practice of observing the seventh-day was continued after this manner is uncertain. But this much is known, that to this day the shop-keepers in Scotland close their shops at noon on the seventh-day. This practice is a relict of the decision of the council.

We are able to trace the history of S. D. Baptists back some two centuries or more; so that we can show that the seventh-day has been observed by Christians from Christ till now, with the exception of a period less than 500 years, and for ourself we have no doubt but the fact can be established that it has been observed without intermission.—Of this, we have no means at present of knowing. But we expect that an examination of some English Library will yet show the fact.

We claim nothing on this account for the Sabbath. If it had not been observed at all from Christ till now, it would by no means alter the fiat of the great Jehovah that fixed the day without limitation, and made it binding on all men, in all times and places.

Pugilism.

A prize fight came off at Hastings on the 17th ult., between Christopher Lilly and Thomas McCoy, two "bullies" of New-York, in presence of a large number of spectators. The fight lasted two hours and forty-three minutes, and at the 120th round terminated in the death of McCoy, one of the combatants. Never have we read of a more horrid affair, even in savage life.—The duelist and the angry murderer do not exhibit so much depravity as was here shown; nor can we any where find a parallel of cold-blooded and determined hostility. The surviving principal and the seconds have taken themselves away. Two who were engaged in abetting have been taken into custody, and it is hoped the others may not escape the vigilance of the officers of the law.

American Millenarian.

A paper, with the above title, is published semi-monthly by an association of believers in the Pre-Millenial Advent of our Lord, at 138 Fulton st., New York, and 32 Cornhill, Boston. It professes to be a literal interpretation of prophecy. We are not prepared to judge of the work from the specimen No. before us. The subject, however, to which it is devoted, is exciting much interest, and is worthy of careful investigation. Subscription price $1, in advance.

Missionary Department.

For the Register.

Journal of Br. Griswold.

August 3. Left for Scott, passing through the villages of Truxton and Homer. Arrived at Scott, and called upon Eld. R. G. Burdick. Had a long interview with Br. Hubbard, the Treasurer of our Missionary Society.

5. Received an invitation from the Presbyterian minister, Rev. Mr. Slye, to give an address before the Moral Reform Society on the evening following the Sabbath. Collected some money. Preached in the evening.

6. Sabbath; preached in the morning and in the afternoon at Scott, to a full and attentive audience. The services were peculiarly solemn. Many were the tears that flowed while I endeavored to press the claims of the gospel, and to which a hearty response was made, by a large contribution. The choir here, also, are deserving of praise for the excellent manner in which they performed that interesting part of worship.—In the evening lectured before the Moral Reform Society at the Presbyterian house, to a large congregation. The cause of moral purity is making rapid progress here, and soon may it sweep every vestage of licentiousness from earth.

7. Rode 25 miles to Truxton, and preached to a full house at 5 o'clock. Here too the Lord was evidently present. The weeping eye, the involuntary sigh, and the expressive countenance, all told how much they felt for a lost and ruined world, and for the evangelizing of which they contributed liberally of their substance.

8. Traveled to Lincklaen, at which place I preached at 5 o'clock. Here also, the cause of God has many a friend, and altho' the weather was unpleasant the assembly was large, and the collection liberal.

10. Left for Verona, passing through Cazenovia, skirted with its beautiful lake on the west; thence to Chittenango, thence to Oneida Castle. At the last place saw a large number of the Oneida tribe of Indians, dressed in rich and elegant, although in Indian, manner. Some of their dresses were of the most costly kind. Alas! their forest and game have disappeared before the white man, but what has he given in return?

12. Called on Elder Lewis, and was very kindly entertained.

13. Sabbath; preached at the first church in Verona in the morning, also again in the evening. Enjoyed the opportunity of celebrating the death of my Redeemer with the church here. A solemn season we had. May it be only a prelude of that meeting which we hope to enjoy in our Savior's mansion above. Found the friends here warm-hearted in the cause of religion at home and abroad.

14. Passed through Jerusalem to Jericho where we stopped to hear a sermon from a first-day minister, to whom I gave a Sabbath Tract. Afternoon I preached at the second church Verona to an overflowing house.—Took up a contribution for my Agency.—This and the first church made a liberal donation.

15. Left for Watson, in Lewis county, passing through Rome, Constableville, Turin, Martinsburgh, crossed the Black River, thence to Watson. This is a newly settled country. Our friends here think it to be a good country. The land is easily brought under cultivation, and pleasant land to work. Crops look well.

17. Preached to our friends at Watson; had a most excellent meeting. Our friends here ought to be borne in mind. Just commencing a settlement any aid that could be rendered them would be thankfully received.

18. Left for Adams, Jefferson Co., passing through Lowville, Copenhagen, Tylersville and Rodman to Adams. At Copenhagen, in company with some gentlemen and ladies, visited the falls on Deer River. The falls are about 100 feet high. The gulph below on the east side is about 150 feet in perpendicular height.

20. Sabbath; preached twice at Adams, having an interval of only 15 minutes, to a large congregation. Our friends here appear to take a deep interest in the cause of Missions, and to which they contributed very liberally. Here is the best country, I think, through which I have as yet passed. It is level, rich and luxuriant.

21. Went to Hounsfield, which lies about 5 miles from Lake Ontario. Here I found the meeting-house crowded full, and if ever I had the assistance of my Savior, I believe I had it then. A large contribution was taken up for the cause of Missions, at which time many of the first-day brethren contributed, as also they have at several other places. Returned with Elder Wm. Green to Adams.

21. Left for Berlin, in Rensselaer county, distant about 180 miles.

27. Sabbath: For the first time I had the pleasure of seeing our aged brother, Eld. Satterlee, whose locks are blossomed for the grave. Preached at his church in the morning.

28. Had a happy meeting with our brother Scott, the faithful missionary of the west. If I mistake not our hearts felt to sympathize together. A delightful interview we had. Afternoon preached at the first-day house in Berlin.

Sept. 4. Sabbath: preached at Petersburgh, followed by Br. Scott. The friends contributed liberally.

During the last month I have secured the following sums. Scott, $11,37; Truxton, $8,33; Emily James, $1; David Colegrove, $1; Mary Colegrove, $1; Lincklaen, $5,37; 1st Verona, $5,25; 2d Verona, $6,37; Adams, $14,16; Hounsfield, $12,80; Berlin, $7,76; Petersburgh, $11-82; J. Whitford, $8,66; Lucius Crandall, $1; Alex. Campbell, $24,62; total, $152-85. Total during my Agency, $522,50.—Expenses of my tour, $47,34.

Thus, through the goodness of my Heavenly Father, I have arrived at the end of my journey in safety. May my heart ever be grateful for his kindness, and may my future life be dedicated to his service. I wish to express my gratitude also to the churches I have visited for the very kind reception manifested, and the liberal donations to the cause of our Redeemer. For the first, and perhaps for the last time, your unworthy brother has been permitted to see you in the flesh, but may the acquaintance which has thus been formed be only a prelude of that delightful association which we shall enjoy in that world where parting is known no more.

SHERMAN S. GRISWOLD, Ag't.

Berlin, Sept. 12, 1842.

P. S. In consequence of a new organization contemplated, the A. S. D. B. Missionary Society wishes to bring its present system to a close. Having been re-appointed to act as an Agent in collecting the dues of the Society, I would say, that I expect to call upon all those who are indebted to the Society during the present winter; and as I am now serving gratis, it is to be hoped that all indebted will be ready to respond when called upon. The Society having repealed the resolution of last year, giving owners of Notes the privilege of calling them in, the local Agent must now hold all Notes in their hands, as the interest on said notes is now to be collected. S. S. G. Ag't.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From the N. Y. Tribune.

ARRIVAL OF THE GREAT WESTERN

Fifteen Days Later from Europe.

By the steamer Great Western which left Bristol on the 3d ult., and reached this city on Saturday evening, we have papers to her day of sailing.

The most important intelligence which she brings, is, that the insurrection in the manufacturing and mining districts, having spent its violence, was subsiding, and the restoration of tranquility was becoming general, though in many of the manufacturing towns the workmen still remained out, yet the quarrel had become one only between masters and men; not partaking in the least degree of a national character.—The cry of the mob was "more wages," and not "the Charter or no work." A number of the deluded men who took a leading part in the recent disturbances had been apprehended, and it was expected that a special commission would be shortly granted for their trial, and that the nominations for it will soon be made. It was expected that in a few days all the hands yet out, would return to their employment.

The Treaty.—The Great Western took out the new Treaty, and she brings the first intelligence in return. The Liverpool Chronicle remarks, that "upon the whole Lord Ashburton has ably and efficiently discharged his duty, and more than realized the expectations which his embassy held out. All the bad blood which the constant discussion and agitation of the points in dispute between the two countries produced, has been removed and a happy union has been formed between Great Britain and her 'magnificent daughter of the West,' which will endure, it is to be hoped, for ages."

Willmer's Newsletter says: "Nothing has, as yet transpired here as to the terms of the treaties, but they are generally supposed to be such as cannot fail to give the utmost satisfaction to the people of both countries, and at all events, the settlement of the long-pending difficulties is regarded as a matter of [illegible] importance. The news gave an impetus to the cotton trade, and little [illegible] is entertained here, but that as soon as American credit shall have been re-established, these treaties will tend much to the extension of the trade and commerce between the two countries."

The Queen and Prince Albert were on a visit to Scotland.

The trial of the [illegible] Bean for attempting to injure the person of the Queen has taken place at the Criminal Court. After a trial which lasted some seven or eight hours, he was found guilty on one of the counts against him, and [illegible] eighteen months' imprisonment in Newgate.

Since the intrusion [illegible] have been taken at Windsor Castle to prevent the ingress of strangers [illegible] man at the only entrance [illegible] from the time the porters leave [illegible] until they return to [illegible] night and the greatest vigilance [illegible]

The Great Western [illegible] when she has performed [illegible] advertised. It is reported that [illegible] has been any thing [illegible] and at the present time [illegible] sum amounting to nearly £[illegible] £15,000 are owing to their bankers.

The [illegible] steam frigate Montezuma has been seized for being [illegible] and destined to assist the Mexicans in the operations against Texas, contrary to the Foreign Enlistment Act.

The American Minister, Edward Everett, had gone to Paris.

The Company of Royal Sappers and Miners have returned from the Niger Expedition—so many of them as [illegible] with their lives. [illegible] the expedition [illegible] done [illegible] the slave trade [illegible] of Her [illegible]

An earthquake [illegible] North Wales.

Mr. [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] when [illegible] the Celestial [illegible] it will [illegible] exchange [illegible]

[illegible]—[illegible] Missionaries at [illegible] apprehend [illegible]

The [illegible]

News of the Day.

STORM [illegible]

The storm of [illegible] last was very severe at Westfield [illegible]. The Messenger of that place says:

Between seven and [illegible] increased to a [illegible] by eight it became [illegible] quency of the flashes [illegible] roar of the thunder. Its violence continued to increase until about [illegible] when the prodigious floods of falling water, the rapid and intensely vivid flashes, and the loud crashing peals of thunder, were truly terrific. It seemed as if the Lake [illegible] by some supernatural throw [illegible] upwards and was again seeking its ancient bed. Never did we know it to pour such oceans before, or to thunder in such long continuous roar. For two hours, we can attest,—and some say for three or more hours,—there was not a single cessation in the roar of "Heaven's artillery."

Such was the flood of waters that fell, that the Creek, by twelve o'clock, was swollen to a height greater than was ever before known by the present inhabitants, except possibly in a single instance. Walker's dam, half a mile south of the village, was carried away except about thirty feet; J. Farnsworth, jr., lost the flume to his oil mill; the premises of F. Waters' Shovel and Fork Factory, were considerably injured; the tan yard and cellar of Stephen Rumsey were overflown, and the contents of some 50 vats spoiled or injured; the dam of C. Rumsey was swept off, as was also that of Mr. Cochrane. The bridge across the creek at Mr. Cochrane's was carried off, and one or two more below.

On the main road West, the bridges are nearly all gone, and the fences too, where they crossed the streams. The Western Mail Stage got into the Creek on which is [illegible] mill, and was with difficulty extricated. Luckily there were no passengers, or they would have had a hard time of it. The mail got a thorough soaking, but was not lost. We have not heard from beyond the State line.

The lake shore of Chautauque county, particularly in the neighborhood of Westfield, for some reason or other, seems peculiarly subject to severe thunder storms. There was a terrific one in that neighborhood sometime in the spring.

[illegible]

TERRIBLE DISASTER.

[illegible] our painful and melancholy [illegible] one of the most serious casualties [illegible] the village of Keeseville. Yesterday being general muster [illegible] Infantry, the [illegible] and the [illegible] was that there was a great [illegible] the new suspension foot [illegible] the Ausable, now nearly [illegible] o'clock, some 30 or [illegible] the chain on the [illegible] precipitated near[illegible] the river. The rains of [illegible] swollen the Ausable [illegible] and the force of the waters was almost irresistible. In the [illegible] the strongest swimmer [illegible] resist. The [illegible] might have been [illegible] circumstances [illegible] certainly known that [illegible] are lost, but of [illegible] names, as follows:

[illegible] H [illegible] Keeseville.

[illegible] Keeseville, aged [illegible]

[illegible] aged [illegible] years.

[illegible] Keeseville, aged [illegible]

[illegible] years.

[illegible] aged [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] Indians on [illegible] Hill about [illegible] were [illegible] was [illegible] years [illegible] They [illegible] were scattered on [illegible] Holmes' Valley [illegible] them. The Indians [illegible] them a fight and [illegible] family, and [illegible] the whites fired [illegible] Mr. Jas. W [illegible] Holmes' Valley [illegible] gentleman [illegible] The Indians were [illegible]

I give you the tale as it was told to me, but have no doubt of its truth.—Sentinel.

[illegible] Carrier Pigeons from Birmingham to Antwerp.—An extraordinary and interesting flight of carrier pigeons, to [illegible] was witnessed in the neighborhood of Birmingham, on Tuesday, the [illegible]. About 300 pigeons, belonging to merchants and other parties at Antwerp were forwarded a few days previously to Mr. Muntz, brother of one of the members for the borough, with a request that he would see them fairly started at six o'clock on the above morning. This request was accordingly complied with, the whole of the pigeons having been started on their journey almost simultaneously, from Mr. Muntz's residence at Handsworth, and after making some gyrations in the air, they took an easterly direction, and favored by a fresh breeze, they were out of sight in a few minutes. Mr. Muntz has since received intelligence of the safe arrival of the whole flock, the first pigeon having reached Antwerp at half past nine o'clock the same morning, followed in rapid succession by the others, in fives and tens; the last pigeon reached its destination at half past ten. Estimating the distance from Birmingham to Antwerp (measuring in a straight line) at 300 miles, and allowing for the difference in time between the two points, the first bird would appear to have travelled at the surprising velocity of ninety miles per hour! It is not the least singular fact connected with the match, that amongst so large a number of pigeons not one should have wandered from its homeward course.

Boston and Cincinnati.—When the Sandusky Railroad is finished, Cincinnati will be within three days of Boston. From Cincinnati to the Lake the distance may be accomplished easily in 16 hours; a magnificent steam packet will then receive the passengers and transport them to Buffalo in 20 hours; and from Buffalo to Boston they will go by railroad, say in 34 hours; the whole distance from Cincinnati to Boston requiring only 70 hours! Does this prediction startle any one? In a very few years it will pass into history, and be regarded as a very common-place fact.—Philanthropist.

A Mammoth Steamer.—A contract was made a day or two since between the Troy Steamboat Company and Mr. Brown of New York, for the construction by the latter of a steamer, 810 feet keel and 28 feet beam, to be finished by the first of May next. This steamer will form one of a night line between Troy and New York.—She will be fitted with Lighthall's half-beam engine, and in point of speed and accommodations, surpass any steamer afloat.—Troy Whig.

A New Free State.—The people of the Territory of Iowa are about to call a Convention, for the purpose of forming a Constitution, with a view to be admitted into the Union as a sovereign State.

Great Britain and Texas.—Great Britain and Texas have concluded three treaties—of amity, navigation, and commerce—of mediation between Mexico and Texas, for which the latter is to pay £1,000,000 of the debt of the former to Great Britain, if she procure a permanent truce in thirty days, and a permanent peace in six months—and a treaty granting reciprocal right of search for the suppression of the African slave trade.

A splendid Piano, has recently been shipped from Boston for Liverpool. This is said to be the first Piano of American manufacture ever ordered from England.

The Bible.—It was stated at the recent anniversary of the Liverpool Bible Society, that during the existence of the association, fourteen millions of copies had been issued.

A Moderate Fortune.—It is stated that the Rothschilds, of London, have offered to compound their tax, under the new Income Tax of Sir Robert Peel, for the three years, at £24,000. In other words, they are willing to be let off with the payment to tax collector of $40,000 a year. They admit, therefore, if the report be true, that their annual income is at least $1,350,000.

Commerce of New Orleans.—According to Cook & Young's Prices Current, the total value of products of the interior, brought to New Orleans during the twelve months ending the 1st of August, 1842, is estimated at $45,716,000.

Mr. William Webb, near Wilmington, (Del.) has now in operation a mill for the manufacture of Sugar from Corn Stalks, and which it is said has proved thus far eminently successful.

Olden Times of England.—The records of the Corporation of Canterbury publish the expense paid for bringing a heretic from London in 1535, at 14s. 8d.; and for a load and a half of wood to burn him, 2s.; for gunpowder, 1d.; and a stake and staple, 8d. This is one of the records of the "good old times."

The Seneca Treaty, negotiated by Ambrose Spencer at Buffalo, during the summer, has been ratified by the U. S. Senate, and the lands are to be put into market immediately. The Buffalo Advertiser says:

The Senecas cede two of their reservations, the Buffalo and Tonawanda, for a fair consideration for the soil and improvements, and retain two, the Cattaraugus and Chautauque. Those who choose to emigrate to the West, under the provisions of the treaty of 1838, are at liberty to do so.

But it is supposed that the great body of the nation will remain upon and cultivate the two reservations retained, which are sufficient to allow about 200 acres of land to each family.

Thus a large tract of country, of about 70,000 acres of the very best land in Western New York, contiguous to one of the most flourishing cities in the Union, is opened to the industry and enterprise of the white man.

Wiskonsan.—Gov. Doty of Wiskonsan Territory, has issued his proclamation, in pursuance of the organic laws of that Territory, requiring the people to vote at the election to be held on the 4th Monday of the month, for or against the formation of a permanent Government for the State of Wiskonsan.

Death of Lloyd the Defaulter.—The brig Hope arrived at this port on Saturday from Goree on the Coast of Africa, bringing the first intelligence received since the flight of Thomas Lloyd, the defaulting Collector of City Revenues of this city. The brig Hope is the vessel in which Lloyd was supposed to have left the city, and in which he did leave it last May, coming on board after she had got under weigh. He appears to have gone out as supercargo, and is supposed to have been owner of both vessels and cargo. He went in her to the Cape de Verds, thence to Goree on the Coast of Africa, there disposed of her cargo, shipped another, and sailed for this port. When about ten days out, he was attacked by yellow fever, of which he died, and was committed to the deep. The vessel pursued her course, and reached this port on Saturday, the Captain severely sick of the fever. She of course is detained in quarantine for thirty days.—Tribune.

Indian Sports.—Nineteen wagons, containing some two or three hundred of the Tuscarora tribe of Indians, came up from Niagara county yesterday afternoon, to meet their brethren of the Seneca tribe, on the reservation near this city, for the purpose of joining in their annual athletic games. These sports, consisting of ball-playing, wrestling, running, leaping, &c., will probably continue for two or three days. We understand that they are to commence at noon to-morrow near the "Sackett Stand."

We believe that although the Senecas have annually held these sports, this is the first occasion for some years in which they have been thus joined by a large delegation from the neighboring tribes.—Buffalo Com. Adv.

Silk in Arkansas.—Several weeks ago, we mentioned the success in Arkansas in the cultivation of silk. The enterprise is still in progress. The Editor of the Little Rock Gazette mentions the receipt of 500 skeins manufactured by Mrs. Smith, of Hempstead (? silk-stead) county. These skeins are dyed a variety of colors, all very brilliant. The yellow, which is very beautiful, is dyed with Bois d' Arc, or Osage Orange, a tree indigenious to that State, and particularly the southern part of it. Its texture is very fine and even; and for strength, finish, and brilliancy of colors, it will not suffer by a comparison with most of the foreign silk sold in the stores.—N. O. Bulletin.

Commerce of New Orleans.—According to Cook & Young's Price Current, the total products of the interior brought to New Orleans, during the twelve months ending 1st Aug. 1842, is estimated at $45,716,000.

The receipts of cotton, during the same time, have amounted to 740,155 bales.

The sugar crop, of last year, about 90,000 hhds.

The receipts of tobacco have amounted to 66,000 hhds., most of them very large.

Of flour, 439,688 bbls. were received.

Of pork, 945 hhds., 244,142 bbls., and 4,501,800 lbs. unpacked have been received.

Of bacon 22,725 casks, and 1,288,000 bbls. in bulk.

Grain—Corn, oats and wheat—240,875 bbls., and 388,180 sacks of corn; 63,281 bbls. and sacks of oats; 134,886 bbls. wheat.

Whiskey—63,335 bbls.
Lead—472,556 pigs.
Molasses—35,000 hhds.
Staves—18,000,000.

Slave Trade.—A letter from Joseph Pease, (one of the noble band who, fifty years ago, began the warfare against the slave trade,) says that then there were two or three millions of the African race in bondage—now there are six or seven millions; that then there were not one hundred thousand annually torn from Africa—now there are four hundred thousand; and he asks his friends, with a sad heart, "what have we accomplished?"

Stealing Negroes.—The Missouri Sentinel, in remarking upon the number of negro slaves stolen, says there is a secret combination, extending from the east bank of the Mississippi through Illinois to Michigan, by means of which slaves are transported clandestinely to any place whither they desire to go.

It is stated that the interest on the debt of the State of Alabama due January 1st, 1843, in London has this day been remitted to that city. This will do something towards the restoration of our nation's character in Europe.

The cloth case, "Broadbent vs. United States," at Philadelphia, was decided on Friday in the United States District Court, in favor of the United States. Another case will come up on the 17th inst. The goods seized in these cases are valued at $175,000.

Distressing Accident.—As the morning train west yesterday morning, approached Schenectady, the engineer discovered a man sitting on the rail, with his head resting on his knees, apparently asleep, but as he was in the shade of the bridge, he was not perceived until the train was within a few feet of him. The engine was immediately reversed, the breaks applied, and the alarm given, but the man could not be aroused to his danger, nor the engine prevented from striking and dragging him forward some two rods, his legs becoming entangled in the machine, and badly broken. He was taken to Schenectady and every attention bestowed upon him; but it was supposed he must die. His name was ascertained to be Ezra Smith, but his residence was not known—supposed to be Utica.—Argus.

The extensive rolling mill and nail factory at Harrisburgh, Pa., owned by Messrs. Hunt, were totally destroyed by fire on Wednesday last, causing a loss of $25,000 to $30,000, which was only partially covered by insurance.

Upwards of $400,000 are annually appropriated by our Government, for the purpose of aiding and educating various Indian tribes, agreeable to treaties made with them.

Deserves to be Immortalized.—The fellow who gave twelve and a half cents on Monday, to a man for risking his limbs and life to stop a horse when running away with a chaise.—Bay State Democrat.

Norwegians in Wisconsin.—The Chesapeake landed on Monday morning, two hundred and five Norwegian emigrants.—They are all in good health, and are much rejoiced to think they have got to the end of their journey. They will settle in the Norwegian neighborhood in the south part of the county. We learn that about five hundred more will be along during the season.—Milwaukie Courier.

Worse than State Stocks.—A recent number of the National Intelligencer contains an advertisement of one Notley Maddex, in which he deplores the loss of five excellent slaves, within the short space of about three months, and for which he offers a reward of $450. Property of this kind seems to have become quite insecure. We recently heard of the flight of fifteen articles in one lot, and others were on their way. An investment in deeds of mercy and justice will be found to be more permanent.—New-York Evangelist.

The Great West Coming!—Letters from Buffalo dated 12th inst., advise of the arrival in that port, in the previous 24 hours, rising of 100,000 bushels of wheat. The arrivals were upwards of forty in number. A sale of wheat had been made at Buffalo as low as 60 cents.

The Slave Trade.—In a recent speech, Lord Brougham declared that "the men who supplied nearly all the capital embarked in this traffic, the men whose ingenuity defeated every attempt to put it down, the men under whose auspices it was now flourishing to an unprecedented extent, were British merchants." This statement was not denied in Parliament.

It is said that Queen Victoria has expressed her desire to have forwarded an early copy of the forthcoming work on American Antiquities, by Mr. Stephens, to be elegantly bound for her private library.

Notices.

NOTICE.

There will be a special meeting of the trustees of De Ruyter Institute on the 6th day of Oct. next, at 1 o'clock, P. M., at the Institute, to consider the best measures for sustaining the interests of the Institute.—The wisdom of the board is wanted and every trustee is especially requested to attend.

B. G. STILLMAN, Pres't.
J. R. BUTTS, Secretary.
De Ruyter, September 3, 1842.

ALFRED ACADEMY, AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY.

W. C. Kenyon, Principal.
Miss Caroline B. Maxson, Preceptress.

LECTURERS.

On Phrenology and Physiology.—Drs. J. R. HARTSHORN, and E. RIDER.

On School Teaching.—LUKE G. MAXSON.

On Chemistry and Geology.—W. C. KENYON.

Lectures on other subjects as occasion may require.

This Institution is pleasantly located, in the county of Allegany, thirteen miles South-East of Angelica, and six miles South of Almond. From its retired and quiet situation, it presents a favorable opportunity to parents to place their sons and daughters under a moral influence that will not be counteracted by those with whom they may associate.

The patronage which it has hitherto enjoyed, has been so liberal as to warrant very considerable expenditures in rendering it still more worthy of a more extended patronage; and it is hoped that it will, under its present organization, be rendered inferior to no similar Institution in Western New York.

The qualification of Common School Teachers will receive particular attention, so as to render them thorough and practical instructors of youth.

The Academic Year,—Is divided into three terms of fifteen weeks each. 1st, Commencing Wednesday 17th August; 2d, 7th December; 3d, 4th April, 1843.

Vacations.—At the expiration of the first and second Terms, one week each; at the expiration of the 3d Term, five weeks.

Tuition.—Varying with Instruction, from $3,50 to $4,75 per term.

Board.—From $1 to $1,25 depending on accommodations. Rooms in the Institution, furnished with Cook Stoves, can be had at a moderate expense.

SAMUEL RUSSELL, Esq., Pres't.
Alfred, July, 1842.

PROPOSALS
For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead.) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

MARRIED,

In Genesee, on the 15th inst., by Eld. Z. Campbell, Mr. HORACE COLLINS, and Miss TEMPERANCE E. MAXSON, of the above place.

In the same place by by the same, Mr. JEREMIAH F. BURDICK, of Angelica, and Miss SARDINIA P. HALL, of Genesee.

DIED,

In Lincklaen, on the 18th inst., RONIE ANN, daughter of Edward H. Burdick, aged 2 years, 3 months.

LIST OF LETTERS.

J. Brown, Joseph Goodrich, (we will publish statistics in the minutes.) E. Maxson.

LIST OF RECEIPTS

Of Ephraim Maxson, $3, cr. Ezra Coon, $2, J. S. Coon, $1, vol. 3, of J. Spicer jr., $6, cr. J. W. Langworthy, Reuben Brown, Isaac C. Burdick $2, each, vol. 3, of A Campbell, $6, cr. Adam Stillman, C. Saunders, Luke Crandall, $2, each, vol. 3.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

De Ruyter Institute.

M. L. WOOD, A. B., Principal.
Instructor in Languages, and Lecturer on Chemistry.
G. M. LANGWORTHY,
Instructor in Mathematics, and Lecturer on Natural Philosophy and Astronomy.

Ladies' Department.

Miss MARY A. SEVERANCE, Preceptress,
Instructress in French, Drawing, and Painting, &c.
Miss ELIZABETH B. GOODRICH,
Instructress in the Primary Department.

THE Natural, Intellectual and Moral Sciences, are taught by the different Instructors, as best suits the circumstances accompanying the formation of classes, except those mentioned above, which are always taught by the same Teacher.

This Institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter, thirteen miles south of Cazenovia, twenty-four miles west of Hamilton, and about eighteen east of Homer. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms, of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, stoves, and rented to gentlemen and ladies at one shilling a week each, each room being large enough for the accommodation of two students.

The ladies occupy the rooms on the south, and the gentlemen those in the north of the building.

The Institution is furnished with a good philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a good education, as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

The year is divided into three terms of fourteen weeks each the first term commenced on the 16th of Sept., followed by a vacation of one week, the second term will commence on the 30th of Dec. followed by a vacation of three weeks, the third term will commence on the last Friday in April 1843, followed also, by a vacation of four weeks.

TUITION.

In the common English branches,	$3.50
In the Languages and higher English branches,	5.00
In Drawing,	2.00
In Painting,	2.00
Extras,	.50

Tuition in advance.

N. B. Those desiring to qualify themselves for teaching, will be furnished with every facility for doing so, and when duly qualified will receive a certificate of recommendation.

New Arrangement.

GEORGE W. SUTTON, having this day purchased the interest of W. H. QUINBY, in the Dry Goods and Shoe business, will continue the Trade and the Manufacture of Boots and Shoes as usual at the NEW YORK CASH STORE, where he would solicit the continuance of the liberal patronage heretofore received.

Sept. 14, 1842.

Dissolution.

THE Co-partnership heretofore existing under the firm of SUTTON & QUINBY, is this day dissolved by mutual consent. All notes and accounts will be left with Geo. W. Sutton for settlement.

GEO. W. SUTTON,
WM. H. QUINBY.
De Ruyter, Sep. 14, 1842.

BOOTS BOOTS! SHOES! SHOES!!

AT the sign of the Mammoth Boot, manufactured invariably of leather tanned in "cold liquor." Please call.

FLOUR, PROVISIONS, GROCERIES, and six hundred other things, for sale by 11tf
May 11. HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

SILK! SILK!! SILK!!!

A BEAUTIFUL assortment of plain, figured and striped, just received and for sale very cheap at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

JOB PRINTING.

BOOKS, Pamphlets, Way, Hand-Bills, Cards Bills, &c. &c., neatly executed at this office.

Election Notice.

SHERIFF'S OFFICE, }
Madison County, ss. }

I, ISAAC BROWN, Sheriff of said county, do hereby give notice that an election is to be held on Tuesday succeeding the first Monday of November next, for the election of the several officers mentioned in a notice received by me from the Secretary of State, a copy of which is hereunto annexed.

Morrisville, Sept. 7, 1842.
ISAAC BROWN, Sheriff.
By W. B. BRAND, Under Sheriff.

STATE OF NEW-YORK, Secretary's Office, }
Albany, August 31, 1842. }

To the Sheriff of the county of Madison:

SIR: Notice is hereby given that at the next general election, to be held on the Tuesday succeeding the first Monday of November next, the following officers are to be elected, to wit:

A Governor and Lieutenant Governor of this State;

A Senator for the Fifth Senatorial District, to supply a vacancy which will occur by the expiration of the term of service of Joseph [illegible], on the last day of December next;

Also, the following county officers, to wit: Three Members of Assembly, and one Coroner in the place of Allen Davis, who has removed from the county, and whose term of service would have expired on the last day of December, 1843.

Yours respectfully,
S. YOUNG, Secretary of State.

STATE OF NEW-YORK, Secretary's Office, }
Albany, Sept. 7, 1842. }

To the Sheriff of the county of Madison:

SIR: Notice is hereby given that at the next general election [illegible] the Tuesday [illegible] the first Monday of November next, a Representative in the twenty-eighth Congress of the United States [illegible] District, consisting of the counties of Madison and Oswego.

Yours respectfully,
S. YOUNG, Secretary of State.

I certify that the above is a true copy of the notice received by me from the Secretary of State. Morrisville, September 9, 1842.

ISAAC BROWN, Sheriff.
By W. B. BRAND, Under Sheriff. 5w7

Christian Review.

A GOOD PROPOSITION.

THE importance of the Christian Review is admitted. It was commenced nearly seven years since in obedience to an urgent and almost spontaneous call from different parts of the [illegible] and in compliance with that call has been [illegible] through six successive volumes [illegible] fort, and considerable sacrifice [illegible] the present volume [illegible] the part of a few individuals. The number of subscribers, however, has gradually increased [illegible]

[illegible]

GOULD, KENDALL & LINCOLN [illegible]

N. B. [illegible]

Boston, August 10.

What is Economy?

RANDOLPH & DUNHAM [illegible] informing their customers [illegible] Mechanic's Hall [illegible] Cutting done at sight and warranted [illegible]

De Ruyter, August [illegible]

Economy is the [illegible]

JAMES M. LETTS [illegible] customers, and [illegible] removed his Tailoring [illegible] ing occupied by [illegible] he will be ready [illegible] making all manner [illegible] be done in the [illegible] done in the latest [illegible] dies Habits, and [illegible] notice. All work [illegible] be warranted to [illegible]
De Ruyter, [illegible]

L. W. BLISS [illegible] Bliss' & [illegible] Holme's [illegible] consisting of Broad [illegible] Chisels, at F[illegible]
October 4.

☞IMPORTANT WORK!

NOW IN THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION,
A DICTIONARY OF
Arts, Manufactures, and Mines,
Containing a clear exposition of their
PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.
B. ANDREW URE, M. D., F. R. S., M. G. S.,
M. A. S., Lond., Mem. Acad. N. S.
Philad., S. Ph. Soc. N. Germ.
Hanov., Mulh. &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings.

THIS [illegible] the most popular work [illegible] a book most [illegible] the wants of all classes of the [illegible] important objects [illegible]

1st. To [illegible] Manufacturer, Metallurgist, and Tradesman [illegible] the principles of their respective processes [illegible]

2d. [illegible] Merchants, Brokers, Drysalters, [illegible]

[illegible]

STOVES.

COLD WINTER IS COMING

[illegible]

Fancy Parlor Stoves.

[illegible]

BRASS AND TIN WARE

[illegible]

LOW PRICES

[illegible]

Eave Troughs

[illegible]

JUST RECEIVED

[illegible]

JOB WORK

[illegible]

"Hard times and money scarce."

[illegible] Goods must [illegible]

[illegible] W. SUTTON

BOOKS & STATIONERY.

[illegible] Miscellaneous [illegible] Stationery, at the Book Store [illegible]
HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

50 [illegible] BROAD CLOTHS, CASSIMERES, SATINETTS, at reduced prices [illegible]
NEW YORK CASH STORE.

[illegible] FARMER'S EXCHANGE is the place to [illegible] CHEAP. Oct. 20, 1841.
S. G. WALKER.

Notice.

[illegible] who are indebted to the subscriber, [illegible] accounts or notes, are requested to [illegible] immediately and save cost.
[illegible] June 20, 1842.
JAMES M. LETTS.

BOOK BINDING.

[illegible] having connected a BINDERY [illegible] establishment, is now ready [illegible] kinds of Binding in a neat and durable [illegible] reasonable terms as at any other establishment [illegible] section of country.
JAMES BAILEY.
[illegible] 1841.

POETRY.

From the New-York Evangelist.

Broken Vows.

"Jesus turned and looked on him."

When silent steal across the soul
  Remembrances of broken vows,
And tears, almost without control,
  Flow, as the guilty spirit bows :—

'Tis then he's caught the Savior's eye!
  He views, with looks of injured love,
The soul for whom he deigned to die
  Ungratefully a traitor prove!

"Oh! had He but in anger glanced!"
  The weeping soul in anguish cries,
"I could have borne that dreadful look;
  But now I yield; my spirit dies.

"No more in promises I'll rest,
  Nor resolutions vainly made:
But, leaning on my Savior's breast,
  I'll ask his love—implore his aid."

MARY.

Miscellaneous Department.

THE EXPLORING EXPEDITION.

At the trial of Lieut. Wilkes now going on, a document was presented which gives the following summary of the labors and exploits of this Expedition. We copy from the Commercial Advertiser:

The voyage of the expedition lasted three years and ten months, from the time of its leaving the Capes of the Chesapeak, until the return of Vincennes to New York. In this voyage the globe was circumnavigated, the Atlantic and Pacific oceans were each crossed three times, and the exploration extend from 16 degrees of North to 67 1-2 of South latitude.

During this time the following work was performed:

Madeira visited, and its mountains measured. The Cape de Verds visited, and the Atlantic, between their longitude and Brazil, examined for shoals and islands, said by former navigators to exist. Rio Janeiro visited. Cape Horn, Terra del Fuego, and Orange harbor visited. Two separate expeditions made toward the South Pole, in one of which Palmer's Land and South Shetland were seen, and in the other the barrier of ice, the ne plus ultra of Cook, visited. The coast of Chili and Peru visited, the harbors of Valparaiso and Calloa surveyed. Clermont Tonnerre, Serle's Island, the Pomatou Groupe, and Tahiti visited. Surveys made of the harbors of Matavai, Papou, Tanou, Papeite. The Peaks of Tahiti ascended and measured. The islands of the Navigator's Groupe surveyed. Sydney visited. An expedition made toward the South Pole, in which a firm barrier of ice, lying aground, was explored from longitude 160 E. to 97 E.—Within this, land was so frequently seen as to leave no doubt of the existence of a vast antarcic continent, the extreme visited points of which are 1400 miles apart.—During the expedition the flag ship was forty days among the ice, and exposed to most formidable hazards; the Peacock, Captain Hudson, was so crushed by the ice, that her stem was ground off to within 1 1-2 inches of the wood ends.—Sydney revisited. New Zeland visited.—Tongataboo visited. The Fejee Islands thoroughly surveyed. The Sandwich Islands visited. A vessel of the squadron despatched to re-survey Upolu; another to complete the exploration of the Pomatou Groupe. The summit of Monwa Loa visited, and many harbors, shoals, &c. of the Sandwich Islands surveyed. The Oregon Territory visited, and its seaboard explored to a considerable depth; the Columbia river and its branches surveyed for a distance of 120 miles from its mouth; numerous harbors and sounds surveyed. The harbor of San Francisco examined, and a part of it surveyed, to supply the defects of existing maps. The Sandwich Islands revisited. The Landrones, Wake's and Bashee Islands. The Phillippines and their capital, Manilla, visited. The Sooloo Sea, and the straits leading to it surveyed, and a treaty made with the Sultan of Sooloo. The squadron then returned by Singapore, the Cape of Good Hope, and St. Helena, to the United States.

The surveys have furnished one hundred and eighty charts, which, by the industry of the officers, have reached the United States, nearly ready to be put in the hands of the engraver. All these charts relate to regions either wholly or imperfectly known before, and many of them will be of great value to our commerce. Four hundred views of the entrances of harbors, headlands, and other objects necessarry to the navigator, have been obtained. The length of the pendulum has been measured at six stations, and particularly at the level of the sea near the base, and on the summit of Monwa Loa, an operation which will be of great interest in science. Innumerable observations on the circumstances of terrestrial magnetism have been performed.

The longitude of the places visited has been ascertained by methods promising greater accuracy than those of any former circumnavigator.

Of meteorological observations there is a full and complete record, taken four times a day during the whole voyage, in each of the ships, and at the stations on shore.

In botany, from three to five separate specimens of ten thousand different species have been collected, and one hundred living plants, likely to be valuable, brought to the United States, as well as the seeds of many others. In addition, a numerous collection of drawings of plants has been made. In particular the geographical botany of all the regions visited has been closely attended to.

The collections in geology and mineralogy are large, and a branch of the former science, namely, that of the animals by which the coral reefs and islands have been formed, may be almost said to have been created; while the gentleman to whom this department was intrusted has passed the limit of his prescribed duty in the investigation of the habits and characters of the microscopic crustacea which inhabit the mid ocean. Of these 1100 species have been found and figured.

In philology, vocabularies of all the tribes visited have been compiled, and the structure of many of the languages investigated. The collection of native Africans brought by the slave trade to Rio Janeiro, gave an opportunity wholly unexpected of research into the tongues of that continent: and the almost extinct dialects of Australasia, neglected by the English settlers, have been rescued from oblivion.

The philologist was left in the Oregon Territory, and will probably return overland, bringing with him the vocabularies of the tribes from the Pacific to the Missouri.

Such are the more important of the scientific results of this expedition. Those of less interest are so numerous that we have not space to detail them.

During the four years cruise, visiting natives of the most savage character, cannibals from taste and habit, only four collisions with the natives have taken place.—Two of these were to avenge the murder, for food, of members of the expedition; another to recover a boat whence the crew had been forcibly driven, and the effects it contained; the fourth was for the purpose of taking a chief, who had killed and eaten part of the crew of an American vessel.—On the fifth occasion some natives, who forcibly opposed a landing, after they had parleyed and accepted presents, were driven from the beach, until magnetic experiments could be made, by a charge of small shot from a fowling piece.

"OUR EDITOR."

To the Editor of the Christian Watchman,—

DEAR SIR,—As I dropped into a neighbor's house the other day I took up your last week's paper and my eye fell at once on the complaints of "An Afflicted Parishioner," who is so severely tried with "Our Minister." I do most sincerely sympathize in his trials, for he has evidently suffered grievously. But he is not the only sufferer from such intolerable evils.—I have long groaned under a load of sore trials with our editor. Now I am very quiet and peaceable and never say much about my complaints for fear it may produce difficulty. I have told my neighbors again and again my trials with our editor, and as you were so kind as to allow my fellow sufferer to print his complaints I hope you will allow me to tell my trials also.

1. I think him very imprudent. He is sure to be out upon every form of wickedness. He spares neither rich nor poor, friend or foe. He does not seem to care how many enemies he makes. If he thinks he can do any good by it, he will be sure to lay on the lash, come what will.—He has displeased more than one influential man in this way, to my knowledge.—Now is not this culpable imprudence?

2. He is to lean and thin. They say it is because he reads and writes so much, and his subscribers pay him so poorly. But the Bible tells us that Daniel grew fat on beans. There must be something wrong about this.—for it is awfully trying when I sit down to read, to imagine that I see his gaunt form and spectacled nose right before me. It is really tormenting. And when I told one of my neighbors what a trial this is to me, he said perhaps it was owing to the workings of my conscience because I had not paid my subscription for the last three years. No such thing.

3. He is a time serving man. He does not publish any thing which will displease people. He never was mobbed in his life. Never even had his office torn down, or a press destroyed. And what is horrible, I have known worldly men to speak well of him and even political editors to copy his articles! Ah, I feel as though I ought to lift up my voice like a trumpet at such enormities!

4. He disregards public opinion. He has been told repeatedly what the public think of his course. But it does not make the least difference. I talked with him myself two hours and he listened very patiently or at least tried to, but his eyes kept falling on a great pile of letters and papers before him, and finally thanked me and added that public opinion could not be his only guide, but that he must seek to know the will of God by the help of his own judgment and conscience. How impudent!

5. He has no mind of his own. I know this is so because he admits articles into his paper which I would not. And he has been known to say that he admits articles which he does not pretend to approve wholly, so as to allow of free discussion! A fine fellow, indeed!

6. He is too full of controversy. He often displeases other denominations. There was a wealthy Universalist who got mad with his people and talked of joining our society, but just about that time, as ill luck would have it, our editor said something about future punishment which he did not like, and he declared that if we believed such monstrous, cruel doctrines, he would never come among us. There was a dead loss of ten dollars a year to our society, and our folks were very much displeased about it.

7. He has a very long face. This is a serious defect. He hardly smiles at all when people call to see him. How different Mr. Twaddle, the talented editor of the Weathercock. He is all smiles and kind words and is never so uncivil as to point out defects and make alterations in the articles which are sent to him.

8. He is under the influence of great men. He dare not do any other way than just as they tell him. He would not dare to say any thing to displease such a man as Dr. Wisdom I'll be bound for all the world. I do not know that I can bring any proof of this just now, but I know it must be so.—At any rate, I heard a minister say so, and that is better than proof.

9. He is not faithful to expose errors.—Here are other denominations believing errors and ministers preaching falsehood and he ought to charge it upon them continually. He ought not to be afraid to lay on the lash. The Bible tells us that we shall 'in no wise suffer sin upon our neighbors' and I think there are no sins so dangerous as those of other denominations. I think he ought to cry aloud against them continually but he is so afraid, that it is only now and then he says any thing about them.

10. He will not do as wise men tell him. They tell him sometimes how he must do, and he is very thankful for their advice and opinions, says he will weigh them well, but that he cannot promise to follow them implicitly. As though others did not know better than he what he ought to do.

11. He is very deficient in news. Particularly he does not have half as many awful catastrophes as suit my taste. Why, I know of papers that have two murders to his one! besides a great many more Indian massacres, battles in Canada line, and earthquakes, in which twenty thousand men were swallowed up. I know that most of them which he rejects, afterwards prove to be hoaxes but then we lose all the comfort of reading them.

12. He does not have enough revival intelligence. I want to see in every paper accounts of revivals from all parts of the country. But he does not give them to us. I know he looks over a great pile of papers every week and selects all that he thinks can be relied on, or is worth reading, and I know too that he takes great pains to obtain original accounts from every quarter. But still I am not satisfied. I think he ought to give a large batch every week. This is what we need to stir up our piety and zeal.

13. He is an awfully severe critic. He will take up a book, read it through and say just what he thinks about it, no matter how much injury it may do the bookseller. He must certainly be very devoid of charity. The booksellers want their books praised, and therefore it is his business to praise them. But instead of that, I have known him to come right out against them.

14. But lest I should tax your patience too far I will mention only one more grievance, which my indignation hardly finds words to express. He rejected my article! This was more than I could bear. I used to think well of him before, but I changed my mind at once. It was most splendidly written, but he thought it was not quite suitable! I tried to frighten him, but he was firm as a rock. Then I told him to "stop my paper," and besides that I would persuade as many of my neighbors to stop as I could. But he with most provoking coolness opened his book and marked "stop" against my name, adding that he hoped I should think better of it. And then to complete my mortification as I could not think of doing without the paper, I was obliged to send for it again in a few weeks and to pay up what was due besides.

I have now given you a slight glance at my troubles, you will see that their name is legion. What can I do? I was telling them the other day to one of my neighbors and he advised me to go the editor with them, for that he was a reasonable, kind and judicious man. And says he to me, "Will not that be doing as you would be done by? Does not the Bible command you first to go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone? And are you not as surely bound to do that to editors as to others?" I felt rather conscience smitten at the time, but I have got over it now, and I am determinded to tell my complaints to every one who will hear them.

AN AFFLICTED SUBSCRIBER.

NERVOUS DISORDERS.—One of the most frequent complaints of literary men is a disorder of the nervous system. Other men of sedentary habits are also liable to them, but in a less degree. The solitary exercise of the mind seems to nearly double the injury which would result from mere confinement. The best cure for almost all affections of the nerves is now generally acknowledged to be physical hardships. Something more is needful than pleasant exercises, which, though it promotes the circulation of the blood and other healthful functions, is not calculated sufficiently to blunt and harden the sensibility, which in nervous people is too acute. There is no disease, however, which meets with so little compassion and sympathy, as a mere nervous disorder. Yet they are the most difficult diseases in the whole catalogue of curable complaints, to be managed either by the physician or the patient. And how numerous are the instances in which the very profession by which the patient earns his livelihood, and which his indigent circumstances will not permit him to relinquish, is the cause of his disease. He must, in this case, either continue an invalid or renounce his only means of obtaining a subsistence.

That equivocal state between actual health and acknowledged disease, which seldom excites alarm, or even compassion for the subject of it, is often the most truly calamitous condition of human life. "I pine," says Dr. Johnson, in one of his letters, "in the solitude of sickness, not bad enough to be pitied, and not well enough to be endured" Such is the feeling of many a patient, who labors under the wretchedness of too much nervous sensibility and too little bodily vigor. Johnson, it is said, was never so great as when he was gloomy. All his writings develope the opulence and gigantic energy of his intelligence; but his private correspondence, more completely than any other recorded production of his pen, unveils the tenderness, and discloses the secret sensibilities of his heart. Had Johnson been a ploughman, his mind would never have exhibited that energy, or betrayed that [illegible] cility, which were [illegible]

[illegible] Boston Weekly M[illegible]

A POLAR PLANT OR VEGETABLE COMPASS.—[illegible]

PATRONIZING NEWSPAPERS.—The following from the Pittsburgh [illegible] Journal [illegible]

"The way some people [illegible] is a sin. [illegible]"

PROPERTY LEFT TO CHILDREN.—[illegible] young women as young men. [illegible] rather an evil than a blessing. But we have to point out to parents a better way in which they may dispose of their property. It is to place it in the heads and hearts of their children. There it will abide, and it will truly bless not only one of them, but the race of man generally. Is there one reason that can be urged against this course? If so, let us hear what it is. "We pause for a reply."

Religious Services in the Norwegian Language.—We are informed by a gentleman who who was present, that on Sunday before last a congregation of about one hundred persons, composed of seamen and others from the north of Europe, assembled for divine service upon the deck of the barque Emilie, Captain Ankerson, of Drammen, Norway, lying at pier No. 5 North river. The services were conducted agreeably to the Lutheran church, in the Norwegian language, the worthy Captain officiating, who read sermon selected from the writingss of a distinguished divine of Norway, and distributed hymns printed on slips of paper, which were sung by the congregation. Representatives of the

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Not 25 or 50 per cent Reward.

S. G. WALTER

HAS [illegible]

De Ruyter, May 23, 1842

LOTS OF HATS & CAPS [illegible] HART, ACKLEY & CO.

NO IMPOSITION.

NO STATES PRISON WORK!

THOSE wishing to purchase BOOTS and SHOES [illegible] MAMMOTH BOOT

De Ruyter, May 24, 1842

How to make money.

[illegible]

Drugs and Medicines.

[illegible]

The Seventh-day Baptist Register

IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY,

AT DE RUYTER, MADISON CO., N. Y.,

BY

JAMES BAILEY.

[illegible] $2 25, in advance, [illegible]

[illegible] $2 IN ADVANCE

[illegible] facts and intended for insertion in the paper must be accompanied [illegible]

No subscription received for a less term than six months.

[illegible] who do not give express notice [illegible] as wishing to [illegible] and their paper will be sent to them accordingly. No paper will be discontinued until all arrearages are paid except at the discretion of the publisher.

[illegible] Advertisements inserted on the most reasonable terms.

[illegible] Letters and communications to ensure attention [illegible] addressed to the publisher [illegible]

Lester [illegible] Rogers 2d

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.

VOL. III.—NO 32.] JAMES BAILEY, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR. [WHOLE NO. 136

Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,——The SEVENTH DAY is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.—COMMANDMENT.——If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments.—JESUS CHRIST

TWO DOLLARS IN ADVANCE.] DE RUYTER, N. Y., FOURTH-DAY, OCTOBER 5, 1842. [PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Religious Department.

USES OF TEMPTATION.

To all real Christians, temptations, though grievous in endurance, are blessings in their consequences. They become, as it were, a means of grace. The petition taught us by our Lord, "Lead us not into temptation," was evidently not intended as a request, that we may absolutely be saved from exposure to any solicitation or inducement to transgress. This would be as impossible, in the nature of things, as it would be undesirable in itself. It is a request, that we may not be suffered to encounter temptations which are disproportioned to our strength, and unaided by the grace of God; and so to fall beneath their power.—But if we meet them as the man Christ Jesus met them; if we promptly say to each suggestion, "get thee behind me, Satan;" if new grace will accompany each new trial of our principles, while we are faithful to ourselves; then we should think ourselves happy that we are not left undisturbed, to sink down into spiritual listlessness. Yea, should we not even desire that God would put our graces to the proof; to the end that they may grow, and that we and others, may have evidence, clear and convincing, of their existence and increase. If it is thus, that we are to be brought to the estate of perfect ones in Christ, instead of desponding or growing weary, we should endure hardness, as good soldiers of the cross.

And it is also manifest, that they whose hearts are stayed on God, have no right, in the discharge of Christian duty, to decline a useful course of action, on the ground that it will be attended with temptations.—It will often, and perhaps generally be found, that eminent usefulness exposes to peculiar dangers. And hence some Christians may be found, who excuse themselves from enlarging their sphere of usefulness when opportunities occur, on the ground that they must thus increase their perils.—One refrains from the exercise of an enlarged benevolence, lest he should fall into the sin of ostentation. Another will not employ his talents, on an extensive scale, and in a way to confer the highest benefit on others, lest he should come to love inordinately the praise of men. A third will not attempt to make himself a bright example of holiness to others, lest spiritual pride should be awakened in his heart.—In all such cases, there is a criminal want of moral courage. The Christian has no right, indeed, presumptuously to rush into the way of danger; for if he does, he has no promise that will shield him. But if he goes at the call of duty, he has underneath him the everlasting arms; and thus sustained, he will not, cannot fall.

When the friends of Luther would have dissuaded him from going to Worms in defense of truth, he replied, "I would go, though the devils in my path were as thick as the tiles upon the house-tops." This is the true spirit, when the call of duty is plain. You may not, Christian reader, decline responsibility, lest evil should assail you. Your fears are groundless. As your need is, so shall be your strength. And having faithfully endured, you shall afterward come forth in perfect strength and beauty.

Nor must it be forgotten, that if not successfully resisted, temptations are of course evils, in themselves, and in their consequences. If therefore there are any means, the use of which will serve to insure success in the conflict with them, no doubt can possibly exist, that every child of God is bound to use them. There are such means, and both reason and the Bible point them out. It is one of the plainest principles of common sense, that when dangers threaten, we should stand upon our guard; and that when they come, we should avail ourselves of whatever aid is within our reach. The same things are enjoined upon us in the Scriptures. "Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation;" that is, that ye fall not by its power.—"What I say unto you, I say unto all, watch." "Be sober, be vigilant; for your adversary the devil, goeth about, seeking whom he may devour. Stand, therefore, having your loins girt with truth, and having on the breast-plate of righteousness, and your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace. Above all, taking the shield of faith, wherewith we shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked. And take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God." These directions require Christians to be watchful, lest temptations find them unprepared for conflict; to renew their strength by waiting upon God; and to fortify their minds by filling them with the motives and promises of the gospel. In this way, every one should prepare himself to war a godly warfare. Be persuaded, therefore, Christian reader, to watch and pray. You are, and must be, while you live, encompassed with temptations. There is no place of refuge from them, on this side of heaven. It is for you, therefore, to determine, whether, being overcome, they shall raise you to higher glory; or overcoming you, shall sink you to perdition.—You need not fall beneath their power.—The strength of heaven is yours, if you will use it. Oh! then, be faithful. When tossed upon the billows, and wearied and perplexed, remember that a rest remaineth for you, when you shall have borne the heat and burden of the day. They who are gone before you, and are now enjoying its repose, passed on their way thither through all that tries your heart. But what they then endured, is forgotten amid their present joys. And you, too, will not deem your severest trials worth a thought when you shall have reached their blessed estate. You will obtain joy and gladness, and sorrowing and sighing shall flee away forever!—Rev. R. Palmer.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

THAT GLANCE!

"And the Lord turned and looked upon Peter." That disciple but recently met the fierce and searching gaze of the Roman soldiers. The keen eye of the malignant Jew had disturbed him. He was troubled also by the penetrating look of the maid that said, "Thou also was with Jesus of Galilee." But there was one present who had forborne, it seems, till now, to notice the fallen disciple. But when he did, one glance was enough. When Peter's eye met that of his Lord, what emotions were awakened!

It was the look of a friend. And such a friend! Whose kind and sweet voice was it that summoned him from his nets to be a fisher of men? What mortal had ever been more favored, as for three years he had dwelt under the radiance of the Light of the World? Who gave him a vision of heavenly glory on the Mount of Transfiguration; admitting him into the secret places of the Most High, and under the shadow of the Almighty? Who was he that had pitied him in his moral darkness and guilt, had assuaged his domestic sorrow, had honored him with a chief place among the founders of his glorious kingdom, and was now about to die for him, that earthly good might be crowned with everlasting life? There stood such a benefactor bound, buffeted, despised, denied, and his ears now ringing with the language of that denial, and the awful profanity that gave what was already crimson a more deadly hue. There stood he, an injured friend—how kind a friend, how deeply injured!

That glance! Peter understood it. Words were not necessary. Mingled with rebuke, it was a look of kindness still. A glance from such a being, at such an hour, and on such a man. Could Peter withstand it? Could he brave that glance, and in spite of it, carry out, in hardness of heart, the denial that oath had just confirmed?—No! the unhappy man cannot endure it.—That gaze of the injured friend caused all that friend's kindness to rush upon his mind, while the consciousness of his own ill-treatment of him overwhelmed him with the deepest remorse and misery.

"And he went out." How could he remain in the presence of one so deeply injured? The glance of that eye had kindled a flame in his soul. He must retire. He must seek a place to weep. The deep fountains of his heart are broken up. His fear of man had bewildered his mind—drew a rash denial from his lips, and cursing with it. But that glance has reclaimed him. He is a man, a disciple again.—He was fallen; how deeply fallen! But that anguish, and those tears—they speak for him. He is not a lost man. He was overpowered by the sudden shock of temptation. A powerful onset of Satan bore him away; but those tears dashed Satan's hopes. The broken heart is the fallen man's recovery. Shout, enemy of all righteousness, as you sift him as wheat, and malignantly triumph over his fall!—You'll have other work soon. The prostrate disciple rises, and standing now on firmer ground than ever, your dark empire will find in him an assailant that shall shake many of its walls, and burn many of its gates with fire.

Reader, the Lord looketh unto you. His eye is not the flaming fire of a righteous judge. 'Tis that of mercy and good will. But is there nothing of rebuke in it? As it called before Peter his own character, is there nothing in your's for it to fix your eyes upon? Have you no occasion for tears?

THAT GLANCE! Beware of what it shall see when the Redeemer shall come in the clouds of heaven, and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him, and all the kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him. PASCAL.

ASKING A BLESSING.—A gentleman in whose office we called a few days since, gave us the following original anecdote of Dr. Payson:—

He was going to one of the towns of Maine for the purpose of attending a minister's meeting, accompanied by a friend, when they had occasion to call at a house on the journey where Dr. Payson was unknown. The family had just sat down to tea, and the lady of the house, in the spirit of genuine hospitality, invited the strangers to partake of the social repast. Dr. Payson at first declined, but being strenuously urged, he kindly consented. As he took his seat he inquired if a blessing had been asked, and being answered in the negative, requested the privilege, which was readily granted, of invoking the benediction of Heaven. This was done with so much fervor, solemnity, and simplicity, that it had the happiest effect. The old lady treated the company with the utmost attention, and as Dr. Payson was about to leave, he said to her, "Madam, you have treated me with much hospitality and kindness, for which I thank you sincerely, but, allow me to ask, how do you treat my Master? That is of infinitely greater consequence that the manner in which you treat me."—He continued in a strain of appropriate exhortation, and having done his duty in the circumstances, proceeded on his journey. This visit was sanctified to the conversion of the lady and her household. The revival continued in the neighborhood, and in a short time a church was built, and the regular ordinances of religion established.—N. Y. Evangelist.

From the Olive Branch.

Hope.

Oh! why should sadness touch the heart,
Though earth's gay charms should all depart?
Why does the soul so fondly cling
To earth, when earth no joys can bring!

Earth may allure us for awhile,
And we are flatter'd by its smiles,
But if deceived, we pine in grief,
Till bright hope comes to our relief.

When tempests toss our feeble bark,
When winds are high and clouds are dark;
Though all around is dark and drear,
Hope still points to a brighter sphere.

So when for friendship's voice we sigh,
And think of days that have gone by,
Though friendship's tones greet not our ears,
Hope still points on to future years.

Oh! were it not for hope's bright ray,
How dark and drear would be life's way;
How full of wo, how full of care,
How oft our hearts would feel despair.

Come smiling hope, and rest with me,
And never from my presence flee.
Oh! guide me to the land of rest,
Where joys shall evermore increase.

Millville, 1842. ERA.

THE CHURCH.—Much, yea, more than tongue can tell depends on the character of the church in any given place. On this depends the light that shall shine upon a lost world, the character of their children, and the salvation of unborn thousands.—Every minister should labor to make his church not only pious, but intelligent, consistent and benevolent. One intelligent Christian, I mean one that understands the sacred word, its doctrines, duties and spirit—one such (other things being equal,) is worth four that are ignorant. One consistent Christian is worth ten who are here and there and every where; and no soul can tell by their position or professions to-day where or what they will be to-morrow.

One benevolent, open-hearted soul, who is willing to do it, as well as pray, is worth a host of illiberal, pinching professors, who give evidence to the world, and were it not for the enlarged charity of the present day, would give evidence to the church that they love their property more than Christ or the souls of men.

A CHRISTIAN.—What was he?—A creature of God, a subject of his government, a violator of his law, a despiser of the Gospel, a rejecter of the Savior, a griever of the Spirit, an awakened inquirer, a convicted rebel, a penitent sinner.

What is he?—A regenerated creature, a redeemed sinner, a child of God, a brother of Christ, an heir of heaven, kind to his relatives, a lover of his enemies, a friend of his countrymen, a neighbor of the heathen, diligent in business, fervent in spirit, liberal in giving, abundant in good works, anxious for the welfare of souls, content with his situation, faithful to his promises, poor in spirit, meek under injuries, hungering and thirsting after righteousness, pure in heart, a happiness maker, persecuted for the sake of Christ, reviled for his religion.

What will he be?—A sanctified creature, a saved creature, an inhabitant of heaven, a friend of saints, an associate of angels, a companion of Christ, a son of God.—Watchman of the Valley.

MAXIMS BY EDWARDS.—The devil tries to destroy the Christian's hope, while truth and conscience disturb the hypocrite's.

There are two kinds of hypocrites,—legal, and evangelical. The legal trust in works; the evangelical in great discoveries.

To walk by faith and not by sight, is to believe in unseen things and not trust in visible things. The difference is not to be understood as times of spiritual light, and spiritual darkness.

The doubts of Christians do not respect the grace of God, but their interest in grace.

Parent's Department.

From the Christian Secretary.

INFLUENCE OF "FIRESIDE AND TABLE CONVERSATIONS."

All Christian Parents should consider themselves as auxiliaries to the church, and to all Societies having as their object the best good of their children, and of society in general. And this consideration on their part should show its operative influence during their familiar "fireside and table conversations." The minister of the Gospel after looking to the Holy Spirit in the first place to give power and efficacy to his message from the desk, next looks to the devoted Father and Mother by the grace of Christ to impress this message upon his children's mind. He looks to them after they have left the earthly sanctuary and gone to their own house, which should be a little sanctuary on the Sabbath, to impress the solemn truths they have heard, upon their children; to make them feel the importance of receiving the truth into their hearts, and of being governed by it in their lives. The minister looks to them to keep up and encourage all solemn thoughts, and to cherish and water by a holy example and christian conversation, any seeds of the gospel which may have been sown in their hearts. O, how cheering and stimulating is it to the minister of the Gospel, amid his many anxieties on account of the spiritual condition of his people—to know that the advice, admonition, counsel and instruction he has given in the pulpit, will all be repeated and impressed upon the youth of his congregation by parents. It animates him, it prompts him to double effort. This is one way to encourage his heart, and strengthen his hands. How easy a thing it is, how delightful and profitable for christian parents, after returning from church, and all their family coming around the table of God's Providence, spread with the tokens of his love, to nourish their bodies, to direct the minds of the children to Him who has made ample provision for their souls, and who has just given them in his sanctuary this bread, of which, if they eat, their souls shall never hunger. Of course, christian parents should seek opportunity every day of making such impressions on the minds of their children, but particularly on the Sabbath day; then there are a thousand holy influences to assist them; there is no business to distract their thoughts, no pleasures of a worldly nature to draw them off. The day is God's own peculiar day; all the services of the day direct to God. But is this always remembered? Let parents answer it! O, how often do professing christian parents and children return home, engage in conversations on all kinds of subjects, laugh, talk, and act as though they had no God, and as though they had never seen his sanctuary, or felt their responsibilities. Some lounge about the house, some walk out in the garden, some take up an amusing or entertaining book, some sleep, and thus the interval between the services is spent. They go again entirely unprepared to church, and return home to pass the evening as the noon. Thus the holy Sabbath becomes a curse instead of a blessing.—And the minister is led to cry out, "who hath believed our report, and unto whom hath the arm of the Lord been revealed?" Now, if christian Parents want to be blessed in their families, and in the church, they must so direct their conversation as to produce so desirable a result.

The Sabbath School also looks to this nursery for support—it looks to parents to take an interest in it, to inspire their children with a love for it, and to prepare them during the week for the school on the Sabbath. By their so doing, they actually prepare the minds of the children to receive instruction and benefit by those influences, which may lead to their conversion.

The Temperance Society also look to them for assistance and encouragement, and to its claim next to those of the church, they stand indebted. That christian parents can do much to promote the cause of Temperance in their families, there can be no doubt, and that this is a duty incumbent upon them, not only as professors of religion, but also as philanthropists, is equally without a doubt. The temporal and eternal interests of their children demand their influence in this point. If they are ambitious to see them respected, happy, and wealthy, if they are anxious to see them circumspect, godly, and heavenly-minded, let them recommend the cause of Temperance not only by their mere examples, but [illegible] their conversations. Let Temperance occupy a prominent place. For they may be assured that stimulating drinks, call them by what name you choose, tend directly to impair the reasoning faculties, and exert a stupefying effect upon the whole moral man. And as the moral faculties of the soul are blunted and stupefied, all moral obligations to God and man are weakened. The mind and heart look through a perverted medium. Obligations and responsibilities are not felt, and consequently not discharged. If children are taught to believe while very young, that to drink ardent spirits is injurious, disgraceful, and sinful, they grow up with an abhorrence of it;—they are prepared to condemn it;—all their prejudices are against it; and for them to drink liquor, or have any thing to do with it when they arrive at years of discretion, they must go counter to all their early notions upon the subject; they must go counter to the dictates of their consciences, and act directly in the face of what they always considered degraded and ruinous.

Parents are careful to warn their children against those deadly poisons which would destroy their lives, kill their bodies,—but how few trouble themselves to warn them against that delicious, formerly fashionable poison, which gradually, though certainly, if not counteracted, destroys both soul and body; which brings intellectual, moral, immortal man, down to the level of the brute creation; which defeats the great object of his existence on earth, and renders his day of probation, instead of a season of preparation to meet his God in peace, a season for the filling up of the phials of God's wrath and indignation against him. Time will not allow me to dwell on this point.

Let christian parents know and reflect upon it, that not only the institutions above named, but all institutions having as their object the good of immortal man, and the glory of God, demand that influence which may be exerted in their familiar family conversations.

The Missionary, the Bible, the Tract, all benevolent societies look to them for support. Their children are to be the pillars of the church, the managers and members of these various societies, which, under God, are to evangelize and save the world. Let them, therefore, go forth from the family circle and altar, with their hearts charged with a love for these institutions, and with a desire to add their influence in promoting them, and our country and world would soon present a different aspect. The human family would be holier and happier. C. W. R.

Children's Department.

DON'T BE TOO POSITIVE.

There are many young persons who are very positive about things, when they are, after all, mistaken.

'There goes Jerry Smith,' says Philip.

'Where? I don't see him,' says John.

'Why, there, yonder, at the top of the hill.'

'Oh! that ain't Jerry Smith.'

'Why, yes it is.'

'No it ain't—that's Seth Mead.'

'I tell you it's Jerry Smith. [illegible] I'll [illegible] him.'

Such is the dialogue; but pretty soon the boy comes along, and, behold, it is Seth Mead, and not Jerry Smith. 'There!' says John—'now you've got [illegible].'

'Where is the hammer, Peter?' says his father.

'I don't know, sir,' is the reply.

'But you had it last.'

'No, I didn't, sir.'

'Yes you did; you took it yesterday.'

'Oh, yes, I remember—I took it—and I put it in the drawer again, when I got through.'

'Are you sure?'

'Yes, sir.'

'I think you are mistaken—for if you had put it there it would have been there still.'

'I'm certainly sure I put it back there.'

'Well now, my son, I found it out on the grass, where you had been at work. Didn't you leave it there?'

'Oh—yes—I believe I did. Yes, I remember—I did leave it there.'

'Well, now take a lesson from this: don't be so positive, when you are not sure. In two instances you have been mistaken; you first said that you had not taken the hammer out, and you were quite positive; you then said you had put it where you got it, and you were again quite positive. But remember that in both cases you were mistaken. Let this teach you to be more modest and careful in future; and, instead of saying you are sure, say, I think so and so; or, I believe so and so. No person ought ever to say that he is positive of a thing, where there is the least chance of a mistake.'

'Mother,' said Ellen, 'may I go and see Jane Hanson? she asked me to come.'

'When did she ask you?' said the mother.

'Yesterday—yesterday afternoon.'

'Not yesterday, my [illegible].'

'Yes it was yesterday, mother; I saw her on the green [illegible].'

'[illegible], Ellen, it could [illegible] not have been yesterday.'

'Yes it was yesterday—I'm certain it was yesterday; I met her on the green, and she asked me to come. When [illegible], how could I be mistaken? I think it was yesterday.'

'[illegible] Ellen, for I have just [illegible] Mrs. Hanson's, and [illegible] went to [illegible] the seventh [illegible] than [illegible] day [illegible].'

'Oh! well—it must have been the day before yesterday—yes, now I see how it was; [illegible] to yesterday.'

'Well, my child, I am sorry to see you so certain—so positive, when you are really not sure, and when, in point of fact, you are mistaken. Pray be more careful in future. You may go and see Jane; but as you go along, say it over [illegible] you cannot forget it—Don't be too positive.'—Merry's Magazine.

From [illegible] Magazine.

THE EAGLE.

The eagle is called the king of birds; he lives amongst rocks and mountains; his eyes are bright and keen, and his wings and claws so strong that he can carry off lambs to his nest for the [illegible]. There have even been [illegible] known [illegible] an eagle carry [illegible]. A woman in the [illegible] of S[illegible] left her child for a short time in a field, [illegible] whence an eagle [illegible] across a lake, and then set it down [illegible] some people [illegible] sleep saw it, and [illegible] the infant's cry, hurried to the spot [illegible] unhurt. The name of the child was N[illegible], but he was afterwards called by a word which in the language of that country means eagle.

The crest of the eagle and child which is borne by the Stanley family is supposed to have been founded upon a story of one of their forefathers, which is thus told in an old book of English history. "Alfred, king of the West Saxons, went out one day a hunting, and passing by a certain wood, heard as he supposed the cry of an infant from the top of a tree; and forthwith diligently inquiring of the huntsmen what that doleful sound could be, commanded one of them to climb the tree; when in the top of it was found an eagle's nest, and lo! therein a pretty sweet-faced infant, wrapped up in a purple mantle, and upon each arm a bracelet of gold, a clear sign that he was born of noble parents. Whereupon the king took charge of him, and caused him to be baptized; and because he was found in a nest, he gave him the name of Nestingum, and in after time, having nobly educated him, he advanced him to the dignity of an earl."

In the parish of St. Ambrose, near New York, in America, two boys, one of seven and the other of five years old, were amusing themselves by trying to reap, while their parents were at dinner. A large eagle soon came sailing over them, and with a sudden swoop attempted to seize the eldest, but happily missed him. The bird, not at all dismayed, alighted at a short distance, and in a few moments repeated his attempt. The bold little fellow, however, defended himself bravely with the sickle, and when the bird rushed upon him, he struck it with all his might. The sickle entered under the left wing, and killed the bird.

The gamekeeper of a Scotch nobleman, when out on the moors, saw an eagle rise from the ground with something which it had seized as its prey; for a time it flew away steadily, when suddenly it began to struggle and flutter, flew upward to a great height, and then ceasing to flap its wings, fell headlong to the ground. The keeper made what haste he could to the spot, and found the eagle quite dead, and a wounded stoat struggling by its side. On examining the body of the eagle, he soon discovered the cause of its fall. The stoat, when in the air, had contrived, according to its custom in attacking rabbits, hares, rats, and other small animals, to open a vein in the eagle, and sucking the blood from it, kept [illegible] the wound which it had made.

Another case is told of an eagle attacking a cat, when a battle took place in the air, and lasted some minutes. The cat, aware, it may be supposed, of her danger, clung with her claws to the eagle, and prevented him from letting her drop. At length, tired of struggling, and hindered by the clinging of the cat, he came down on the ground, where the fight still continued, till both were taken by some lookers-on.—A cat, however, if once within the fair grasp of an eagle on firm ground, has but a poor chance. One, tempted probably by some pieces of raw meat, was seen to make its way through the lattice work of a large hut in which a fine golden eagle had been long kept. In an instant the bird was seen to pounce from his perch, and seize poor puss so firmly and suddenly with his claws, that she was killed in a moment, without seeming to struggle.

Some kinds of eagles are gifted with such wonderful clearness of sight, that from a great height in the air they will distinguish fish swimming in the water, and shooting down as swiftly and speedily as an arrow in its course, will seize the fish in their claws.—From Rev. Edward Stanley's History of Birds.

From [illegible] Magazine.

MORNING.

"I laid me down, and slept, and rose up again; for the Lord sustained me."

Whilst it is dark, the birds sleep quietly in the trees, and you, children, sleep quietly in your beds. The same God that keeps the birds safe, keeps you. He gives sleep to all His creatures, whilst He watches over [illegible].

When the sun rises the birds wake up and begin to sing among the branches—[illegible] you must awake from your sleep, [illegible]—the birds welcome the new day with their songs; they seem to praise Him who made [illegible]. When you awake, you should [illegible] be thankful, for God has given [illegible] as well as voices. The birds praise God without knowing Him; you ought to praise Him because you know Him. You should thank Him for your [illegible] night's sleep, and for letting you see the light of another day. The birds are cheerful, because they are without care; they have no fears for the morrow. God feeds them day by day; they take what He gives them, and spread their wings to fly, and stretch their little throats to sing. You are fed daily by God; for He teaches your parents to get food for you. They work for you, and take care of you; and you can live, as the birds do, without care. The birds are gay, because they mean no ill; they bear no malice, they plot no mischief. So you may be gay and merry-hearted, if you have no bad thoughts to [illegible] pride and anger to trouble you.—The birds do not know what will happen to them from day to day, nor do they fret themselves about what is coming—they never think of it. They never think of dying, yet they will die some day. You do not know what will happen to you whilst you live; but you know that some day you will die. And you know that through your life many evils might happen to you, which you could not keep yourself safe from. But you may be as free from care as the birds are, for God takes the care of you upon Himself. You need not [illegible]. You need not think it sad that you must die some day; for God takes care of Christians all their life long, and gives them a better portion after death, if they have lived like Christians here. You need not take care for the morrow, because our Savior Christ has said, "Behold the fowls of the air," &c. Matt. vi.

Christian children may live like the birds of the air—taking their daily food as it is given them, praising God as well as they are able, living among the pleasant trees, and in the fresh air, having light hearts and quiet consciences.

"Who blusheth not to hear the birds every morning how sweetly and solemnly they sing their praises to God, and is so dull himself to do the like!" Ambrose.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, October 5, 1842.

ALONZO H. BURDICK, of this office, will visit, this month, the friends of the paper in Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, and Eastern New York, to settle up the unsettled accounts of the Register, and obtain new subscribers. Will the friends of the press aid him as much as possible?

In the 30th No. (Sept. 21,) in copying an article from the New York Evangelist, the title of the article was made to read, "the duty of comparison." It should read "the duty of compassion."

THE SABBATH.—The subscriber having entered upon a course of efforts to aid in promoting the universal observance of the Christian Sabbath, respectfully requests all Editors of papers and periodical publications, to publish from time to time such facts as they may become acquainted with, which illustrate the duty and utility of remembering the Sabbath day and keeping it holy; and the evils of violating it; that the voice of Providence on this subject, as well as that of revelation, may be more distinctly heard, and generally regarded, throughout the community.

JUSTIN EDWARDS.

Andover, Sept. 16, 1842.

We are happy to have it in our power to present some facts on the above subject, which are of vital importance, and without a proper understanding of which, the Christian world will not be brought to a proper observance of the "Christian Sabbath." The first fact we shall mention, "which illustrates the duty and utility of remembering the Sabbath day and keeping it holy," is, that God has commanded it. There can be no higher authority than this. The Sabbath was instituted at the close of creative operations; repeated again at Mount Sinai, and observed by Jesus Christ. It was made for man, and was not confined to any particular people, but was designed for the benefit of all men. This is shown from the fact that the Sabbath was instituted when there was but one man in existence; and also from the language of Jesus Christ: "The Sabbath was made for man." For a definite knowledge of this command of God, we refer to the 4th command of the decalogue, engraved on stone by the finger of God, and recorded in Exodus xx. 8—11.

Fact 2*d.* The majority of the Christian world is in error relative to the day of the Christian Sabbath, and are not able to present a "thus saith the Lord" for their practice. Consequently, they are not able to bind the consciences of men. This may be relied on as one of the most prominent reasons why there is no more attention paid to a Sabbath. Those who are at all familiar with the Bible, have learned this, that the seventh day only, is spoken of as the Sabbath. Neither is there the slightest allusion made by Christ or his Apostles, to any alteration, abrogation, or superseding of the Sabbath of the commandment. Consequently, when the claims of any other day are set up, it is without any Divine authority, or scripture proof for its support, and in opposition to the claims God has set up for the Sabbath he sanctified and blessed. This being the fact, (and it cannot be gainsayed) there is no wonder at all, that men refuse to observe as holy time, a day that God has never declared so. Until some Divine warrant is shown it is folly, it is impiety to undertake to bind men's consciences, and induce them to conform to any course of conduct that would cause them to neglect that which God has commanded. All efforts that are made to induce men to observe the first day of the week as a Sabbath, to the neglect of the seventh, are directly calculated to diminish esteem for God and his law, and leads to a disregard of a day of rest. Let this fact then be remembered, that a prominent reason why there is so little regard paid to the observance of the Sabbath, is because Christians lay aside the word of God, which says "the seventh day is the Sabbath," and undertake to establish another day in its stead.

The practice of the Christian Church in observing a day which God has not commanded, diminishes or destroys regard for the day he has commanded, in the minds of an immense multitude. Christians are, and should be regarded as being the standard of moral excellence and obedience; therefore, when they disregard the voice of God, others feel justified in doing the same.

Fact 3*d.* God cannot bestow his blessing upon disobedience as upon obedience. The Church can not shine forth in purity, nor enjoy so much of the Divine presence and blessing, when it gets aside any thing God has enjoined upon it, as it will when God's will is done in it perfectly. The Church is in the wilderness, nor can it come out bringing with it the innovations of the man of sin. All the appendages it has gathered in its degeneration and apostacy, must be lopped off. The substitution of the first day for the seventh, is one of those appendages. 'Tis true, God loves his Church now, but he will love it more when it is pure. He blesses it now, but he will bless it more abundantly, when it is obedient to his mandate in all things.

Fact 4*th.* The observance of a day for the Sabbath that can not be sustained by a Divine precept, gives to Antinomianism its strength. If the practice of the Christian Church of disregarding the voice of God, can be shown in one case, then as many as please are at liberty from this example, to disregard the voice of God in other matters, and the Church is bound to keep silence. The train of impiety and sin that follows Sabbath desecration, is long. And it is supposed that a majority of the iniquity that abounds among Christians and others, is attributable to a disregard of the voice of God, which says, remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. Now if the Church would dry up in a great measure the fountain of iniquity, whose streams are spreading sin and death, it must purify itself and obey the voice of God. When the Church and Christians can plead innocence and obedience to God, there may then be hope that faithful admonition will be regarded, and the withering rebuke, "Physician heal thyself," no longer paralize their efforts. But so long as the practice of Christians remain as at present, a blush should mantle its face, when it undertakes to induce a regard for a day as sacred, which the great head of the Church has never rendered such; at the same time that it disregards a day God has sanctified and blessed, and declared to be his Sabbath.

Zion the Perfection of Beauty.

A great variety of expressions are used in the Bible to define the glory of the church. The Psalmist speaks of the church as the perfection of Beauty. That it is worthy of this appellation, may be seen by examining its fundamental principles, its object and end. Men in all ages have labored to establish a code of morals by which to govern society. The best ever established has been full of imperfections, and incompetent to answer the design. And the instance can not be found where virtue and equity have prevailed under any code of morals of human inventions. But that code on which the church is built, is perfect in its application to every relation of men. This law of the church was written with the finger of God on tables of stone, and engraven on the heart of every Christian. 'Tis a law founded on the fitness of things—in the relations existing between God and men, and among men. God's ancient church was built on this foundation. The Gospel church is established on the same. The essential principles of both are the same, viz: to love God with all the heart, soul, might, and understanding, and to love his neighbor as himself. This law, as written by God, and explained and enforced by Jesus Christ, has stood the severest criticism, and has been declared perfect in all ages.—The Psalmist declares the law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul. The Apostle James says, "Pure religion, and undefiled before God and the father, is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and keep himself unspotted from the world." This, when examined, is found to mean benevolence to man and holiness before God, or love to man, and love to God; thus precisely corresponding with the law as first given by God. Herein is the glory of the church, that it requires love to God that will secure his favor and blessing, and love to man, that is calculated to promote his happiness. And when the church shall be triumphant God will be reconciled to all men, and all men will be reconciled to each other, thus ushering in a state of perfect blessedness. Such a state, is the perfection of all things desirable, and an institution that can accomplish this may properly be denominated the perfection of beauty.

One object that religion accomplishes, is to make man sensible of his true dignity and responsibility. So far as religion has influence, it raises a man in virtue and integrity. Man, unrestrained by the gospel, is a heathen, and in the ratio that he is influenced by the principles that are the elements of the church, is he removed from heathenism. Deprive him of any religious restraints, or place him in utter ignorance of the gospel and its influences, and he acts out, as a heathen, all the unholy feelings of a depraved, sinful nature. But the grand object of religion is the complete renovation of the nature and ultimate salvation of the soul. Having accomplished these objects, every thing desirable is accomplished, and the church shines forth the perfection of beauty.

It is said to be a gentlemanly trick for persons writing on their own business to pay their postage.

For the Register.

Scio, Allegany co., Sept. 18, 1842.

BRO. BAILEY—I take this opportunity to inform you that I moved to Scio last Spring, and have labored with that church, and the Amity church ever since. About three weeks past there appeared to be something of a stir with our church and other christians in the neighborhood, and the Lord has showered us by pouring out his Spirit and giving us the influence of his grace which has revived his people very much in this place. Judgment has begun at the house of God in very deed. Travailing pains have been rolled upon Zion in this place, and children have been born according to his word. We have had night meetings for the most of this month, and within the time we had an appointment for a two days meeting, but it lasted four days. At that time and since I have baptized fourteen, and received into the church twenty-two members; three of whom were first-day keepers, but when they became christians, they thought it best to be Bible christians. There is quite a stir here about the Sabbath. There is one strong Universalist in our place, and he has a son who has become a true christian, and I think he will join our church.

Brother Z. Campbell was with us when we had our four days meeting, and a first-day Baptist minister, and brother Giddings, were also present, and we had a precious season. We hope and pray that the work will still spread.

I was with the church in Friendship last week at a Quarterly Meeting, and there appeared at the close of that meeting to be a good state of feeling in the congregation.

Our meeting was a union meeting, and I invited the first-day Baptists and Methodists in our place, and they took a good part with us. The Baptist minister baptized two in the course of the meeting, and a number more were convicted of sin in that meeting, who have been brought out since, and will join the Baptists.

Dear brother pray for us, that we may contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints, and that the cause of our Divine Master may prosper in our place.

Yours, respectfully,

RAY GREEN.

For the Register.

Great Revival in Portersville, Ct.

MYSTIC, (Portersville P. O.) Ct.
Sept. 11, 1842.

DEAR BROTHER—Permit a stranger to address you concerning the things of the kingdom. God has poured out his Spirit in this village in a wonderful manner.—Four weeks ago this day, Eld. Jabez Swan commenced preaching afternoon and evening. For the first week all that seemed to be accomplished was the chastizing of christians, and a spirit of confession on their part. Sunday morning, one week from the beginning of the meeting, one old hoper told her experience, and was baptized. Three more made up their minds on the shore, and followed in baptism on the spot. From that day, Sir, there have been additions to the church by baptism daily. Some days 6, sometimes 10, or 20, and one day 30, were baptized. To-day (Sunday) 19 have followed the same example. Total, by immersion 324, in just 3 weeks. Nearly all our villagers are on their way to Canaan. This afternoon occurred a most affecting ceremony. The converts (about 300 in number) assembled in the open air, in the form of a hollow square, [Eld. Swan wants square work,] and he gave to them the right hand of fellowship, giving them at the same time the most affecting advice as he passed along the lines. At the same time hundreds of saints and sinners looked on deeply thrilled by this sight, which seemed like the day of Judgment. The Methodist church has received quite a number in accession, and some will join the Congregational church. The most, however, have joined the 2d and 3d Baptist Churches.—The meetings close to-morrow. Eld. Green is about commencing a protracted meeting in the Eld. Whitman Church in Groton.—May the Lord succeed his labors.

Yours, in Christ,

WM. H. POTTER.

FOREIGN NEWS.

LATER FROM ENGLAND.

Arrival of the British Queen.

The papers are singularly barren of news. Queen Victoria was still touring in Scotland, and nothing of interest seems to have happened, either in Great Britain or on the continent. The papers are busily employed in discussing and quarrelling over past events, especially the doings in Affghanistan.

The disturbances in the manufacturing and mining districts were slowly subsiding—more slowly in the latter than in the former. A considerable number of mills had resumed work, but there were still many standing idle, the employers and operatives not being able to agree upon terms. Many of the miners still hold out.

Multitudes of the parties arrested at various places have been tried, convicted and sentenced to divers grades of punishment. At York there were 150 brought up at once for sentence.

Serious accident to Mr. Carter.—Another accident occurred to Mr. Carter, the rival of Van Amburgh, on Tuesday evening, which has incapacitated him from appearing on the succeeding nights at the English Opera House. In the piece called The Lion King, Mr. Carter had to encounter a lion and other animals confined in a cage. On Tuesday night, on Mr. Carter entering the cage, the lord of the forest made a sudden spring, and before Mr. Carter had time to prevent him, seized him by the hand with his teeth. Mr. Carter, although his hand was being severely lacerated by the animal, commenced striking him with all his might with the butt end of a whip which he held in the other hand.

The audience applauded most vociferously, little thinking that it was a combat in reality. Mr. Carter continued to deal heavy blows on the infuriated animal, who, at the end, took shelter in one corner of the cage. The scene was dropped, and Mr. Carter having bound a handkerchief round his hand, which was much lacerated, left the cage, the animal growling at him as he went out. He was attended to by Mr. Brane, a surgeon. This is the second time Mr. Carter has been bitten by the same animal within the last week. The lion has only been in Mr. Carter's possession about three months, and is between three and four years of age.

News of the Day.

Sentence of the Murderer, John C. Colt.—This culprit has at last been sentenced to be hung. He was called up on Monday, Sept. 26th, and asked if he had anything to say why the sentence of death should not be pronounced against him. The prisoner said he had prepared a few remarks, which he should like the Court to read.

The paper alluded to the present position of the prisoner, which, it said, was more painful than the struggle of death itself.—But it is a form which he is obliged to pass through before his case can go before the Court of Errors, to which it is to be carried. He speaks of the Jury that tried him being led aside by "prejudice and error," and to have "trampled" on evidence, law, and the Judge's charge. He expected to get the verdict set aside, and to be tried by an impartial jury. Misfortune, not crime, had placed him in his present position, but he was not one of those calmly to submit to the injustice. The paper requested that the Court should spare him the pain of accompanying comments on pronouncing sentence.

Judge Kent made a few remarks exculpating the jury from the unjust charges of the prisoner, and remarking upon their intelligence, candor, and great leniency. "No man ever doubted," the Judge is reported to have said, "that yours was a crime of the greatest magnitude and enormity, and which has left the stain of blood-guiltiness on your soul. It is a crime, too, which has sunk deep into the community. Leaving out of view all those appalling circumstances which followed the commission of that homicide, which I will not distress you or myself by summing up now—leaving out of view the evidence in the case, and all but those gaping wounds themselves, no doubt can exist that the deed was marked by ferocious passion and sanguinary cruelty."

Colt replied that he could assure the Judge, so far as regards his own conscience, he would rather leave his case with God than with man—he never did an act in his life but he would repeat, had it to be gone over again. "I am not the man to be trampled down in my own office, and look tamely on. It was not my intention to kill the man, but he made the assault, and must take the consequences." I am sorry the Court thought proper to make the remark it has. For myself, I had intended to say something more, but not expecting to be sentenced to-day, I am unprepared. I am ready to receive sentence, knowing it can not be avoided.

Judge Kent said, "Sentence will now be pronounced, with expressions of the deep regret entertained by the Court at the reckless and morbid insensibility exhibited in your last speech, and which shows that any further remark will be lost. John C. Colt, the sentence of the Court is, that on the 18th of Nov. next you be hanged till you are dead, and may God have mercy on your soul."—Sun report.

Another Railroad in Market.—It appears, from the Troy papers, that the Rensselaer & Saratoga Railroad, extending from Troy to Ballston Spa, is to be sold at auction on the 17th of next month, under the foreclosure of a mortgage. The Road is to be sold subject to a right of redemption, as provided by an act of the Legislature passed on the 12th of April last.

The Steam Ships.—The London papers have a great deal to say about the disasters of Atlantic steam navigation, which has proved signally unfortunate, they allege to all the companies engaged in it. The West India lines has proved a failure throughout, and is to be given up. The Cunard line can not get on without more help from the Government or a greater reduction of expenditure; and the Great Western Company, has been, on the whole, a losing concern, although the Great Western herself is believed to have been profitable. She will undoubtedly continue to perform her trips as advertised, and perhaps longer; but there seems no reason to doubt that the affairs of the company will be as soon as possible brought to a close.—Jour. of Com.

The buckwheat crops throughout the country are said to be of the most promising character.

Mr. Webster and the Treaty.—The assembly at Faneuil Hall, Boston, to greet Mr. Webster and hear a speech from him, was expected to take place on Thursday night; but the day was not definitely fixed, and as Mr. Webster was so much oppressed by a severe cold as to be unable to speak on Thursday, the matter was postponed, or rather, not brought on. Mr. Webster will make a good speech on the occasion, we do not doubt, for he never made any other; but what it will be, we can not exactly foresee. Mr. Webster has taken a sort of Journal of Commerce position, that is, a position of his own, independent of all parties. What he can say which is likely to be echoed by the united voices of the Whigs of Boston, we do not know. He agrees with them on the tariff [illegible] great business of the day [illegible] Tyler, he will not go into [illegible] Tyler [illegible] Mr. Webster has [illegible] President [illegible] as he wished. Mr. Webster [illegible] remained in office when the other members of the cabinet retired. He [illegible] saw no necessity for the [illegible]. He has not changed his [illegible] though he has given [illegible] of his intention to retire from office when the news of the ratification of the treaty lately concluded with Lord Ashburton [illegible] be received, his retirement is not based on any quarrel or disaffection towards Mr. Tyler.

Under such circumstances, it may be difficult for Mr. Webster to command the applause of [illegible]. He has, indeed, by remaining in office, done the country more real service than all the other politicians of the country put together. But what of that? He did it by securing peace, and war only brings [illegible]. There is great reason to believe that Mr. Webster alone could have rendered Lord Ashburton's mission successful. At any rate, he was eminently qualified for the task, and he managed it with consummate wisdom. In anticipation of the negotiation, he repaired to Massachusetts and Maine, and first of all settled the fundamental point that the negotiation was not to be made a party question. He thus brought both parties [illegible] procured the commissioners [illegible] equally from both. [illegible]

[illegible] Dr. MC——, [illegible] where the Hon. Henry [illegible] other lawyers were present. A great [illegible] of crosses being [illegible] MC——, who was extravagantly [illegible] vegetables, helped himself [illegible] largely [illegible] with his fingers, with peculiar [illegible] of manner. Mr. Erskine was struck with the idea that he resembled Nebuchadnezzar in his state of [illegible] ved to give him a hit for the [illegible]ness of his taste and manner of eating: he wittily addressed him with "Dr. MC——, ye bring me in mind of the great king Nebuchadnezzar;" and the company were beginning to titter at the [illegible] allusion, when the reverend vegetable [illegible] replied—"Ay, do I mind ye o' Nebuchadnezzar? That'll be because I'm eating amang the brutes!"

Wheat Crop.—A good deal of wheat in western New York has been thrashed and brought to market; and we are warranted in saying that the crop, though of a fine [illegible] and in general in good order, has [illegible] the early expectations [illegible] by one-quarter, in many cases [illegible] less. Much of the wheat likewise, which has been brought to Rochester, has evidently been damaged by being cut in too green a state and afterwards not sufficiently ripened or dried. This is a very serious matter. Early cut wheat will undoubtedly make more and sweeter flour than that which stands too long, and will yield more weight of crop, but this presupposes that this is not cut too early, and in the next place, that it is most thoroughly made in the sheaf or stock. In some places the wheat suffered from rust, and in reference to the inquiry respecting the use of rusted straw, one of the best farmers in the State expresses his experience that cattle will not eat much of it, and his convictions that what they do eat will injure them.—New Genesee Farmer for Sept.

Our citizens who are about going to New-York, should stop at Albany and visit the American Aloe, now blooming at the Patroon's greenhouse. It is a splendid sight, and can only be seen once in two generations. A gentleman in Albany writes that "the flower stem is 22 feet high, looking like an immense candelabrum, with 28 lateral flower branches, containing in the whole 28 stems, with at least 2600 flowers. When it is remembered that another opportunity to behold this wonder of nature may not occur, and that the proceeds of this exhibition are devoted to that laudable charity the Orphan Asylum, every one is furnished with a sufficient inducement for the examination of this rare exotic, which has been in the VAN RENSSELAER family upwards of 80 years. It will continue improving in appearance for a week to come."—Buffalo Com. Adv.

Nauvoo.—It was commenced by the Mormons, being then a small village of twenty houses, in November, 1839, and such has been its rapid growth that it now contains a population of 10,000 souls, and the number is rapidly increasing. It is 200 miles above St. Louis, upon the Mississippi river, at the head of the Desmoines rapids. They have two extensive steam saw mills, a large steam flouring mill—a tool factory, on a handsome scale—a foundry—and a company of considerable wealth from Staffordshire, England, who are establishing the manufacture of the English China ware. They have many extensive public buildings in the course of construction, besides the [illegible], and there is a very large [illegible] houses and stores in process of construction.—[illegible] Republican.

[illegible].—A revolution certainly, [illegible] peaceable one—a revolution [illegible] when such men as Baldwin and [illegible] are made Attorney-Generals for [illegible] East and West! It will be remembered that Robert Baldwin, a well-known [illegible] resigned his situation as [illegible] government of the illiberal policy of the then administration—and [illegible] kept out of Parliament [illegible].

The fact that such men are now placed [illegible] the Canadian councils [illegible] "the throne"—[illegible] of liberal principles [illegible] Governments can [illegible] Continent in these enlightened days.

We also learn from Canada that the Seat of Government temporarily fixed at Kingston, will soon be transferred to some place not yet designated in the Lower Province, or "Canada East," as it is now termed.—[illegible] Post.

[illegible].—The late Richard [illegible], Esq. of Norfolk county, the Norfolk Herald says, recently bequeathed the following legacies to the undernamed institutions, viz:—

The American Bible Society,	$1000
American Tract Society, N. Y.	1000
[illegible] Baptist American and Foreign Bible Society, [illegible] Philadelphia	1000
[illegible] General Convention of Baptists [illegible] Foreign Missions,	1000
[illegible]	[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible], we do [illegible] the family [illegible] yellow fever as [illegible] merely spas[illegible] our ears yester[illegible] this morning. It is [illegible] Mr. McCor[illegible] at the same [illegible] same grave on Sunday! [illegible] Sunday, about [illegible] yellow fever—his wife [illegible] the same afternoon, [illegible]. They were [illegible] we have [illegible].—N. O. Pic.

The Camels.—The experiment to carry a [illegible] ship over the bar at Nantucket, after [illegible] failures, caused by misconstruction of the machines, or inexperience [illegible], has been successful, whereat the citizens of Nantucket are greatly re[illegible] them writes to the Boston [illegible] as follows:

"Three cheers for Nantucket! Not for [illegible] political party, (of that [illegible]) but for her victory over the elements. Yes, three cheers for Nantucket! She is [illegible] what has never [illegible] in America, but what, we trust will now be accomplished in every place like ours, where nature has shut out all large vessels by a sandy bar.

She has built a floating dock, which has [illegible] taken a large ship within its embrace, and carried her over her shoal bar [illegible] water. In other words, the much [illegible] "Camels" have proved successful. They have just taken the fine ship [illegible] to sea, and our citizens are re[illegible] at this glorious era in our commercial history. For the first time, a ship has [illegible] our wharves! For the first time, has a ship cleared from this place directly for the Pacific!

[illegible] ugly bar to our progress is now surmounted, and our ships will be able to come in directly to our wharves, and when they are ready again, proceed directly to sea.—N. Y. Commercial.

Slaves Missing.—The southwestern papers made loud complaints of the rapid increase of what they call "negro stealing." They say there is a secret combination, extending from the east bank of the Mississippi through Illinois to Michigan, by means of which slaves are transported, clandestinely, to any place whither they desire to go. It is probably nothing but an experiment on the part of the slaves, from curiosity, to try whether they can "take care of themselves."

The yellow fever appears to have been on the increase at New Orleans, on the 15th inst. There were ten deaths from it at the three hospitals on that day.

It is said that the Dublin University has conferred the degree of LL. D. on two persons only, since 1815. Edward Everett, was honored with one—the Rev. Henry Cooke, of Belfast, Ireland, received the other.

Another Prize Fight.—Incredible as it may seem, there has been at least another Prize Fight, while the public feeling is yet chilled by the shocking murder of McCoy; under the nose of the N. Y. Police, and that on Sunday, on the peaceful Sabbath of the country! The particulars are thus stated by a morning paper:

MORE PRIZE FIGHTING—Worse and Worse.—To such a pitch has the spirit of ruffianism and wickedness reached in this beautifully governed community, that our bullies and blackguards are not content alone with setting at defiance the laws and shocking the decent portion of the public by their bloody and murderous fights, but they must, forsooth, to add to the infamy of their outrages, select the Sabbath for their beastly infractions of public decency and morals.—The blood spilt and misery produced by their hellish proceedings on Tuesday the 13th inst., appear to have produced no other effect upon them than to whet their appetites for more blood, and for the wider spread of ruin and desolation. In this spirit, two more pugilistic encounters were arranged to take place on Sunday last, on a spot of ground in 27th street, one to follow the other. The parties and their associates accordingly repaired to the ground at an early hour last Sunday, and commenced their infamous sport. The ring was formed, and two of the pitted combatants commenced their encounter, and had prosecuted it to the 31st round before the police reached the spot, put an end to the disgraceful proceedings, and dispersed the assembled mob. Whether any arrests were made or not, we are not informed. If the police did their whole duty on the premises, our reports from that department will show the fact. The second fight, of course, did not take place according to the arrangements; but whether it was consummated elsewhere through the day, or stands over to another opportunity, we are unadvised.—Sun.

Joseph Murphy, one of the abettors of McCoy's murder, surrendered last Saturday, by advice of his counsel, Price, and has been admitted to bail in $10,000.

Country McCleesky was arrested up the North River, at Caldwell's, by officer Bowyer.

"Yankee Sullivan," one of the principal getters up of the late brutal fight, and an active participant in the murder of McCoy, was arrested in New Jersey, on Monday last, and committed to prison. We trust he will not escape the punishment due to his crime.

The Common Council on Monday passed a resolution, offering a reward of $200 for information that would lead to the conviction of any of the principals in the fight, and $50 for each of the accessories.

The tobacco crop in Missouri, for the present year, is estimated at about 25,000 hhds rated at about a million of dollars.—Missouri promises to be the greatest tobacco-growing State in the Union, and that in a short time, too.

A Convention of silk-growers will be held in Northampton, Mass., on Wednesday of next week, to collect and embody facts in relation to the business, to be presented to Congress at the next session.

Fish from Lake Superior, received by the Western Railroad, are for sale in Boston market. There are three kinds, called Ssiskawit, Trout, and White Fish.

A flat boat arrived at New-Orleans on the 12th having on board twenty-seven hundred live alligators.

The Ohio river is at a stand at Cincinnati with enough water for the largest boats. There was 7 feet, on the 14th, in the Canal Louisville.

The Sangamo Journal states that Joe Smith and O. P. Rockwell are now out laws, they having escaped from the officers of Justice.

The city of Washington is 11 square miles in extent, covering an area of 7,134 acres. Not less than 2,604 acres were in the streets in public squares, covering 541 acres, were reserved to the United States. The running length of the streets laid out was 721 miles—those streets being equal to an average of 100 feet wide. Not only were the 17 squares, covering 541 acres, reserved for the use of the United States, but of the 20,372 building lots, one-half were given to the United States, and all the property held by the Government in the city, is free from taxation.

A free negro man, named Brown, who was charged by a negro woman with having in conjunction with another negro, murdered a white man in the woods, in the suburbs of the city, in June last, and having thrown the body into Chouteau's Pond, where it was found, was tried on Saturday, and convicted of murder in the first degree.—St Louis Republican.

Still more of the Prize Fight.—Officer A. M. C. Smith this morning arrived from Philadelphia with George Kensitt, the trainer of the unfortunate McCoy, and Lewis W. Halsey, the time keeper at the late fatal fight between Lilly and McCoy, in custody.

Kensitt was one of the seconds in the fight between Sullivan and Bell, which took place at Hart's Island. They were both fully committed.

Nothing more has been heard of the arrest of Sullivan, and the rumor that he had been arrested in New Jersey is now supposed to have been unfounded.—N. Y. Express.

The Seal.—I went out in a punt, and at a distance of not more than twenty yards positively drove a ball into the throat of an old seal that rose to look at us; notwithstanding which he dived and got away. We brought one young seal on board to day alive and unhurt, by my particular request. He lay very quiet on deck, opening and closing his curious nostrils (which, when expanded, were nearly round, but closed firmly into a narrow slit,) and occasionally lifting his dark eyes as if with wonder at the strange things around him. His fur being quite dry and clean was as white as wool—short, and close, and thick, composed of strong hair standing out perpendicular everywhere, except on his face and his flippers, or paws. On being patted on the head he drew it in, making his face perpendicular to his body, knitted his brows, shut up his eyes and nostrils, and he then presented a very droll appearance, having a comical countenance in a circular bush-wig. With his head extended, however and his eyes open, he was really a very pretty creature, looking so warm and round and comfortable. When teased, although quite young he was fierce, biting and scratching at everything about him; but on being patted and stroked he immediately became quiet. These animals might certainly be tamed if properly managed. The men and the dog, however, teased this one till he became exhausted and dying, and I passed my knife into his heart to put a stop to it at once.

Tragical and Nearly Fatal Occurrence!—A Double Escape!—Powerful and Desperate Effect of Love.—To-day, about noon, the sudden report of a pistol, attended by the shrieks of females, was heard in the vicinity of our office, followed in an instant by the appearence of a woman leaping from a balcony, in the second story of a house, on Commerce, between Little and Wide Water streets, occupied as a boarding house for seafaring persons, by a widow lady, named Mary Ann Anderson. The facts connected with the case are substantially as follows:

It seems that an Italian, named Michael Francis, recently sailmaker of the revenue cutter Taney, had for some time, entertained a strong attachment of Mrs. A., with whom he had been a boarder for several years. She had repeatedly rejected his addresses; Francis had, several times, declared that she should never marry any other man than himself, and so jealously apprehensive was he that she might become the wife of another, that of late he was seldom absent an hour from the house.

This morning he again renewed the declaration of his attachment, and Mrs. Anderson firmly expressed to him her determination never to become his wife. He was then pacing the room in an agitated manner; Mrs. A. was seated in a corner, near the window, engaged in sewing; opposite, but a few feet distant, sat her niece, and beside Mrs. A. was a vacant chair.—Francis suddenly seated himself near Mrs. Anderson, and said; "Mary An!"—at the same instant presenting at her head a small rifle barrel pocket pistol, he fired. * *

The sound of her name, uttered in a tone somewhat unusual, caused her to raise her head quickly, when the ball passed immediately in front of her and lodged in the wall, whence it was extracted with a part of the wadding attached, and was since shown to us. The sudden movement of her head, from the cause stated, alone saved Mrs. A. from inevitable destruction. She sprang from her seat, and rushing into the balcony, threw herself, at once, into the street below, a height of about fifteen feet.

Mean while, the young lady, the niece of Mrs. Anderson, who was an eye witness of the whole scene, dreadfully alarmed, ran into the balcony and called for help.—Francis threatened her with instant death, if she made an outcry. He then threw himself on the floor, presenting the empty pistol at his head, in which situation he was found when the crowd, alarmed by the cries of the females, entered the house.

He had, it seems, obtained the pistol mentioned, from the trunk of a fellow boarder, and had another loaded in an adjoining room, with which he designed (it is supposed) to take his own life after killing Mrs. Anderson, but was prevented getting it, by the person who was then in that room, who, it appears, was either intentionally by Francis, or otherwise accidentally, fastened up there.

Francis was immediately committed to jail.—Norfolk Phoenix.

Arrest of Sullivan.—In yesterday's Morning Post, we mentioned the arrest of Sullivan. The younger Hays and Stanton were his captors. He has been since the death of McCoy, cruizing about the shore of Staten Island, during the day in a small boat, and returning to the city at night.—The officers were informed of it, and yesterday they proceeded to Shrewsbury in a small steamboat, and on their return a little boat was seen off Fort Richmond in which were Sullivan, Ford and another man.—They were pursued ashore, where Sullivan, after a chase, was captured. Ford and the other escaped into the woods and will doubtless be captured.

Sullivan solemnly asseverated that he had not seen Lilly since the night after the murder, when he slept with him in this city, and that he does not know where Lilly is. Sullivan had some $350 in gold about him when he arrived at the Police Office.—Morning Post.

A First Spree.—"Never was drunk but once in my life," said a chap once in my hearing; never mean to be again. The street seemed to be very steep, and lifted my legs at every step as if I was getting up stairs. Several cart wheels were making convolutions in my brain, and at one time I fancied my head was a large carving and turning establishment, the lathes of which I was keeping in motion with my own feet. I couldn't conceive what was the reason that the town had turned into such an enormous hill; and what made it worse was that it seemed all the time growing higher, and threatened to pitch over on me. Stop, stop, thought I, and I'll head this odd hill yet, or at least it shan't head me. So I turned round to go down and get at the bottom; but hang me if the town didn't turn round me, heading me all the time, and presenting the high bluff in front of me. Well, sure enough, the ground soon flew up and struck me in the forehead; and, as soon as the stars cleared away, I commenced climbing with my hands and knees. The next thing I saw was a big brick house coming full split around the corner! and I believe it run right over me, for I don't remember any more."—Picayune.

Notices.

NOTICE.

There will be a special meeting of the trustees of De Ruyter Institute on the 6th day of Oct. next, at 1 o'clock, P. M., at the Institute, to consider the best measures for sustaining the interests of the Institute.—The wisdom of the board is wanted and every trustee is especially requested to attend.

B. G. STILLMAN, Pres't.
J. R. BUTTS, Secretary.
De Ruyter, September 28, 1842.

ALFRED ACADEMY,
AND
TEACHER'S SEMINARY.

W. C. Kenyon, Principal.
Miss Caroline B. Maxson, Preceptress.

LECTURERS.

On Phrenology and Physiology.—Drs. J. R. HARTSHORN, and E. RIDER.

On School Teaching.—LUKE G. MAXSON.

On Chemistry and Geology.—W. C. KENYON.

Lectures on other subjects as occasion may require.

This Institution is pleasantly located, in the county of Allegany, thirteen miles South-East of Angelica, and six miles South of Almond. From its retired and quiet situation, it presents a favorable opportunity to parents to place their sons and daughters under a moral influence that will not be counteracted by those with whom they may associate.

The patronage which it has hitherto enjoyed, has been so liberal as to warrant very considerable expenditures in rendering it still more worthy of a more extended patronage; and it is hoped that it will, under its present organization, be rendered inferior to no similar Institution in Western New York

The qualification of Common School Teachers will receive particular attention, so as to render them thorough and practical instructors of youth.

The Academic Year,—Is divided into three terms of fifteen weeks each. 1st, Commencing Wednesday 17th August; 2d, 7th December; 3d, 4th April, 1843.

Vacations.—At the expiration of the first and second Terms, one week each; at the expiration of the 3d Term, five weeks.

Tuition.—Varying with Instruction, from $3,50 to $4,75 per term.

Board.—From $1 to $1,25 depending on accommodations. Rooms in the Institution, furnished with Cook Stoves, can be had at a moderate expense.

SAMUEL RUSSELL, Esq., Pres't.
Alfred, July, 1842.

PROPOSALS
For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead,) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

MARRIED,

In Lincklaen, on the 28th ult., by Rev. S. M. Burdick, Mr. GEORGE JUSTUS, and Miss MARY ANN GRAVES, all of Lincklean.

On the 29th ult., by the same, Mr. JACOB GOODELL, of Cherry Valley, and Miss DRUSILLA P. BURDICK, of Lincklaen.

On the 1st inst., by the same, Mr. SAMUEL R. STILLMAN, of De Ruyter, and Miss SARAH S. AMES, of Lincklaen.

In Petersburgh, Rensalaer co., N. Y. on the 8th inst., by Eld. W. B. Maxson, Mr ZACHEUS R. BABCOCK, and Miss LAURA MAXSON, all of Petersburgh.

DIED,

In this village, on the 1st inst., FRANK, son of S. G. Walker, aged 13 months.

In Persia, Cattaraugus co., on the 21st of Sept., Mr. JAMES CRANDALL, of Brookfield, aged [illegible] He went to Persia to visit his friends, while on the way was taken sick and survived only about [illegible] days after he arrived. He had been a member of the S. D. B. Church for more than fifty years. His death was peaceful, though from home, and we trust he has gone to reap the fruits of [illegible]

OBITUARY.

In Brookfield, on the 19th ult., of an inflammation of the bowels, CHARLOTTE B., daughter of Kenyon and Mary Crandall, aged 20 years.

Miss Crandall embraced religion and became a member of the 3d S. D. Baptist Church in Brookfield, in January 1838, and by her orderly walk gave strong consolation to the friends that He who had redeemed her had taken her to himself, though from the violence of her disease, reason was hurled from her throne, never more to return to its empire in the tenement of clay, so early in the disease, and the mind left so shattered that she could not converse intelligibly on any subject, having a very imperfect, if any view of her approaching dissolution, thus calling in thunder tones to the young to "remember their Creator in the days of their youth," to prepare in the morning of life to meet their God in judgment, lest when disease shall seize upon their mortal bodies it shall as in the case of our young friend, thrust reason out from its empire, leaving a body racked with pain, and no avenue through which a glimmering ray of hope may pass to sooth the anguish of surviving friends.

L.

LIST OF LETTERS.

J. G. Maxson, John R. Hartshorn, (last week,) Maxson Greene, E. Shelton, [illegible] Williams, James E. Cartwright.

LIST OF RECEIPTS.

Of P. Maxson, $1, cr. H. Smith vol. 2 and 3. [illegible] E. Curtis, $2, cr. E. Rogers. Of Ethan Rogers $2, cr. Davis Stillman vol. 3.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

DE RUYTER INSTITUTE.

M. L. WOOD, A. B., Principal
Instructor in Languages, and Lecturer on Chemistry.
G. M. LANGWORTHY,
Instructor in Mathematics, and Lecturer on Natural Philosophy and Astronomy.

Ladies' Department.

Miss MARY A. SEVERANCE, Preceptress,
Instructress in French, Drawing, and Painting, &c.
Miss ELIZABETH B. GOODRICH,
Instructress in the Primary Department.

THE Natural, Intellectual and Moral Sciences, are taught by the different Instructors, as best suits the circumstances accompanying the formation of classes, except those mentioned above, which are always taught by the same Teacher.

This Institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter, thirteen miles south of Cazenovia, twenty-four miles west of Hamilton, and about eighteen east of Homer. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, stoves, and rented to gentlemen and ladies at one shilling a week each; each room being large enough for the accommodation of two students.

The ladies occupy the rooms on the south and the gentlemen those in the north of the building.

The Institution is furnished with a good philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a good education, as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

The year is divided into three terms of fourteen weeks each the first term commenced on the 16th of Sept., followed by a vacation of one week, the second term will commence on the 30th of Dec. followed by a vacation of three weeks, the third term will commence on the last Friday in April 1843, followed also, by a vacation of four weeks.

TUITION.

In the common English branches,	$3,50
In the Languages and higher English branches.	5.00
In Drawing,	2.00
In Painting,	2.00
Extras,	,50

Tuition in advance.

N. B. Those desiring to qualify themselves for teaching, will be furnished with every facility for doing so, and when duly qualified will receive a certificate of recommendation.

New Arrangement.

GEORGE W. SUTTON, having this day purchased the interest of W. H. QUINBY, in the Dry Goods and Shoe business, will continue the Trade and the Manufacture of Boots and Shoes as usual at the NEW YORK CASH STORE, where he would solicit the continuance of the liberal patronage heretofore received.

Sept. 14, 1842.

FLOUR, PROVISIONS, GROCERIES, and six hundred other things, for sale by 11tf
May 11. HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

SILK! SILK!! SILK!!!

A BEAUTIFUL assortment of plain, figured and striped, just received and for sale very cheap at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

JOB PRINTING.

BOOKS, Pamphlets, Way, Hand-Bills, Cards Bills, &c. &c., neatly executed at this office.

Election Notice.

[illegible]

STATE OF NEW-YORK, Secretary's Office, Albany, Sept. 7, 1842. [illegible]

ISAAC BROWN, [illegible]

Christian Review.

[illegible]

GOULD KENDALL & LINCOLN, [illegible]
59 Washington Street.

N. B. [illegible] be entitled to a selection [illegible] volumes.

Boston, August [illegible]

What is Economy?

RANDOLPH & DUNHAM, take pleasure in informing their customers, and the public generally, that they continue the Tailoring business, in "Mechanic's Hall," in rooms adjoining the "Register Office," in all its various branches, where they will be happy to wait on customers on the shortest notice. Thankful for the patronage already bestowed on this establishment, they would say, that all work entrusted to them shall be done up in a style not surpassed by any of the "Craft" in this "village or county," and at prices that will suit their customers, and tend to that "Economy" which has been advertised to be the "road to wealth."—Cutting done at sight, and warranted to fit if properly made up. Finally, all work done at this Establishment will be warranted to fit or no sale.

S. F. RANDOLPH.
J. V. DUNHAM.
De Ruyter, August 3, 1842. 23tf

Economy is the road to Wealth.

JAMES M. LETTS, would inform his friends and customers, and the public generally, that he has removed his Tailoring Establishment, to the building occupied by Eli A. Gage as a Hat Store, where he will be ready at all times to attend to cutting and making all manner of clothing as cheap as can be done in the village or county. Military work done in the latest and most approved fashion. Ladies Habits, and Coat Dresses Cut to order, at short notice. All work done at this establishment, shall be warranted to fit.

De Ruyter, July 1st 1842.

L. W BLISS' Window Sash
Bliss' & Co. " Blinds.
Holme's Sampson & Salisbury Edged Tools consisting of Broad Axes, Hand Axes, Adzes and Chisels, at Factory prices by J. N. ELMORE,
October 4. Manufacturers' Agent

IMPORTANT WORK

[illegible]

Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

[illegible]

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings

[illegible]

STOVES.

COLD WINTER IS COMING

[illegible]

Fancy Parlor Stoves.

[illegible]

BRASS AND TIN WARE

[illegible]

LOW PRICES

[illegible]

Eave Troughs

[illegible]

JUST RECEIVED

[illegible]

JOB WORK.

[illegible] La Fayette Block [illegible] 1841. 34tf

REMOVAL.

JAMES M. LETTS [illegible] his tailoring establishment [illegible] 2 doors north of [illegible] Apr. 16th 1842.

20 [illegible] STONE STORE.

"Hard times and money scarce,"

IS the general complaint, and economy is the object of every person.

GEO. W. SUTTON has just opened a large assortment of [illegible] Groceries, Crockery, Paints, Oils and Dye-Stuffs. Persons wishing to make purchases [illegible] we feel confident that our Low Prices and Good Goods must give [illegible] satisfaction.

Sept. 14. GEORGE W. SUTTON.

BOOKS & STATIONERY.

SCHOOL BOOKS, of all descriptions, Miscellaneous Books & Stationery, at the Book Store of HART, ACKLEY, & CO.
De Ruyter, May 11, 1842. 11v3tf

50 PIECES BROAD CLOTHS, CASSIMERES, SATINETTES, at reduced prices at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

THE FARMER'S EXCHANGE is the place to buy Goods CHEAP. Oct. 20, 1841.
S. G. WALKER.

Notice.

ALL persons who are indebted to the subscriber, either in accounts or note, are requested to call and settle [illegible] and save cost.
De Ruyter, June 20, 1842.
JAMES M. LETTS.

BOOK BINDING.

THE subscriber having connected a BINDERY with his printing establishment, is now ready to execute all kinds of Binding in a neat and durable manner, on as reasonable terms as at any other establishment in this section of country.

JAMES BAILEY.
De Ruyter, June 8th 1841.

POETRY.

From the Washingtonian and Genius.

Lines.

Written on seeing a young Lady, an intimate friend, partake of the sparkling wine—that "destroyer of souls."

Dash from thy lips that sparkling glass!
As thou wouldst spurn the blackest sin;
Though nought its beauty can surpass,
Yet dire destruction lurks within.

Oh! dash away that liquid flame!
Nor let it taint thy youthful breath;
For in it lurk the seeds of shame
And anguish, poverty and death.

What, though the wine-cup, sparkling bright,
Can quiet all thy rising fears;
'Twill prove thy soul's eternal blight,
And whelm the in remorse and tears.

O! could that glowing wine-cup tell
The woes its liquid fires has wrought,
'Twould but unfold the scenes of hell,
With darkest shades of horror fraught.

'Twould tell the wreck of god-like mind;
Life's fondest joys to ruin driven—
Of anguish deepest most refined—
The loss of peace—of life—of HEAVEN!

Then dash away that sparkling glass!
As thou would'st spurn the blackest sin.
Though nought its beauty can surpass,
Yet dire destruction lurks within.

Bolivar, Ohio, July 27, 1842. W.

Miscellaneous Department.

WESTERN FARMING—WHEAT AND WOOL.

The west is truly a great country. No where else are things done on so great a scale, or when done, is so little said or thought about them. We do not wonder the dwellers on the banks of the father of rivers, and its tributaries, are proud of their country; for there is not another on the face of the globe, that can support such a popalution from the products of the soil, as that. There is a vast deal of true yankee ingenuity too in the west, that is rapidly overcoming some of the natural difficulties of position; and by the more complete adaptation of their immense resources, rendering themselves more truly independent, and by the applications of science to objects comparatively, of little value, securing some of the necessaries as well as luxuries of life. Thus superior wax candles are made from fields of the castor oil bean; and the western herds of swine have not only driven whales out of the great valley, but are fast following them over the Alleganies. Clothed in silk, feeding on short horns and the finest of wheat, and lighted with elaine, truly the prospect of the west is enviable.

There are some farmers at the west, and the number is increasing, who have farms, and who cultivate them too, in a style worthy of the country in which they live. Go to the farm of the Messrs. Sullivants, near Columbus, and see on the beautiful river flats from twelve to fifteen hundred acres of corn, while their fine flocks are covering a thousand hills; or visit the Illinois prairie farms, such as is the one described below, and you can form some conception of western farming.

Eighteen miles above Peoria, Mr. Jas. Underhill has a farm of twenty-three hundred acres, part of which only is under crops at the present time, but will soon be reclaimed and cultivated. It lies on the Illinois river, on the La Salle prairie, and a short description must be interesting.—The first field of this farm you reach in ascending the river from Peoria, is one of five hundred acres; three hundred acres of which are in wheat, and two hundred in corn and oats. The wheat is estimated to yield as an average, only 20 bushels per acre, the land having been reclaimed and ploughed for the first time last year; the mass of vegetable matter not being sufficiently decomposed in that time to give a full crop. This field is fenced with a rail worm fence, eight rails high. This fence cost about $1,200. The second field, which is separated by a road from the first, contains two hundred acres enclosed with a good substantial board fence, costing $1,265. This field contained wheat, rye, oats, and corn, all excellent. The wheat was most beautiful, and was estimated at thirty-five bushels per acre. The third field, which lies to the north of the second, and which is now being broken up and in corn, will contain sixteen hundred acres, all within one fence. Mr. Underhill is intending to put eight hundred acres to wheat this fall; and as much of it will be ground a second time cropped, should the season be favorable, a great crop may reasonably be anticipated; probably not less than 20,000 bushels. The breaking up of the prairie, costs Mr. U. $2,50 per acre, by contract; and the wheat the past season, has sold at Peoria, for 75 cents per bushel. The prices of the new crop must be lower.

Mr. Underhill has built this season, two large barns on the bank of the river, each 30 by 50 feet, from which his grain can be transferred at once to steamboats without handling. In the breaking up, and fencing his farm, Mr. Underhill had a house 14 by 20 feet constructed, and mouted on wheels, which is drawn from place to place on the prairie, by the oxen of the establishment, as the convenience of the party of laborers may dictate. This house affords good lodging room, a dining hall, place of deposite for implements, &c. It has undoubtedly contributed much to the health of the laborers. Mr Underhill's farm has a straight line of fence on one side of three miles in length. The foregoing facts, gathered from the Peoria Press, show what an opening the west affords for men of capital and enterprise, disposed to engage in the culture of the soil.

We find it stated in the Buffalo Com. Advertiser, that a gentleman in that vicinity, having a prairie farm of some 500 acres, purchased 2000 sheep, which he placed upon it, under the care of two faithful men as shepherds. They have succeeded admirably. The sheep have kept in the best of health, have been in excellent condition at all times, and the proprietor, as the first fruits of the undertaking, has just received 6,000 lbs. of wool of good quality, and which in the Buffalo market was worth 30 cents per lb. This, with the natural increase of the flock, must be a handsome profit on the capital invested, and obtained with very little trouble or risk. The transportation of the wool from Ill. to Buffalo, was about one cent per lb. The great difficulty which has existed in the west to the keeping of sheep, has been the wolves, the prairie wolves in particular: but the settlement and improvement of the country will remove this obstacle, which now, indeed is easily overcome by a shepherd and his dogs. There are many men in this and the eastern states, owners of western lands, which are now lying a dead weight on their hands, who we think might take a useful hint from the above. Sheep may be purchased at a price merely nominal at the present time, and driven the whole distance experience shows, with little losss. Once on the prairies, daily attendance and supervision is all that is necessary, and the cost of this can be well afforded, where the flock is large.

ORIGIN OF THE WORD GOD.

Noah Webster, the celebrated American Lexicographer and philologist, wrote a volume of Essays in the year 1780, in which among other subjects discussed, there is a dissertation "on the influence of language on opinions and of opinions on language." The design of the Essay is to show how far truth and accuracy of thinking are concerned in a clear understanding of words. As an illustration, he introduces the word God, is merely the old Saxon adjective, god, now spelt and pronounced good. The German Gott, is from the same root. The words God and good, therefore, are synonymous. The derivation of the word leads us to the notions which our ancestors entertained of the Supreme Being, supposing him to be the principle, or author of good, they called him by way of eminence God, or the Good. By long use and progress of knowledge, the word is become the name of the Great Creator, and we have added to it ideas of other attributes, as justice, power, immutability, &c. Had our heathen ancestors entertained different ideas of the Deity; had they for instance, supposed justice to have been his leading attribute, if I may use the term, they would have called him the just, and this appellation, by being uniformly appropriated to a certain invisible events would in time have lost the article THE, and JUST would have become the NAME of the Deity. Such is the influence of opinion in the formation of language."

The theory of Dr. Webster is not more beautiful than true. Goodnesss comprehends the whole divine character, there is nothing in God, which is not good. Good, therefore, or God, which is the same word, is the appropriate name of the Deity. To call him the Just, the Wise, the Merciful, the Eternal, the Almighty, expresses only one attribute out of many; while the Good the whole. God is just, but his justice is not in conflict with goodness under a certain modification; as the parent is good when he corrects his stubborn child, and the government in punishing seditious subjects; even should the correction and punishment result in no good to the individuals upon whom they are inflicted, the goodness of the parent and government remain unimpeached; indeed to withhold the correction and punishment, would be regarded by all, save the culprits, as the most marked violation of goodness—as absolutely wrong. Goodness is amiable; but not more so than justice; both seek the same end; both are directed by the same principle; and the mercy of God is not worthy of more complacency than his holiness; both must be love, and be eqally loved, before God can be truly loved.

This view of the character of God and the harmony of the divine attributes, is sustained both by the experience of awakened sinners and the representations of the scriptures. Before the convicted sinner finds peace for his troubled spirit, he is obliged "to consent to the law, that it is holy, just, and good;" he must see the justice of God in his condemnation, as well as his mercy in the provision made for his salvation. In the Revelation, the wicked are represented as "calling upon the rocks and the mountains to fall upon them, and cover them from the face of him who sitteth upon the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb." The wrath, or justice of the Savior, therefore, is not incompatible with the lamb-like, or merciful attributes of his character; he who is gentle as a lamb, inflicts wrath, or punishment, as a judge. The redeemed also are represented as exclaiming, when the impenitent are removed to their eternal prison-house, "True and righteous are all thy ways, O thou King of saints;" and as crying, "Alleluia! the Lord God omnipotent reigneth, when the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever."

Universalism would call God the Merciful, but not Just; it would call him the Good provided goodness could be separated from holiness. But he is called God, because he is both merciful and just, and justice is only a modification of goodness. The great error of Universalism, is its denial of the divine holiness and justice; and the question of the salvation of those who embrace it, turns upon another; whether they can be saved who approve the divine mercy, but abhor the divine justice; who worship for their God a creature of the imagination, a mere figment of fancy, instead of the God of the Bible.

THE QUARREL OF THE BEASTS ABOUT RANK.

IN FOUR FABLES.

I.

There once arose a hot quarrel among the beasts, about rank. "To settle it, let us go to man for counsel," said the Horse; "he is not a party in the quarrel, and can be impartial." "But has he sufficient understanding?" squeaked the Mole. "He needs the highest capacity to discover our perfections, which are often deeply hidden." "That is very wisely suggested," said the Hamster. "Yes," cried the Hedgehog, "I shall never believe Man has penetration enough." "Silence!" commanded the Horse. "It is well known, that he, who has least confidence in the goodnes of his cause, is ever readiest to doubt the sagacity of his judge."

II.

Man appeared as judge. "A word with you," cried the majestic Lion, "before you declare judgment. By what rule, Man, will you determine our worth?" "By what rule?" answered Man, "undoubtedly according to the degree in which you may be more or less useful to me." "Excellent!" replied the indignant Lion. "In that case, how far should I stand below the Ass? Man, you cannot be our judge. Leave the assembly."

III.

Man withdrew. "There," cried the scornful Mole, and the Hamster and the Hedgehog assented, "You see! Horse.—The Lion too, thinks Man cannot be our judge. The Lion thinks as we do." "But on better grounds than you!" said the Lion, casting upon them a contemptuous look.

IV.

The Lion continued: "In my view, this quarrel about rank is a wretched business. I care not whether you regard me as the first in rank, or as the last. It is sufficient for me that I know myself!" and then he walked out of the assembly. He was followed by the wise Elephant, the bold Tiger, the serious Bear, the sensible Fox, the noble Horse, and in short, all who felt, or thought they felt their own worth.

Those who departed last, and murmured most at the breaking up of the assembly, were the Ape and the Ass.

THE SCOTCHMAN'S ADVICE TO HIS DAUGHTER, ON LEAVING HOME FOR A BOARDING SCHOOL.—Now, Daughter, ye hae just four things to learn in Edinburgh: ye hae to learn to manage your head, your hands, your feet, and your heart. Your head will require a little redding up, baith outside and inside. It's no the bobs and curls, the ribbons and the rose knots, the gildet kames, and the toppings o'weel-sleekit-up hair, that are to stand the test for life; and yet these are a'becoming in their places. But there is something else required. Ye maun learn to think for yoursel, and act for yoursel, for you canna always have your mother and me to think and act for you. Ye maun learn to calculate and weigh, not only your own actions, but your motives of action, as well as the actions and apparent motives of those with whom you have to deal; and stick aye by that, my child, of which you are sure never to be ashamed, either in this world, or in the one that's to come.

If ever ye be spared to be a wife, there will be mair depend on your head than your hands; but yet you are nae the waur o'being able to cook your family a neat dinner, and make yoursel a new gown at orra time, or a frock to a bit wee ane.

But now for the heart, daughter; that is what requires the maist care, and the maist watching ower of all, and there's nought else that I am sae unqualified to gie advice in. Keep it aye free o'malice, rancour and deceit; and as to the forming of ony improper connections, or youthful partialities, it is sae dangerous at your time o' life, that no advice nor guardianship can countervail. I maun therefore leave it entirely to your own discretion and good sense.

I might have mentioned the management of the tongue, as another and separate point of attention; but it is a mere maching, and acts in subordination to the head and the heart; and if these are kept in proper order, the other winna rin far wrang. But dinna be ower the matter tual about catching the snappy English pronunciation. It looks rather affected in a country girl to be always snapping at the English, and at the same time popping in an auld Scot's phrase that she learned in the nursery, for it is impossible to get quit o' them. But mind aye this, my child—that good sense is well-faured and becoming, in whatever dialect it be spoken; and ane's mother-tongue suits always the lips of either a bonny lass or an auld carl the best.—Ettrick Shepherd.

THE BEECH TREE.—My attention has lately been called to the question whether the Beech tree, Fagus sylvatica, is ever struck with lightning; and after an extended inquiry and examination, I am brought to the conclusion, that for this reason as yet unexplained and unaccounted for, this tree has always escaped the effects of the atmospheric electricity. This fact has been noticed for more than a hundred years both in Europe and this country, and yet it is not so generally known as it should be; at least, very little improvement sems to have been made of it. In an address delivered by Dr. S. L. Mitchell, in 1826, before the New York Horticultural Society, there is a letter from Dr. Becton, of Tennessee, in which the writer says:

"Neither tradition, nor more authentic history, give any account of injury having been sustained by a beech tree, from the effects of electricity. So notorious is that fact, that in Tennessee, it is considered almost an impossibility to be struck by lightning, if protection be sought under the branches of a beech tree." "Other trees may be surrounded by these and shivered to splinters, while the beech remains entire and unhurt." Dr. Mitchell adds, "improvement might and ought to be made of this fact, by planting and rearing beeches near and around the dwelling houses and barns of our farmers, for the immunity of cattle as well as human beings from the violence of lightning. Let a beech grove, as easy to rear as a plantation of butternuts, accompany every inhabited spot, and let solitary beech trees arise here and there over every farm and plantation." How often do we read of some flock of sheep, some two or three horses or cattle, or men, being killed by lightning, who had taken shelter under some oak, maple or hickory tree! And yet few farmers suffer a beech tre to stand, notwithstanding it is as shady and ornamental as the maple. "Wood man, spare that tree." H. A. P.

Buffalo, Aug. 1842.

PENMANSHIP.

It is a very desirable thing for a young man, who has [illegible] livelihood to get, to acquire a good hand as a writer. In the changes of mercantile life, a clerkship is sometimes a good resort; and he who can keep neatly a set of books, has at his command, in ordinary circumstances, the means of support. Some regard it as a matter of little importance how they write; and every printer has opportunities to know that the number of abominable penmen is not small. But verily, a graceful pen, wielded only as a copyist, will furnish one with bread; and one who holds such a pen may almost be said to have a trade—not a laborious one either—to which he may have recourse when he fails in trade, or cannot make a fortune by speculation.—Our advice to all boys is, that they learn to write a good hand—a legible, smooth hand, without flourish, round and bold, such as was in fashion a quarter of century ago, for aught we can tell, as our memory of a time so distant is not very distinct. They never will regret taking the trouble to make this acquisition. When they write for the press, the gratitude of compositors shall be their's, and their copy held in honorable remembrance throughout the office; and although many other strings to their bow may be broken, this one may enable them to hit the mark, i. e., a good hand will procure something to eat and drink, the wherewithal to be clothed, and a lodging.

Speaking of hand-writing, it is a little remarkable that, even when taught in the same school, no two persons write exactly alike. The theory has been started that a man's character may be known by his penmanship,—and there is something in the theory. We have often thought of it when looking over a large collection of autographs. Most decidedly different and distinctly individual is every name. There is the timid stroke and the bold stroke, the careless and the careful, the sentimental and the logical, the prosaic and the poetic, the commercial and the literary; and the imagination can easily read traits of mind and heart in the cut of every letter. Moreover there is sex in writing. Ladies seldom write like gentlemen. Of a hundred pieces of penmanship, it were easy to pick out the males and the females: so there is character in writing. Let every body try to have a fair character, to be represented by a fair hand.—Newburyport Herald.

THE SCOTCH.

The general character of the people of Scotland is well known. The physical features of the country are a fit emblem of the robust and unyielding spirit of the population. No community in Europe has presented a more determined front to every kind of foreign influence, especially such as has threatened to soften the characteristic sternness of national manners, or mitigate the rigor of Calvinism. In every department of study and of action this strong peculiarity has showed itself. We find ample proofs on the battle field and in the halls of science. The General Assembly alone furnishes evidence of the truth; for it will sooner incur the hazard of driving from her ranks a large body of her ablest champions, than yield one iota of that which, in her opinion, makes the kirk the glory of all lands—the most illustrious of ecclesiastical institutions. All the ports of the country are next to closed against novelties in respect of morals and manners: and while the poor Irish in tens of thousands are advancing in temperance reformation, the Scotch more stiffly adhere to their former habits, hating innovation whether in the shape of new-fangled notions, or extraneous lights. We have heard them described as men of sturdiness to mingle strong drink, equally as they are to construct systems of mental philosophy.

When right or when wrong, there is something about the Scotch people that commands respect; for they present a distinct and permanent national character, which is as often perhaps, illustrated on the one side as on the other. Many too, are the associations which find a welcome in the heart of the stranger, belonging to the land of the mountain and flood. And beyond this, great and glorious are the achievements which sustain the name Caledonia. Need we allude (keeping more especially within the sphere indicated by the running title of our paper) to the hero-reformer, the Rutherfords, the Erskines, Gillespies—to two of the triumvirate of British historians—to the never-dying names in intellectual science—or to the sons of song?—Lond. Month. Rev.

ABSURDITIES.—It is very absurd for a person to suppose that in this world we will meet with no injustice.

It is absurd to think that all beautiful women will make good wives.

It is absurd to expect decency of a fool, or brains of a dandy.

It is absurd to think of passing through life without adversities, or that lobsters will not turn red after being boiled.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

PROSPECTUS OF THE FARM HOUSE OF THE XIX CENTURY, OR ENCYCLOPEDIA OF PRACTICAL AGRICULTURE, containing the best mode of culture adopted in France, England, Germany, and Flanders; full practical instructions to guide the small cultivator, the farmer, the director, and the large proprietor in the improvement of an estate; the general principle of agriculture, and the culture of all the useful plants; the training of domestic animals, and the veterinary art; the description of various arts relating to agriculture; rural implements and buildings; the management and improvement of vines, fruit trees, [illegible] forests, [illegible]; the economy, organization, and direction of a rural establishment [illegible] figures, [illegible]

An Extract [illegible] of Rural Economy, [illegible] Trees, Shrubs, and Plants, [illegible] Agriculture [illegible] of M. T. [illegible] Translated from the French, with Notes [illegible] the United States of America, by [illegible] Whiting, formerly Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in the Western Reserve College, Translator of La Fontaine's Fables, etc.

Agriculture is the foundation of all human arts—the art for which man was made, and the perfection of which is his chief happiness and glory as the lord of this planet. Of this art, all other arts and sciences are but [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] Young Man. A[illegible] 120.

Of the qualifications of the translator it may be said that [illegible]

[illegible]

1842

[illegible] S. S. HASKELL [illegible] New York.

New York, June 1, 1842.

[illegible] to one copy of the work. 16w15

Not 25 or 50 per cent Reward.

S. G. WALKER

HAS received his NEW GOODS, which he is disposed and determined to sell as CHEAP, if not cheaper than can be bought at any other establishment in De Ruyter. Among his assortment may be found, Dry Goods, Dry Groceries, Crockery, Hardware, &c. Leghorn and Palm-Leaf hats and a variety of other things too numerous to mention.

Hear ye!! Hear ye!! all persons wishing to buy goods CHEAP will please call at the Farmer's Exchange, and examine the quality and prices of his goods before purchasing elsewhere, and, Hear ye again!! any one having a little "Safety Fund" and indebted to S. G. Walker, will please call and deposit.

De Ruyter, May 23, 1842.

LOTS OF HATS & CAPS on hand—Fashionable and Old Fashioned, Bell Crowned and Low Crowned; and, to crown all, and not be out of Fashion. Cash and most kinds of stuff received in payment, by HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

NO IMPOSITION.
NO STATES PRISON WORK!

THOSE wishing to purchase BOOTS and SHOES of superior quality of custom work, will find just the place by calling at the sign of the MAMMOTH BOOT.

De Ruyter, May 20, 1842.

Dissolution.

THE Co-partnership heretofore existing under the firm of SUTTON & QUINBY, is this day dissolved by mutual consent. All notes and accounts will be left with Geo. W. Sutton for settlement.

GEO. W. SUTTON,
WM. H. QUINBY.

De Ruyter, Sep. 14, 1842

BOOTS BOOTS! SHOES! SHOES!!

AT the sign of the Mammoth Boot, manufactured invariably of leather tanned in "cold liquor." Please call.

How to make money,

IS the study of mankind and of the Yankee Nation in particular. The easiest and most practicable plan for accomplishing the desired end in these times is to "Save Money," which can be done by purchasing NEW GOODS, instead of the trashy accumulations of many shops and many years. The place to do this, is at ELMORE'S whose stock of NEW GOODS is nearly equal to all the rest received in this village and who is daily dispensing great bargains to "Fortune's Favorites."

May 30.

Of Drugs and Medicines,

THE subscriber keeps a much larger stock and sells much lower than those who advertise two [illegible]

May 30. J. N. ELMORE

4 [illegible] fashionable Hats, [illegible] at the

May 30. STONE STORE

NEW TAILORING ESTABLISHMENT.

THE [illegible] from the Citizens of De Ruyter [illegible] that he has opened a [illegible] of S. G. Walker's store [illegible] where he may at all times be [illegible] to favor him [illegible] their garments made as well as [illegible] west of New York City.

N. B. Garments cut and warranted if made by competent workmen. New York Spring and Summer Fashions just received by W. P. GUEST.

De Ruyter, April 25th, 1842.

FLOUR! FLOUR!! FLOUR!!!

SUPERFINE Flour for sale at the Farmers' Exchange, put up in good order in barrels and half barrels. Said Flour is made from the best of western wheat at one of the best mills in the state.

S. G. WALKER.

De Ruyter, April 19th, 1842.

BLANKS! BLANKS!!

JUSTICES Blanks, Personal Mortgages, &c. just printed and for sale at this office.

De Ruyter, April 20, 1842.

TEAS, SUGARS.

CALL and see how cheap they are selling them at the NEW YORK CASH STORE

[illegible]

500 PAIRS Boots and Shoes for sale at the

May 30. STONE STORE.

AGENTS FOR THE REGISTER.

NEW-YORK.

Alfred—Silas Potter, A. G. Green, Job Spencer
Alfred [illegible] R. [illegible], Maxson Greene, Oran [illegible] P. M.
B[illegible]—[illegible]
B[illegible]—[illegible] Silas Bailey, Adin [illegible]
[illegible]—[illegible] I. Scott.
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]—[illegible] Maxson
[illegible]
[illegible]—[illegible] Samuel E. Lan[illegible]
[illegible]—W. P. [illegible] E. P. Cran[illegible] B. M. [illegible] H. P. Greene
[illegible]
[illegible]—[illegible] Livermore
[illegible]—[illegible] M. Dunham, [illegible] Wm. G. [illegible]
[illegible]—[illegible] Hardin.
New [illegible]—[illegible] Stillman.
[illegible]—[illegible] Truman.
[illegible]—Charles M. Lewis
[illegible]—[illegible] Church
Petersburgh—George Crandall.
[illegible]—[illegible] Clark Rogers
[illegible]—[illegible] Whitford
Potsdam, St. Lawrence Co.—Geo P. Burdick.
[illegible]—[illegible] Greene.
Scott—Ezekiel G. Potter, James Hubbard, Hi[illegible] Babcock.
[illegible]—Abel Ward
[illegible]—[illegible] T. Greene.
[illegible]—[illegible] Burdick.
[illegible]—Welcome Stillman, William B. Maxson.
[illegible]—[illegible] Williams
[illegible]—[illegible]
West [illegible]—[illegible]

RHODE-ISLAND.

[illegible]—[illegible] Campbell.
[illegible]—[illegible] Jacob D. Bab[illegible]

CONNECTICUT.

[illegible]—Lester T. Rogers, Wm. Maxson.
[illegible]—[illegible]

NEW-JERSEY.

[illegible]—[illegible]
[illegible]—W. B. [illegible]
[illegible]—[illegible] P. [illegible] Azor Estee.
[illegible]

PENNSYLVANIA.

[illegible]—[illegible] B. Brown
[illegible]—[illegible]
[illegible]—[illegible]
[illegible]—[illegible] Maxson
[illegible]—[illegible]
[illegible]—[illegible] W. [illegible]

VIRGINIA.

Lost Creek—[illegible] H. Bond
[illegible]—[illegible] B. Bond
New Salem—Jephtah F. Randolph
Lowmont—Joseph Jeffrey
Luther's Run—Asa Bee

OHIO.

Bloomfield—Charles Clarke.
Northampton—Simeon Babcock, B. C. Church.
Port Jefferson—Lewis A. Davis
[illegible]—Davis Loofbourrow.
Butlerville—G. N. Swinney
Kingsville—Julius M. Todd

MICHIGAN.

Oporto—Job Tyler.
Tallmadge—Bethuel Church.

WISKONSAN.

Milton, Rock Co.—Joseph Goodrich, P. M. Stillman Coon.

IOWA.

Fredonia, Louisa Co.—M. Wheelock.

ILLINOIS.

Tremont, Peoria Co.—James Dunham.

The Seventh-day Baptist Register
IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY,
AT DE RUYTER, MADISON CO., N. Y.,
BY
JAMES BAILEY.

TERMS.—To village subscribers who have the paper left at their doors, $2 25, in advance, or $2 50, at the expiration of the year.

☞To office and mail subscribers, $2 in ADVANCE

Each communication, involving facts and intended for insertion in the paper, must be accompanied by a responsible name.

No subscription received for a less term than six months.

☞All subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, will be considered as wishing to continue their subscription, and their paper will be sent to them accordingly. No paper will be discontinued till all arrearages are paid except at the discretion of the publisher.

☞Advertisements inserted on the most reasonable terms.

☞All letters and communications to ensure attention should be addressed to the publisher free of postage.

L J Rogers ad

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.

VOL. III.---NO 33.] JAMES BAILEY, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR. [WHOLE NO. 137.

Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,——The SEVENTH DAY is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.——FOURTH COMMANDMENT.——If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments.—JESUS CHRIST.

TWO DOLLARS IN ADVANCE.] DE RUYTER, N. Y., FOURTH-DAY, OCTOBER 12, 1842. [PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Original Papers.

For the Register.

Notes on Wiskonsan.

BY JOHN R HARTSHORN, M. D.

DEAR SIR :—I have just returned from the West on a tour to Wiskonsan. As there have been various, and apparently contradictory reports concerning that country ; at the suggestion and request of a number of individuals, to give a description of its aspect, soil, productions, and prospects, through the medium of your valuable paper, I have taken my pen to discharge the task, with as much brevity as justice and perspicuity will admit. I traveled about four hundred miles in the territory, chiefly in the counties of Milwaukie, Racine, Walworth, Dane, Rock and Jefferson. The surface on the whole is not level, nor is it very uneven, sufficiently so however to give it a picturesque and romantic appearance. In some parts, there are mounds or elevations with corresponding sinks or circular depressions. In some places, on the margin of the rivers, the bluffs are rather high, having a gradual declivity terminating in table lands, which extend a considerable distance. In other situations, from inland elevations the ground gradually declines to the water courses ; but as a general thing, the lands in the vicinity of streams of water, are more broken and uneven than in other parts of the territory.—These bluffs are mostly in the form of cones, pyramids or parallel ridges, with a general elevation from 10 to 40 feet, presenting an easy acclivity from the surrounding country to the summits. The surface of the country generally is beautifully undulating, with little or none of it, unsusceptible of cultivation. The soil, rich and fertile, consists of a black vegetable mould, intermixed with calcareous and sandy loam, and all covered with a luxurious sward of natural or indigenious grass. The depth of soil varies. In the vicinity of lake Michigan, it is from two to three feet, under which, is a layer of blue clay or limestone, closely imbeded to a considerable depth. About Rock river, it is generally from 3 to 5 feet, having an under layer composed of clay, sand and carbonate of lime, forming a tenacious compound or paste, which will ever prevent it from losing its strength by leaching, and render it capable of enduring a long drought, by retaining the water near its surface. In ploughing the natural sward a very strong team is required ; which, when subdued, is cultivated with the greatest facility. The average crops of fall and spring wheat are from 25 to 30 bushels an acre ; Indian corn from 50 to 60 ; oats from 45 to 60. Many farmers of undoubted veracity, informed me that their farms had yielded 40 bushels of wheat and 80 of corn to the acre. This grain can be raised for several years in succession, on the same piece of ground, without sensibly diminishing its fertalizing powers. The common white and yellow flint, and the dent, are the varieties of corn chiefly raised. Every species of culinary plants common to this country, grows most luxuriantly. The soil is well adapted for rearing the choicest fruits and fruit-bearing shrubs ; strawberries, raspberries, goosberries, blackberries, wild plumbs, crab-apples, and even wild grapes, whose rich and purple clusters hang with gorgeous and tempting display.

The timber is principally oak of every variety, intermixed with more or less of every species of wood common in the northern States. Marshes are scattered through most portions of the territory; not generally very large, nor so wet and soft as to be impassible. One deep ditch through the middle, or often one simple furrow made by the plough, would be sufficient to render them not only subservient to the uses of the husbandman, but of inexhaustible fertility. The farmers, not having yet cultivated much timothy or clover, depend upon them for supplies of hay ; an acre furnishing 2 or 3 tons.

The country is not generally well supplied with perennial springs of water, but that of good quality and in great abundance can in most cases, be obtained by digging from 10 to 75 feet. No where have I ever seen such a multiplicity of small lakes, as are to be found in that region ; being scattered throughout almost every town. Their waters are mostly clear, their bottoms sandy ; they being formed from springs, or connected by rivulets gliding lazily around from lake to lake.

The timber is rather scattering and of a dwarfish growth, except on the margin of rivers, where it is sometimes heavy. About one third of the surface is prairie, on which as well as on the woodlands generally, cattle and horses can find exhaustless supplies of fine grass. The prairies are not generally so extensive as those in Illinois and some other parts of the U. S. ; but are interspersed with groves, and points of woodland, which are admirably proportioned to each other, for the wants and conveniences of the inhabitants. A few are large ; the forest outlines resembling in the far perspective, the dim shore of the ocean, with its deep vistas and distant headlands, like harbors and capes.

No where do we find high hills or ridges of mountains ; no where do we see the river tumbling its crested foam over precipitous ledges of massy and cragged rocks; but the purling stream meandering slowly along, to convey its limped waters to their bed of rest. The prairie admired for its gently undulating features and unrivaled landscape beauty ; and the still more undulating woodland, with all varieties of herbage and diversified flowers, fair as the roses of Sharon, and beautiful as the lilies in the valley of the Temple of Solomon, present pictures that would enrapture even the dullest imagination. As regards the climate, so far as I have been able to learn, the thermometer does not range so widely, nor are the winters so cold, as in the same latitude in the Eastern States.

Being a physician, and having learned that many, who, in this state, were toiling and struggling without hope and without progress, were building up for themselves competence, independence, and a patrimony for their children, I very naturally inquired about the success of my profession there, but was informed by a number of physicians, that it is alarmingly healthy for the interest of the medical man. Lung diseases are rare. Persons afflicted with the asthma, have experienced a material palliation, or complete removal of that distressing and inveterate disease. Horses taken there with the heaves, soon manifest no symptoms of the previous disease. There may be a liability and predisposition to bilious diseases, ague &c., on the wet lands of marshes and water courses. In a short time, cultivation will cut off the sources of noxious exhalations, and the air will be equally salubrious and free from miasme.

The inhabitants are characterized for their industry, frugality and intelligence. They are mostly from this State and New England, whose republican principles and sterling habits, fellowship no drones or aristocratic indolence ; the sentiment being early instilled into their minds, that no pleasures are so sweet as those earned by effort, and no possession so valuable as that gained by toil. They enjoy life better in improving their farms, erecting their buildings, making their fences, cultivating their gardens, and preparing their luxuriant soil for a rich and plenteous harvest, than in slandering an unfortunate neighbor, gossiping about other people's business, or haunting the gambling house or the bacchanalian's grog-shop. They are not behind the age in moral and benevolent enterprizes, but the various associations into which they have cheerfully entered, and the ability with which they are conducted, are proof, not only of their intellectual acumen, but of their noble patriotism and general philanthropy.

Madison, the capital of the territory, is romantically situated on a beautiful elevation between two lakes, in Dane county, about 40 miles west of Rock river. We called at the Government house, entered the council-chamber, where the heartless and contempible Vineyard, with a murderous intent, and fatal shot, ushered into the world of spirits, his fellow brother Charles C. Arndt. I can but believe, that the trial of this ruffian and murderer, on November next, will consign him to deserved punishment, and save the courts of justice, from the imputation of partiality or bribery, and the capitol from the appellation of " slaughter house."

We then visited Astalon, or the ancient city. Ere we arrived, the setting sun, and our weary limbs, called for a night's repose. Here we suffered not a little in consequence of bad company, consisting of swarms of restless and insatiable musketoes, which would give us little sleep to our eyes, or slumber to our eyelids. By the bye, these animals are quite prolific in some parts of Wiskonsan. In the morning we resumed our journey, not much pleased with our night's rest ; soon found a region of country about 15 miles in extent, of an aspect so disgusting, and an atmosphere so enervating, as almost to discourage civilized man from settling within its precincts. Our enemy the gnats, soon received a reinforcement of horse-flies, darning-needles and massangers, which formed a phalanx, if not more dangerous and appalling, more ferocious and tormenting than our common enemy in the marshes and everglades of Florida ; and in the mean time traveling over miserable pole bridges, near half a mile in length, and surrounded by swamps almost unbounded by the natural eye, and unfathomable by my hickory cane. Being liberated from these contemptible marauders' dark domain, we at length reached Astalon, renowned for its indubitable traces of a once flourishing and populous city. A wall running parallel with Rock river 80 rods, and extending from each extremity to the stream, embraces about 50 acres of land in the form of a parallelogram. I have a specimen of the material with which the wall is made, being composed mostly of clay like our common brick, with indentations on the sides, apparently the impressions of straw which might have entered into the combination of the uniting substances. There are from 40 to 50 mounds in the vicinity of this antique city, some of immense size, where it is supposed the dead were buried who fell in battle.—Mounds are also found in other parts of the territory ; sometimes in the form of various animals, as the buffalo, horse, crocadile, &c.

Are these the works of human art ? Are they not substantial proof of a race of men of enterprizing habits, and of a far more civilized age than the aborigines ? Have human bones, entombed as these are, retained their form and solidity 500 or a 1000 years ? What city was fortified by this wall ? What people built these mounds ? What is the history of this immense number of military heroes, of whom perhaps more were slain, than ever fell in any single battle of Alexander, Cæsar or Bonaparte? These questions, let the antiquarian decide. Even now as I looked around me, I could but compare the present with the past. The city and its inhabitants had passed away, and their mouldering records alone remained ; yet on whatever side I turned my eyes, myriads of happy beings crowned my vision. " The air, the earth, the waters, teemed with delightful existence."

A beautiful country was spread out in enchanting prospect. Flowers of every variegated hue unfolded their nectar cups to a genial sun, and mingling with the heads of the thick prairie grass, waved in the soft summer breeze. The wild deer was sporting over the enameled meadows in an exuberance of delight. The winged tribes were trying their pinions in the air. Their sportive motions, their wanton gambols, their gratuitous activity and continued change of place, indicated their possession of abundant happiness. The cow, the horse, the ox and every domestic animal, manifested pleasure and alacrity in their movements.

The people, conscious that emigration had bettered their condition, seemed contented with their western clime, and rich in the anticipation of future wealth, health and happiness.

I have heard that in some regions, hamlets and cities have sprung up as if by magic ; but in no case have I seen the assertion so apparently true, as when applied to this territory. I was astonished at the infant efforts of this young giant of the west.

When I referred back a single leaf in the calender of time, reviewing the past, and contemplating the ominous present, as unfolding the developements of the future, the vivid thought flashed upon my mind, which Coleridge has expressed with so much grandeur, " a nation of 100,000,000 of freemen, stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific, living under the laws of Alfred, and speaking the language of Milton and Shakespeare." When the reader reflects that these fertile plains were a few years since, the hunting grounds of the savages, the Indian lodge skirting the banks of every river, the lynx, the wolf and the panther, remaining undisturbed in their lairs ; where now hamlets and peopled towns have sprung up, as if by the power of the enchanter's wand; where commerce and manufactures flourish ; where literature and the arts are diffusing their invigorating influence and industry in all the ramifications of business, is developing the resources of wealth and prosperity ; surely we must believe in the prophetic declaration, that " westward the star of empire takes its way," and that its fulfilment is rapidly advancing.

Alfred, Sept. 1842.

Religious Department.

I MUST DIE.

In the giddy whirl of the world, men too little pause to reflect that they are mortal. On and on they delve and toil, strive and contend, criminating and recriminating, throwing their whole souls into the vortex of the world, as if it and its objects were worthy to absorb their whole being. Painful object of contemplation ! A few more passing seasons, and all who are engaged in the exciting and maddening strife of the world, will, one after another, have silently dropped into the bosom of the earth, no more to be seen of men, soon to be remembered no more on earth. How unimportant then to the disembodied spirit, will appear the trifles which to-day are so much magnified, and which by partial, interested and selfish views, are clothed with so much consequence. I must die ! This short sentence, frequently uttered and pondered upon, would go far to moderate asperity of feeling, to eradicate enmity from the heart, to cool the ardor of worldly pursuits, to abate strife and jarring discord. I must die ! Let us in imagination overleap the bounds of earth, and placing ourselves on some far off point in the eternal world, look back upon the scenes in which we have mingled, which have absorbed so much of our thoughts and our feelings, and which have so frequently aroused and lashed into fierce excitement our passions. How do these things now appear ? How does this great world, with all its glitter and its tinsel, its honors and its applause, appear ?—Absolutely worthless and insignificant, not deserving a thought or a wish. But there we must stand at no distant period, and thus surveying this empty passing scene, in memory's magic glass, shall put a proper estimate upon its comparatively unimportant concerns. It is the part of wisdom to view these things now, somewhat as they will then appear. And such a contemplation, while it will serve to blunt the sorrows, lighten the cares, and ease the burdens of this life, will tend to magnify eternal realities. I must die ! Yes, this handful of earth of which I am now so careful, and for whose decoration, ease and comfort, I expend so much, will be so loathsome as to be hidden carefully from the sight of men, and will soon mingle with the clods of the valley. Well will it then be, if the spirit is not so loathsome and defiled with sin, as to be for ever excluded from the presence of a pure, and holy, and sinless God. I must die ! Yes, and I must appear at the judgment, and there my motives and my true character will be read and known of all. Think of this, reader !—Ponder often upon it, and if you are wise you will think, act, and feel, far otherwise than do the men of the world.

I must die !

" But the monitory strain,
Oft repeated in our ears,
Seems to sound too much in vain,
Wins no notice, wakes no fears.
Pleasure's call attention wins,
Hear it often as we may ;
New as ever seem our sins,
Though committed every day.

Death and judgment. heaven and hell,
These alone so often heard,
No more move us than the bell,
When some stranger is interr'd.
Oh, then, ere the turf or tomb
Cover us from every eye,
Spirit of instruction come,
Make us learn that WE MUST DIE !"

[W. R. Cabinet.

From the New-York Evangelist.

"I CAN MAKE SOME USE OF IT."

I was much interested in a stroll I recently took through a ship-yard. A noble ship was on the stocks, a proud monument of the industry and skill of the architect and his assistants. A master carpenter, with great kindness and politeness, explained everything relating to the work which particularly drew my curiosity. Gazing about upon the great variety of pieces of timber that filled the yard, my attention was particularly arrested by one that was crooked, gnarled, and every way a most unseemly article, and I queried with the carpenter concerning what use he could make of it. He remarked that many pieces of timber, which, when hewn in the distant forest, were designed for particular purposes, were found totally unfit for them when the use of them was actually called for. They must be rejected, and others selected in their places. " But," he added, " there is no stick that comes here, but I can make some use of it."

These last words have been often ringing in my ears. I look about me in the world, and behold it, like a ship-yard, filled with the materials which the Supreme Architect is using in carrying out his great designs. The noblest fabric that can be conceived, is rising under his hand. The " lively stones" of this spiritual building are immortal minds. In great numbers, in these days of the Spirit's power, are these minds found ready and willing materials for the great work. And as the Divine Architect assigns them their respective places, they rejoice in the distinguished honor to which they are advanced. Because " beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth, is Mount Zion, the city of the Great King.—And men shall walk about Zion, and go round about her, and tell the towers thereof, and mark well her bulwarks, and consider her palaces, and tell it to the generation following."

But there are materials, which, from the perversity of their character, fall not in with the great design of the Architect. He would make them as corner stones, polished after the similitude of a palace, and they might shine as living stones and brilliant ornaments in his Eternal Temple.—But they yield not to the hand of the workman. The hammer and the polishing iron is applied in vain. All the methods of infinite grace and love fail of rendering them fit for any use in Zion Her palaces and towers must go up without them. Her beauty and strength must come from other quarters.

But the Supreme Architect can make some use of them. If their perversity defeats the original design, he can accomplish other purposes by them. If they cannot be so worked into that splendid building, the church of the living God, as to take part in her glory, yet shall they be turned to some valuable account by Him who can bring order out of confusion, and who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will. If their perversity defeats his merciful designs, yet may they be made use of to glorify his justice. If they, by their holiness, will not adorn his moral government, they shall show its firmness and strength by enduring its righteous indignation. The Supreme Architect will be glorified. If his materials will not accomplish one object, they shall another. If they will not shine as the brightness of the firmament and as the stars for ever and ever, they shall nevertheless render important service, by showing to the universe what a just award of shame and suffering the offended Monarch lays upon the rebellious. The tenants of the eternal prison of despair, do not sustain the divine government in the same way with the obedient and happy subjects of it. Yet they do sustain it. As examples of the determination of that government to vindicate its own honor, they sustain it. Unwilling aid do they indeed render, yet most important. They would pull it down and triumph in its ruins. But no ; they must support it. God will make some use of them ; a most valuable use of them. Rebellious as they may choose to be, they cannot escape the Architect's skill and power to employ them in sustaining the glory of his eternal government.

PASCAL.

THE WOODMAN'S DAUGHTER.

Being overtaken by a storm one summer's evening, I observed a feeble light glimmering through the casement of a cottage, toward which I bent my steps. I knocked at the door, and was welcomed in; but immediately perceived that the inhabitants were oppressed with grief. 'I fear,' addressing myself to the father, 'that you are in trouble ?'

'O, yes sir, our hearts are all bursting : for death is coming to bear off our little Jemima. She is up stairs, sir, where she has now been these eight days, and her mother has not left her night and day. She is one of the sweetest girls a father ever loved.'

'But death,' I remarked, 'does not come by chance.'

'O no, sir: 'The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away ; blessed be the name of the Lord ;' but it is hard work to part.'

'Walk up, sir,' said the father, 'and see her before she dies; but she is so changed.'

I entered her room, and soon perceived that death had cast his fatal shadow on her countenance, which still retained its beautiful form. Addressing myself to the child, I said 'do you think you shall die ?'

'Yes sir.'

'And if you die, where do you expect to go ?'

'To heaven.'

'What makes you think you shall go to heaven ?'

'Jesus Christ has said, 'Suffer little children, and forbid them not to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven.' '

'What do you understand by coming to Jesus Christ ?'

'Believing in him, and loving him.'

'Did you always believe in him, and love him ?'

'No sir ; not till he inclined me ; for, if we love him, it is because he first loved us.'

'Then, you can leave father and mother, and all, to go to heaven ?'

'Yes, sir ; I have no wish to live on earth when I have the prospect of living a nobler and happier life in glory.'

The surgeon, who had been anxiously expected for several hours, now arrived.—'Do you think,' said the heart-struck mother, 'the child is dying ?' This question, though familiar to the humane man, was not heard without an evident expression of grief.

'While there is life,' he replied, 'there is hope ; but I would not advise you to be too sanguine in your expectations.'

We now walked down stairs ; the surgeon left, but I could not leave. 'Will you, sir,' said the father, 'go to prayer with us ? If it were not for prayer, and the hope which the Gospel inspires, my heart would break.' With this request I complied : and, while praying to the God of all grace, that the little child might be favored with the light of his countenance in her passage through the valley of the shadow of death, I heard the mother's shriek, which convinced me that she was gone. All wept aloud ; the children started up, wringing their hands, and calling 'Jemima, Jemima, don't leave us !' and the mother, with a softened melancholy of countenance, appeared among us, saying with a faltering tongue, 'She exclaimed as I was raising her up on the pillow, I am going to glory !' and fell back in my arms, and died.'—(London) Teacher's Offering.

THE WAY TO MAKE A POOR PASTOR.—1. Be very careless and irregular in attending church. Never go, except when you can manufacture no good excuse to stay at home.

2. When at church, be either asleep or staring about. Do not listen to the sermon.

3. When you go home, complain of the sermon as light and chaffy, or dry and uninteresting.

4. Treat your pastor with a cold and uninviting civility, and then complain of him because he does not visit you.

5. Neglect to pray for a blessing upon him and his labors, and then complain of him because the church does not prosper.

6. Be always finding fault with your pastor, and yet regret that he is not more popular with the people.

7. Be very lukewarm and worldly-minded, and yet complain of him for the want of zeal.

8. Neglect to provide for his necessary wants, and yet complain of him because he wants a salary.

Do all these things, and you will have a poor pastor.

AN INFIDEL'S TESTIMONY.—I passed the Sabbath with a man from ———, who said he had read every infidel work that he could find, had then a chest full of them—had taken Abner Kneeland's paper for 10 years. While in ———, he fitted up a room at the expense of $15 for Abner to lecture in, and gave him $50 for one evening's services. He had also in the meantime, been one of six to sustain Mr. ——, a Universalist. But he says he could never see what infidels could place in the room of the Bible. His mind never was at rest. He now says, that he is satisfied that the Bible is the word of God, and nothing but experimental religion can make a man happy here or hereafter. He wished me to tell men inclined to scepticism, wherever I went, " that one who labored hard till almost 40 years old, to find a resting place on that system, has given it up."

BE FAITHFUL.—How often do men shrink from the performance of duty, to avoid opposition and to secure the respect of wicked men. But this is the very way to lose respect. Men may affect to deride or despise the humble, faithful Christian ; but in their hearts they approve his course. They expect faithfulness of him, and will really despise him if he proves a traitor. Sinners often tell what they would do if they were Christians. In this they state their ideas of what a Christian should be, and for being which they really respect, though they oppose him. To neglect duty is no way to secure any man's esteem.—Oberlin Evan.

HEART SERVICE.—It is not an intellectual service that reaches and pleases the heart of God. Worldly men may be pleased with a prayer that displays a great intellect, and little or no heart. But it is the pouring out of the desires of a warm heart, be the language what it may—it is the language of love, that interests the heart of God, and brings the needed blessing to the soul.—Ib.

PRAYER.—Prayer draws all the Christian graces into its focus. It draws charity, followed by her lovely train, her forbearance with faults, her forgiveness of injuries, her pity for errors, her compassion for want. It draws repentance with her holy sorrows, her pious resolutions, her self-distrust ; it attracts faith, with her elevated eye—hope, with her grasped anchor—beneficence, with her open hand—zeal, looking far and wide to serve—humility with introverted eye, looking at home. Prayer, by quickening these graces in the heart, warms them into life, fits them for service, and dismisses each to its appropriate practice. Cordial prayer is mental virtue ; Christian virtue is spiritual action ; the mould into which genuine prayer casts the soul, is not effaced by the suspension of the act, but retains some touches of the impression till the act is repeated.—Hannah More.

HENRY MARTYN.—" Of the Bible, he could ever affirm, 'thy word is very pure, therefore thy servant loveth it.' Large portions of it did he commit to memory, repeating them during his solitary walks ; and so deep was his veneration for the word of God that when a suspicion arose in his mind that any other book he might be studying was about to gain an undue influence over his affections, he instantly layed it aside, nor would he name it, till he had felt and realized the paramount excellence of the divine oracles. He could not rest satisfied till all those lesser lights which were beginning to dazzle him, disappeared before the effulgence of the scriptures.'—Memoirs of Henry Martyn.

THE LAST COMMAND.—'Go,' said He, and He was standing but one step from the throne of heaven—'Go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature.'—'Go, and you shall move under the shield of omnipotence.' 'Lo, I am with you always, even to the end of the world.' Thus taking the whole responsibility of success on Himself, his last act was to bless and dismiss them to their work—and the last impression He left on their minds was, that they held in trust the conveyance of the gospel to all mankind.—Great Commission.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, October 12, 1842.

ALONZO H. BURDICK, of this office, will visit, this month, the friends of the paper in Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, and Eastern New York, to settle up the unsettled accounts of the Register, and obtain new subscribers. Will the friends of the press aid him as much as possible?

Basis of Confidence.

A hope of salvation well founded, is, most of all to be desired. Such a hope as nothing can shake or destroy, such as will stand the test of adversity, of affliction and persecution—such as will shine brighter as it brings its possessor nearer his promised inheritance, and such as will be like an anchor to the soul as it passes the dark valley of death, and comes up to the judgment. All others will be as the hope of the hypocrite.—"as the giving up of the Ghost."

The basis of a good hope is laid in the word of God, and not elsewhere; and is defined in the language of Jesus Christ in this and numerous other passages of scripture, of like import, viz: "He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." Faith, then, in the Lord Jesus Christ, is the foundation of a hope that shall be like an anchor to the soul. A faith that does not embrace the whole gospel as taught by Jesus Christ, in all its bearings, is no faith. The Savior knew what limits to give, how much it was necessary to restrain, how much to require and what encouragement to give, and having fixed these according to the councils of his own will, they become the measure of the Christian's duty, and define the limits of a justifying and saving faith.

The soul and essence of the gospel is love. What evidence is there of love, without obedience? "Jesus answered and said unto him, if a man love me, he will keep my words." And again, "He that loveth me not, keepeth not my sayings."—In the same spirit with this, is the language of the apostle James.—"For as the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works, is dead also." Hence we come to this conclusion, that obedience to one and all things required by God in his word, is the only infallible evidence of the existence and exercise of a saving faith in Jesus Christ. And this is the only sure ground of confidence in God. Nothing is clearer, than that agreement is necessary to union; "Can two walk together except they be agreed?" Hence, he that would be united to God and his son Jesus Christ, must be in agreement with them. And as it is God's right to reign, he has fixed the terms of agreement, and left it with man to obey and be in union, or disobey and be in opposition. God first exhibited the terms on which he could be in union with man, and engraved them with his own hand on tables of stone, thereby signifying that these terms were as lasting as a rock, and would never pass away. Obedience to this code of laws or terms of union with God, secured to the soul the everlasting favor of God. Let no one suppose from this, that we preach salvation by the law. We do not say that salvation is of the law, but that obedience to the law of God, is the evidence that the soul is in agreement with God, and thereby in a salvable state. It is not in accordance with the plan of God's government, to save men in their sins. How then can those who will not obey God's law, hope for union with him, and ultimate salvation?—Jesus Christ, when he made his appearance into the world, renewed and enforced the same law, as in Matt. v. 17—18.—"Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets. I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil. For verily I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one title shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfiled." And in Mark xii. 29—34, Jesus after summing up the law into the two grand principles of love to God with all the heart, soul, mind and strength, and impartial love to men, informed the scribe who gave his consent to this, that he was not far from the kingdom of God. In Matt. vii. 21, Jesus says, "Not every one that saith unto me Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my father which is in heaven." The above, with numerous other passages of like import, coupled with the oft repeated language of the Savior, showing the necessity of faith in his name, settles the question beyond a cavil, that the only ground of confidence in God and hope of salvation, is in exercising love to God and faith in Christ, which will secure obedience to the divine will in all things.

Having thus seen the ground of the Christian's hope, the mind is led to compare the ground of confidence on which men rest, with that which God gives.—What a picture presents itself. Men of almost all habits and dispositions, are hoping for heaven. Of the vast multitude who live after the flesh, and give unrestrained license to their corrupt, unsanctified nature, there is scarcely one that does not indulge a hope of salvation. And to such an alarming extent has sin depraved the heart, that men have set bounds to the Almighty, and erected new standards of salvation. Of these, are

1. Those who teach, that as Christ has died for all men, so all will be saved, regardless of the course of life they pursue. A more fatal, and yet artful scheme, satan could not devise. It is laid right to meet the carnal heart. Consequently, multitudes embrace it with all eagerness, as a sort of security for salvation and full license to indulge in every sinful desire. Let the language of Jesus Christ, in John v. 28—29, be heard on this question. "Marvel not at this, for the hour is coming, in which all that are in their graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good, to the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil, to the resurrection of damnation." The plan of salvation in the gospel, and this one embraced by men, are as dissimilar as two things can be. Let men take heed how they are found fighting against God. Agreement with him alone secures salvation.

2. Another thing similar to this is the doctrine that teaches a deviation from God's word. A specimen of this is found in the language of Naaman, the Leper, when the prophet Elisha directed him to "Go wash in Jordan seven times," and his flesh should come again to him, and he should be clean. He was wroth, and said, "Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel?" Also in the language of Lot when directed to escape to the mountain, "Oh, not so my Lord! Behold now this city is near to flee unto, and it is a little one: Oh! let me escape thither, (is it not a little one,) and my soul shall live." Similar courses of conduct may be found now among those who profess love to God. And when men can not be bold enough to profess determined opposition to God, they can plead for an extenuation like Lot, and to satisfy themselves, can separate the spirit from the letter of God's word, or offer like Saul, as a substitute for obedience, a sacrifice of things forbidden, or not required, or, like Annanias and Sapphira, offer one half of the price to God. Now let this be remembered that God is pleased with obedience, but is displeased with all disobedience, substitutes, alterations, or deviations from what he has commanded.

"De Ruyter Institute going to stop!"

Don't be frightened, reader, it is not so. It is only the story of some evil-minded persons got up to injure the school. There is no intention on the part of the Trustees and friends of the school to have it stop as long as the stones of which it is made remain one upon another. We simply call attention to this now, because the above and some other stories equally false, have been circulated, much to the detriment of the school, and many who had made arrangements to come here, have been deterred on this account. We ask this, that no one will receive flying stories for fact, and that they will not allow themselves to be prejudiced without hearing both sides of the story. Now we say this, and we are prepared at any time to meet it, that notwithstanding the thousand stories set afloat, that the school has had a good reputation with all who KNOW IT, and well-disposed students have made as good advancement in study, and have been as well satisfied as they could be in any school.—We most cordially invite students to attend this school, and we pledge our reputation that as many as are disposed to learn, and could learn any where, can do it successfully here. We invite parents to send their children here, and assure them that all good attention to their manners, and habits, and mental culture that it is the duty of teachers to give, will not be wanting.

The Church in Preston have made the following response to the proposition for a voluntary support of a Missionary at the West, during the ensuing year. Let as many others as are disposed to favor and aid in the work, make prompt returns. If other Churches come any where near the pattern here set, the desired object will be immediately accomplished. The Church in Preston express it as their opinion that the Missionary should be confined to a smaller field than Br. Scott was, and that the brethren where he should labor, be called on to bear as much of the expense as their circumstances would allow. These suggestions, however, they leave for the direction of the Committee.

At a meeting of the Seventh-Day Baptist Society, in the town of Preston, held at their house, for the purpose of considering the propriety and importance of sustaining one or more Missionaries in the Western States,

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this Society that the S. D. B. Denomination should sustain one or more Missionaries in the Western States the ensuing year.

Resolved, That we will aid in carrying on the purposes of the above resolution.

Resolved, That we approve of the labors of Br. J. L. Scott as a Missionary, and would heartily recommend him to the patronage of the Denomination, and that his labors be secured for the ensuing year.

We have subscribed for the above purpose $18,50, to be paid by the 1st of June next.

VARNUM HULL, Pre's.
J. J. MAXSON, Sec'y.

The Trustees of De Ruyter Institute at a recent meeting, voted to request the Ministers of the S. D. Baptist Denomination to act as Agents of said Institution. With pleasure we present them this resolution, and request them as best they may, to lend their influence for this school. And when we make this request, we are sure that it is not made in vain. The vote was unanimous; and it is the unanimous wish of all who desire the prosperity of this school, that those who have an influence should exert it. To no class could we appeal with more confidence than to those who are now requested to act. And no class understands better the advantages of right culture of the mind than those who minister in holy things.—And none will appreciate more the good that will result to our societies from having all its members well educated than they.—We, therefore, request them, as they wish to see intelligence abound, and our youth enjoy the advantages others enjoy, to lend us their influence to fill up the walls of this edifice with scholars. To you we make our appeal, because from the relation you sustain you come in contact with all individuals, and are more likely to have influence than others. And we feel confident that should you labor as you may in this sphere, that you would be rendering a lasting good both to the Institute, and to those placed under its advantages. May we not look to you for support and encouragement? May we not look to your influence to send scholars here? To our own societies must we look mainly for support. The expense was chiefly borne by them, and the primary object was to benefit them. And shall it be said now that so much expense has been incurred in vain, and that those who at first manifested a laudable zeal, have now no interest in the matter? There are young persons enough in our societies who need the advantages of the school, to yield it an adequate support. Why are they not here? May we not hope that our ministers will do what they are able, to place them here.

We publish below the plan for a Missionary Association proposed at the General Conference, and also the report on the state of religion.

The Committee appointed to prepare a Constitution which shall be the basis of a Domestic Missionary Society, would respectfully report the following:—

CONSTITUTION.

Article 1. This body shall be known by the name of the Seventh-Day Baptist Missionary Association, and its object shall be the dissemination of the Gospel in America.

Article 2. Any person contributing ten dollars annually to the funds of the Association shall be a member. Societies, Churches, or Associations, may become auxiliary by contributing to the funds, and shall be entitled to one representative for every ten dollars. Each subscriber of fifty dollars at one time shall be a member for life.

Article 3. The officers of this Association shall consist of a President, one or more Vice Presidents, a Corresponding Secretary, a Recording Secretary, a Treasurer, and five Directors, who together shall constitute an Executive Board to transact business, and shall be elected annually. Five members of the Board shall constitute a quorum.

Article 4. It shall be the duty of the President to preside at the meetings of the Association. In his absence, one of the Vice Presidents may preside. The Corresponding Secretary shall conduct the correspondence of the Association, and, under the direction of the Board, prepare their Annual Report. The Recording Secretary shall keep a faithful record of the proceedings of the Association, and the Board, and deliver them to his successor in office. The Treasurer shall take charge of the funds, keep a faithful account of all receipts and expenditures, report annually, hold his books open to the examination of the Board, and transmit to his successor in office all funds in his possession. The Executive Board shall appoint all Missionaries, select their fields of labor, fix their salaries, give them instruction, and transact generally such business as may be necessary to secure the designs of the Association.

Article 5. This Association shall hold its meetings annually, at the place of meeting of the General Conference, during the same week, and on such day of the week as shall have been designated at its preceeding meeting.

Article 6. The Board shall hold stated meetings as often as once in three months, and special meetings as occasion may require, at the call of any two of its members through the Recording Secretary.

Article 7. This Constitution may be amended at any regular meeting of the Association by a vote of three fourths of the members present.

The Committee report, that in review of the past year, we have much to rejoice our hearts—much that should call forth devout gratitude to the Author of our mercies—much that should stimulate us to more vigorous action. Our Eastern and Central Associations have been signally blessed with outpourings of God's Holy Spirt to the conversion of sinners, and the reviving of the saints, which has been manifested by our increase of holiness, and in ardent and active desires for the advancement of truth in the earth. A deep interest, which has led on to action, has also prevailed in the Eastern Association relative to the obligation resting on it concerning God's holy Sabbath. The Western Association says—"In looking over our beloved Zion we find, (with few exceptions,) a general coldness and apathy prevail, and that we are admonished to humble ourselves at the foot of the cross, and in faith to call upon the great Head of the Church to revive his work." The South Western Association express an "ardent desire to stand fast in the truth, and to see the work of the Lord prosper. Yet there is not apparent that lively zeal and holy fervor that should characterize the followers of the Lamb; and we have need to humble ourselves before God, hoping he will exalt us in due time." From the communications of our Missionary in the West, it appears that our feeble efforts to extend the cause of our Redeemer have been greatly blessed, which ought not only to call forth thanksgiving and praise to our God, but should incite us to more vigorous efforts in the future to publish salvation to a dying world. The communication of the Traveling Agent of our Missionary Society, shows that a great increase of Christian liberality for the spread of the Gospel is apparent. In conclusion, your Committee would say, that in their opinion the spirit of religion and personal holiness is on the advance, although far below the standard required by the Bible; and they would respectfully recommend, that our benevolent institutions be still prosecuted with vigor and perseverance.

WM. B. MAXSON, Ch'n.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From the Atlas.

ARRIVAL OF THE COLUMBIA.

The steamship Columbia, which left Liverpool on the 20th, arrived at Boston yesterday morning at half past 5 o'clock.

We are indebted to Harnden & Co's Express for a copy of the European, from which we make the following summary of news by this arrival:

GREAT BRITAIN.

The news of the ratification of the late treaty and the passage of the tariff bill was much commented upon. The treaty gives general satisfaction, and by some, immediate and great benefit to British trade was anticipated from the tariff.

Money was tolerably plenty, but much caution exercised in letting it, on account of heavy failures, past and anticipated, in the corn trade.

FRANCE.

It would appear that the secret societies in Paris are still meditating insane projects. On Sunday the 10th, several Sectionnaries went out to St. Maur, a village five miles distant from that capital, to make a trial of a new infernal machine. They placed it under one of the arches of the bridge, and having set fire to it by means of a long match, it produced a tremendous explosion, but its destructive effects did not come up to their expectations. Several of the party were arrested on Monday.

THE EAST.

According to the Gazette du Midi, of the 18th inst. the Russians had experienced another check in Circassia. The insurgents surprised at night and cut to pieces a body of about 10,000 men, encamped under the walls of Marga, and made themselves masters of that fortress, which they entered together with the fugitives. Nearly the whole of the troops in the camp were put to the sword, and a number of officers were made prisoners.

The Syrian question is settled. The Porte has recommended that Lebanon shall be divided into two districts, and that the Maronites shall be governed by a Christian Prince of the Sheab family, and the Druses by one of their own Sheikhs, to be elected by themselves. Both these governors to be placed under the control of the Turkish Pasha of Acre or Damascus. The great European powers are expected to agree to this arrangement.

News of the Day.

The Cattaraugus Co. Freeman says that on Sunday evening, the 18th instant, a terrible thunder storm passed over the village at Lodi. A man and his wife by the name of Babcock, were struck by lightning after they had retired to rest. The latter was killed, but Mr. B. was resusciated by the free application of cold water. The streams in that vicinity, and at the east and west, were unusually swollen. In Sardinia, the Woollen Factory dam, the Grist-mill dam, the Saw-mill dam, and Furnace, were all swept away by the flood early on Tuesday morning. The extent of the damage we have not ascertained.

We learn, also, that the heavy shower of Sunday evening resulted in the destruction of a number of bridges, and considerable other damage in Chautauque county.

Hemp.—Among the agricultural resources of Missouri, that of Hemp is far from being the least important. Mr. John Lay, of St. Louis, has succeeded in rotting it by steam. The process occupies eight hours, and Hemp, when so rotten, is said to be superior to that rotted in the old way.

The Florida Indian.—We learn (says the St. Augustine News) from an authentic source, that young Octiachee, who is understood to have commanded the band of Indians that committed the murders near the Ocilla, noticed in our paper some weeks since, has been at the Cedar Keys on a visit of negociation with the commanding officer, and that he declares himself entirely ready and willing to come into the arrangement for a cessation of hostilities, entered into with Gen. Worth, by his father and the other chiefs; and he is actively engaged in preparing to move his people to the point designated for their temporary occupancy South. He says he cannot go over the Mississippi himself, but that he will cordially favor the removal of his party there.

The reason (which is certainly a very good one, especially as it is true,) that he assigns against his own emigration, is his having killed one of the Arkansas delegation who was sent to talk with him; for he knows that should he place himself within the power of the relatives of the murdered individual, he must inevitably become a sacrifice to their revenge. It is said that Sam Jones and the Prophet are somewhat similarly situated, having each in his turn put to death an individual sent to them by the commanding officer with pacific messages. This fact sufficiently accounts for the stubbornness with which they persist in desiring to remain in Florida, after almost the entire body of their nation has been taken off. We trust the difficulty in these cases may soon be overcome—the plans of their late commander consummated, and the war finally closed.

Wealth of Massachusetts.—The whole property of Massachusetts, says the Boston Times, amounts according to the last valuation, to three hundred millions in round numbers; population in round numbers 700,000, being $429 nearly for every individual, or $2,145 for every family of five persons. The county of Suffolk, in which is the city of Boston, and which contains 95,773 persons, is valued at 110,010,000; while Essex, with a population of 94,987, is valued at only $31,592,082. Hampshire with 30,897 inhabitants is valued at $7,298,351; and Barnstable, with 32,584 inhabitants contains property of the value of $4,896,083. The difference between Suffolk and the other counties is very great.

Singular and Fatal Occurrence.—The Wiskonsan Gleaner, published at Sawville, states that on the 4th inst. a most singular and fatal accident occurred to a Miss Josephine Moorhouse of that village. It appears that she had called upon a young dentist to have a tooth extracted. As soon as he had applied the 'turnkey' to the tooth, he gave it a very sudden and violent twist, which instead of extracting the tooth dislocated her neck. Medical aid was immediately called in, but it was of no avail. The vital spark had fled. Considerable excitement existed in the village against the dentist, who had prudently left the place by the advice of his friends.

Force of Habit.—Girard's old porter still clings to the tenantless walls of that old building. Twenty-nine years has he been a constant attendent there both under the old United States Bank, Mr Girard, and more recently the Girard Bank. Having been retained under all these various institutions, and become a part even of the fixtures there, he still clings to it, and nothing can alienate him from its cold walls. Day and night he may be found at his post, either sweeping the marble steps of that institution, or sitting in a contemplative mood in the little adjoining lodge. Poor man, what revulsions in his trade.—Philadelphia Eve. Cour.

Sudden fall of Stock.—On Tuesday last, says the Concord N. H. Statesman, as a drove of fifty head of cattle were crossing the toll bridge at Hooksett, it broke down, and the whole herd fell among the rocks in the bed of the river. Ten were killed and wounded, and the rest were able to be driven hence to the place of execution.

Important from Texas.—We have been favored (says the N. Y. Tribune) with the following extract from a private letter containing highly important Texas intelligence. We are assured, on the best authority, that the statement is undoubtedly true, as the letter is from an authentic source. It bears date some hours later than our latest New Orleans paper:—

NEW ORLEANS, Monday, Sept. 26.
10 o'clock, A. M.

The Merchant has just arrived from Galveston, and reports great destruction of property in that place from storm—two churches destroyed, great damage to the shipping, several houses blown down, and heavy losses of other property.

Also, San Antonio taken by 1,300 Mexicans under General Wall. The Circuit Court at that place was in session when taken; the judge and officers of the court were made prisoners at the same time.

A. M. N.

Mysterious Disappearance.—Capt. William W. Peters left his residence in this city on Friday afternoon for the Cohoes, intending to return the same evening. A tavern keeper at the Cohoes states that he left his house on Friday evening with the intention as he said, of finding a boat bound to Troy. Since then nothing has been heard from him. His family are apprehensive that he has either been murdered, or else accidentally drowned. He had a considerable sum of money with him when he left home. Any information with regard to him will be thankfully received at his late residence No. 24 Jacob street.

Capt. Peters may be recognized by the following description by his wife, which is [illegible]. He was about 35 years old, 5 feet 5 or 6 inches high, thin, dark brown hair, light blue eyes, a small [illegible] upper lip [illegible] teeth, [illegible] whiskers [illegible] under the chin, and the letters W. P. on the [illegible]. He had on a [illegible] dress coat, [illegible] silk velvet vest, black broadcloth [illegible], new [illegible] boots, black fur hat, [illegible] and a bombazine stock. In his pockets, a silver watch with silver chain, [illegible] and a small pocket rule. He was in a feeble state of health—had, about two weeks previous, been very sick—since that, by spells, seemed to be partially deranged.

☞ Other papers will please copy the above.—Troy Whig.

Melancholy Affray at Louisville.—We yesterday, on the strength of a report by the steamboat passengers stated, that in an affray, Mr. Bliss, one of the Editors of the Louisville Journal, had been mortally wounded by Mr. Pope of the Sun.

The Journal of Wednesday, whilst the Sun of that day is silent on the subject, gives the cause of the quarrel.

—Mr. Henry C. Pope, at a meeting of the Democrats, [illegible], when intoxicated, made a speech in which he reflected severely on [illegible] and Mr. Bliss [illegible] present, wrote [illegible] report of the speech and it was published in the Journal as a communication. Upon this Mr. G. Huey Pope the editor of the Sun, wrote a note requesting the name of the person who had made the report of Mr. H. C. Pope's speech. Mr. Bliss, [illegible] Mr. Prentice the [illegible] provided Mr. G. Pope would make no use of it in the Sun. After Mr. G. Pope had been notified of this, [illegible] Mr. Pope [illegible] Mr. Prentice [illegible] Mr. Bliss's name in his place, and the name was given by Mr. Prentice. Mr. Bliss was thereupon informed that his name had been given up, and warned by Mr. Prentice to be on his guard.

The next evening Mr. G. Pope met Mr. Bliss in front of Washington Hall, when some words passed and the latter was shot down.

The Journal refrains from any statement of what the words were, or whether Mr. Bliss gave any provocation for the rash act of his antagonist, on account of the impropriety of saying any thing to prejudice either party till an examination of witnesses [illegible].

Mr. G. Huey Pope in his first note to Mr. Prentice [illegible] to claim the name, on account of being the next friend of Mr. H. C. Pope, who, he said, was enfeebled by sickness and insanity.

Within a day or two the whole details will doubtless reach us, in an authentic form.

The editors of the Journal and persons who are well acquainted with Mr. Bliss, represent him as a mild, gentle, inoffensive and benevolent man, endowed with talents of a high order. His wound was supposed by the Journal to be mortal.—Cincinnati Republican.

The Treaty.—We hail as a serious and permanent boon to this country and the United States, the termination of Lord Ashburton's mission to America, furnishing, as it has done, a peaceful settlement of a variety of questions—some immediately menacing, and all ministering an ever-ready occasion of mischief at any time when the British and American governments found themselves hostilely disposed.

The questions waiting solution were those respecting the disputed boundary, the slave-trade, the Creole, the Caroline, the arrest of McLeod, and the rights of impressment and visitation at sea—a pretty formidable catalogue. The five first Lord Ashburton has disposed of. The last he has omitted, and perhaps wisely, as unmanageable.

We do not hesitate to say that the present settlement is far better, as indeed almost any thing must have been better, than the late precarious state of things—a state of things, which, while leaving a casus belli unsettled, allowed the United States quietly to concentrate their strength and strike at any moment at which they might find us embarrassed by disturbances or disaffection in Canada. We have had one lesson on this subject, and one lesson is enough. So far at least we cannot be wrong in congratulating ourselves on the issue of Lord Ashburton's mission.—London Times.

A brutal murder was committed on the 19th inst, at a camp meeting four miles from Ballston Spa. The facts are these: A man named McKnight, was caught in the act of picking a gentleman's pocket, named Jones, when he turned, drew a knife, and stabbed Jones in the abdomen. He survived but a few hours. The murderer was arrested, and secured in prison.

"The Welch Calvinistic Methodists" are reported to have 25 churches in this country. The sect is very numerous in the mountains of Wales. Their church formula resembles the Presbyterian Confession of Faith.

The yellow fever at New Orleans appears to be increasing. On the 19th the number of patients admitted to the Charity Hospital during the week ending the 17th, being 66, of whom 24 died. The weather had been favorable.

Nearly all the mills, factories, &c. in and about Pittsburgh are making preparations for a fresh start.

During the past week, there have been frosts in various parts of the Middle States. Indeed, there has not been a month this year, in which there has not been frost in some part of the country or other.

The guns at several of the U. S. forts, which were put in position a few months ago, with reference to a possible occasion to use them, have been ordered to be dismounted.

At Philadelphia on the 28th inst. a fight took place between two fire companies, which caused the inhabitants to close their houses in consequence of the vollies of stones and brickbats which the combatants were flinging at each other. Several persons were severely hurt.

The erection of the Astor Library building in Lafayette Place and Astor Place N. Y., has been commenced. It is to be 45 feet by 60.

Rev. A. Verren.—This gentleman has been recently tried in the city of N. Y., for perjury. Mr. Verren is pastor of the French Protestant Episcopal church in Franklin st. Charges of improper conduct were brought against him two or three years ago by several foreigners, some of whom had been members of his church, and two, we believe, members of the vestry. They were indicted for conspiracy, found guilty and imprisoned. Their terms of imprisonment have expired, and now they charge him with perjury on the former trial. The charge is directed particularly to four letters which on the former trial he denied, on oath, that he had written. The case went to the jury on the 29th ult. who returned, after an absence of three-fourths of an hour, a verdict of Not Guilty. Bishop Onderdonk, in behalf of a large number of clergymen attending the Episcopal Convention, addressed Mr. V. a letter of congratulation for his acquittal, and of confidence in, and sympathy for him.

Married.—In Holden, Aug. 17, by Rev. Wm. Paice, Mr. Beriah W. Hyde, and Miss Harriet S. Partridge, both of Holden.

Beriah set himself a snare,
To catch a Partridge young and fair:—
And caught her as she run to Hyde:
Now may their lives be long and good,
And may they have a little brood,
To be their hope, their joy, and pride.

Diversity of mind.—There are now 800,000,000 of human beings on the earth. There have been more than 1,000,000 times that number in the world and as many more yet to exist; and there never have been, are not now, nor will there ever be any two of that innumerable multitude exactly alike.

Performance of a Locomotive.—William Norris, of Philadelphia, built a locomotive called Simon Snyder. It recently hauled, on an inclined plane, fifty-five cars, loaded with coal, weighing, exclusive of engine and tender, 682 200 lbs., or 305 gross tons, of 2,240 lbs. The engine weighs, with water and fuel, nine tons; cylinder, ten and a half inches in diameter, eighteen inch stroke. This is the heaviest load ever hauled by an engine of equal weight in this country.

The Great Western.—A card from Mr. Irwin, Agent for this favorite steamer, is published in the Journal of Commerce, stating that "the statements which have appeared in English and American newspapers, that the steamship 'Great Western' was about to be withdrawn from the trade between England and New York, which she has hitherto so successfully prosecuted, are incorrect and entirely unauthorized. Her trips will be continued in conformity with her public advertisements, and, it may be fairly expected, with accustomed success and accuracy."

Determination to learn an honest trade.—A singular case came before the Police court yesterday. In the forenoon, an English lad, 18 years of age, who gave his name as James Burns, went into a store in Washington street with a roll of diaper cloth under his arm, and asked the keeper of the store if he knew the cloth. The gentleman replied that he knew it to be his, and asked him how he came by it. He answered that he had taken it from the door about two hours before, and had been walking up and down the street, with the hope of being detected, and sent to the House of Correction, where he understood he would have a chance to learn a trade; and he begged, as a favor, that he might be given up to a constable. The gentleman then sent him with a clerk to constable Clapp's office.

To Mr. Clapp, he made the following statement:

"I am a weaver, and have arrived very lately in this country with my mother, having been out of employ at home. On account of the low wages in England, it took me two years to lay up eight pounds towards paying our passage over. In New York I was advised to go to Lowell, and I have been up there, but could get no work. One objection to taking me into the factory is, that I have, as you may see, the 'king's evil' on both sides of my neck. Now, I have some idea of shoe making, and I am told that I can learn that trade in the house of correction, and I thought by stealing the cloth I could get sent there, and by that means get a trade at which I could work by myself, and support my mother. I have no home, no friends, and no money."

Under these circumstances, and after much consultation, a complaint was entered against him, upon his own statement, as a vagrant, and he was sentenced for six months. One object and hope in disposing of him was, that his disease might be cured in the establishment.—Boston Post.

How Employed.—The number of persons in the United States engaged in mining is 16,950

Agriculture,	3,719,951
Commerce,	117,606
Manufactures and Trades,	791,739
Navigation of the Ocean,	56,021
Do. of Canals, Lakes and Rivers,	32,976
Learned Professions and Engineers,	65,255
Pensioners,	20,798

With regard to agriculture, the States which are most prominent, are New York, which employs 455,954; Pennsylvania, 257,533; Virginia, 318,771; North Carolina, 217,095; South Carolina, 198,363; Georgia, 209,373; Tennessee, 227,739; Kentucky, 197, 738; Ohio, 272,579.

Indians in Florida.—We alluded briefly in our last Sentinel to the result of the scout. Since then we have understood that, in addition to the capture of the squaw and her child, much plunder was taken; and a band of some sixteen Indians was hotly pursued and near being captured. Among the plunder was a considerable quantity of lead.

We have heard, upon very good authority, that some of the Indians routed in the first scout, on going into Cedar Keys were supplied with new rifles, ammunition, &c., by the commanding officer at that post. If so, he deserves the severest censure. We trust this matter will be looked to.—Tallahasse Sentinel.

A Sight.—The Boston Transcript says: "The country on the Missouri above L'Eauaui-court, is nearly bare of timber. The river bottoms are narow, and the ground generally high bluff prairies. This open bare country, is at times, as far as the eye extends, in every direction, blackened with buffalo. It has been estimated that fifteen or twenty thousand may sometimes be seen at a glance."

Pilfering Fruit.—The following is extracted from a paper in the transactions of the New York State Agriculture Society, by David Thomas, Esq. Let us tell the truth to the shame, and hereafter maintain a conscience void of offense.

"Unfortunately for the moral character of our population, fruit is too generally considered lawful plunder. The culturist is allowed to have a full and exclusive right to his corn and potatoes; it would be infamy to steal them; but no exclusive right to his fruit, if they can get it. Thousands of honorable exceptions to this charge indeed may be found, but it is not the less true that a great part of our population is tainted, and deserves to branded with reproach.

"The native fruit of a thinly populated country, growing without culture, and free to all, has doubtless had its share in producing this laxity of morals. 'I had rather have a hundred Irishmen around me than one Yankee,' was the declaration of a sufferer, whose fruit had beeen plundered near the Erie canal, when that grand work was in progress. Europeans are generally more exempiary on this point than Americans—shame on us! When Prof. Stowe was in Prussia, where the roads are lined with fruit trees by order of the Government, he observed a wisp of straw attached to particular trees to protect the fruit—a sufficient guard; but he suggested to the coachman that in America it might only prove an invitation to plunder. 'Have you no schools?' was the significant reply.

"Yes, we have schools but how many where the child is taught respect to his neighbor's property? Too often he acquires literature and vice at the same time. The State of New York is famous for her schools and her prisons—The latter to supply the defects of the former system, which they do, however, very imperfectly. Better let the mandate go forth that the morality of the Bible shall be one of the chief objects of instruction. TEACH HER CHILDREN TO BE HONEST."

We are surprised to learn, as we do by the Jersey City Advertiser, that there is in that orderly place "a well known rendezvous of prize fighters, where, for a length of time past, New York ruffianism has resorted for practice and training, and where Lilly is said to have been trained; and Hoboken is distinguished as the training ground of McCoy." Both these places are within the jurisdiction of the Hudson County Courts now in session, and Grand Jury can scarcely fail, under the charge of the Chief Justice, to investigate the case.—Newark Daily Adv.

Romanism approaching the Church of England.—An article from a Romish priest, published in the Dublin University Magazine, recommends the abolition of celibacy as one of the most direct means of assimilating the Church of Rome and that of England. He deprecates the sinful results of celibacy in the Clergy, and attributes to these the indignation which the Almighty has often poured out on nations professing the Catholic faith. There can be no doubt that he has attacked one of the greatest abominations invented by Rome.

Liberated Africans.—When slaves are captured by the English cruisers, instead of being restored to their own country, families and friends, they are shipped off to the British colonies, there to be employed as laborers. Upwards of 3,000 have recently been shipped from the rendezvous at St. Helena, not one of them to the countries from which they came, but to Demerara, Berbice, Jamaica, Trinidad, and the Cape of Good Hope. There may be difficulties which do not occur to us, in the way of restoring these unfortunate beings to their homes and friends, if not, it would seem but a stunted philanthropy which rescues them from being carried into Cuba, and then sends them to Berbice or Demerara. Cuba is by far the most healthy and inviting country to live in, and whether it would not be better to be a slave in that island, rather than half a slave in some British charnel-house, is a question concerning which there might be different opinions. We have no wish to detract from the credit due to England for her persevering efforts to suppress the slave-trade. She is far in advance of all other nations in this work of humanity, and we only desire that she should make it such in fact, and not a scheme for benefiting her colonies.—Jour. Com.

Opium.—Opium, as much used as a medicine to allay pain and occasion sleep, is the juice obtained from the urpine seed vessels of species of white poppy. In many parts of Asia Minor whole fields are sown with its seeds as ours is with corn. When the heads are nearly ripe, they are wounded on one side with a sharp instrument, and a white liquor flows out, which the heat of the sun hardens upon them; this is opium. It is collected the next day, when fresh wouds are made on the opposite side of the seed-vessel; but what comes from the first incision is decidedly the best. When the opium is collected, it is moistened with a small quantity of water or honey, and worked on a board until it has the consistency of pitch, when it is formed into cakes or rolls for sale.

Notices.

NOTICE.

At the next meeting of the De Ruyter Lyceum, which will occur on Monday evening, 17th inst., the following question will be discussed.

"Ought a Slave-holder to be eligible to the office of President of the United States?"

Disputants. Aff.—Ira Gage Barnes. Neg.—A. V. Bentley.

JEREMIAH GAGE, Pres't.
E. P. BLY, Sec'y.

PROPOSALS

For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead,) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

DIED,

In Alfred, Sept. 15th, of Bowel Complaint, CAROLINE ELIZABETH, only child of Leonard S. Woolworth, aged 1 year 2 months and 16 days.

LIST OF LETTERS.

J. Goodrich. H. Frances.

LIST OF RECEIPTS

Of Elias Frink, $2, cr. Geo. Frink, vol 3, of Dea. C. Rogers, $1, cr. Miss P. Beardsley, of J. Goodrich, $2, cr. James Weed, of H. Frances, $2, cr. Miss D Kingman.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CASH paid for Sheep and Lamb's Pelts with the Wool on. HART, ACKLEY & CO.
October 4, 1842.

LIST OF LETTERS

REMAINING in the Post Office at De Ruyter Sept. 30, 1842.

Avery, Lafayette	Gardner, Dwight
Allis, Israel	Gates, Mrs.
Byram, Joann K. 2	Gage, Eli A.
Burdick, Sophrona	Gage, Jeremiah
Burdick, Thomas	Gifford, Edwin
Burdick, Annis	Hitchcock, Augustus
Brush, Mariah L.	Hoag, Caleb Senior
Brown, Samuel L.	Kinyon, Jonathan
Breed, Benjamin	Larabee, Amasa
Boyce, Wm. C.	Marvott, James
Barbour, Alpheus	Neil, Simeon Jr.
Chase, Caroline M. 2	Peterson Mary Ann
Colegrove, Eli S.	Severance, Mary
Cartwright, Hannah Jr.

M. SPEAR, P. M.

FLOUR, PROVISIONS, GROCERIES, and six hundred other things, for sale by 11tf
May 11. HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

SILK! SILK!! SILK!!!
A BEAUTIFUL assortment of plain, figured and striped, just received and for sale very cheap at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

A Christian Father's present to his Family.

HOLIDAY GIFT FOR THE YEAR 1843.

A BOOK FOR EVERY FAMILY IN THE UNITED STATES.

AGENTS WANTED.

ONE Hundred Dollars given for every one hundred copies sold!—Agents—responsible men—wanted in every town and village throughout the United States and British Provinces, to sell 'Sears' Bible Biography,' the most splendidly illustrated and Cheapest work ever issued on the American Continent, containing several hundred Engravings, entirely new and original, designed and executed by the most eminent artists of England and America. Cost of preparing the work, $5000. This beautiful and important work contains upwards of 500 pages royal octavo, is printed from new stereotype plates, handsomely bound in gilt, and lettered, and retails readily at the low price of $2 50 per volume. The following extract is from a lengthy Review, written by the Rev. W. C Brownlee, D. D., and is only one out of several hundred recommendations, from the clergy and the press, that the work has already received.

New-York, August 6, 1842.

"This is, beyond question, one of the most elegant books ever presented to our fellow citizens in this Republic. It ought to be in every Christian family for its innate value; and in every patriotic family as a splendid specimen of our progress in domestic manufactures, and the advancement of our artists and manufacturers in their rivalship with those of Europe. W. C. BROWNLEE."

A very liberal offer!—One Hundred Dollars will be given by the Publisher to every Agent who will undertake and sell One Hundred Copies of the above Work. He believes that there is scarcely a town or village in the Union, but that numbers may easily be disposed of.

⁂ Persons inclosing money, will be careful to pay the whole postage; and in ordering books will state, explicitly, how the books shall be sent to them

Also, in press, another important, valuable, and cheap work, in the course of publication, and will be ready for delivery early in October, 1842, complete in one volume royal octavo, containing about 600 pages of letter-press, and more than five hundred Engravings, elegantly bound in gilt; price only $2 50 per copy.

The Wonders of the World,

In Nature, Art, and Mind.

Comprising a complete Library of Useful and Entertaining Knowledge, and illustrated by more than FIVE HUNDRED ENGRAVINGS.

Consisting of Views of Cities, Edifices, and other great works of Architecture, Monuments, Mechanical Inventions, Ruins, Illustration of the Manners and Costumes of different Nations, Religious Rites and Ceremonies, Cataracts, Volcanoes, Curiosities, Trees Beasts, Birds, Fishes, Reptiles, and the numerous objects contained in the Fossil, Vegetable, Mineral, and Animal Kingdoms. Carefully compiled by ROBERT SEARS, from the best and latest sources.

For further particulars, please to address the subscriber, post paid, without which no letter will be taken from the office. ROBERT SEARS,
Publisher, 122 Nassau street, N. Y.

The above will be found the most useful and popular work ever published, for enterprising men to undertake the sale of, in all our cities and towns.

All Clergymen, Superintendants and Teachers of Sabbath schools, Agents of Newspapers and Periodicals, and Postmasters, are respectfully requested to act as Agents.

To Publishers of Religious Newspapers throughout the United States.

Religious papers copying the above, entire, without any alteration or abridgment, (including this notice,) and giving it Six Months' insertion in their papers, shall receive a copy of each of the above works (subject to their order,) together with the well known and popular work, (in 3 vols) entitled "Pictorial Illustrations of the Bible and views in the Holy Land," forming an illustrated Commentary of the Old and New Testament, each volume containing 200 Scriptural Engravings, and 400 pages of interesting letter press descriptions, 8vo., substantially bound. Compiled from the Notes of the London Pictorial Bible, which sells in this country for $20 per copy.—September 24, 1842. 33m6

DE RUYTER INSTITUTE.

M. L. WOOD, A. B., Principal.
Instructor in Languages, and Lecturer on Chemistry.
G. M. LANGWORTHY,
Instructor in Mathematics, and Lecturer on Natural Philosophy and Astronomy.

Ladies' Department.

Miss MARY A. SEVERANCE, Preceptress.
Instructress in French, Drawing, and Painting, &c
Miss ELIZABETH B. GOODRICH,
Instructress in the Primary Department.

THE Natural, Intellectual and Moral Sciences, are taught by the different Instructors, as best suits the circumstances accompanying the formation of classes, except those mentioned above, which are always taught by the same Teacher.

This Institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter, thirteen miles south of Cazenovia, twenty-four miles west of Hamilton, and about eighteen east of Homer. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, stoves, and rented to gentlemen and ladies at one shilling a week each; each room being large enough for the accommodation of two students.

The ladies occupy the rooms on the south and the gentlemen those in the north of the building.

The Institution is furnished with a good philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a good education, as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

The year is divided into three terms of fourteen weeks each the first term commenced on the 16th of Sept., followed by a vacation of one week, the second term will commence on the 30th of Dec. followed by a vacation of three weeks, the third term will commence on the last Friday in April 1843, followed also, by a vacation of four weeks.

TUITION.

In the common English branches,	$3,50
In the Languages and higher English branches,	5,00
In Drawing,	2,00
In Painting,	2,00
Extras,	,50

Tuition in advance.

N. B. Those desiring to qualify themselves for teaching, will be furnished with every facility for doing so, and when duly qualified will receive a certificate of recommendation.

New Arrangement.

GEORGE W. SUTTON, having this day purchased the interest of W. H. QUINBY, in the Dry Goods and Shoe business, will continue the Trade and the Manufacture of Boots and Shoes as usual at the NEW YORK CASH STORE, where he would solicit the continuance of the liberal patronage heretofore received.
Sept. 14, 1842.

Election Notice.

SHERIFF'S OFFICE, Madison Couty, ss.

I, ISAAC BROWN, Sheriff of said county, do hereby give notice that an election is to be held on Tuesday succeeding the first Monday of November next, for the election of the several officers mentioned in a notice received by me from the Secretary of State, a copy of which is hereunto annexed.

Morrisville, Sept. 7, 1842
ISAAC BROWN, Sheriff.
By W. B. BRAND, Under Sheriff.

STATE OF NEW-YORK, Secretary's Office, Albany, August 31, 1842.

To the Sheriff of the county of Madison:

Sir: Notice is hereby given, that at the next general election, to be held on the Tuesday succeeding the first Monday of November next, the following officers are to be elected, to wit:

A Governor and Lieutenant Governor of this State;

A Senator for the Fifth Senatorial District, to supply a vacancy which will occur by the expiration of the term of service of Joseph Clark, on the last day of December next;

Also, the following county officers, to wit: three Members of Assembly, and one Coroner in the place of Allen Davis, who has removed from the county, and whose term of service would have expired on the last day of December, 1843.

Yours respectfully,
S. YOUNG, Secretary of State

STATE OF NEW-YORK, Secretary's Office, Albany, Sept. 7, 1842.

To the Sheriff of the county of Madison:

Sir. Notice is hereby given, that at the next general election, to be held on the Tuesday succeeding the first Monday of November next, a Representative in the twenty-eighth Congress of the United States is to be elected for the twenty-third Congressional District, consisting of the counties of Madison and Oswego.

Yours respectfully,
S. YOUNG, Secretary of State.

I certify that the above is a true copy of the notice received by me from the Secretary of State.
Morrisville, September 9, 1842.
ISAAC BROWN, Sheriff.
By W. B. BRAND, Under Sheriff. 30w7

Christian Review.

A GOOD PROPOSITION.

THE importance of the Christian Review is admitted. It was commenced nearly seven years since in obedience to an urgent and almost spontaneous call from different parts of the land, and in compliance with that call, has been sustained through six successive volumes only by special effort, and considerable sacrifice (previous to the present volume) on the part of a few individuals. The number of subscribers, however, has gradually increased, so as to inspire the hope that ultimately, the list would become such as to place it above "want," and on a basis that should insure its perpetuity; and with proper exertions on the part of its friends, it is believed such a result might easily be accomplished.

The work is put at the low price of three dollars per annum, in order to bring it within the means of as large a number as possible. Yet, many who are able, and who would be benefitted by its perusal, are not now subscribers, and need, it is thought, only to be reminded of the facts to become so

The work occupies a high position among the religious quarterlies of the country, and in the estimation of intelligent men of all Christian denominations, is contributing a good share of the religious periodical literature of the age. To the Baptist denomination, in particular, it is an auxiliary in defence and illustration of the truth, with which it is believed, we cannot afford to dispense. And, since the committee and the publishers have resolved, never again to make an appeal for pecuniary aid, but to discontinue its publication whenever the subscriptions cease to be sufficient to sustain it, it becomes every well-wisher of the Review to exert himself now in its behalf.

☞ The publishers having a number of the past volumes on hand, propose, in order to interest some who may be desirous of possessing it, yet feel unable to subscribe, to exert their influence to obtain new subscribers, and by so doing not only secure it for themselves, but, by increasing its circulation, extend its usefulness, and help also in insuring its perpetuity—to offer a PREMIUM for new subscribers, as follows.

☞ Any person obtaining TWENTY NEW SUBSCRIBERS and remitting the publishers sixty dollars, shall be entitled to a complete set of the Review in seven volumes, the subscription price of which is, TWENTY ONE DOLLARS!

⁂ For FIFTEEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS the last five volumes will be given—subscription price FIFTEEN DOLLARS!

⁂ For TEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS, the last two volumes, subscription price, SIX DOLLARS!

For FIVE NEW SUBSCRIBERS, either of the last three volumes, subscription price, THREE DOLLARS!

It is hoped that this very liberal premium, may induce many of the friends of the Review to make a renewed effort in its behalf, and thus not only [illegible] benefit themselves, but aid the great object the Review is intended to sustain SUBSCRIBERS are reminded of the terms of subscription, "three dollars per annum [illegible] Have you paid your subscr[illegible] much needed.

GOULD KENDALL & L[illegible]
59 W[illegible]

N. B. The publishers [illegible] shall give the above advert[illegible] their columns (and send a c[illegible] be entitled to a selection of [illegible] volumes.

Boston, August 10th.

What is [illegible]

RANDOLPH & DUN[illegible] informing their cu[illegible] erally, that they contin[illegible] "Mechanic's Hall," in [illegible] ter Office," in all its varie[illegible] will be happy to wait on [illegible] notice. Thankful for the [illegible] stowed on this establishment, [illegible] all work entrusted to them s[illegible] style not surpassed by any of the [illegible] "village or county;" and at prices [illegible] their customers, and tend to that "Economy" [illegible] has been advertised to be the "road to wealth."—Cutting done at sight, and warranted to fit if properly made up. Finally, all work done at this Establishment will be warranted to fit or no sale.

S. F. RANDOLPH,
J. V. DUNHAM.

De Ruyter, August 3, 1842. 23tf

Economy is the road to Wealth.

JAMES M. LETTS, would inform his friends and customers, and the public generally that he has removed his Tailoring Establishment, to the building occupied by Eli A. Gage as a Hat Store, where he will be ready at all times to attend to cutting and making all manner of clothing as cheap as can be done in the village or county. Military work done in the latest and most approved fashion. Ladies Habits, and Coat Dresses Cut to order, at short notice. All work done at this establishment, shall be warranted to fit.

De Ruyter, July 1st 1842.

L. W BLISS' Window Sash.
L. Bliss' & Co. " Blinds.
Holme's Sampson & Sailsbury Edged Tools consisting of Broad Axes, Hand Axes, Adzes an, Chisels, at Factory prices by J. N. ELMORE,
October 4. Manufacturers' Agent

☞ IMPORTANT WORK!

NOW IN THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION,

A DICTIONARY OF

Arts, Manufactures, and Mines,

Containing a clear exposition of their PRINCIPLES AND PRACTISE.

BY ANDREW URE, M. D. F. R. S., M. G. S.,
M. A. S., Lond., Mem. Acad. N. S.
Philad., S. Pa. Soc. N. Germ.
Hanov., Mulii, &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings

THIS is unquestionably the most popular work of the kind ever published, and a book most admirably adapted to the wants of all classes of the community. The following are the important objects which the learned author endeavors to accomplish:—

1st. To instruct the Manufacturer, Metallurgist, and Tradesman, in the principles of their respective processes, as to render them, in reality, the masters of their business; and, to emancipate them from a state of bondage to such as are too commonly governed by blind prejudice and a vicious routine.

2dly. To afford Merchants, Brokers, Drysalters, Druggists, and Officers of the Revenue, characteristic descriptions of the commodities which pass through their hands.

3dly. By exhibiting some of the finest developements of Chemistry and Physics, to lay open an excellent practical school to Students of these kindred sciences.

4thly. To teach Capitalists, who may be desirous of placing their funds in some productive branch of industry, to select, judiciously, among plausible claimants.

5thly. To enable gentlemen of the Law to become well acquainted with the nature of those patent schemes which are so apt to give rise to litigation.

6thly. To present to Legislators such a clear exposition of the staple manufactures as may dissuade them from enacting laws, which obstruct industry, or cherish one branch of it, to the injury of many others.

And, lastly, to give the general reader, intent, chiefly, on Intellectual Culture, views of many of the noblest achievements of Science, in effecting those grand transformations of matter to which Great Britain and the United States owe their paramount wealth, rank, and power, among the nations of the earth.

The latest Statistics of every important object of Manufacture are given from the best, and usually, from official authority, at the end of each article.

The work will be printed from the 2d London Edition, which sells for $12 a copy. It will be put on good paper, in new brevier type, and will make about 1400 8vo. pages. It will be issued in twenty-one semi-monthly numbers, (in covers,) at 25 cents each, payable on delivery.

☞ To any person, sending us five dollars, at one time, in advance, we will forward the numbers, by mail, post paid, as soon as they come from the press.

To suitable Agents, this affords a rare opportunity as we can put the work to them on terms extraordinarily favorable. In every manufacturing town, and every village, throughout the United States and Canada, subscribers may be obtained with the greatest facility. Address, post paid, La Roy Sunderland, 126 Fulton street, New-York.

⁂ To every editor who gives this advertisement entire 12 insertions, we will forward, to order, one copy of the whole work, provided the papers containing this notice be sent to the New-York Watchman, New-York. 51:12

STOVES.

COLD WINTER IS COMING

JOHN N. ANNAS,

LATE of the firm of "Elmore Annas & Ayer," has moved into the new building adjoining the Stone Store of John N. Elmore (La Fayette Block) where he is receiving the largest and best assortment of STOVES ever before offered in this market, comprising every desirable pattern of Cooking, Hall, Box, Plate, and

Fancy Parlor Stoves,

Which he offers, Wholesale & Retail, on as favorable terms as can be purchased in this TOWN COUNTY or STATE. Most kinds of Produce old Cast-Iron, and CASH, even, will not be refused in payment for any article in his line o business.

The subscriber manufactures all kinds of Stove Furniture, Pipe, Sheet Iron, Copper,

BRASS AND TIN WARE

Of every description, which he keeps constantly on hand, and offers at as

LOW PRICES

Either at wholesale or retail, as any other manufacturer in the State. All wares warranted, made of GOOD materials, and not LEAKY.

Eave Troughs

Made and put up to order. Also,

JUST RECEIVED

And for sale a full assortment of Westmoreland Climax Stoves and Cauldron Kettles.

JOB WORK

[illegible] on short notice, and for reasonabl [illegible] N. B. Purchasers wishing to buy wil [illegible] Centre Store, La Fayette Block Street.

[illegible] 15, 1841. 34tf

REMOVAL.

[illegible]TTS, has removed his tailoring [illegible] Eli A. Gage's hat store, 2 doors [illegible] Hotel. April 6th 1842.

[illegible] wanted at the STONE STORE.

[illegible]es and money scarce,"

[illegible] complaint, and economy is the ob[illegible] [illegible]TTON has just opened a large [illegible] Dry Goods, Groceries, Crockery, [illegible] Dye-Stuffs. Persons wishing to [illegible] are invited to call, as we feel con[illegible] Low Prices and Good Goods must [illegible] satisfaction.

[illegible] 14. GEORGE W. SUTTON.

BOOKS & STATIONERY.

SCHOOL BOOKS, of all descriptions, Miscellaneous Books & Stationery, at the Book Store of HART, ACKLEY, & CO.
De Ruyter, May 11, 1842. 11v3tf

50 PIECES BROAD CLOTHS, CASSIMERES, SATINETTES, at reduced prices at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

THE FARMER'S EXCHANGE is the place to buy Goods CHEAP. Oct. 20, 1841.
S. G. WALKER.

Notice.

ALL persons who are indebted to the subscriber, either in accounts or note, are requested to call and settle immediately and save cost.
De Ruyter, June 20, 1842.
JAMES M. LETTS.

BOOK BINDING.

THE subscriber having connected a BINDERY with his printing establishment, is now ready to execute all kinds of Binding in a neat and durable manner, on as reasonable terms as at any other establishment in this section of country.
JAMES BAILEY.
De Ruyter, June 8th 1841.

POETRY.

Life's Changes.

BY WILLIAM J. BACON.

Bright rose the morning star of life
  On youth's unclouded day,
Ere pride or passion's baneful strife
  Had led the the heart astray.

And bright the glowing sun which shed.
  In manhood's golden prime,
Its genial blessings round the head,
  To light "the march of time."

But ah! that sun is overcast;
  Dark clouds those skies deform;
Behind me shrieks the whirlwind's blast,
  Before howls winter's storm.

The evening star of hope once bright,
  Hath set in deepest gloom;
Ah! what remaineth now to light
  The pathway to the tomb!

God of that life, thy light impart
  To cheer this downward way;
And on the dark an cheerless heart,
  Pour out celestial day.

And when at length this weary life.
  Its fitful dream shall cease,
In memory close the the parting strife,
  And at the last end be peace.

[A Sick Room's Recreations.

Miscellaneous Department.

VENICE.

The canals of Venice are very clean for canals, but still they are canals, smelling now and then of bilge water. There is a rise and fall of tide here of about three feet, but no current. It is singular that hero, at the head of the Adriatic, there should be a visible ebb and flood, and none on the shores of the Mediterranean itself. A long island or bar of sand, called the Lido, runs across the head of this narrow sea, about three miles below Venice, leaving a passage between each end of it and the main land. The sea runs in by these passages or mouths, forming a lagoon behind this island of considerable extent, but very shallow, not above eighteen feet in the deepest of the navigable channels; so that the difference between ebb and flood, not perceptible on the shores of the wide and deep Mediterranean (which, in general is very deep all round, and close to the Italian shores) is shown here by lying dry and covering the mud banks in this shallow lagoon. Venice is built upon the little islets in this little sea, covering them so entirely with her buildings that she may be truly described as a city springing from the waters. No natural land is to be seen; all is water or wall. It is possible that some individuals here may be strangers to the ordinary appearances of animal and vegetable life in the country—may never have seen growing corn, nor heard the lark singing, and know not what the country means. Whoever regrets the decay of Venice—the extinction of her independence as a state —regrets the advance of society from barbarism to civilization. The republic of Venice was a huge compound of all the evil principles of a social condition collected together under an oligarchy. Despotism, intolerance, mutual distrust among those wielding the power, disregard of the people, cruelty, secrecy, terrorism, all the extreme evils of bad government, were united here. It has passed away, and even the relicts of its former greatness are rapidly decaying—the palaces, quays, bridges. In some future age the traveler may be inquiring, where stood Venice?—The port of this queen of the seas has at present in it two foreign brigs, a government guard-ship, and some small craft.—The appearance of Venice is probably more novel and impressive now than in her best days. When her port was crowded with vessels, her canals with lighters coeveying goods, her quays with merchandize, she may have been very like some parts of Amsterdam, or other great commercial cities penetrated by canals. In her present state she is unique, because it is not the movement of a sea-port or commercial town upon her waters, but the ordinary communications of her own inhabitants with each other. Shipping and trade are not seen in it. The coasting trade of Venice, however, in small craft is not inconsiderable. The very supply of 115,000 people, a strong garrison, a naval depot, and a host of public functionaries employed in the civil government of the district, with every article, even to the fresh water they use, must employ many market boats and small craft. Foreign trade at all times has only been forced into this channel; and its present course, by which consumers in this part of Europe receive their supplies 'thro' Trieste a port nearer to them and to the producers, with more convenience and saving of time for the shipping, is undoubtedly more natural and advantageous. We see with regret the decay of ancient power and magnificence; but where these were founded on monopoly and oppression, and when we see the supply of the necessaries and comforts of life better, cheaper, and more widely diffused through society by the downfall of this grandeur and power, we may dry our eyes and be consoled The extinction of Venice, and the transfer of her territory to Austria, however iniquitous in principle and execution, has been of advantage to the inhabitants of the old Venetian states. A government strong like the Austrian can afford to be impartial; favors no one class in systematic, uncontrolled oppression; and where one ruling class had uncontrolled power, as the nobility had in the Venetian state, raises in reality the condition of the other class, subjecting all to equal and known law, and giving security and protection to every man against petty authority. Abuses from power lodged in the hands of incompetent, arrogant, or stupid, but still responsible functionaries, are more tolerable and curable than those of a powerful irresponsible class of nobility without a king.—Laing's Notes.

JERUSALEM.

Vast as is the period, and singular as are the changes of Europe history since the christian era, Judea still continues to be the most interesting portion of the world. Among other purposes, it may be for the purpose of fixing the general eye upon this extraordinary land, that it has been periodically visited by a more striking succession of great public calamities than perhaps any other region. With less to attract an invader than any other conspicuous land of the East, it has been constantly exposed to invasion. Its ruin by the Romans in the first century did not prevent its being assailed by almost every barbarian, who, in turn, assumed the precarious sovereignty of the neighboring Asia. After ages of obscure misery, a new terror came in the Saracen invasion, which under Amrou, on the conquest of Damascus, rolled on Palestine. A siege of four months, which we may well conceive to have abounded in horrors, gave Jerusalem into the hands of the Kaliph Omar. On the death of Omar, who died by the usual fate of Eastern princes--the dagger—the country was left to the still heavier misgovernment of the moslem viceroys—a race of men essentially barbarian, and commutating for their crimes by their zeal in Proselyteism. The people, of course, were doubly tormented.

A new scourge fell upon them in the invasion of the Crusaders, at the beginning of the twelfth century, followed by a long succession of bitter hostilities and public weakness. After almost a century of this wretchedness, another invasion from the Desert put Jerusalem into the hands of its old oppressor, the Saracen, and in 1187, the famous Saladin, expelling the last of the Christian sovereigns, took possession of Palestine. After another century of tumult and severe suffering, occasioned by the disputes of the Saracen princes, it was visited by a still more formidable evil in the shape of the Turks, then wholly uncivilized—a nation in all the rudeness and violence of mountaineer life, and spreading blood and fire through western Asia. From this date (1317) it remained under the dominion of the Ottoman, until its conquest, a few years ago, by that most extraordinary of all Mussulmans, the Pacha of Egypt—a dreary period of 500 years, under the most desolating goverment of the world.—It is equally impossible to read the scriptural references to the future condition of Palestine, without discovering a crowd of the plainest and most powerful indications that it shall yet exhibit a totally different aspect from that of its present state. Enthusiasm, or even the natural interest which we feel in this memorable nation, may color the feature to us to brightly; but unless language of the most solemn kind, uttered on the most solemn occasions, and by men divinely commissioned for its utterance, is wholly unmeaning, we must yet look to some powerful, unquestionable, and splendid display of Providence in favor of the people of Israel.

The remarkable determination of Europe politics towards Asia Minor, Syria, and Egypt, within these few years; the not less unexpected change of manners and customs, which seemed to defy all change; and the new life infused into the stagnant goverments of Asia, even by their being flung into the whirl of European interests, look not unlike signs of the times. It may be no dream, to imagine in these phenomena the proofs of some memorable change in the interior of things—some preparatives for that great providential restoration, of which Jerusalem will yet be the scene, if not the centre; and the Israelite himself, the especial agent of those high transactions, which shall make Christianity the religion of all lands, restore the dismantled beauty of all earth, and make man—what he was created to be—only "a little lower than the angels."

The statistics of the Jewish population are among the most singular circumstances of this most singular of all people.—Under all their calamities and dispersions, they seemed to have remained at nearly the same amount as in the days of David and solomon, never much more in prosperity, never much less after ages of suffering. Nothing like this has occurred in the history of any other race; Europe in general having doubled in its population during the last hundted years, and England nearly trippled hers within the last half century; the proportion of America being still more rapid, and the world crowding in a constantly increasing ratio. Yet the Jews seem to stand still in this vast and general movement? The population of Judea in its most palmy days, probably did not exceed, if it reached, four millions.—The numbers who entered Palestine from the wilderness were evidently not much more than three; and the census, according to the German statistics, who were generally considered to be exact, is now nearly the same as that of the people under Moses—about three millions. They are thus distributed:

In Europe, 1,916,000, of which about 658,000 are in Poland and Russia, and 453,000 are in Austria.

In Asia, 738,000, of which 300,000 are in Asiatic Turkey.

In Africa, 504,000, of which 300,000 are in Morocco.

In America, North and south, 57,000.

If we add to these about 15,000 Samaritans, the calculation in round numbers will be about 3,180,000.

This was the the report in 1825—the number probably remain the same. This extraordinary fixedness in the midst of almost universal increase, is doubtless not without a reason—if we are even to look for it among the mysterious operations which have preserved Israel a separate race through eighteen hundred years. May we not naturally conceive, that a people thus preserved without advance or retrocession; dispersed, yet combined; broken, yet firm; without a country, yet dwellers in all; every where insulted, yet every where influential; without a nation, yet united as no nation ever was before or since—has not been appointed to offer this extraordinary contradiction to the common laws of society, and even the common progress of nature, without a cause, and that cause one of final benevolence, universal good, and divine grandeur?

Children's Department.

BE KIND TO YOUR PARENTS.

In the Revolutions of this world, and by the vicissitudes of human affairs, many children have left their parents behind them in the humble vale of poverty; and some have lost their filial piety in the ascent. Few more shocking scenes can be presented to a feeling mind, than a rich son or daughter, ashamed of, or unkind to, his poor father or mother. Such wretches deserve the fate of the proud monarch of Babylon, and would have no more than their desert if they were driven from the company of men to herd with beasts, to which they are more allied in disposition than to human being. How beautiful a scene, the very opposite of that which I have just considered, was exhibited in the palace of Pharaoh, when Joseph, then the prime minister of the state, led in a poor old shepherd to the presence of the king, and, before all the lords of the Egyptian court, introduced the decrepit and careworn pilgrim as his father! Who, after looking at this, will ever be ashamed of a parent because he is clad in the garb of poverty? What a halo of glory did that one act draw around the honored brow of Joseph! The lustre of the golden chain that hung from his neck was dim compared with the brightness of this action, and the chariot in which he rode, with almost imperial pomp, before the people, raised him not to so high an eminence as that which he occupied, when he stood before the monarch with the patriarch of Canaan leaning upon his arm. Never be ashamed of your parents, then, because of poverty.

Let your kindness operate in the way of affording them all things necessary for their comfort. The author of the Æneid has denominated his hero "the pious Æneas," because of the heroic manner in which he bore his decrepit father from the flames of Troy. Two inhabitants of Sicily obtained a celebrity in an ancient story, for their kindness to their aged parents in carrying them upon their shoulders from an eruption of Mount Ætna.

We have another instance, of modern times. Mr. Robert Tillotson went up to London on a visit to his son, then dean of Canterbury, and, being in the dress of a plain countryman, was insulted by one of the deans servants for inquiring if John Tillotson was at home. His person, however, being described to the dean, he immediately exclaimed, "It is my worthy father;" and, running down to the door to receive him, he fell down upon his knees, in the presence of his servants to ask his father's blesssing.

And how has the poet, and the historian, and the painter, loved to exhibit that beautiful picture of filial piety, first given by Plinny, of a daughter, who, when her mother was condemned to be starved to death, obtained leave from the keeper to visit the prison daily, and there nourish her parent from her own breast! A similar occurrence took place afterwards, in which a daughter nourished her father in the same manner; the action was considered so striking, that it obtained the honorable appellation of "The Roman Charity." The senate decreed that the father should be restored to his child, and that, on the spot where the prison stood, a temple should be erected to Filial Piety.

There are however, few instances of more touching kindness to parents, than that mentioned by Bruce in his Juvenile Anecdotes.

"An officer, having remained some time at Kingston, in Surrey, for the purpose of raising recruits, received orders to join his regiment. On the evening before his departure, a young man of the most engaging aspect made his appearance, and desired to be enlisted into his company. His air at once indicated a well-cultivated mind, and commanded respect.

"He betrayed, however, evident marks of perturbation, and was greatly embarrassed. The officer asked the cause of it. 'I tremble,' said he, 'lest you should deny my request.' While he was speaking, the tears rolled down his cheeks. 'No,' said the officer, 'I accept your offer most heartily; why should you imagine a refusal?' 'Because the bounty which I expect may perhaps be too high.' 'How much, then, do you demand?' said the officer. 'It is no unworthy motive, but an urgent claim that compels me to ask ten guineas; and I shall be most miserable of mankind if you refuse me.' 'Ten guineas!' said the officer; 'that, indeed, is very high, but I am pleased with you; I trust to your honor for the discharge of your duty, and will strike the bargain at once. Here are ten guineas; to-morrow we depart.'

"The young man overwhelmed with joy, begged permission to return home to perform a sacred duty, and promised to be back in an hour. The officer, impressed by the honesty of his countenance, yielded to his desire; but, observing something mysterious in his manner, he was induced by curiosity to follow him at some distance. He saw him hastening towards the town prison, where he knocked and was admitted. The officer quickened his pace; and when he came to the door of the prison, he overheard the young man say to the jailer, 'Here is the money for which my father is imprisoned; I put it into your hands, and I request you will conduct me to him immediately, that I may release him from his misery.' The jailor did as he was requested.

"The officer delayed a few minutes, that the young man might have an opportunity of being alone with his father; he then followed him. What a scene! He saw the son in the arms of a venerable and aged father, who, without uttering a word, pressed him to his heart, and bedewed him with tears. A few minutes passed before he observed the officer, who, deeply affected, approached them, and said to the old man, 'Compose yourself; I will not deprive you of so worthy a son. Permit me to restore him to you, that I may not regret the money which he has employed in so virtuous a manner.'

"The father and son fell upon their knees at his feet. The young man refused, at first, to accept of his proffered freedom; but the worthy officer insisted that he should remain with his father. He accompanied them both from the prison, and took his leave with the pleasing reflection of having contributed to the happiness of a worthy son and unfortunate father."

What mind is not enamored, what heart is not affected, by such touching instances of filial kindness? And what child is not ready to exclaim, "O my father, my mother, I will share with you my last crust, and feel at once both honored and happy, to return upon you, in your old age, the kindness you bestowed upon me in my youth, my childhood, and infancy?"—Zanesville Gazette.

HEAR BOTH SIDES.

'Ma, can't I have two apples this evening—Charles had four to-day, and would not give me one.'

'I did not think Charles could be so selfish. Where did he get them?'

'One of the boys at school gave them to him. He had four; can't I have two?

Presently Charles entered.

'Charles, how could you be so selfish and ungenerous as not to give your brother a part of your apples, when you had so many?'

'I did offer him as much as I had, ma, and he would not take it.'

'Yes, you offered me half of one out of four.'

'I should certainly think, Charles, you might have given your brother a whole apple at least. You may go without any this evening, and he shall have yours.'

'Now Ma, I'll just tell you how it was. You know our teacher took us to walk.—One of the boys bought some apples, and gave me four. I gave one to our teacher, one to a boy who had given me a piece of cake; I could do no less than give one to the boy who walked with me, and I offered Frederick the half of the one I had left. Now do you think I ought to have given him any more?'

'Frederick is this so?'

'I don't know ma'am.'

'Did not Charles offer you half of the apple he had left?'

'Yes, ma'am, but I think he might have given me a whole one.'

'I do not. I think he acted very properly in the distribution of the apples, and very generous in offering you the half of what he had reserved for himself. Your partial representation was most unjust, and made me judge Charles wrongfully. I regret having condemned him unheard, and for your unfair representation, I shall insist that you forfeit your apple, so that instead of getting two, you will have none; and I hope this circumstance may teach you ever after that even in this world, honesty is the best policy.'

For my own part, I laid the lesson to heart, and regarded it as one more illustration of the obligation we are under to 'hear both sides.'—Mother's Magazine.

HOW DIFFERENTLY IT STRIKES PEOPLE.—In the township of Newbury, O., a protracted meeting was once held, in which some of God's children became so deeply interested for the situation of some anxious souls, that their prayers were heard to a considerable distance. Some of the inhabitants of the place, both male and female, became so enraged that they declared there should be a stop put to the exercises.—Next day a Christian, in referring to the circumstances, said, "Yesterday, when I heard the voice of prayer going up from this place, although I was at a distance, it seemed that my soul was transported with the sound! My heart was filled with heaven, and my desires spontaneously ascended to the throne of God, that God would hear and answer." How different the heaven that could render these two classes happy. A. K. M.

The means provided by nature whereby a silk worm escapes from the cocoons are worthy of notice. Immediately at the head of the insect there is a small sack, into which it secrets one drop of very sharp and corrosive acid. At the the time for the escape of the little animal, the sack bursts, and the acid destroys the fibre of silk which it touhes, and thus makes a hole through which the moth creeps into the open air. Is this arrangement the effect of mere chance?

It is absurd to believe every story one hears, or that hope is not an ignis fatuus

It is absurd to expect that every well dressed man is a rich one, or that hens eggs will hatch young ducks.

It is absurd to suppose that all great men are good ones, or that great augers are not great bores.

It is absurd to expect a return of evil, or to hope for assistance from a relation.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

PROSPECTUS OF THE FARM HOUSE OF THE XIX CENTURY, OR ENCYCLOPEDIA OF PRACTICAL AGRICULTURE, containing the best mode of culture adopted in France, England, Germany, and Flanders; full practical instructions to guide the small cultivator, the farmer, the director, and the large proprietor in the improvement of an estate; the general principle of agriculture, and the culture of all the useful plants; the training of domestic animals, and the veterinary art; the description of various arts relating to agriculture; rural implements and buildings; the management and improvement of vines, fruit trees, timber, and forests, tanks, etc.; the economy, organization, and direction of a rural establishment; and finally, legislation as applied to agriculture; closing with a table of contents alphabetically arranged; a list of figures, abbreviations, and authorities cited

An Elementary, Complete, and Methodical Course of Rural Economy, with more than Two Thousand Engravings, representing the various Implements, Machines, sets of Apparatus, Breeds of Animals, Trees, Shrubs, and Plants, Rural Buildings, etc. Digested and Revised by a Committee of Scientific and Practical Agriculturists, belonging to the Agricultural Society of France, under the direction of M. T. Bailey, Member of the Societies of Agriculture and Horticulture. Translated from the French, with Notes adapting it to the use of farmers in the United States of America, by Elizur Wright, jr., formerly Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in the Western Reserve College Translator of La Fontaine's Fables, &c.

Agriculture is the foundation of all human arts—the art for which man was made, and the perfection of which is his chief happiness and glory as the lord temporal of this planet. Of this sublime art, all other arts and sciences are but satellites, their business being to wait on, enlighten, and adorn it with their moonshine. Consequently, no man more than the agriculturalist needs the full use of his brains, and a perfect command of all the treasures of human experience. So the farmer of the United States view the matter; and in presenting them with a translation of the celebrated Maison Rustique of the French, we have no doubt of their hearty support. It is the work of all works on practical agriculture; the most scientific, clear, and comprehensive. France has long excelled in profitable farming. This is the source of her wealth. England is rich by coals and commerce. Her agriculture is splendid, but sometimes costs more than it comes to. Those who have fortunes to spend may buy the vast works of Marshall, Dickson Arthor Young, Loudon, &c., but those who wish to get a fortune out of the soil will find the French writers better able to show them the way. The excellence of French elementary works is well known to all teachers. For centuries, the Maison Rustique has been, in France, the standard elementary work—the spelling book and grammar of farming. The present edition for "the nineteenth century," has been re-written and brought up with the 'march of mind," by sixty of the ablest "agronomes" of France. It has all the light of the latest improvements, not only in France, but in all Europe

William Cobbett, one of the most successful farmers both in England and America, who wrote the best English style and the best French grammar that ever was, valued the Maison Rustique, not only as an encyclopedia of farming, but as a means of educating his children. He was his own schoolmaster. In winter evenings his family resolved itself into a school, and he thus speaks of the use then made of this work:

"Our book of never failing resource was the French Maison Rustique, or Farm House, which it is said, was the book that first tempted Duguesnois (I think that was his name,) the famous physician in the reign of Louis XIV., to learn to read. Here are the four-legged animals, from the horse down to the mouse, portraits and all; all the birds, reptiles, insects; all the modes of rearing, managing, and using the tame ones, and destroying those that are mischievous; all the various traps, springs, nets; all the labors of the field and garden exhibited, as well as the rest, in plates; and there was I, in any leisure moments, to join this inquisitive group, to read the French, and tell them what it meaned in English, when the picture did not sufficiently explain itself. I never have been without a copy of this book for forty years, except during the time that I was fleeing from the dungeons of Castlereagh and Sidmouth, in 1817, and when I got to Long Island, the first book I bought was another Maison Rustique."—Advice to Young Men, Art 129.

Of the qualifications of the translator, it may be said that he is a practical farmer, and in regard to his translation of La Fontaine, which has been reprinted in England, an English reviewer confesses that he "does not know the English writer who could have done it better."

TERMS.—The work will be published as a semi-monthly periodical, in numbers of 56 pages, octavo, each 25 cents, and when completed will contain forty numbers, at $10.

Five dollars paid in advance for the first 20 Numbers, shall entitle subscribers to the remaining 20 Numbers for four dollars.

Or, nine dollars in smaller sums, (if not less than $1.) regularly advanced during the course of publication, shall entitle the same reduction.

The 1st number will be issued on the 1st of July, 1842.

All orders and remittances should be addressed to S. S. HASKELL, Publisher, 138 Fulton-st. New York.

New York, June 1, 1842.

⁂ All editors who will give this prospectus fifteen insertions, and forward the papers containing them to the New York Watchman, shall be entitled to one copy of the work. 18w15

Not 25 or 50 per cent Reward.

S. G. WALKER

HAS received his NEW GOODS, which he is disposed and determined to sell as CHEAP, if not cheaper than can be bought at any other establishment in De Ruyter. Among his assortment may be found, Dry Goods, Dry Groceries, Crockery, Hardware, &c. Leghorn and Palm-Leaf hats and a variety of other things too numerous to mention.

Hear ye!! Hear ye!! all persons wishing to buy goods CHEAP will please call at the Farmer's Exchange, and examine the quality and prices of his goods before purchasing elsewhere, and. Hear ye again!! any one having a little "Safety Fund" and indebted to S. G. Walker, will please call and deposit.

De Ruyter, May 23, 1842.

LOTS OF HATS & CAPS on hand—Fashionable and Old Fashioned, Bell Crowned and Low Crowned; and, to crown all, and not be out of Fashion, Cash and most kinds of stuff received in payment, by HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

NO IMPOSITION.

NO STATES PRISON WORK!

THOSE wishing to purchase BOOTS and SHOES of superior quality of custom work, will find just the place by calling at the sign of the MAMMOTH BOOT.

De Ruyter, May 20, 1842.

Dissolution.

THE Co-partnership heretofore existing under the firm of SUTTON & QUINBY, is this day dissolved by mutual consent. All notes and accounts will be left with Geo. W. Sutton for settlement.

GEO. W. SUTTON,
WM. H. QUINBY.

De Ruyter, Sep. 14, 1842.

BOOTS BOOTS! SHOES! SHOES!!

AT the sign of the Mammoth Boot, manufactured invariably of leather tanned in "cold liquor." Please call.

How to make money,

IS the study of mankind and of the Yankee Nation in particular. The easiest and most practicable plan for accomplishing the desired end in these times is to "Save Money," which can be done by purchasing NEW GOODS, instead of the trashy accumulations of many shops and many years. The place to do this, is at ELMORE'S whose stock of NEW GOODS is nearly equal to all the rest received in this village and who is daily dispensing great bargains to "Fortune's Favorites.

May 30.

Of Drugs and Medicines,

THE subscriber keeps a much larger stock and sells much lower than those who adevrtise two columns.

May 30. J. N. ELMORE.

4 CASES, Superior quality, fashionable Hats, just received, and for sale low at the

May 30. STONE STORE.

NEW TAILORING ESTABLISHMENT.

THE subscriber would inform the Citizens of De Ruyter and its vicinity, that he has opened a shop in the second story of S. G. Walker's store Farmer's Exchange, where he may at all times be found, and where those who are pleased to favor him with a call may have their garments made as well as at any establishment west of New York City.

N. B. Garments cut and warranted if made by competent workmen. New York Spring and Summer Fashions just received by W. P. GUEST.

De Ruyter, April 25th, 1842.

FLOUR! FLOUR!! FLOUR!!!

SUPERFINE Flour for sale at the Farmers' Exchange, put up in good order in barrels and half barrels. Said Flour is made from the best of western wheat, at one of the best mills in the state.

S. G. WALKER.

De Ruyter, April 13th, 1842.

BLANKS! BLANKS!!

JUSTICES Blanks, Personal Mortgages, &c. just printed and for sale at this office.

De Ruyter, April 20, 1842.

TEAS, SUGARS.

CALL and see how cheap they are selling them at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

Oct. 11.

500 PAIRS Boots and Shoes for sale at the

May 30. STONE STORE.

AGENTS FOR THE REGISTER.

NEW-YORK.

Adams--Chas. Potter A G. Green, Job Spencer
Alfred---James R. Irish, Maxson Greene, Oran Vincent, Samuel Russell P. M.
Berlin—John Whitford.
Brookfield—Andrew Babcock, Silas Bailey, Adin Burdick, Samuel B. Crandall.
Bolivar—Rowse Babcock, J. L. Scott.
Clarence—Nathan V. Hull.
Clear Creek—Abel Saunders.
Darkamville—Dea. Joseph Potter.
Edmeston—Dea. Ephraim Maxson.
East Rodman—Chester Greene.
Friendship—Zuriel Campbell, Samuel E. Lanphear.
Genesee—W. P. Langworthy, Dea. E. P. Crandall, Sheffield B. Maine H P Greene.
Hounsfield—Charles West.
Independence—John P. Livermore.
Lincklaen.—Sebeus M. Burdick, Dea. Wm. G. Crandall.
Leonardsville—Dennis Hardin.
New York City—Paul Stillman.
Newport—Daniel Truman.
New London—Charles M. Lewis.
Otselic—Dea. Silas Church
Petersburgh—George Crandall.
Preston—Dea. Clark Rogers.
Persia—Dea. Hosea Whitford
Pitcairn, St. Lawrence Co.—Geo P. Burdick.
Sacket's Harbor—Joel Greene.
Scott—Ezekiel G. Potter, James Hubbard, Hiram Babcock.
Schenectady—Abel Ward.
South Branch—Rowland T. Greene.
Truxton—Russel G. Burdick.
Unadilla Forks—Welcome Stillman, William B Maxson.
Verona—Oscar Williams.
Watson—Ezra Whitford.
West Clarksville—Clarke Saunders.

RHODE-ISLAND.

Westerly.—Alexander Campbell.
Hopkinton—Joseph Spicer jr., Jacob D. Babcock.

CONNECTICUT.

Waterford—Lester T. Rogers. Wm. Maxson.
Mystic Bridge—T. S. Greenman.

NEW-JERSEY.

Plainfield—Thomas S. Alberti
New Market—W. B. Gillett.
Shiloh—Isaac D Titsworth, Azor Estee.
Salem.—David Clawson.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Crossingville—Thos. B. Brown.
Meadville—Dea. Lewis Dunham.
New Geneva—B. F. Bond.
Coudersport—L G. Maxson.
Clifford—Zebediah Burdick.
Sharon Centre—Isaac W. Jones.

VIRGINIA.

Lost Creek—Levi H. Bond.
Elk Creek—Thos. B. Bond.
New Salem--Jepthah F. Randolph.
Lewisport---Joseph Jeffrey
Lowther's Run---Asa Bee.

OHIO.

Bloomfield---Charles Clarke.
Northampton.—Simeon Babcock, B. C Church.
Port Jefferson.—Lewis A. Davis
Jackson.---Davis Loofbourrow.
Butlerville---G. N. Swinney.
Kingsville---Julius M Todd.

MICHIGAN.

Oporto---Job Tyler.
Tallmadge---Bethuel Church.

WISKONSAN.

Milton, Rock Co.—Joseph Goodrich, P. M. Stillman Coon.

IOWA.

Fredonia, Louisa Co—M. Wheelock.

ILLINOIS.

Trivolia, Peoria Co.---James Dunham.

The Seventh-day Baptist Register
IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY,
AT DE RUYTER, MADISON CO., N. Y.,
BY
JAMES BAILEY.

TERMS.—To village subscribers who have the paper left at their doors, $2 25, in advance, or $2 50, at the expiration of the year.

☞To office and mail subscribers, $2 in ADVANCE.

Each communication, involving facts and intended for insertion in the paper, must be accompanied by a responsible name.

No subscription received for a less term than six months.

☞All subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, will be considered as wishing to continue their subscription, and their paper will be sent to them accordingly. No paper will be discontinued till all arrearages are paid except at the discretion of the publisher.

☞Advertisements inserted on the most reasonable terms.

☞All letters and communications to ensure attention should be addressed to the publisher free of postage.

Lester T Rogers 2d

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.

VOL. III.---NO 34.] JAMES BAILEY, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR. [WHOLE NO. 138.

Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,——The SEVENTH DAY is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.—COMMANDMENT.——If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments.—JESUS CHRIST.

TWO DOLLARS IN ADVANCE.] DE RUYTER, N. Y., FOURTH-DAY, OCTOBER 19, 1842. [PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Original Papers.

For the Register.

Notes from a Traveler.

NEW-YORK, Friday Afternoon,
Oct. 7, 1842.

MR. EDITOR:—Well, last evening, at 8 o'clock, I found myself in the Emporium of the U. S., the city of New-York. My passage down the majestic Hudson, was rendered very agreeable, and interesting. The scenery along the Hudson is grand, even to sublimity. Hudson is a beautiful city indeed, and far surpasses what my anticipations in regard to it had led me to think of finding. Newburg, also, stands conspicuous in my mind, as being one of the most beautiful cities in the country. We had a fine view of West Point, which was a military position of great consecuence in Revolutionary times. At this point, during the revolution, a battery on the extremity of the point, which indeed is conspicuous, commanding the river, while a strong chain stretched across, intercepted the passage.

Here, as you are aware, the United States Military Academy was established by Congress in 1802, for the instruction of young men destined for the army. The number of cadets is limited to 250, and in choosing among the applicants, the sons of revolutionary officers are allowed the first claim, and the children of the deceased officers of the last war, the second claim. The age of the pupils on admission, must be between 14 and 22. The professors and instructors are 30 in number, and each of the cadets costs the government annually $336. The annual expense of the institution is $115,000. There are 11 large buildings, six of brick, and five of stone, occupying a very beautiful and commanding site from the river, being a level of 188 feet above the river. Close to the shore stands a white marble monument, bearing the name of the generous and noble spirited Polander, Kosciusko.

The village of Tappan, near which Major Andre was executed, was not observable from the river. It is said that the Cypress tree, which grew on his grave, has been removed, and planted in the garden of the Queen.

The new State Prison is located on the river bank at Sing Sing, an indistinct view of which I had, owing to the late hour at which the steamboat passed. It was commenced in 1825, under the supervision of Mr. Lynde, of Syracuse, and was completed and first received tenants in 1828. The building is spacious, being 44 by 480 feet. It has a double row of cells, back to back, 200 in each tier, making in all 800 cells. The beautiful marble of which it was built, was obtained on the premises, and the whole work was performed by convicts taken from the Prison at Auburn.

Tarrytown, on the east side of the river, is famous for being the place where Major Andre was captured on his return to the British lines, after his visit to Arnold.

In passing to Utica, I had the pleasure of an agreeable interview with the Rev. Mr. Johnson, a Unitarian minister from Boston, who has been staying at the Temperance House of Mr. Spear in your village, for some days past. As I learned that he had formerly been an Editor of an influential paper in Boston, I ventured to make myself free with him in conversation. The subject of the Sabbath was introduced, and he remarked that it was passing strange that people would be so deluded as to observe as holy time the seventh day, Jewish Sabbath. I very kindly invited him to inform me where he found any direction for keeping as SABBATH any other day in the week. He observed that it had been the practice of Christians from time immemorial, to keep Sunday or Lord's-day! I told him I thought not, and referred him to some of the early writers, such as Eusebius, Carlow, etc., and also to the decree of Constantine, to show him that the Sabbath had been changed within the limits of time immemorial; and consequently he must be in an error. Something else attracted his attention, and we did not resume the discussion. "Excite the people!" as the Abolitionists say, and the Sabbath of the Bible will preponderate over the superstitions of the age. The world is in darkness deep and gloomy on this subject. In this city the subject is receiving some attention among the Pedo-Baptists, which promises much for the cause of God, and his long trodden-down Sabbath. I defer particulars, until I see you. X. Y. Z.

Conscious integrity and rectitude of purpose, will present an impenetrable shield to the shafts of slander and calumny.

Religious Department.

DARKNESS OF HEATHENISM.

[Among the evening addresses made at the late meeting of the American Board at Norwich, was one from the Rev. Dr. Scudder. It is so interesting that we transfer it to our columns, as it was reported for the N. Y. Evangelist.]—Christian Reflector.

Dr. S. then addressed the audience in a most striking and impressive manner.—Coming, said he, directly from a heathen land, I might tell you much of the darkness and death with which it is covered—much of the miseries of the 130 millions of perishing heathen among whom I have had my residence—130 millions of immortal souls posting to the judgment, deprived of all true knowledge, of all spiritual privileges, and who know nothing of God or of Christ, and among the thousands of whose temples, not one has been dedicated to the true God. I could tell you of their 30 millions of gods—gods, some black, some white, and some blue, gods of all shapes and all sizes, some human, and some bestial—some holding spears and clubs—some mounted on elephants, others on rats, on peacocks, and on serpents—gods in every form of beauty and deformity—gods dedicated to folly and to wisdom, to cruelty and revenge, to war and to peace—gods addicted to adultery, to theft, to murder, and to every vice comprised in the apostolic catalogue of human crimes—and to vices which the Holy Ghost would not allow Paul to mention. I could tell you of Kuma, whose thirst could only be slaked with blood; and of men whose calling and profession it is, to steal their fellow-beings for sacrifice upon her bloody altars. I could tell of ceremonies in her service, at which the blood would curdle—of victims whose flesh is cut from their bones while living. O, I could say much—too much of the manner in which the poor heathen grope in darkness, endeavoring in vain to propitiate their dark and cruel divinities—of their wearing iron collars—of their rubbing their bodies with ashes—of their counting beads—of their long and wearisome repetition of vain and foolish prayers, one word of which they do not understand, of their burying themselves in the earth, of their swinging on hooks—of the fearful funeral pile, the horrid fires of which yet burn in more than twenty Indian provinces—in all, indeed, which are beyond British authority. One king recently died, whose funeral was celebrated by the burning of seven queens, two concubines, one servant, and four female attendants—fourteen human beings burned to death. I could tell of 120,000 infants murdered annually in Bengal—of the revolting abominations of a heathen temple. But I must not—they are too awful, and cruel, and disgusting to be told. And a heathen religious procession—it is beyond the powers of description, and too horrid for recital—so horrid that a French Abbe justly said of it, that it presented a more vivid picture of hell than any other earthly spectacle. Heathenism with its dark orgies, its terrible sacrifices, its polluting practices, its soul-destroying influences—O heathenism, its misery, its crime, and its blood, no one can know whose eye has not been pained, and whose heart has not bled to behold it.

But blessed be God, there are also bright spots on the dark landscape—spots made radiant and beautiful by Christianity.—There is the district of Tinnevali, where are 15,000 native Christians. There is another luminous point at Travancore, where are 600 Christians, and at Tanjore and Madras, are also many who love the Lord. I could point you also to Bengal, where thousands have been baptized, and to Ceylon, where are other thousands—converts from among the wild men of the forests, who have lived among the rocks, and fed upon berries; these, tamed, clothed, and in their right mind, are praising Jesus.

But it is time, my brethren, to come to you. I come to remind you of the great command of Christ, a command of which though you have long known it, you cannot be too often reminded, while there is one heathen left in pollution. It is the last command of our risen, gracious Redeemer, a command which makes every believer either a preacher or missionary, or lays him under solemn obligation to provide a substitute, a command which requires us never to rest until all the race are rescued, and God descries his own image restored, in every human soul. On the American church devolves in a peculiar manner, this duty of sending the gospel to the heathen. I say peculiar, because no nation has so many young men who might be enlisted in this grand and glorious enterprise. There are 100,000 pious young men in the evangelical churches of America, of whom at least 10,000 might, without disadvantage to any other interest, be spared for this work, and who have all the qualifications for it. Is it so? TEN THOUSAND well-qualified young heroes of the cross? Is it too great an estimate? But what does your Report tell us? Only five of these are ready to go forth. Can it be? Only five out of ten thousand? From all these churches, from all these youth, from all these families of pious fathers and pious mothers, are there but five? O thou bleeding, suffering, dying Lamb of God! who came down from heaven, and groaned in sorrows, and sacrificed thy life for man, is this the treatment which thou must receive from the pious youth of this favored land, of these blood-bought churches! No more than five to go to the ten hundred millions of the lost! No more to go forth and proclaim thy name!

I said that this last command makes every Christian a preacher or missionary, or requires a substitute at his hand. Shall this not be told? Shall I hold my peace under these circumstances? I, who have come, deputized by the whole heathen world, to bear to you their Macedonian cry, Come over and help us, shall I be still? O! I dare not. If I forget you, ye poor, perishing heathen, let my right hand forget its cunning—let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth! Who are these youth upon whom my eye now rests? Who? Are there none who have the proper qualifications for the missionary work? none who are burying in secular employments talents that might have saved many a soul? none who will go to the millions of heathen now marching down to hell, without a voice to arrest their fearful progress? If there is such an one, my brother, I have a controversy with you. I urge you by the sufferings of the Son of God: by all your Christian privileges; by your obligations to God; by all the enjoyments of heaven; by all the solemnities of your dying hour; by the day of judgment, that you seriously inquire whether it is not your duty to hear the cry of an orphaned and famishing world. O! how urgent the call! A vast concourse of immortal souls, which, if collected together, would make a mighty phalanx, one mile in width and a thousand miles in length, crowding each other on to an eternal doom! I ask, is there no compassion that will yearn over them, and flee to their rescue? I am aware that there are excuses. But what are they? Are they houses or merchandize? Is it opposition of friends? Is it fear of toil? Go to the Savior, and ask if this plea is a valid one. Ask him if it is right to pray "thy kingdom come," and then refuse to make any sacrifice to hasten that kingdom on.

Beloved brethren in the ministry! are there none among you who will pity the heathen? No one who will respond to the call I bring from a dying world? Are five missionaries all you can send? Can no more reinforcements be spared? Is this mode of warfare wise? Is it right to send one man to storm a fort? or to besiege a city? or three to conquer an empire? This Board is calling for young men—have you done all you can to assist them? Can you appeal to the Searcher of hearts and say, that in addition to your last effort in prayer to the Lord of the harvest, you have made your last effort to bring forth laborers into the harvest? Has each one of these pastors sent one representative to the heathen? I know of one who has been a pastor 35 years, and during that time has brought forward 25 youth into the ministry. O if every minister would thus labor—if each would be faithful to inquire of every candidate for church membership, have you sought of God whether you ought not to go to the heathen, how speedily would the desert become verdant, and the howling wilderness rejoice. Mothers too! if they were all Hannahs—if they entered their closets with their children, to pray for the privilege of giving them to the heathen, how soon would hundreds go forth, where now there are but few. There is a mighty responsibility resting upon you, ye Christian mothers! The history of your children you are writing out beforehand. With you, more than with any earthly power, abides the decision of the question, whether your sons shall toil in the missionary's life, and attain the missionary's crown. I know a mother of eight sons, who permitted not a day of their childhood to pass, in which she did not pray for and with each one of them, that they might be counted worthy of the ministry. Several are yet too young to decide—but these are already in course of preparation for that holy office, and if God permits, will lay their bones in heathen lands. Would that the church were full of such Hannahs.

From the New-York Evangelist.

THE EXCUSE.

The doors of the feast have long been open. Why can you wish to be excused? Are you so absorbed by your gains, with your buying and selling to such advantage, that you cannot heed, and think you do not need the protection of the Lord of such a feast? Perhaps you are so engaged that you do not heed the voice of Him, who, in the kindest accents bid you come. I tell you that is impossible—there is written on everything thou seest, "Prepare to meet thy God." You do see it. You have often seen it—then, why ask to be excused?

Perhaps you have married a wife, and therefore wish to be excused. Ah! she needs that feast as much as you. Take her with you; perhaps she will not go!—Then, hard though it be, leave her, and go yourself—she may follow you—I pray you turn not away from the doors of the feast. Go not together with heart cemented to heart, and hand joined to hand, down to eternal darkness, misery, and despair.

Have you no time? Either to listen to the invitation, or obey its summons. True, indeed, you have no time. Did you ever think that what you meant for an excuse was in reality so? You have no time.—Time is pressing you hard; soon you will feel the pressure. What if you could look into his hourglass, and see the sands which yet remain for you. I pray you recollect that there is a time for everything, and that a time is set for the feast, which will not stand forever. You have no time—if you press not hard, your sands may be out before you reach the prize; or, when you get there, perchance the doors will be closed. They are closing every day on some one. Here one, and there one, and why not on you? Are you especially exempt? No! You are not yet excused—stop not to breath that fatal wish again.

Are you young?

Fond youth! while free from blighting care,
Does thy firm pulse beat high?
Do Hope's glad visions, bright and fair,
Sparkle before thine eye?

And do you therefore, wish to be excused? Do you therefore think that you have plenty of time in store against the feast, but none to spare at present? Oh, look clear and steadfastly before you say, "Have me excused." You may be looking forward to a long life, and may think that the flowers of life will ever bloom in your pathway; but your happiness may be misery if you do not enter that feast now. On many a youth has its door been closed, and thus it may be on you. Press hard! You too have no time. The longest period of your life is short in the eyes of Him who hath bid you come, since all things are now ready.

Are you old? And have you been threading the misty labyrinths of the world, with no light to guide you? Have you too breathed the prayer to be excused? You too have no time. It is your eleventh hour—the minute hand presses close upon the twelfth hour.

Thou aged man! life's wintry storm
Hath seared thy vernal bloom;
With trembling limbs, and wasting form
Thou'rt bending o'er the tomb;
And can vain hope lead THEE astray?
Go, aged pilgrim, go and pray.

Pray for what? Pray that the doors of the feast may not be closed upon you. Not only pray, but run, if haply you may get there in time. Stop not on the way to pray—pray as you go. Run for thy life, for the doors of the feast are closing.

A. M. L.

DEATH AND THE GRAVE.

'I am hungry,' said the Grave—'give me some food.'

'I will send forth a minister of destruction,' replied Death, 'and you shall be satisfied.'

'And what minister will you send forth?'

'I will send forth Intemperance, and he shall carry alcohol for a weapon.'

'It is well,' said the Grave; 'but how know you the people will fall into the snare?'

'I will demand the assistance of the tempter,' replied Death, 'and he shall disguise the snare under various seducing forms, such as food, and medicine, and pleasure, and hospitality, and benevolence. The people will then drink and die.'

'I am content,' said the Grave; 'so, I perceive that your scheme is skillful, and will succeed.'

The church bells began to toll, and the mourners to walk through the streets, and the sexton to ply his mattock and his spade; for the minister of destruction had gone forth; and once more Death and the Grave met together to exult over the success of their schemes.

'And who is this they are bringing?' asked the Grave

'This is an old man, who fancied that wine was necessary to recruit his wasted strengh. He began with but a little at first, but gradually increased the quantity, and finally drank to excess and died.'

'And who is this?'

'This is a young man who was fond of company, and thought liquor was necessary to convivial meetings. He contracted the habit of drinking, and is now a corpse.'

'And who are they now bringing, followed by a train of weeping children?'

'This is a broken-hearted woman whose husband became a confirmed drunkard, and who left her children to pine in want, whilst he spent his time and money in the tavern. And now they are bringing the corpse of the husband himself, who has lost his life in a drunken brawl.'

'Hush,' said the Grave, 'I hear a loud wail, and the sobs of grief that will not be silenced. What is the meaning of this?'

'Ah!' said Death, 'they are bringing the body of a little infant, whose drunken father, aiming the blow at his wife, destroyed it at the breast; and the mother, like Rachel, 'refuseth to be comforted, because her child is not.''

'And who are these?'

'These are the bodies of a female profligate and her still-born offspring. She was once fair and innocent; but liquor inflamed her seducer, and deprived her of caution. She was soon, however, deserted, and after pursuing a short career of crime, died.'

'And these?'

'These are the bodies of a murderer and his victim; they were once bosom friends; but wine snapped the bonds of friendship: they quarreled over their cups, and one having died by the hand of his companion, the other suffered the felon's death. But here is the crowning incident of our scheme. Behold the corpse of a suicide! This man drank until his property was dissipated and his mind deranged; and so in his distraction, he laid violent hands upon his own life.'

Long did these dark associates thus converse, and loud was the cry that ascended to heaven from injured parents and children, and brethren and friends, until at last Mercy was sent down to see what could be done to check the mischief. And Mercy instantly sent her healing minister, and she called it Total Abstinence; 'for,' said she, 'they cannot touch the evil without contamination. Like the poison of the Upas tree, its very smell is deadly, and no one is safe that comes within the reach of its influence.'

The church bells were but seldom heard, and but few mourners were seen in the streets. The wailings of the widow and the orphan were succeeded by hymns of praise and thanksgiving; for death and the grave were despoiled of all their prey.—Tribune.

ALL MEN AFFLICTED.—Sometimes when contending with a religious or political opponent, we are liable to forget that he too is a man of sorrows. He appears to our imagination a mailed knight in full armor. His spirit is assuming its haughtiest tone. His look flashes immortality. His self-confidence is majestic. But we repeat it, he is a man of sorrows. He is tried with poverty; tempted by the world; subject to the toothache and heartache; liable to lose his wife and children. The man is a father, a husband, yea, he is a man. Could we see him in his closet; leaning over the bed of a dying wife; praying for the recovery of a darling child; our hearts would frequently soften, and we should be better pleased to welcome him as a brother, than defy him as an enemy.—N. Y. Evan.

This life commences our eternity. Here we begin, but can never cease to live.—From the verge of time we step off on to the boundless plain of unending joy and delight, or on to the steep declivity which leads to unending woe.

"I would not give a straw for that assurance which sin will not damp. If David had come from his adultery, talking of his assurance, I should have despised his speech."

Parent's Department.

TEACH CHILDREN TO BE COURTEOUS.

'Aunt, can I have my tent put up to-day and may I stay and play in it?' said a little boy four years old.

'Yes, James, I have no objection, if Mary is not engaged. You may go and tell her that your aunt would like to have her put up your tent, as soon as it is convenient. Speak very kindly and politely to her, and don't be impatient if she is busy—you can wait a little.'

James, by the decease of his mother, had been but a short time previous to the period of which I speak, placed in the care of his aunt, a cultivated, accomplished, refined lady, of lovely deportment, and eminently Christian spirit. She received the little boy into her heart, and earnestly devoted herself to promoting his best welfare. A young woman who had had the charge of him in his father's house, was still with him, and was expected to render him all needful attention. But I noticed during several days' observation, that whenever James had permission to go to Mary for any service, or was sent with a message from his aunt, he was carefully reminded to speak courteously. And the tone in which the errand was given him, was always such as was likely to ensure his using the manner enjoined. It was not, 'go and tell Mary to give you drink'—but 'you may ask Mary to give you a glass of water. Recollect to speak very properly. Say, 'Mary, I'll thank you for some water,'—or some other suitable phrase was given him in a mild tone and manner, the influence of which he was likely to feel when he reached the kitchen or the nursery.

I have said James' aunt was refined and cultivated; she was eminently so; and she and her friends moved in high circles, and were familiar with polished society. Her true refinement and the marks of a well-bred lady were exhibited in the manners which she cultivated in the child,—manners which he saw uniformly and unaffectedly worn by his aunt and other friends,—for in that entire family circle the utmost courtesy and benevolent consideration prevailed.

Those who allow their children to treat domestics, or such as they would term inferiors, superciliously, or to speak to them in a tone of command, establish, by this means, certainly a very slight claim to the consequences they assume. Only persons of second rate pretensions at best, will be found guilty of such rudeness. Either their importance is newly acquired, and they have mistaken notions as to suitable modes of establishing and exercising it, or their fancied consequence is only that which station creates, while they have no true dignity of character or magnanimity of spirit.

A regard to their own credit for genuine good breeding, where no higher motive exists, would be expected to produce in parents a courteous demeanor, and to secure the cultivation of it in your children. Add to this the affectionate interest with which all persons regard an amiable, unassuming child, while the little tyrant or aristocrat is an object of universal dislike,—and the motive is still stronger. And stronger yet will it be, when the formation of the child's disposition and habits for life are taken into the account.

The little boy who is permitted to run through the house calling, 'Mary, Mary, give me some water this minute,' will, no doubt, domineer over all whom he dares thus to treat, as long as he lives. The little girl who at the table is allowed to make known her wants in such terms as, 'bread, Jane,' 'water, David,' issued in a tone of command, will most inevitably be an imperious woman. What parent wishes to train up children to be such men and women?

It is impossible to contemplate a single wrong habit in children, without seeing that many evils flow from it. In the present instance, I have named several—discredit to the parents, certainty that the children will be disagreeable, and the formation in them of permanent unlovely characters. Their own unhappiness growing out of this character, even in the best circumstances, is of course included; and it must be perceived that they are not as cheerfully served nor as well served as they would be with less repulsive manners. The comfort of domestics is sacrificed by the rudeness or imperious bearing of children. Those of them who have the care of children ought to reap something from the charge, in their own feelings, besides the endurance of annoyance or injustice. This class of people are susceptible of being made happy or unhappy, as well as others: and they are almost wholly dependent for their comfort upon their employers and the children whom they attend. Parents who allow children to address them in notes of command, and practise other acts of rudeness, which will accompany such a manner, are selfish and unamiable, or, at best, highly inconsiderate; and they are greatly mistaken if they expect thus to secure respect, and a reputation for true gentility.—Mothers' Monthly Journal.

Children's Department.

IS GOD BEAUTIFUL?

"How great is His Beauty!"—Zech. ix. 17

'Mother,' said little Fanny to her mamma, as she was sitting in her lap one evening, 'Is God beautiful?'

'Yes, my child,' replied the mother, 'God our Father is very beautiful.'

'How does he look?' replied Fanny.

The mother drew back the curtain and told little Fanny to look out at they sky. 'Yes,' she said, 'those bright gold colored clouds, and those others that look like beds of roses, and that shining white one—how beautiful and bright they all lie together, and above them is a great dark purple one with silver edges. Is it [illegible]tiful?'

'Yes, mother.'

'And what makes them beautiful?'

'I do not know.'

'It is the brightness of the sun which you cannot see, because he is sunk down in the sky; you do not see the sun, but you see how beautiful he makes the clouds, and you know that he is brighter than they are. So you cannot see God, but you see a great many bright and lovely things that he has made, and you know that he is more bright and lovely than any of them.'—Then Fanny's mother took a fair white lily from the vase and bade her look at it. 'See how pure it is, look close at the leaves, see how they are all made of little bright shining grains?'

'Yes,' said Fanny, 'they look like little white grains of snow, and how sweet it is.'

'Well, dear child, God is more beautiful than the lily, he is purer and fairer than the fairest flower.'

'Still mother, you do not tell me how he looks?'

'Do you remember, Fanny, how beautiful you thought the moon was the other night when you saw her looking into your window?'

'O yes, mamma, but does God look like the moon?'

'No, dear child, God is far more beautiful than the moon.'

'Does he look like the blue sky when it is full of stars, mother?'

'No, dear child, God is more beautiful than the blue sky and the stars.'

'Oh mother, I saw a rainbow the other day, it was the most beautiful thing I ever saw, does God look like the rainbow?'

'No, my dear child, God is far more beautiful than the rainbow, a thousand times more beautiful.'

'Mother, our garden is full of flowers, are there any of them as beautiful as God is? Oh, mother, some of our roses are so very beautiful!'

'No, dear child, God is more beautiful than all the flowers you ever saw.'

'Mother, I want to see God,' said little Fanny, 'will any body ever see him?'

'See here,' replied her mother, opening the Testament, 'what our dear Savior says:'

'Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.'

'Mother, am I pure in heart?' said Fanny.

'No,' replied her mother, 'you are not, and I am not.'

'And shall we never see God, then, mother—can't we grow to be pure?'

'Dear child,' said her mother, our kind Savior left his heavenly home and came to live in our world, to make us pure in heart that we might see God; and all those who love and trust in Him are made pure, so that they can see Him.'

'How does he make us pure?'

'By loving us, and teaching us to love Him, till we learn to love all that he loves, and to hate all that he hates, and then when we die, he takes us to his own beautiful home, and there we are never tempted to sin any more.'

'Oh Jesus,' said the little girl earnestly, 'love me too, and make me pure in heart—Youth's Mag.

[illegible]

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, October 19, 1842.

ALONZO H. BURDICK, of this office, will visit, this month, the friends of the paper in Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, and Eastern New York, to settle up the unsettled accounts of the Register, and obtain new subscribers. Will the friends of the press aid him as much as possible?

Trespass.

A perfect rule is given in Matt. 18, in cases of trespass. If the wisdom of Jesus Christ was sufficient to devise rules for every exigence—rules that were perfect, and if carrried out would accomplish the object desired, then we are to receive the above mentioned rule as just suited to the case. If difficulties can be arranged in any way, they can in this, and when other expedients fail, this will not fail if the persons concerned have the least disposition to do right.

The command of Jesus Christ is first "if thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault, between thee and him alone." This direction lays a duty upon any who have matters of grief, to have it arranged immediately, and if it can be arranged, no second person is to become privy to it. It is easy to see the fitness of this rule. In most cases no trespass has been intended, or even committed. A compliance with the above direction would at once determine this, and thus end the matter. And in the case of an actual and wilful trespass, obedience to the rule given would in almost every case end the matter, and make an end of all trouble.

There are several things worthy of consideration, as connected with this subject.—First, if any member of a church receives information, by any means whatever, that a brother has done him an injury, he is not at liberty to mention it to the third person, but his first business is to enter upon the course of labor prescribed by Jesus Christ, and if successful, the whole matter is healed, and is to be consigned to forgetfulness, otherwise scandal will be brought upon the church, and the cause of righteousness be injured. If, instead of taking this course, the person injured, or supposed to be injured, publishes his grief to others, he inflicts a deep stain upon the church, and perhaps inflicts a deeper injury upon an innocent brother than he may have received. The church can not consistently receive a complaint from one who has become a tresspasser in the same matter. But it is bound for righteousness sake to reprove any who may make complaint against a brother, when he is himself equally guilty. The object proposed to be accomplished in the rule given by Jesus Christ, is to reclaim an offender.—There can be no hope of reclaiming an offending brother by meeting him with hostile weapons. Human nature prompts a man to guard himself when assailed. A brother may be slain with reproaches and complaints, but never can be won. The unchanging truth that "every spirit begets its own likeness," is true in this case as in others. Hostile weapons will be met with hostile weapons, reproaches with reproaches, and so will a meek and forgiving spirit be met with the same. No one then is prepared to take the first step till he possesses the mind of Christ, and is more anxious to bring back to the way of rectitude one who has wandered than to avenge his own wrongs. The gospel inspires in all who possess its influences, a disposition to heal all wounds they may have inflicted. Consequently, he who may have inflicted an injury upon a brother is ready to make restitution the moment that he is under the influence of the spirit of Christ, and he is seldom if ever ready to do this till he possess that spirit. There is, therefore, but little if any hope of redeeming a trespasser, unless he who undertakes the work, first conceals with himself the cause of grief, till he is prepared under the influence of a Christian spirit, to labor for this object. Another object will frequently be accomplished by this course. The injured person may find that he has been the injurer, and that the offence first committed by himself, has been the producing cause of all subsequent offences. If he have the spirit of religion, his first labor will be to make amends. When this is done, all things are set right.

In the second step, no less care is to be exercised. The object designed to be accomplished by this course of labor, may be lost by improper management. In this case, the persons called to aid, should be, if possible, entirely free from prejudice, or they would be unprepared to act impartially. Their business is to act the part of mediators, and after having heard the subject explained, to give such council as is demanded; and if possible, effect reconciliation. If they fail in this, they are to be witnesses before the church. No person is prepared to take this place, who has become biassed on the subject, or in favor of either of the parties. Beside being impartial, they should be persons full of the Holy Ghost, whose great object is to advance the interests of the church, and all its members.

The spirit of the rule is violated, where any one concerned, acts from other motives than a desire for reconciliation. And we much question, whether the church will often, if ever, be called on, to settle difficulties, when the first and second step have been taken for the right purpose, and in the right spirit.

CONFERENCE MINUTES.—We have sent out the Minutes of the General Conference and Missionary Societies. We have published an extra number to supply those who may wish them. Churches or individuals can be supplied to the amount of some 200 copies or more.

The following inquiries and report thereon, we publish from the minutes of Conference. They elicited an interesting discussion and are worthy of careful attention.

Inquiries.

1. What course shall churches pursue with their members who allow children in a state of minority, or domestics, or others, to labor on the Sabbath within their gates, or hire their children to others to labor on that day, or give them their time that they may hire themselves out for such purposes?

2. What steps ought to be taken by a church to avoid injury to the cause of God, when members of sister churches present themselves for admission to church privileges, who are known to be delinquents, and the proper subjects of church censure? And what means shall be employed to adjust differences between sister churches when differences exist?

3. What course ought to be pursued with members who form co-partnerships with those who disregard the Sabbath, and allow their capital to be traded on, their machinery to be used, their beasts to be worked by others, and share the profits of such trade, wear, and labor?

Report.

The Committee to whom was referred the above Inquiries report—

1. It is the opinion of your Committee that those members of churches of our fellowship who allow their children who are minors, their domestics, or others under their control, to labor within their gates on the Sabbath, or who promote such labor on the Sabbath by hiring them to others, or in any other way connive at Sabbath desecration, are guilty of a violation of the fourth commandment, and of disregard to the word of God, as recorded in Deut. vi. 6—9. We believe a church should deal with such members as transgressors.

2. Should it be known to one church that any member of a sister church is a transgressor, and a proper subject of church censure, it is the opinion of your Committee that they are under obligation to labor with him, as commanded Lev. xix. 17.—"Thou shalt in any wise rebuke thy neighbor, and not suffer sin upon him;" and if he be not reclaimed, they should "tell it to the church" of which he is a member. But we consider they are not justified in receiving such member into their own fellowship, and ought under such circumstances, as they value the peace of Zion, and the honor of the cause, to reject any application they may make for a place among them.

3. When church members do so far disregard the Sabbath as to enter into co-partnership with those who do not observe it, and permit their property to be employed, and their beasts worked on that day for the income of such property and labor, they ought, in the opinion of your Committee, to be considered as infringing upon the claims of the fourth commandment.

And further, should a disorderly member of one church reside within the limits of another church, we consider it to be the duty of said church to notify such church of the disorderly conduct of such member.

WM. B. MAXSON, Ch'n.

Report of the Executive Committee of the American Evangelical Board of Directors for Disseminating Religious Truth among the Jews:

DEAR BRETHREN,—Agreeably to the Constitution by which we are governed, it becomes our duty to present to you our Annual Report, and it would be pleasing to us, and doubtless to you, could we state that through our means and labor as officers of this Board, much good had been effected.—But we feel a consciousness that with the means that we possess, and in the circumstances in which we have been placed, we have done what we could.

After the last meeting of the Board at Alfred, a meeting of the Executive was called by the President, when the decisions of the Board were taken up by items, and candidly and prayerfully considered. At this meeting a full report from the Treasurer was received, which was not obtained in time to lay before you at your last meeting. The report was then sent and published in the Register, so that all the friends of the cause could see the state of the funds. It will be remembered that at your last meeting, some suggestions were presented in the report in reference to the publication of tracts. That part of the report was taken up, and a resolution passed that we offer $25, premium for the best written tract, or original Essay upon the subject embraced in the following title, "An Exposition of the unfulfilled predictions of God, respecting the Nation of Israel, together with an illucidation of the causes which prevent their restoration to God, the means by which it will be effected, the benefits to result therefrom—and an appeal to all men who pray and look for the salvation of the world." This proposal was published in the Register in December, with encouragement from some individuals that the attempt should be made. The manuscripts were to be forwarded to the Secretary by the 1st of April; but none have ever been presented.

The means that we possessed would not warrant us in the employment of a Missionary—nor were we sensible that a suitable one could have been obtained. Thus you see, brethren, that although we have acted, yet we have done nothing effectually to promote the cause.

It becomes our duty in making out our Annual Report to present a plan for future operations. In view of the limited means of information in our possession, we consider ourselves incompetent for the task, and would choose rather to refer this to the meeting of the general Board, supposing that possibly there may be some present who may possess light that we do not. And our prayer is, that you may be directed by wisdom to adopt such measures as may result in the furtherance of the gospel of the Son of God.

Report of James L. Scott.

To WM. B. MAXSON, President of the Executive Committee of the A. S. D. B. M. Society.

SIR,—Agreeable to your request I now bring before you a summary of my labors, and expenditures, during the period of my employment as a missionary for the Society. The journal published in the Register supersedes thenecessity of a daily detail of the labors. All that may be necessary for the benefit of the Society, is as follows:

Expenses.

Postage on letters for publication,	$1,25
Repairs on the wagon when broken,	17,63
Toll and ferriage,	11,93
Horse shoeing,	3,36
For common traveling expenses,	82,41
Total,	$116,58
Whole amount of donations,	$18,92
Received of Treasurer,	36,00
do. do. sent to Allegany,	35,00
Total,	89,92
	116,58
Balance due me,	$26,66

The first field of labor occupied, was in Clark and Shelby counties, Ohio, where I spent about five weeks, and baptized twenty candidates. From that I passed to Pickaway Co. and labored three weeks, and there baptized twenty-two, and constituted a church, thence to Ripley Co. Ia., and labored one week. After leaving Ripley, I came to Fulton, and Peoria counties, Ill. Five or six weeks were occupied, during which time, a church was organized. From that, I went to Louisa Co. Iowa Territory, and spent three weeks with the friends there; baptized one, and organized another church. Leaving this interesting field, the next, and last place where much time was spent, was in Rock Co. Wiskonsan, and after laboring near two weeks, I left for home.

On this tour, I have spent seven months and a half—have traveled about thirty-eight hundred miles, passing through Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Wiskonsan and Michigan. I have made about four hundred family visits, and attended one hundred and fifty meetings, baptized forty-three, and constituted three churches.

Yours, &c.

JA'S. L. SCOTT.

Berlin, Sept. 4, 1842.

Missionary Department.

For the Register.

MR. EDITOR,—I forward this communication, wishing you to publish it in the Register, that it may relieve me of the embarrassment under which I now labor respecting the settlement of the affairs of my tour through the western States and Territories. A reference to some things connected with my engagement, and the means by which I prosecuted the mission, may not be amiss.

When I received a notice from a member of the Executive Committee of the A. S. D. B. M. Society, to prepare for the above Mission, I was at a loss to know what was duty. I was somewhat aware of the embarrassments of the Society, and as I had not means in my hands to sustain the Mission, I should not have turned my attention to it had it not been for the deep anxiety I had that the country should be explored, and thereby the denomination arrive at a knowledge of their duty with regard to their supplying that western field with Missionary labor, and an expectation that a sum of money had been raised for that purpose by a band of brethren in New Jersey, which hope was encouraged by the letter before alluded to. With this view of the subject, I considered it not unsafe to enter on the account of pecuniary aid, although I must, of necessity, start without an outfit.

A quotation from that letter will show that I had some reason to expect money from that source, and that the Executive Committee was of the same opinion, although that opinion proved, in the result, "erroneous." It is as follows:

"And as the brethren in New Jersey have subscribed very liberally towards the support of the contemplated Mission, we thought proper to ascertain their feelings with reference to the particular field they wished to support."

Brother Estee states in his corrective communication that we labored under a mistake, which, by the by, I had found by experience was the fact. But in the mean time he states that the money was originally raised for that purpose, although to be spent by a Minister of their "own choosing," which last phrase appears as a key to unlock the ministry concerning the final disposition of two hundred dollars before alluded to. After deciding in favor of complying with the request of the community, I arranged my business and prepared for the tour. But when the appointment came, to my confusion it was "pennyless." On this failure I knew not what to do, but the destitute condition of the people at the west rolling up before my mind, caused me to make one more effort for the accomplishment of this object. Finally, after much exertion I obtained thirty-five dollars and with this, trusting in the arm of the Lord for support and success, I entered on a tour of about four thousand miles through the wilderness and amongst strangers. Feeble as my health was, and scarce as was my means, I felt that if the appoint was of the Lord he would sustain me. I was sometimes driven to extreme necessity, but God was there, and ere I fell, he stretched forth his hand and saved. I obtained money of strangers to aid me on. and was by necessity obliged to purchase a horse on credit to supply the place of one that in consequence of the hardships of the journey had failed. This communication, however, would not appear, were it not for some things conveyed through the Register to my creditors, of such a character as to cause them and the denomination at large to suppose that I have received all of the money raised by Br. Griswold.

That the members of the denomination have been liberal in their donations to the SOCIETY, through the agency of Br. Griswold, is obvious to all. But it should be remembered that that society was deeply involved, previous to the debt incurred by the mission of the past year, and though much has been given, when all of the debts were presented, and each received his ratio of money, there was not a vast sum to fall to each individual, and I can say for one, that my share fell far short of the amount of my debts incurred by the mission. A letter from Br. Griswold, published in the Register, while he was in Scott, and remarks made through the Register, by W. D. C., convey the idea that I have this money alluded to, in my possession and at my control, virtually saying to my "creditors" "that their money will be forthcoming." As it is, I cannot meet all of the demands, and unless they know the reason, they will be justifiable in charging me with a breach of trust. Of what I have, they shall share as soon as practicable.

I here take the liberty to say, for the encouragement of the friends of the west, that Br. Estee has circulated a petition, and obtained about two hundred dollars, payable next fall, for the purpose of aiding me on a return to that field, and I was solicited to engage this fall, upon the strength of it. But my health is so much impaired, and I am so completely worn down by the fatigues of the journey, that these things, in consideration with my embarrassed circumstances, actually forbid my complying immediately with their request, notwithstanding my deep anxiety for the prosperity of those infant Churches. The people at the west, will by this discover, that they are not forgotten, nor are their prayers unheard by their eastern friends, and although they may not be supplied this fall, yet by patiently enduring, they "shall see of the travail of their soul, and shall be satisfied."

The new subscription obtained by Br. Estee, shows what this denomination will do, when they know where they may act effectually; and that a concentrated effort of all of its members, would soon supply every missionary field that is now lifting its hands and voices to us for aid. Then, will we not, my brethren, unite our hearts and hands together, for the advancement of this glorious cause.

Let the interests of souls of men—the interests of the Redeemer's Kingdom, in which is involved all of our interest, both in time and eternity, come up before our minds—let the awful consequences of a non-compliance with the requirements of Heaven, fall upon our vision, and then let the bright prospects of a final success in the Gospel field, follow in quick succession, plainly exhibiting the contrast here and hereafter, and which will we do, throw all of our interests into the gospel field, or not? My brethren, will we not, notwithstanding the old Society has ceased its operation, act this year upon individual responsibility? thus following out the course advised by W. D. C. May heaven inspire and direct, so that we may act without condemnation, and in view of eternity.

J. L. SCOTT.

Hopkinton, R. I., Oct. 12, 1842.

News of the Day.

From the Portsmouth Journal.

Spare the Birds.

I was right glad, friend Smith, that you have taken up arms in defence of the poor birds. The barbarous fashion of shooting sparrows and robins has gone quite out of date with decent men. There are now only a parcel of great grown-up boys, stout, two fisted, almost men kind of boys—who deem it a great thing to carry on this miserable warfare. I saw one once coming home after a day's campaign; he was six feet high.—with an old rusty firelock on his shoulder, and in his hand, as a trophy one poor robin, I could not help asking him—Did you kill that bird?

The amusement of shooting birds is pretty much the same as if you were to catch some little wren or tomtit, and stick pins into them,—he to be the hero, who first could touch the little bird's heart and kill him.

I would not say one word against the humane and gentle, and kind-hearted sport, if these gunners always would kill these birds stone dead, and thus put them out of their suffering at once. It is no sin to kill an animal; but to kill for amusement,—to break a bird's wing, to shoot off its legs, to tear away a portion of its beak—in sport! And then for the poor creature to starve to death, pine away—dying by inches—sport! A man with a reasoning mind, a conscience, fine feelings—doing that which a cat does —torturing to-death some poor miserable little victim!

A sportsman, now a sportsman no more, told me that he was cured of his folly by shooting a beautiful bird and breaking its wing. 'The poor silly thing,' said he, 'could not escape me, and I picked it up whilst it screamed out in pain,—its little heart I felt beating in agony, and its eye looked at me so beseechingly. I had not the nerve to kill it, yet I dared not let it go to starve to death. So after mustering courage I shut my eyes and then crushed its head;—it made me sick of this kind of sport.'

There was another story told me by a clergyman not far distant. 'When I was a boy,' said he, 'like other boys I went a-gunning; after a long ramble I found nothing to shoot at but one poor little jay. This was my only trophy of the day's sport. Feeling thirsty, I called at a house hard by where I had shot the bird, with my gun on my shoulder and my game in my hand. When I got up to the door I saw a poor idiot boy tied to a chair in the doorway; as soon as he saw me he began to scream and curse and swear; it was shocking; he appeared to be in a great rage; all I could understand was 'birdie,' 'birdie,' 'my birdie.' I asked for water. It was given me in silence, by his mother. I then asked what troubled the boy. She answered, 'you have shot his little bird, one that had been tamed, and that he had fed at the door every day.' This cured me of the sport.' Reader, don't shoot the 'pet birds.' It is not manly, nor humane, nor respectable.

C.

Treaty with the Sacs and Foxes.—We learn from the Burlington Advertiser, that Governor Chambers, of Iowa, has received instructions to treat with the Sacs and Foxes for their title to the lands which they now occupy in Iowa. It is understood that the Indians are now willing to sell their lands, provided they can be allowed to move south and west of the Missouri river, whither a portion of the tribe removed some years since. Gov. Chambers is the sole commissioner.

The annuities due the Indians were paid at the agency about ten days ago. A census of the tribe was taken, and it was found that there were about 2500 souls, being an increase of about 200 since the enumeration last year. This increase had been made by a party of the Missouri Sacs, who had come to the agency a few days previous, and mingled with the tribe for the purpose of receiving a share of the money.

Keokuk and his band had induced the Missouri Sacs to play this game, and had laid a plan by which he and his men were to attack the party, after they had received the money and take it from them, thereby securing a greater share of the annuity than would otherwise fall to their lot. It was represented to the Missouri Indians that the Sacs of the Mississippi were rich, and were willing to divide with the Missouri Sacs, who were very poor, as an act of charity and good will. Another census was taken—the number was found to be about 2200 souls, and the sum of $41,000 was distributed by payment to the heads of families.

About 1500 whites were present; some for the purpose of securing payment of debts due to them—others to trade and traffic—and others from curiosity; but the most numerous class went with the expectation of a treaty being held, and to see the country, in order to secure a good claim, should a treaty be formed.

The dragoons who were present had some difficulty in preserving order, and it is alleged, that they 'treated some of the most respectable citizens with insolence, merely because their curiosity, or perhaps their interests, may have led them to visit the Indian country!'—St Louis New Era.

Disturbance in Cambridge—We learn, with regret, that the tranquility of Harvard University has been again disturbed. There is, however, we are happy to say, no dissatisfaction with the Faculty, or with the honored President of the Institution.

The facts of the case, we believe, are these: A member of the Senior Class, though quite advanced in years, never having succeeded by his force of character to inspire the respect of his younger classmates, was too often made their butt. A short time since, a few stones, thrown from a neighboring room, accidentally broke a pane or two of glass in his windows. He mentioned the accident, and the name of the classmate who was the cause of it, to the President, expressing a desire that there should be no punishment. This provoked some excitable spirits in the class, and the windows of the obnoxious man met with a more universal crash. He again reported the matter to the Faculty, and one of the class was dismissed.

On Saturday, as we understand, one young man of the class used a cowhide upon the back of the unfortunate student, and then he was forced, by a number of his classmates under the pump.

The youngest who used the cowhide was taken before a Justice, and, consequently, expelled; and those who performed at the pump were dismissed till Commencement. One of the offenders was ordered to recognize in the sum of $500 for his appearance at the next term of the Middlesex Court at Lowell.—Boston Trans.

From the River Gambia, (Africa)—The schr. Kathleen Taylor, arrived at Philadelphia on Monday direct from the river Gambia, which she left on the 1st September. The United States Gazette furnishes the following items of news received by this arrival. S. M. Goheen, M. D. came passenger in the Kathleen; he was physician to the Liberia Mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The doctor left Monrovia, (Liberia) on the 22d of June, in the brig Hope, Revens, master, Thomas Lloyd, supercargo, bound to New-York. Two days out, several of the men were taken ill, and also the captain and supercargo. Two men died, and she ran into Sierra Leone in distress, for more men, where Dr. Goheen left her.—The Hope shipped additional men, and left in seven days. A few hours out, the supercargo (Lloyd) died, also another man. She then put into Goree, an island on the African coast, north of the Gambia, where an inventory was made of the supercargo's personal effects, and left Goree on the 5th of August, for New-York. [Since arrived at this port.]

Distress for provisions prevailed at Bassa Cove (Liberia.) The colony is in pretty good health.

The U. S. sloop of war Vandlia, Ramsey, commanding, arrived at Sierra Leone on the 23d of July, and left for a cruise to Liberia and the leeward coast, the 7th of August—officers and crew all in good health. The American merchantmen were much gratified to have a U. S. ship of war in the waters of West Africa.

The brig Atalanta, Brown, master, of Philadelphia, was at Sierra Leone on the 11th of August. The barque Gentleman, of New-York, was at the Gambia about the 25th of August.

There was much sickness among Europeans at the town on the mouth of the Gambia.

H. B. M. steam vessel Kite arrived at Sierra Leone from the Niger, about the 19th of July, bringing Captain Allen, and all the remaining officers of the ill fated Niger expedition, as also the citizens (natives) and re-captives of Sierra Leone, who had joined in the expedition as laborers, mechanics and interpreters.

[Captain A. and his remaining party have since arrived in England.]

The Mendians have all forsaken the missionaries except eleven men and the three girls.

A shrewd reply.—Sir Walter Scott says that the alleged origin of the invention of cards produced one of the shrewdest replies he had ever heard given in evidence. It was made by the late Dr. Gregory of Edinburg, to a counsel of great eminence at the Scottish bar. The doctor's testimony went to prove the insanity of the party whose mental capacity was the point at issue. On a cross-interrogation, he admitted that the person in question played admirably at whist. 'And do you seriously say, doctor,' said the learned counsel, 'that a person having a superior capacity for a game so difficult, and which requires, in a pre-eminent, memory, judgment, and combination, can be at the same time deranged in his understanding.' 'I am no card player,' said the doctor, with great address, 'but I have read in history that cards were invented for the amusement of an insane king.' The consequences of this reply were decisive.

Escape.—Joseph Sperry, convicted of the murder of his wife at Sandusky, together with Thompson, the murderer of Miss Hamblin, and another prisoner named Harmon, made their escape from the jail of that place on Thursday last. A reward of $300 has been offered for the fugitives.—Buff. Com. Adv.

Sad Accident—but Fortunate Rescue.—Yesterday morning as the steamboat Iolus was coming up from Shrewsbury, Lieutenant Hunt of the Navy, with another officer and thirteen men in a barge, attempted to board her; when by the mismanagement of the coxswain, the barge came in contact of the steamer's wheel, which instantly destroyed the barge and left them all floating in the water; some saved themselves by the wheel and some by the ropes—but Lieut. Hunt and six men went floating astern. Passed Midshipman Bartlett of the Navy, a passenger on board rallied a crew quickly, and launching the yawl of the steamer from the upper deck, was after them in a moment, and succeeded in rescuing Lieut. Hunt and all the men from a watery grave. One poor fellow was taken up from beneath the surface quite insensible, but was soon resuscitated. Too much praise cannot be given to Captain Allaire, his crew, all the passengers, for their promptness and assistance in the rescue.—Herald.

Elopement.—A widower named Seely, residing in Stark county, Illinois, has just run away with the wife of a tenant he boarded with. They took one child each and left three or four behind them. Seely is a man of property, having two farms, &c., and lost his wife but a year ago. They ran off in the night, leaving nine of their children asleep in the house from which they absconded!

Yellow Fever.—Accounts from New Orleans to the 3d inst. state that the yellow fever had nearly disappeared. At Mobile, on the contrary, it had increased. The number of cases reported to the Board of Health during three days ending the 4th inst., was 15. The Mobile Advertiser advises strangers to keep away for the present.

The Exciting Subject.—A letter from the editor of the Emancipator, written at Bangor, (Me.) tells the following incident:

"The Rev. Dr. Hawes, of Hartford, Ct., preached a sermon in one of the churches here, on Sunday evening, on the 'immortality of the soul'; and, in one of his inferences, very naturally, but in a few words, applied his doctrine as an illustration of the sinfulness of slavery, saying he would as soon think of holding an angel as property as an immortal man. Had an earthquake suddenly shaken the everlasting rocks on which the clay banks of Bangor recline, the audience could not have been more startled—so rigidly has the pulpit been schooled to its propriety on these anniversary occasions. The editor of the Bangor Daily Whig, of Tuesday, thought the matter such a flagrant breach of order that he sternly rebuked it in his paper."

There is a ridiculous sensitiveness on this subject at the North, and this appears to be one of the most ridiculous exhibitions of it that we have noticed.—Newark Daily Adv.

The disturbances in Syria.—We learn from late Paris papers that a joint interference of France and England for the protection of the Christians in Syria, is about to take place.

Santa Anna.—General Santa Anna, President of Mexico, is a tax payer in New Orleans. The Crescent City says he owns some fine property in that city, purchased some years ago.

Duty on United States Wheat.—The bill imposing a duty of three shillings sterling per quarter, on wheat from the United States, passed the Canada House of Assembly on the 4th instant, by a vote of 31 to 19. The bill goes into operation on the 5th of July next. We presume there is no doubt of its passage in the Legislative Council.—Com. Adv.

ALBANY, Aug. 23d, 1842.

Governor Seward.—I had the pleasure, last evening, of attending the soiree given by Gov. Seward to the members of the New York Assembly Senate, and other departments of the Government. I was glad to learn that the invitation embraced men of all parties, and that all attended. I am not versed enough in political phrenology to be able to read Whig or Loco Foco in the countenance. But I think I know enough of human nature to decide, that the physiognomy of the party indicated as firm and intellectual a set of men as any body of politicians I ever looked upon. And I am certain that they discovered great harmony of feeling and action in the discussion of the turtle soup. But the most gratifying thing which I saw, was the absence of all intoxicating drinks from the rich entertainment. Gov. Seward certainly deserves great credit for such a noble example. It will animate the men who are struggling in the lower classes of society to save their fellows from ruin, and who have found the example of public men hitherto, for the most part, a dead weight upon their efforts. I trust that some one will be able to report a like cheering history of any soirees that may be held in the metropolis of New England, during the approaching session of the Massachusetts Legislatures.—Corres. of Boston Recorder.

The Mormons appear to be backing out from Jo. Smith. About forty of them arrived at St. Louis on the 24th ult., from Nauvoo, having became heartily tired of the absurdities or villainies of the prophet.—Ex. Paper.

Boston and the Far West.—It seems that there is now wanting but one short link of rail road (15 miles) to complete the long line of steam communication between Boston and Chicago—nearly two thousand miles! by land and water. And we are assured by a friend from the West, that the remaining link (on a section between Rochester and Buffalo) will be completed within this present month of October.

Right heartily do we congratulate our fellow citizens of Boston on the near completion of the vast line of internal communication thus pointing to our noble city as an outlet on the Atlantic coast! The event is well calculated to inspire the most cheering reflections, and should be marked with some ceremonial indicative of popular opinion in this quarter respecting the vast object which this month will see accomplished.

We perceive some indications in the Buffalo and Rochester papers, of an expectation westward that a movement will be made at the Boston extremity of the route to mark the occasion with some suitable testimonials of public rejoicing. And we allude to the subject now, in the hope that such of our fellow citizens as deem the matter worthy of attention will take immediate measures for signifying their feelings in accordance with those already manifested in the Western cities.—Boston Traveler.

The Texan Squadron.—It is not generally known that two of the vessels belonging to the Navy of Texas have been here for months owing to financial difficulties. Failing to receive the supplies Yucatan stipulated to furnish the squadron for the protection of her coast and commerce, Com. Moore repaired to the seat of government of Texas, and used every effort to raise means to start a second cruise in the Gulf. Congress then in session made a large appropriation for the navy, but it has been impossible to obtain money.

Commodore Moore has struggled manfully to overcome the difficulties which surrounded him, but from the causes above stated, he has been unsuccessful. The vessels under his command are motionless, while the natural enemy of his country is prosecuting conquests on the coast. Gallant crews, panting for the breeze again, and conscious of their ability to compel an acknowledgment from Mexico of the liberty of their country, are detained here from causes which could neither be foreseen nor controlled.

From the New Orleans Crescent City.

LATE FROM MEXICO.

The steamship Medway arrived at the Balize on the 23d, having left Vera Cruz on the 15th.

G. S. Curson, Esq., bearer of despatches from from Gen Waddy Thompson, our minister in Mexico, came passenger in her.

On the day the Medway left Vera Cruz, General Almonte, Minister Plenipotentiary near the Government of the United States, and suite, among whom is the son of the late Emperor Iturbide, were to leave Vera Cruz in the barque Eugenia for New York.

We have before us a letter from a friend in the city of Mexico, stating that the bad understanding existing between the two Governments, in consequence of the insulting tone of Bocanegra, has been arranged to the satisfaction of General Thompson, who, at the request of the President, held an interview with him at the palace of the national Government.—This was effected, the latter adds, by the high and manly tone assumed by General Thompson on all occasions.

The Yucatan navy is safely moored under the fort of San Juan de Ulloa. The general imperssion was that no more troops would be transported to laguna, the force in Yucatan at present being deemed sufficient for all purposes.

The war steamer Guadaloupe was at Vera Cruz, preparing to sail immediately for Galveston, for the purpose of reconnoitering the island, and capturing any Texan vessel she might fall in with, previous to the sailing of the expedition fitted out for the invasion of Texas by sea—consisting of two steamers, two brigs and three schooners of war, and the transports to be employed for the purpose of transporting the troops, (6,000 in number) who are at present stationed at Puebla, Zalapa and Vera Cruz. Large numbers have also been sent by the northern route, and have for some time been encamped in the valley at the foot of the Sierra Madre.

We published, yesterday, a paragraph from a N. Orleans paper, expressing fears for the safety of the cutter Woodbury. It now appears that she arrived at Vera Cruz on the 28th of August, having had adverse winds all the way. She sailed again for New Orleans on the 12th September, having on board fifteen of the Santa Fe captives and $80,000 in specie.

It Can't be done.—The Boston Post has been exposing the rascality of a young man, named Charles H. Stower, aged 22, who had palmed himself off in that city as an officer of the U. S. Army—promised marriage to a young lady—robbed a traveler's trunk—and decamped without paying his board. He had been previoulsy married, under the name of Bouck, at Oswego. The Post calls upon the brethren of the press to "pass him round;" but as he is now closey jugged in the Ithaca jail, we shall be unable to send him on any farther. Since his feat in Boston, it appears he had been successful in extorting money, by means of forged papers, at Palmyra, and had been guilty of sundry other rascalities. So bold had he become, that he even had the temerity to attempt an imposition upon a citizen of Ithaca; and though he made tracks from here very rapidly, he was, by the energetic vigilance of Mr. B. D. Quigg of this village, pursued—overtaken—arrested—brought back—and lodged in the Ithaca jail, to await the next step in his downward career.

This strangely infatuated imposter, rascal and rogue, is caged at last. He is a son, it is said, of John G. Stower, who formerly represented Madison county in Congress, and who was, some years ago, a member of the Senate.—Ithaca Journal.

Thanksgiving.—The Governor of Massachusetts has appointed Thursday the 24th of November to be observed as a day of public Thanksgiving.

Duel between two Indians.—Two Choctaws living in the parish of Rapides, in this State, fought a deadly duel a few days ago. The weapons were rifles; the muzzles they placed within six inches of each combatant's breast, and at the firing, which was simultaneous, both fell dead!—New Orleans Picayune.

Mr. E. GRIER, residing ner Pitsburg raised this season a pumpkin weighing 87 pounds. On the same vine with it were, fourteen others all raised from a single seed, weighing in all 852 pounds.

The father of the late Rev. Dr. Channing, says the Providence Journal, was one of the first lawyers of his day, and at the time of his death, Attorney General of Rhode Island, and United States District Attorney for the Rhode Island District

The Rochester folks are getting up a Croton celebration on their own hook. A barrel of Croton water taken from the Fountain in the City Hall Park at New York, was forwarded last night by Pomeroy's Express to the Eagle tavern, Rochester.—Daily Adv.

The Navy Yard at Charleston, (Mass.)—The following are the names of vessels at this yard at the present time. On the stocks:—

Vermont, Ship of the line—could be launched and equipped for sea in 120 days.

Virginia, Ship of the Line, ditto.

Vessels at the Yard:—

The Cumberland, (44 guns)—she could be be fitted for sea in 60 days.

The frigate Potomac, (44 guns)—recently returned from the Brazil station—could be prepared for sea in 20 days.

The Store ship Erie, (6 guns)—In complete order for sea.

The brig Bainbridge, carries 10 guns, and is completely ready for sea.

Brig Comet, built for the Exploring Expedition, used recently for a Receiving ship at Portland.

Razee Independence, Captain Silas H. Stringham, now attached to the Home Squadron.

The Ohio, Ship of the Line. This vessel is used for a Receiving Ship. She had on board, at one time during last summer, about 1200 hands. There is at this time about 196 apprentices under the tuition of a schoolmaster.

The greatest number of men employed in the yard, when the work requires it is 700; at present there are, all told, 250.

Notices.

An adjourned meeting of the Mechanics of this village, for the purpose of forming a "Mechanic's Association," will be held at the School House in this village, on Saturday evening next, 22d inst., at 7 o'clock, at which meeting a Constitution and Bye-Laws will be presented for adoption.

A general attendance of the Mechanics is respectfully solicited.

B. G. STILLMAN, Ch'n.
R. F. CONE, Sec'y.

NOTICE.

Mr. F. M. BUELL, of Truxton, would respectfully inform the inhabitants of De Ruyter and vicinity, that he will open a school at the Baptist Church in this village, on the evening of Tuesday the 25th inst., for instruction in the science and practice of Sacred Music. All can have an opportunity of attending free of expense, until they can determine whether it will be an object to become permanent scholars.

NOTICE.

At the next meeting of the De Ruyter Lyceum, which will occur on Monday evening, 24th inst., the following question will be discussed.

"Were our Forefathers justifiable in settling America as they did?"

JEREMIAH GAGE, Pres't.
E. P. BLY, Sec'y.

PROPOSALS
For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead,) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

DIED,

In Brookfield, Sept. 21st, FANNY, wife of David Babcock, in the 55th year of her age. Sister Babcock had been a member of the S. D. B. Church nearly thirty years. Her last sickness which was long, she bore with christian fortitude, and died in full hope of a glorious immortality beyond the grave.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CASH paid for Sheep and Lamb's Pelts with the Wool on. HART, ACKLEY & CO.
October 4, 1842.

LIST OF LETTERS

REMAINING in the Post Office at De Ruyter Sept. 30, 1842.

Avery, Lafayette	Gardner, Dwight
Allis, Israel	Gates, Mrs.
Byram, Joann K. 2	Gage, Eli A.
Burdick, Sophrona	Gage, Jeremiah
Burdick, Thomas	Gifford, Edwin
Burdick, Annis	Hitchcock, Augustus
Brush, Mariah L.	Hoag, Caleb Senior
Brown, Samuel L.	Kinyon, Jonathan
Breed, Benjamin	Larabee, Amasa
Boyce, Wm. C.	Marvott, James
Barbour, Alpheus	Neil, Simeon Jr.
Chase, Caroline M. 2	Peterson Mary Ann
Colegrove, Eli S.	Severance, Mary
Cartwright, Hannah Jr.

M. SPEAR, P. M.

FLOUR, PROVISIONS, GROCERIES, and six hundred other things, for sale by 11tf
May 11. HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

SILK! SILK!! SILK!!!

A BEAUTIFUL assortment of plain, figured and striped, just received and for sale very cheap at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

REMOVAL.

JAMES M. LETTS, has removed his tailoring establishment to Eli A. Gage's hat store, 2 doors north of M. Spear's Hotel. April 6th 1842.

20 TONS Butter wanted at the
May 30. STONE STORE.

"Hard times and money scarce,"

IS the general complaint, and economy is the object of every person.

GEO. W. SUTTON has just opened a large assortment of Dry Goods, Groceries, Crockery, Paints, Oils and Dye-Stuffs. Persons wishing to make purchases are invited to call, as we feel confident that our Low Prices and Good Goods must give general satisfaction.

Sept. 14. GEORGE W. SUTTON.

BOOKS & STATIONERY.

SCHOOL BOOKS, of all descriptions, Miscellaneous Books & Stationery, at the Book Store of HART, ACKLEY, & CO.
De Ruyter, May 11, 1842. 11v3tf

50 PIECES BROAD CLOTHS, CASSIMERES, SATINETTES, at reduced prices at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

THE FARMER'S EXCHANGE is the place to buy Goods CHEAP. Oct. 20, 1841.
S. G. WALKER.

Notice.

ALL persons who are indebted to the subscriber, either in accounts or note, are requested to call and settle immediately and save cost.

De Ruyter, June 20, 1842.
JAMES M. LETTS.

BOOK BINDING.

THE subscriber having connected a BINDERY with his printing establishment, is now ready to execute all kinds of Binding in a neat and durable manner, on as reasonable terms as at any other establishment in this section of country.

JAMES BAILEY.
De Ruyter, June 8th 1841.

DE RUYTER INSTITUTE.

M. L. WOOD, A. B., Principal.
Instructor in Languages, and Lecturer on Chemistry.
G. M. LANGWORTHY,
Instructor in Mathematics, and Lecturer on Natural Philosophy and Astronomy.

Ladies' Department.

Miss MARY A. SEVERANCE, Preceptress.
Instructress in French, Drawing, and Painting, &c
Miss ELIZABETH B. GOODRICH,
Instructress in the Primary Department.

THE Natural, Intellectual and Moral Sciences, are taught by the different Instructors, as best suits the circumstances accompanying the formation of classes, except those mentioned above, which are always taught by the same Teacher.

This Institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter, thirteen miles south of Cazenovia, twenty-four miles west of Hamilton, and about eighteen east of Homer. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, stoves, and rented to gentlemen and ladies at one shilling a week each; each room being large enough for the accommodation of two students.

The ladies occupy the rooms on the south and the gentlemen those in the north of the building.

The Institution is furnished with a good philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a good education, as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

The year is divided into three terms of fourteen weeks each the first term commenced on the 16th of Sept., followed by a vacation of one week, the second term will commence on the 30th of Dec. followed by a vacation of three weeks, the third term will commence on the last Friday in April 1843, followed also, by a vacation of four weeks.

TUITION.

In the common English branches,	$3,50
In the Languages and higher English branches,	5,00
In Drawing,	2,00
In Painting,	2,00
Extras,	,50

Tuition in advance.

N. B. Those desiring to qualify themselves for teaching, will be furnished with every facility for doing so, and when duly qualified will receive a certificate of recommendation.

New Arrangement.

GEORGE W. SUTTON, having this day purchased the interest of W. H. QUINBY, in the Dry Goods and Shoe business, will continue the Trade and the Manufacture of Boots and Shoes as usual at the NEW YORK CASH STORE, where he would solicit the continuance of the liberal patronage heretofore received.

Sept. 14, 1842.

Election Notice.

SHERIFF'S OFFICE,
Madison Couty, ss.

I, ISAAC BROWN, Sheriff of said county, do hereby give notice that an election is to be held on Tuesday succeeding the first Monday of November next, for the election of the several officers mentioned in a notice received by me from the Secretary of State, a copy of which is hereunto annexed.

Morrisville, Sept. 7, 1842.
ISAAC BROWN, Sheriff.
By W. B. BRAND, Under Sheriff.

STATE OF NEW-YORK, Secretary's Office,
Albany, August 31, 1842.

To the Sheriff of the county of Madison:

Sir: Notice is hereby given, that at the next general election, to be held on the Tuesday succeeding the first Monday of November next, the following officers are to be elected, to wit:

A Governor and Lieutenant Governor of this State;

A Senator for the Fifth Senatorial District, to supply a vacancy which will occur by the expiration of the term of service of Joseph Clark, on the last day of December next;

Also, the following county officers, to wit: three Members of Assembly, and one Coroner in the place of Allen Davis, who has removed from the county, and whose term of service would have expired on the last day of December, 1843.

Yours respectfully,
S. YOUNG, Secretary of State.

STATE OF NEW-YORK, Secretary's Office,
Albany, Sept. 7, 1842.

To the Sheriff of the county of Madison:

Sir. Notice is hereby given, that at the next general election, to be held on the Tuesday succeeding the first Monday of November next, a Representative in the twenty-eighth Congress of the United States is to be elected for the twenty-third Congressianal District, consisting of the counties of Madison and Oswego.

Yours respectfully,
S. YOUNG, Secretary of State.

I certify that the above is a true copy of the notice received by me from the Secretary of State.

Morrisville, September 9, 1842.
ISAAC BROWN, Sheriff.
By W. B. BRAND, Under Sheriff. 30w7

Christian Review.

A GOOD PROPOSITION.

THE importance of the Christian Review is admitted. It was commenced nearly seven years since in obedience to an urgent and almost spontaneous call from different parts of the land, and in compliance with that call, has been sustained through six successive volumes, only by special effort, and considerable sacrifice (previous to the present volume) on the part of a few individuals. The number of subscribers, however, has gradually increased, so as to inspire the hope that ultimately, the list would become such as to place it above "want," and on a basis that should insure its perpetuity; and with proper exertions on the part of its friends, it is believed such a result might easily be accomplished.

The work is put at the low price of three dollars per annum, in order to bring it within the means of as large a number as possible. Yet, many who are able, and who would be benefitted by its perusal, are not now subscribers, and need, it is thought, only to be reminded of the facts to become so.

The work occupies a high position among the religious quarterlies of the country, and in the estimation of intelligent men of all Christian denominations, is contributing a good share of the religious periodical literature of the age. To the Baptist denomination, in particular, it is an auxiliary in defence and illustration of the truth, with which it is believed, we cannot afford to dispense. And, since the committee and the publishers have resolved, never again to make an appeal for pecuniary aid, but to discontinue its publication whenever the subscriptions cease to be sufficient to sustain it, it becomes every well-wisher of the Review to exert himself now in its behalf.

☞ The publishers having a number of the past volumes on hand, propose, in order to interest some who may be desirous of possessing it, yet feel unable to subscribe, to exert their influence to obtain new subscribers, and by so doing not only secure it for themselves, but, by increasing its circulation, extend its usefulness, and help also in insuring its perpetuity—to offer a PREMIUM for new subscribers, as follows.

☞ Any person obtaining TWENTY NEW SUBSCRIBERS and remitting the publishers sixty dollars, shall be entitled to a complete set of the Review in seven volumes, the subscription price of which is, TWENTY ONE DOLLARS!

⁂ For FIFTEEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS the last five volumes will be given—subscription price FIFTEEN DOLLARS!

⁂ For TEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS, the last two volumes, subscription price, SIX DOLLARS!

For FIVE NEW SUBSCRIBERS, either of the last three volumes, subscription price, THREE DOLLARS!

It is hoped that this very liberal premium, may induce many of the friends of the Review to make a renewed effort in its behalf, and thus not only reap benefit themselves, but aid the great object the Review is intended to sustain.

SUBSCRIBERS are reminded of the terms of subscription, "three dollars per annum IN ADVANCE." Have you paid your subscription? The money is much needed.

GOULD KENDALL & LINCOLN, Publishers,
59 Washington Street.

N. B. The publishers of any religious paper who shall give the above advertisement three insertions in their columns (and send a copy to the publishers) shall be entitled to a selection of either two of the last four volumes.

Boston, August 10th.

What is Economy?

RANDOLPH & DUNHAM, take pleasure in informing their customers, and the public generally, that they continue the Tailoring business, in "Mechanic's Hall," in rooms adjoining the "Register Office," in all its various branches, where they will be happy to wait on customers on the shortest notice. Thankful for the patronage already bestowed on this establishment, they would say, that all work entrusted to them shall be done up in a style not surpassed by any of the "Craft" in this "village or county;" and at prices that will suit their customers, and tend to that "Economy" which has been advertised to be the "road to wealth."—Cutting done at sight, and warranted to fit if properly made up. Finally, all work done at this Establishment will be warranted to fit or no sale.

S. F. RANDOLPH,
J. V. DUNHAM.
De Ruyter, August 3, 1842. 23tf

Economy is the road to Wealth.

JAMES M. LETTS, would inform his friends and customers, and the public generally that he has removed his Tailoring Establishment, to the building occupied by Eli A. Gage as a Hat Store, where he will be ready at all times to attend to cutting and making all manner of clothing as cheap as can be done in the village or county. Military work done in the latest and most approved fashion. Ladies Habits, and Coat Dresses Cut to order, at short notice. All work done at this establishment, shall be warranted to fit.

De Ruyter, July 1st 1842.

L. W BLISS' Window Sash.
L. Bliss' & Co. " Blinds.
Holme's Sampson & Sailsbury Edged Tools consisting of Broad Axes, Hand Axes, Adzes an, Chisels, at Factory prices by J. N. ELMORE,
October 4. Manufacturers' Agent

☞ IMPORTANT WORK!

NOW IN THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION,

A DICTIONARY OF

Arts, Manufactures, and Mines,

Containing a clear exposition of their
PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.
BY ANDREW URE, M. D., F. R. S., M. G. S.,
M. A. S., Lond., Mem. Acad. N. S.
Philad., S. Ph. Soc. N. Germ.
Hanov., Mulii, &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings

THIS is unquestionably the most popular work of the kind ever published, and a book most admirably adapted to the wants of all classes of the community. The following are the important objects which the learned author endeavors to accomplish:—

1st. To instruct the Manufacturer, Metallurgist, and Tradesman, in the principles of their respective processes, as to render them, in reality, the masters of their business; and, to emancipate them from a state of bondage to such as are too commonly governed by blind prejudice and a vicious routine.

2dly. To afford Merchants, Brokers, Drysalters, Druggists, and Officers of the Revenue, characteristic descriptions of the commodities which pass through their hands.

3dly. By exhibiting some of the finest developements of Chemistry and Physics, to lay open an excellent practical school to Students of these kindred sciences.

4thly. To teach Capitalists, who may be desirous of placing their funds in some productive branch of industry, to select, judiciously, among plausible claimants.

5thly. To enable gentlemen of the Law to become well acquainted with the nature of those patent schemes which are so apt to give rise to litigation.

6thly. To present to Legislators such a clear exposition of the staple manufactures as may dissuade them from enacting laws, which obstruct industry, or cherish one branch of it, to the injury of many others.

And, lastly, to give the general reader, intent chiefly on Intellectual Cultivation, views of many of the noblest achievements of Science, in effecting those grand transformations of matter to which Great Britain and the United States owe their paramount wealth, rank, and power, among the nations of the earth.

The latest Statistics of every important object of Manufacture are given from the best, and usually, from official authority, at the end of each article.

The work will be printed from the 2d London Edition, which sells for $12 a copy. It will be put on good paper, in new brevier type, and will make about 1400 8vo pages. It will be issued in twenty-one semi-monthly numbers, (in covers,) at 25 cents each, payable on delivery.

☞ To any person, sending us five dollars, at one time, in advance, we will forward the numbers, by mail, post paid, as soon as they come from the press.

To suitable Agents, this affords a rare opportunity as we can put the work to them on terms extraordinarily favorable. In every manufacturing town, and every village, throughout the United States and Canada, subscribers may be obtained with the greatest facility. Address, post paid, La Roy Sunderland, 126 Fulton street, New-York.

⁂ To every editor who gives this advertisement entire 12 insertions, we will forward, to order, one copy of the whole work, provided the papers containing this notice be sent to the New-York Watchman, New-York. 51t12

A Christian Father's present to his Family.

HOLIDAY GIFT FOR THE YEAR 1843.
A BOOK FOR EVERY FAMILY IN THE UNITED STATES.

AGENTS WANTED.

ONE Hundred Dollars given for every one hundred copies sold!—Agents—responsible men—wanted in every town and village throughout the United States and British Provinces, to sell 'Sears' Bible Biography,' the most splendidly illustrated and Cheapest work ever issued on the American Continent, containing several hundred Engravings, entirely new and original, designed and executed by the most eminent artists of England and America. Cost of preparing the work, $5000. This beautiful and important work contains upwards of 500 pages royal octavo, is printed from new stereotype plates, handsomely bound in gilt and lettered, and retails readily at the low price of $2 50 per volume. The following extract is from a lengthy Review, written by the Rev. W. C. Brownlee, D. D., and is only one out of several hundred recommendations, from the clergy and the press, that the work has already received.

New-York, August 6, 1842.

"This is, beyond question, one of the most elegant books ever presented to our fellow citizens in this Republic. It ought to be in every Christian family for its innate value; and in every patriotic family as a splendid specimen of our progress in domestic manufactures, and the advancement of our artists and manufacturers in their rivalship with those of Europe. W. C. BROWNLEE."

A very liberal Offer!—One Hundred Dollars will be given by the Publisher to every Agent who will undertake and sell One Hundred Copies of the above Work. He believes that there is scarcely a town or village in the Union, but that numbers may easily be disposed of.

⁂ Persons inclosing money, will be careful to pay the whole postage; and in ordering books will state, explicitly, how the books shall be sent to them.

Also, in press, another important, valuable, and cheap work in the course of publication, and will be ready for delivery early in October, 1842, complete in one volume royal octavo, containing about 600 pages of letter-press, and more than five hundred Engravings, elegantly bound in gilt; price only $2 50 per copy.

The Wonders of the World,
In Nature, Art, and Mind.

Comprising a complete Library of Useful and Entertaining Knowledge, and illustrated by more than

FIVE HUNDRED ENGRAVINGS.

Consisting of Views of Cities, Edifices, and other great works of Architecture, Monuments, Mechanical Inventions, Ruins, Illustration of the Manners and Costumes of different Nations, Religious Rites and Ceremonies, Cataracts, Volcanoes, Curiosities, Trees Beasts, Birds, Fishes, Reptiles, and the numerous objects contained in the Fossil, Vegetable, Mineral, and Animal Kingdoms. Carefully compiled by ROBERT SEARS, from the best and latest sources.

For further particulars, please to address the subscriber, post paid, without which no letter will be taken from the office. ROBERT SEARS,
Publisher, 122 Nassau street, N. Y.

The above will be found the most useful and popular work ever published, for enterprising men to undertake the sale of, in all our cities and towns.

All Clergymen, Superintendants and Teachers of Sabbath schools, Agents of Newspapers and Periodicals, and Postmasters, are respectfully requested to act as Agents.

To Publishers of Religious Newspapers throughout the United States.

Religious papers copying the above, entire, without any alteration or abridgment, (including this notice,) and giving it Six Months' insertion in their papers, shall receive a copy of each of the above works (subject to their order,) together with the well known and popular work, (in 3 vols.) entitled "Pictorial Illustrations of the Bible and views in the Holy Land," forming an illustrated Commentary of the Old and New Testament, each volume containing 200 Scriptural Engravings, and 400 pages of interesting letter press descriptions, 8vo., substantially bound. Compiled from the Notes of the London Pictorial Bible, which sells in this country for $20 per copy.—September 24, 1842. 33m6

POETRY.

Heaven.

"Where every tear is wiped away—where parting comes no more."

Allured by vanity and show,
From God our hearts are riven;
Earth's joys are mix'd with bitter wo,
May we its pleasures all forego
To seek a home in heaven!

Earth's glittering toys, alas! must fade
As fleeting hues of even,
But sin, which clothes her light in shade,
Heaven's peaceful shores can ne'er invade,—
Peace dwells alone in heaven.

Thou, Savior! art the only light
To erring mortals given;
O may our faith grow strong and bright;
May all who mourn in sorrows night
Find rest with thee in heaven.

Thou, O our God! art all our trust,
When by fierce wind we're driven;
Our friends may fail, and moth and rust;
Our wealth must mingle with the dust;
True riches dwell in heaven.

May holy sanctifying dew
To cleanse our hearts be given—
Our sinful nature now renew,
And grant our souls a brighter view
Of holiness and HEAVEN.
A. E. P.

Miscellaneous Department.

KNOWLEDGE FOR THE PEOPLE.

ARTS AND MANUFACTURE.

Why are certain natural advantages in a country prejudicial to its progress in the arts?

Because, provided the mildness of the climate renders clothing and lodging of little importance, and the earth spontaneously pours forth an abundant supply of fruits the inhabitants are immersed in sloth, and seem to place their highest enjoyment in being free from occupation. Sir William Temple, Mr. Hume, and some sagacious inquirers into the progress of society have been struck with this circumstances, and have justly remarked that those nations that have labored under the greatest natural disadvantages, have made the most rapid advances in industry. A striking illustration of the above fact follows:

Why has the improvement of the natives of south Amemerica been so tardy?

Because of the extraordinary abundance of animal food, and the equal fertility of the country, where the finest fruits grow spontaneously, and only require to be gathered. Thus, the South Americans are neither a pastoral nor an agricultural people; and, surrounded by partial civilization they remain without any excitement to labor, which alone could improve their moral and physical condition.

Why has the coin of a kingdom been compared to the highways through it?

Because neither of them produce any thing; on the contrary, they are both to be kept in repair at a certain expense; but they greatly facilitate the conveyance from one place to another, of whatever the land produces by agriculture, or what active capital produces by manufactures and commerce. Such is the idea of Dr. Adam Smith, who also compares paper-money to a wagon-way through the air.

Why are we indebted to the ignorance and bad government of our ancestors for our present comparative facility of procuring subsistence?

Because, had it been otherwise, the population that would have accumulated in England since William the Conqueror, must have overflowed, like the swarming of the northern hives during the fall of the Roman empire. An entertaining writer says: "If all the Turks and Egyptians that are to die next year of the plague, were to be devoured during the present by crocodiles, a certain quantity of food would be gained, and things go on just as before. The Roman empire, and the world generally, would have been equally populous and prosperous, if the Huns and Ostrogoths had eaten each other, instead of strewing their bones and those of their antagonists through the wilds of Dacia and along the banks of the Danube."

Why has the pendulum been resorted to in regulating modern weights and measures?

Because it has enabled us practically to carry into effect the idea of seeking for a unit of measure in some unchangable natural object; the great law of the pendulum being, that its oscillation are always performed in the same time.

Why are the foot, yard, &c. used as measures?

Because the earliest standards seem to have been for the most part derived from portions of the human body: as the cubit, or the length of the arm from the elbow to the tip of the middle finger; the fathom, or space from the extremity of the one hand to the extremity of the other, when they are both extended in opposite directions; the pace, &c. These were not, however, fixed standards, as the size of the different parts of the human body differ in different individuals; hence it became necessary to select some durable article, a metallic rod, for example, of the length of an average foot, cubit, &c. and to make it the standard with which all the other feet, cubits, &c. used in mensuration, should correspond. These standards have been preserved with the greatest care; at Rome they were kept in the temple of Jupiter; and among the Jews, their custody was entrusted to the family of Aaron.

Why is money also called coin and cash!

Because coin (cuna pecunia,) from the French coign, i. e. angulus, a corner, whence it is supposed that the most ancient coin was square. Cash is from the French term caisse, that is chest or coffin or the keeping of money.

Why is there alloy in coins?

Because it may save the trouble and expense that would be incurred in refining the metals to their highest degree of purity; and because, when its quantity is small, it renders the coins harder, and less liable to be worn or rubbed.

Why is the guinea so called?

Because the gold with which it is coined in the reign of Charles II. was brought from Guinea. For this reason also the guinea originally bore the impression of an elephant.

Why is the shilling so called?

Because of its corruption from the word scylling, the etymology of which would lead us to suppose it to have a certain quantity of uncoined silver; for, whether we derived it from sceylan, to derive, or scale, a scale, the idea presented to us by either word is the same—that is, so much silver cut off, as in China, and weighing so much.

Why is the penny so called?

Because of its derivation from the Latin pecunia money.

Why was the banking system first introduced into England?

Because, in the turbulent times of the Commonwealth, the merchants and tradesmen, who had before trusted their cash to their servants and apprentices, found that no longer safe; neither durst they leave it in the Mint, by reason of the distress of majesty itself, although this was before a public deposit. In the year 1645, they first placed their cash in the hands of goldsmiths, who began to exercise both professions.

Why were the labors of the alchemists beneficial to mankind.?

Because, however great their follies, their researches instrumental in promoting the progress of chemical discovery.—Hence, in particular, metallic pharmacy derived its origin. Mr. Herschell justly observes, "among alchemists were men of superior minds, who reasoned while they worked, and who, not content to grope always in the dark, and blunder on their object, sought carefully in the observed nature of their agents for guides in their pursuits."

MANY FACTS IN A FEW WORDS.

A legal stone is 14 lbs., or the eighth of an hundred, in England, and 16 lbs. in Holland.

The fathom, 6 feet, is derived from the height of a full grown man. A hand in horse measure, is four inches.

An Irish mile is 2240 yards; a Scotch mile is 1984 yards; an English or statute mile, 1760 yards; German, 1806; Turkish, 1826.

An acre is 4840 square yards, or 69 yards, 1 foot, 8 1-2 inches each. A square mile, 1760 yards each way, contains 640 acres.

The Christian era was first used, in counting time at Rome, in 527; adopted in France, in 750; in Spain, in 1350; and in Portugal, 1410. The early Christians dated from the accession of Dioclesian, in 284.

The Persians give names to every day in the month, just as we give them to days of the week.

A man is taller in the morning than at night to the extent of half an inch or more owing to the relaxation of the cartilages.

The Esquimaux attain the height of but 4 feet 3 inches, and the Mogul Tartars but 4 feet 9 inches.

The human body consists of 240 bone 9 kinds of articulations or joinings, 100 cartilages or ligaments, 400 muscles or tendons, and 100 nerves, besides blood, arteries, veins, &c.

Riley asserts that Arabs, in the desert, live 200 years.

The foot of a Chinese female, from the heel to the great to, is only 4 inches long.

Total abstinence from food above seven days is fatal to man; but there are instances of surviving after a longer period. A religious fanatic, in 1789, determined to fast 40 days, but died on the 16th.

In marching, soldiers take 75 steps per minute; quick marching, 108; and in charging, 150 steps.

The Hindoos have the art of personating death so as to deceive able surgeons.

An elephant bred to war stands firm against a volley of muskatry, and 30 bullets in the flesh will not kill him

Fish are drawn towards a light; they assemble to be fed by the sound of a bell, and are fond of music.

A chestnut tree on Mount Ætna is 196 feet round, close to the trunk.

Potatoes planted below three feet do not vegetate; at 1 foot they grow thickest; and at 2 feet they are retarded two or three months.

The mahogany trees are full grown in 200 years. Cypress trees are known to be 800 or 900 years old.

There are no solid rocks in the arctic regions owing to the severe frosts.

Fossil bones of the lizard, 24 feet in length, equal to the dragons of antiquity, have been found in Bavaria.

The surface of the sea is estimated at 150,000,000 square miles, taking the whole surface of the globe at 197,000,000 square miles. Its greatest depth is supposed to be equal to the height of the highest mountain, or four miles.

Fresh water begins to freeze at 32 deg., called the freezing point; but salt water does not freeze till 38 1-2 degrees.

Of 100 parts into which the surface of the earth may be divided, Europe contains 7, Africa 21, Continental Asia 33 New Holland &c. 8, South America 15, North America 16.

A cylinder of water may be converted into ice, by placing it in 5 lbs. of sulphate of soda, and 4 lbs. sulphuric acid, at 36 deg., well mixed. The ice is extracted for use by putting the cylinder in hot water.

Extreme cold produces the same perception on the skin as great heat. When mercury is frozen at 40 deg. below zero, the sensation of the skin is the same as touching red hot iron.

The sound of thunder may be heard for 20 or 25 miles; or with the ear to the ground, much more. Lightning is reflected 150 or 200 miles.—Saturday Chronicle.

CANOES IN GUIANA.

The canoes which are manufactuted by the Indians consist of the trunk of a large tree, which has been hollewed out, partly by the axe, partly by fire. They are sometimes from thirty to forty feet long; and are peculiarly qualified for these rivers as they draw but little water, and are less subjected to leaking when drawn over a cataract or coming in contact with rocks, than if they were constructed of timbers. A covering of palm leaves is substituted for an awning. As the largest of canoes is seldom more than four feet wide, its load must be restricted, and the baggage is generally placed in such a manner, that arrived where the cataract opposes obstacles to farther progress, it may be unloaded and carried over land.

The canoe is flat on the bow and stern; and in order to prevent the water from getting into it, two pieces of wood cut according to his fashion. The corial narrows to a point towards the stern and bow. Like the canoes, they are scooped out from the trunk of a tree, and have no keel,—which indeed would be quite a superfluous appendage, as it would be soon knocked off by coming in contact with sunken rocks, or when drawn over cataracts. The packasse, or wood-skin, is a boat merely constructed of the bark of a tree. It is generally made of a single piece of the tough bark of the maurianara tree, which grows to a very large size. An incision of the length the boat is to possess is made in the bark, which is removed from the trunk by driving in wedges; when lossened from the wood, it is kept open by cross sticks, and is supported at the extremities upon two beams. in order to raise those parts of the intended boat. Vertical incisions, at about two feet apart and a few inches in depth, are then made, and the parts secured afterwards by overlapping. It remains for several days exposed to the weather before it is fit for use.—Though the pakasse is so crank that the slightest motion, when once in, render it liable to upset, I have seen among the Tarumas, in the Cuyuwini, with five or six indians in them. Their great advantage is, that being flat, they can float where a common corial of the smallest description cannot pass; and are so light that in crossing cataracts, one man can easily carry his boat on his head. When propelled by one man he squats in the middle and paddles on either side. great care is requisite in stepping in or out of them, as if upset, they sink almost instantly, owing to the great specific gravity of the peculiar bark of which they are built.—Schomburgh's Fishes of Guiana.

AMERICAN ANTIQUITIES.

Near the cove at West River, in Vermont, are what are termed the marked Rocks. They are so termed from being covered with curious and antique hieroglyphics.

It is stated that in an old burying ground discovered in White county, Tennessee, were found numerous skeletons, measuring from seven feet to nine feet in length, deposited in coffins of stone. These coffins are covered with various hieroglyphics which the learned have not been able to translate.

In the same neighborhood ase said to be found three other burying grounds, containing skeletons buried in the same manner, only nineteen inches long. One of them had ninety-four pearl beads around the neck. The graves are abot two feet deep.

In the town of Stannardsville, Virginia, have been found the impression of human feet in the solid rock. The rock argillaceous, and is found on the north branch of the Rivanna river, forming the embankment of the stream at that point, and that portion of it which contains the impressions projects into the stream, and is covered in high water. The impressions are those of a child's feet, and are seven in number. They have the positions relative to each other which they would naturally occupy in walking. The most skillful sculptor could not have cut any thing more true to nature than are these feet.

In Schoolcraft's travels there is a plate representing impressions of the two feet of a man, found on a compact, calcareous rock, near St. Louis, Missouri. Every appearance warrants the conclusion that these impressions were made at a time when the rock was solft enough to receive them by pressure, and that the marks of the feet are natural and genuine.

Several tracks of human feet are also said to exist between Esopus landing and Kingston on the Hudson river.

There is one impression on a detached block of granite, near the former residence of Com. Rodgers in Washington. The existence of a similar impression is spoken of in Orange county.

TEETH.—The prevalence of defective teeth in this country is the general subject of the remark by foreigners; and whoever has traveled in Spain and Portugal, is struck with the superior soundness and whiteness of the teeth in those countries. Though not a cleanly people in other respects, they wash their teeth often, and by means of tooth-picks, carefully remove all substance from between them, after meals. A little silver porcupine, with holes all over its back, to insert tooth-picks, is a common ornament on the dining-tables of Spain and Portugal. The general use of them creates so large a demand, that students at Coimbra sometimes support themselves by whitling tooth-picks, which are sold, tied in small bunches, like matches. They are made of willow, on account of its toughness and pliability. Tooth-picks of metal are too hard, and are apt to injure the gums. There is the same objection, in a less degree, to quills. But willow tooth-picks are preferable to all others; and they have the advantage of being the most cleanly; for they break in using, and are throwm away. Food allowed to remain between the teeth, particularly animal food is very destructive; it should be carefully removed after every meal, and the mouth thoroughly rinsed. This may seem to many like a great talk about a small matter; but these are simple precautions to take, and very slight trouble compared with the agony of aching teeth, or a breath so offensive that your best friend does not wish to sit near you. I can see no reason why a man's complexion should exclude him from the dining-table, but I do see a very good reason why he should be banished for not taking proper care of his teeth. A bad breath is such a detestable thing, that it might be a sufficient reason for not marrying a person with otherwise agreeable qualities. It is, moreover, perfectly inexcusable thus to transform ones self into a walking sepulchre. Nobody needs have an offensive breath. A careful removal of substances from between the teeth, rinsing the mouth after meals, and a bit of charcoal held in the mouth, will always cure a bad breath. Charcoal used as a dentrifice, (that is, rubbed on in powder, with a brush,) is apt to injure the enamel; but a lump of it held in the mouth two or three times a week, and slowly chewed, has a wonderful power to preserve the teeth, and purify the breath.—The action is purely chemical. It counteracts the acid arising from a disordered stomach, or food decaying about the gums; and it is this acid which destroys the teeth. A dear friend of ours had, when about twenty years of age, a front tooth that turned black gradually, crumbled, and broke off piecemeal. By frequently chewing charcoal, the progress of decay was not only arrested, but nature set vigorously to work to restore the breach, and the crumbled portion grew again, till the whole tooth was as sound as before! This I know to be a fact.

Every one knows that charcoal is an antiputrescent, and is used in boxing up animal or vegetable substances, to keep them from decay. Upon the same chemical principle, it tends to preserve the teeth, and sweeten the breath.

If these hints induce only one person to take better care of the teeth, I shall be more than rewarded for the trouble of writing. I am continually pained to see young people losing their teeth merely for want of a few simple precautions; and one cannot enter stage or steam-car without finding the atmosphere polluted, and rendered absolutely unhealthy for the lungs to breathe, when a proper use of water and charcoal might render as wholesome and pleasant, as a breeze of Eden.—Mrs. C.
—Nat. A. S. Standard.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S PEDIGREE.

Victoria was the daughter of the duke of Kent, who was the brother of William the 4th, who was the brother of George the 4th, who was the son of George the 3d, who was the grandson of George the 2d, who was the son of the princess Sophia, who was the cousin of Anne, who was the sister of William and Mary, who were the daughter and son-in-law of James the 5th, who was the son of Charles the 1st, who was traitor to his country and decapitated as such, who was the son of James the 1st, who was the son of Mary, who was the sister of Edward the 6th, who was the son of Henry the 8th, who was the cold-blooded murder of his wives—and son of Henry the 7th—who slew Richard the 3d, who murdered his nephew Edward the 5th, who was the son of Edward the 4th, who, with bloody Richard slew Henry the 6th, who succeeded Henry the 5th, who was the son of Henry the 4th, who was the cousin of Richard the 2d, who was the son of Edward the 3d, who was the son of Edward the 2d, who was the son of Edward the 1st, who was son of Henry the 2d, who was the son of Matilda, the daughter of Henry the 1st who was the son of William Rufus, who was the son of William the Conqueror, who was the son of a prostitute.—True Issue.

GALVANIC GILDING.—The new method of gilding by means of galvanism, appears to have excited considerable interest in Germany. There is the Allegemeine Zeitung of the 6th, an article which states that Professor Bottger, of Frankford, has, after a long perseverance in experiments, brought the process to the highest degree of perfection. He has discovered a salt, the application of which to the material, it is said, overcomes all the difficulties hitherto encountered in gilding. All kinds of metals on being immersed in the solution of this salt, come out brilliantly gilded without suffering any of those black marks or stains to which they would be liable in the common process.

Junction of the Red Sea and the Mediterranean.—The Frankfort Journal publishes a letter, dated Trieste, the 11th ult., stating that Mehemet Ali has assured the French engineer, Mongel, that he wished to realize the dream of his life, the junction of the Red Sea, and the Mediterranean by means of a canal. For this purpose the Pasha had written to Mr. Brunel, the engineer who executed the Thames tunnel, proposing to him to undertake this work.

The fashions of the world and the requirements of the Gospel are ever antagonistical. He, therefore, who eschews the one, and yields obedience to the oheir, is in the only safe and sure way.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

PROSPECTUS OF THE FARM HOUSE OF THE XIX CENTURY, OR ENCYCLOPEDIA OF PRACTICAL AGRICULTURE, containing the best mode of culture adopted in France, England, Germany, and Flanders; full practical instructions to guide the small cultivator, the farmer, the director, and the large proprietor in the improvement of an estate; the general principle of agriculture, and the culture of all the useful plants; the training of domestic animals, and the veterinary art; the description of various arts relating to agriculture; rural implements and buildings; the management and improvement of vines, fruit trees, timber, and forests, tanks, etc.; the economy, organization, and direction of a rural establishment; and finally, legislation as applied to agriculture; closing with a table of contents alphabetically arranged; a list of figures, abbreviations, and authorities cited

An Elementary, Complete, and Methodical Course of Rural Economy, with more than Two Thousand Engravings, representing the various Implements, Machines, sets of Apparatus, Breeds of Animals, Trees, Shrubs, and Plants, Rural Buildings, etc. Digested and Revised by a Committee of Scientific and Practical Agriculturists, belonging to the Agricultural Society of France, under the direction of M. T. Bailey, Member of the Societies of Agriculture and Horticulture. Translated from the French, with Notes adapting it to the use of farmers in the United States of America, by Elizur Wright, jr., formerly Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in the Western Reserve College, Translator of La Fontaine's Fables, &c.

Agriculture is the foundation of all human arts—the art for which man was made, and the perfection of which is his chief happiness and glory as the lord temporal of this planet. Of this sublime art, all other arts and sciences are but satellites, their business being to wait on, enlighten, and adorn it with their moonshine. Consequently, no man more than the agriculturalist needs the full use of his brains, and a perfect command of all the treasures of human experience. So the farmer of the United States view the matter; and in presenting them with a translation of the celebrated Maison Rustique of the French, we have no doubt of their hearty support. It is the work of all works on practical agriculture; the most scientific, clear, and comprehensive. France has long excelled in profitable farming. This is the source of her wealth. England is rich by coals and commerce. Her agriculture is splendid, but sometimes costs more than it comes to. Those who have fortunes to spend may buy the vast works of Marshall, Dickson, Arthur Young, Loudon, &c.; but those who wish to get a fortune out of the soil will find the French writers better able to show them the way. The excellence of French elementary works is well known to all teachers. For centuries, the Maison Rustique has been, in France, the standard elementary work—the spelling book and grammar of farming. The present edition for "the nineteenth century" has been rewritten and brought up with the "march of mind," by sixty of the ablest "agronomes" of France. It has all the light of the latest improvements, not only in France, but in all Europe.

William Cobbett, one of the most successful farmers both in England and America, who wrote the best English style and the best French grammar that ever was, valued the Maison Rustique not only as an encyclopedia of farming, but as a means of educating his children. He was his own schoolmaster. [illegible] speaks of the [illegible] of this work:

"Our book of never failing resource was the French Maison Rustique, or Farm House, which, it is said, was the book that [illegible] (I think that was his name), the [illegible] in the reign of Louis XIV., [illegible] Here are the [illegible] [illegible] the French, and ten [illegible] in English, when the picture [illegible] sufficiently explain itself. I never have been without a copy of this book for forty years, except during the time that I was fleeing from the dungeons of Castlereagh and Sidmouth, in 1817, and when I got to Long Island, the first book I bought was another Maison Rustique."—Advice to Young Men, [illegible] 129.

Of the qualifications of the translator, [illegible] said that he is a practical farmer, and [illegible] his translation of La Fontaine, which [illegible] printed in England, an English reviewer [illegible] that he "does not know the English writer who could have done it better."

TERMS.—The work will be published as a semi-monthly periodical, in numbers of 56 pages, octavo, each 25 cents, and when completed will contain forty numbers, at $10.

Five dollars paid in advance for the first 20 Numbers, shall entitle subscribers to the remaining 20 Numbers for four dollars.

Or, nine dollars in smaller sums, (if not less than $1,) regularly advanced during the course of publication, shall entitle the same reduction.

The 1st number will be issued on the 1st of July, 1842.

All orders and remittances should be addressed to S. S. HASKELL, Publisher, 138 Fulton-st. New York.

New York, June 1, 1842.

 All editors who will give this prospectus fifteen insertions, and forward the papers containing them to the New York Watchman, shall be entitled to one copy of the work. 18w15

Not 25 or 50 per cent Reward.

S. G. WALKER

HAS received his NEW GOODS, which he is disposed and determined to sell as CHEAP, if not cheaper than can be bought at any other establishment in De Ruyter. Among his assortment may be found, Dry Goods, Dry Groceries, Crockery, Hardware, &c. Leghorn and Palm-Leaf hats and a variety of other things too numerous to mention.

Hear ye!! Hear ye!! all persons wishing to buy goods CHEAP will please call at the Farmer's Exchange, and examine the quality and prices of his goods before purchasing elsewhere, and, Hear ye again!! any one having a little "Safety Fund" and indebted to S. G. Walker, will please call and deposit.

De Ruyter, May 23, 1842.

LOTS OF HATS & CAPS on hand—Fashionable and Old Fashioned, Bell Crowned and Low Crowned; and, to crown all, and not be out of Fashion, Cash and most kinds of stuff received in payment, by HART, ACKLEY, & CO.

NO IMPOSITION.

NO STATES PRISON WORK!

THOSE wishing to purchase BOOTS and SHOES of superior quality of custom work, will find just the place by calling at the sign of the MAMMOTH BOOT.

De Ruyter, May 20, 1842.

Dissolution.

THE Co-partnership heretofore existing under the firm of SUTTON & QUINBY, is this day dissolved by mutual consent. All notes and accounts will be left with Geo. W. Sutton for settlement.

GEO. W. SUTTON,
WM. H. QUINBY.

De Ruyter, Sep. 14, 1842.

BOOTS BOOTS! SHOES! SHOES!!

AT the sign of the Mammoth Boot, manufactured invariably of leather tanned in "cold liquor." Please call.

How to make money,

IS the study of mankind and of the Yankee Nation in particular. The easiest and most practicable plan for accomplishing the desired end in these times is to "Save Money," which can be done by purchasing NEW GOODS, instead of the trashy accumulations of many shops and many years. The place to do this, is at ELMORE'S whose stock of NEW GOODS is nearly equal to all the rest received in this village and who is daily dispensing great bargains to "Fortune's Favorites.

May 30.

Of Drugs and Medicines,

THE subscriber keeps a much larger stock and sells much lower than those who adevrtise two columns.

May 30. J. N. ELMORE.

---

4 CASES. Superior quality, fashionable Hats, just received, and for sale low at the

May 30. STONE STORE.

NEW TAILORING ESTABLISHMENT.

THE subscriber would inform the Citizens of De Ruyter and its vicinity, that he has opened a shop in the second story of S. G. Walker's store Farmer's Exchange, where he may at all times be found, and where those who are pleased to favor him with a call may have their garments made as well as at any establishment west of New York City.

N. B. Garments cut and warranted if made by competent workmen. New York Spring and Summer Fashions just received by W. P. GUEST.

De Ruyter, April 25th, 1842.

FLOUR! FLOUR!! FLOUR!!!

SUPERFINE Flour for sale at the Farmers' Exchange, put up in good order in barrels and half barrels. Said Flour is made from the best of western wheat, at one of the best mills in the state.

S. G. WALKER.

De Ruyter, April 13th, 1842.

BLANKS! BLANKS!!

JUSTICES Blanks, Personal Mortgages, &c. just printed, and for sale at this office.

De Ruyter, April 20, 1842.

TEAS, SUGARS.

CALL and see how cheap they are selling them at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

Oct. 11.

---

500 PAIRS Boots and Shoes for sale at the

May 30. STONE STORE.

AGENTS FOR THE REGISTER.

NEW-YORK.

Adams--Chas Potter A. G. Green, Job Spencer
Alfred---James R. Irish, Maxson Greene, Oran Vincent, Samuel Russell P. M.
Berlin—John Whitford.
Brookfield—Andrew Babcock, Silas Bailey, Adin Burdick, Samuel B. Crandall.
[illegible]—Rowse Babcock, J. L. Scott.
Clarence—Nathan V. Hull.
Clear Creek—Abel Saunders.
Durhamville—Dea. Joseph Potter.
Edmeston—Dea. Ephraim Maxson.
[illegible]—Chester Greene.
Friendship—Zuriel Campbell, Samuel E. Lan-[illegible]
[illegible]—W. P. Langworthy, Dea. E. P. Crandall, [illegible] B. [illegible] P. Greene.
Hounsfield—Charles West
[illegible]—[illegible] P. Livermore.
[illegible]—Stephen M. Burdick, Dea. Wm. G. [illegible]
[illegible]—[illegible] Hardin.
[illegible]—Paul Stillman.
[illegible]—[illegible]
[illegible]—Charles M. Lewis.
[illegible]
[illegible]—[illegible] Crandall.
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]—Geo P. Burdick.
[illegible]—[illegible] Greene.
[illegible]—[illegible] G. Potter, James Hubbard, Hi-[illegible]
[illegible]—Abel Ward.
[illegible]—Rowland T. Greene.
[illegible]
[illegible]—[illegible] Stillman, William B [illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
West Clarksville—Clarke Saunders.

RHODE-ISLAND.

Westerly.—Alexander Campbell.
Hopkinton—Joseph Spicer jr., Jacob D. Babcock.

CONNECTICUT.

Waterford—Lester T. Rogers, Wm. Maxson.
Mystic Bridge—T. S. Greenman.

NEW-JERSEY.

Plainfield—Thomas S. Alberti
New Market—W. B. Gillett.
Shiloh.—Isaac D. Titsworth, Azor Estee.
Salem.— David Clawson.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Crossingville—Thos. B. Brown.
Meadville—Dea. Lewis Dunham.
New Geneva—B. F. Bond.
Coudersport—L. G. Maxson.
Clifford—Zebediah Burdick.
Sharon Centre—Isaac W. Jones.

VIRGINIA.

Lost Creek--Levi H. Bond.
Elk Creek—Thos. B. Bond.
New Salem- -Jepthah F. Randolph.
Lewisport---Joseph Jeffrey
Lowther's Run---Asa Bee.

OHIO.

Bloomfield.---Charles Clarke.
Northampton.—Simeon Babcock, B. C. Church.
Port Jefferson.—Lewis A. Davis
Jackson---Davis Loofbourrow.
Butlerville---G. N. Swinney.
Kingsville---Julius M Todd.

MICHIGAN.

Oporto---Job Tyler.
Tallmadge---Bethuel Church.

WISKONSAN.

Milton, Rock Co.—Joseph Goodrich, P. M. Stillman Coon.

IOWA.

Fredonia, Louisa Co--M. Wheelock.

ILLINOIS.

Trivolia, Peoria Co.---James Dunham.

The Seventh-day Baptist Register
IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY,
AT DE RUYTER, MADISON CO., N. Y.,
BY
JAMES BAILEY.

TERMS.—To village subscribers who have the paper left at their doors, $2 25, in advance, o $2 50, at the expiration of the year.

☞To office and mail subscribers, $2 in ADVANCE

Each communication, involving facts and intended for insertion in the paper, must be accompanie by a responsible name.

No subscription received for a less term than six months.

☞All subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, will be considered as wishing to continue their subscription, and their paper will be sent to them accordingly. No paper will be discontinued till all arrearages are paid except at the discretion of the publisher.

☞Advertisements inserted on the most reasonable terms.

☞All letters and communications to ensure attention should be addressed to the publisher free of postage.

Lester T Rogers 2a

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.

VOL. III.—NO 35.] JAMES BAILEY, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR. [WHOLE NO. 139.

Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,—The SEVENTH DAY is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.—COMMANDMENT.—If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments.—JESUS CHRIST.

TWO DOLLARS IN ADVANCE.] DE RUYTER, N. Y., FOURTH-DAY, OCTOBER 26, 1842. [PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Religious Department.

From the New-York Evangelist.

WHAT IS PUSEYISM.

As Puseyism or newmanism, called the newmania of Oxford by the wits of London, is now such a wonder of the age, as well as animal magnetism, mormonism, and millerism, and as we often refer to it in common conversation, and expect to live and die making it the subject of our religious detestation and most disciplined abhorrence, this is published to answer the now quite common question, WHAT IS PUSEYISM?

We reply, in the very words of their standard writers, as quoted in the following extract, which we copy from an English paper of authority near the very seat of the beast, though itself of better character—the Oxford Chronicle. We know that all enlightened Christian readers will value the morceau as a precious one, it is such an intelligible synopsis of that modern pestilence, and such an authentic oracle for diffusion and reference. ECCE SIGNUM.

AN ANSWER BY THE PUSEYITES TO THE QUESTION, "WHAT IS PUSEYISM?"

It is to 'say anathema to the principle of protestanism' (1)—to 'depart more and more from the principles of the English reformation' (2)—to 'sigh to think that we should be separate from Rome' (3)—to regard 'Rome as our mother, through whom we were born to Christ.' (5)

It is to denounce the church of England as being 'in bondage, as working in chains, and as teaching with stammering lips of ambiguous formularies' (6)—it is to eulogize the church of Rome as giving 'free scope to the feelings of awe, mystery, tenderness, reverence, and devotedness' (7)—and as having 'high gifts and strong claims on our admiration, reverence, love, and gratitude.' (8)

It is to declare that 'our articles are the offspring of an uncatholic age' (9)—and that the communion service is 'a judgment upon the church.' (10) It is to teach that the Romish 'ritual was a precious possession' (11)—and that the mass book is 'a sacred and most precious monument of the apostles.' (12)

It is to assert that 'Scripture is not the rule of faith' (13)—that 'the oral tradition of the church is a fuller exposition of God's revealed truth' (14)—that the Bible 'placed without note or comment in the hands of uninstructed persons is not calculated, in ordinary cases, to make them wise unto salvation' (15)—and that only persons 'disclaiming the right of private judgment in things pertaining to God are members of the church of Christ.' (16)

It is to teach that 'baptism and not faith is the primary instrument of justification' (17)—that we are not to 'neglect the doctrine of justification by works' (18)—and that 'the prevailing notion of bringing forward the doctrines of the atonement explicitly and prominently on all occasions, is evidently quite opposed to the teaching of Scripture.' [19]

It is to assert that in the Lord's Supper "Christ is present under the form of bread and wine' [20]—that he is then personally and bodily with us' [21]—and that the clergy are 'intrusted with the awful and mysterious gift of making the bread and wine Christ's body and blood.' [22]

It is to maintain the lawfulness of prayer for the dead [23]—to make a distinction between venial and mortal sins [24]—and to assert that a person may believe that there is a purgatory, that relics may be venerated, that saints may be invoked, that there are seven sacraments, that the mass is an offering for the quick and dead for the remission of sins, and that he may yet with a good conscience subscribe the thirty-nine articles of the church of England. [25]

It is to put the visible church in the place of Christ, by teaching that 'she alone is that true hiding place into which the servants of God may flee for refuge and be safe.' [26] It is to put the sacraments in the place of God, by declaring that they 'are the sources of divine grace.' [29]

1 Palmer's Letters to Golightly. 2 British Critic for July, 1841. 3 Tracts for the Times. 4 Palmer's Letter. 5 Tracts for the Times. 6 Id. 7 Newman's Letter to Jelf. 8 Tracts for the Times. 9 Id.—10 Froude's Remains. 11 Tracts for the Times. 12 Id. 13 Tracts for the Times. 14 Linwood's Sermon's. 15 Id. 16 Id. 17 Newman on Justification. 18 Linwood's Sermons. 19 Tracts for the Times. 20 Linwood's Sermons. 21 Tracts for the Times. 22 Id. 23 Id. 24 Id. 25 Tracts for the Times, No. 90. 26 Linwood's Sermon's. 27 Tracts for the Times.—Oxford Chron.

OBSERVATIONS.

We can perceive no unfairness in the manner in which these extracts are taken from the Puseyite authors, and given in their proper sense together, from the scattered and attenuated forms in which they appear in the originals. While men slept, the enemy sowed tares. Error is generally specious, insinuating, and tacked on to truth for its better deceitfulness and its easier currency. The great doctrines of regeneration and all the proper work of the Spirit, the spirituality of all true religion, the office of faith in our salvation, our justification freely, by his grace, through the redemption that there is in Christ Jesus, the divine purposes in saving men, and the conservation of the saints as kept [as with a garrison] by the power of God through faith unto salvation, these and kindred truths, constituting the very vitals of Christianity, are avoided, suppressed, or denied, as well as the genuine doctrine of the atonement of our Savior on the cross. Added to all which, they hold the doctrine of exclusiveness, excluding and denying all the reformed churches of Christ; the result of their super-eminent folly of the succession of lineage, or that all 'authority' in the church of Christ comes in the way of a chain from the first Pope, down to Gregory XVI, and the Archbishop of Canterbury, and down to any and all of the legitimates thereto appertaining, in England and her colonies, in America and her territories.

Who sees not that all this is popery disguised? It is anti-American, anti-protestant, anti-Christian. Let it only spread in silence, and its leaven will leaven the whole lump of society, and we shall all be prepared to yield, we and our children, before we know it, to the organized and antiquated oppressions of Rome; whence the sword and the keys united will subdue our liberties, and we shall fall victims to the worst form of despotism ever seen in our world. The Inquisition will be restored with all its beauties and its blessings!

And all this, as temporal disaster, is INFINITELY LESS than the spiritual damage it will do to our souls. It is another gospel—which is not ANOTHER. Every plant, says Jesus Christ, which my heavenly father hath not planted, shall be rooted up. Puseyism and popery, and all their kindred anomalies, are such poisonous plants And shall the American soil yield them a harvest? Are they here to be propogated, in this country of the pilgrims, in this land of protestants, in this nation of freemen? Have our fathers of the Revolution bled in vain, or our ancestors of the Reformation suffered and burnt in vain? Let Christians arouse from their supineness, and be aware of the most formidable pest of the age. Already do they deny the existence of the churches of the Reformation, holding them as mere synagogues of apostacy from their chain of the succession, consigning them to the 'uncovenanted mercies of God'—that never saved one soul, and denouncing their wisest, holiest ministers, whom God has so abundantly owned and blessed in preaching the gospel, as no ministers of Christ, as 'gross impostors,' intruders, usurpers, and traitors 'to the church'—by which they mean themselves and their party.

Let Christians look to God for his countenance and his arm, against this flood of abominations. Lift up a standard for the people. So shall they fear the name of the Lord from the west, and his glory from the rising of the sun. When the enemy shall come in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him.

WICKLIFF AND LUTHER.

THE APOSTLES AND SLAVERY.

BY DR. BRISBANE.

The apostles' doctrine on the subject of slaveholding is very easily apprehended by every fair and unbiased mind. Wherever a church was founded amid a slaveholding population, three practical questions arose, and only three; by deciding which, the apostles declared the whole mind of God, respecting slavery:

1st. What shall converted slaves do, whose masters remain heathen.

2d. The duty of Christian masters, whose slaves remain heathen.

3d. Where both master and slave were converted to Christianity.

1. The first was a very common case; for the first converts of Christianity were among the most despised of the people.—Hence, the converted slaves naturally wished to know of the apostles whether the law of Christ allowed them to claim liberty from their masters. The apostles would not, of course, set each slave, without any concert, to rebel single-handed against the whole power of the Roman empire, by whose laws his owner held him in slavery, as that would be madly to throw away their lives. They therefore directed the converted slave to endure his condition with patience, till he could get free; 1 Cor. vii. 20: 'Art thou called being a servant,' (doulos, servant, but may mean slave,) 'care not for it.' (Greek, melcto, i. e. do not grieve and vex yourself about it. Bear it patiently.) 'But if thou mayest be made free, use it rather.' The phraseology is peculiar. The apostle does not say, 'if your master offers to emancipate you;' 'but if thou (dunasai eleutheros genesthai) art able to get free, use it rather.' In plain English, bear your bonds till you can safely escape them; or, as one has beautifully paraphrased it,

"Wait for the dawning of a brighter day,
And snap the bond the moment when you may."

2. The second case was where the master was converted to Christ, and the slave not; should he send his slave away, or retain him?

The answer given by the apostles, is in Col. iv. 1; 'Masters, give unto your servants that which is just and equal;' or more rigidly rendered, 'give them justice and equality;' that is, in plain terms, in all business matters, treat them as your equals.

The last case, where master and slave were converted, as were Onesimus and Philemon, is settled in Phil. 16th verse; where Paul commands Philemon to receive Onesimus. 'Not now as a servant, [doulos,] but as above a servant, a brother beloved.'—St. Paul commanded, and Philemon promptly obeyed. Onesimus was immediately freed, was soon joined in an ecclesiastical commission with Tychicus, and soon after, it is said, became bishop of Ephesus.

These three cases include all that could possibly arise respecting slavery in planting the first churches in slaveholding lands; and in every case, the apostles took the ground of the immediate abolition of the practice.

PASTOR AND PEOPLE.

It is a solemn and beautiful association—that between a pastor and his people. The pastor has devoted himself to the office of bringing messages from God to the people; the people have pledged themselves to the receiving reverently the communications of eternity from the lips of the pastor. Woe unto the one if he be faithless and sluggish; woe unto the others if they be inattentive or unbelieving. Woe unto the pastor if he be sluggish or faithless! Of all the duties that have ever been put upon man, there is not one to which is attached a tittle of the responsibleness which hangs around the preaching of the gospel. At a time when the judgment is sufficiently matured to decide fairly on the solemnities of the ministerial office, and an unqualified avowal that he thinks himself moved by the Spirit of God, the clergyman is set apart to the services of the sanctuary, and binds himself to the work of feeding the flock of the Redeemer. The faith which he professes to believe, he must teach it till he die. The vigor of his understanding, the labor of his studies, the fervency of his prayers, all must be gathered into one hearty dedication, and given unreservedly to the mighty work of turning sinners from the error of their ways. And if there be a pause in the arduos career—if there be treachery, or time-serving, or cowardice; or if the base desire of sordid gain, and the unhallowed lust of reputation, intrude themselves into the seat of sacred functions: O! then there breathes not upon the broad face of the earth, the man more deserving than this misnamed minister of Christ, to become a mark for the finger of indignant scorn, and to be wept over and bewailed by all that is holy and noble in creation. Woe unto the people if they be inattentive or unbelieving. Sermons die not. Every means, every opportunity, every warning, every lesson, they are registered in the book of the doomsday; and when the throne is set, and the startled dead swarm up from the sepulchres, they shall stand out as witnesses against the careless and the impenitent—and then shall it be seen that a faithful ministry, if it lead not a man to be a candidate for glory, is as a millstone around his neck, dragging him down into the depths of perdition.—Melvill.

ATTRACTION OF THE CROSS.

There is nothing pleasurable in viewing the scene of a savior suffering in ignominy upon the cross. But we can with pleasure behold the spirit, the affection, the love that moved him thus to die. What wonders meet at the cross of Jesus Christ! Justice and mercy centre here. See the innocent sufferer nailed to the wood. The Son, the only begotten Son of God, suffers there,

"While justice pours upon his head,
Its heavy vengeance in our stead."

Did his Father aid him? Did he extract one drop from the bitter cup that justice held to his dying lips? Did he abate one pang of all his distress? No, not one. Did his Father not fly to his rescue, when encompassed by enemies, and in the jaws of death, while every fibre of his heart was pained? Did he administer no relief? May he not recline his head in death on a kind Father's bosom? No. The Savior exclaims in the bitterness of death, 'My God! My God! why hast thou FORSAKEN me?' Here we behold the justice of God. But mark his love. 'Twas love that moved him to give his Son to die for all our guilt. It was love that prompted him to make the momentous sacrifice. Human love would have failed to make a sacrifice like that. It was as great [with reverence we say it], as Infinite Love could endure! God, as it were, retires, 'and draws a cloud of mourning round his throne,' as though it was a sight too painful for Deity to witness! But love, love to his enemies, demanded it, and the sacrifice was made. Who can say that God is unfeeling, that God cares not for my soul, 'since the Savior has died.'—Morn. Star.

DEPTH OF EARLY IMPRESSIONS.

There are not wanting instances to prove that the changed caracter of many a man late in life has borrowed its complexion from an impression made in youth; and not unfrequently does the turning point of the principles of many centre in some remote cause, in itself without moment, and trivial.

A few days ago I was privileged to experience the exact exemplification of this assertion, as extraordinary as it is true. I allude to a middle-aged man, who has been suffering from convulsive fits ever since he was a boy of nine years old, first caused from a fright; in fact, his mind is bordering upon idiotism, and is mechanically incapable of receiving new impressions. One day, talking to his aged mother of the necessity of personal religion, I perceived the unfortunate man become interested in my observations on prayer. He drew my attention, which was not withdrawn, though his attempts to speak were painful in the extreme. What an inlet of joy to my feelings when from his stammering I learnt 'that he could pray, too.' Upon inquiring what he prayed, he replied, 'Our Parder 'chart in heaven,' and then went through the whole of the Lord's prayer, verbatim. This he has done for more than twenty years; perhaps the only hope to which he clings—certainly the only spiritual exercise he can now enjoy. The prayer was learnt at a Sunday school before he met with the fright.

How suitable is the advice included in the royal injunction—'In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand; for thou knowest not whether shall prosper, either this or that, or whether they both shall be alike good.'—Eccles. 11: 6.

JUST ON THE VERGE OF HEAVEN.—There is something peculiarly affecting in the condition of a Christian, who, though surrounded by objects of earthly affection, knows that he soon must die, and has transferred all his interests to another state. Such a person it is our privilege daily to see.—She is a young mother, and has been for several years a devoted friend of Christ.—For some months she has steadily contemplated her end with a serene tranquility and now in the last stages of disease, her faith entereth into that within the veil, and taketh firm hold on heaven. Her home is beyond the grave. Her relatives and friends are regarded with tender love, but the whole bent and current of her supreme desires are on those things that are unseen and eternal.

How infinitely valuable is such a state of mind! How important that we should keep in view the dying hour! When we engage in any business—when we form any design, it becomes us to inquire how we shall like to reflect upon it in days when we shall be about to bid the world farewell.

There is something lovely in consumption It leaves the mind so clear, that to the Christian it furnishes a most delightful opportunity for glorifying God. There may be exhibited the virtues of patience, resignation, social affection, and calm, unwavering faith. Then may the soul often fix her eye on God, her final portion. Then may the tongue bear witness to the sustaining grace of God.

"It is well," we said to her, one day this week, "that you have not now to seek an interest in the Savior." "O, yes," she replied. "It seems to me I could not do it now." She could not bear the excitement of such an anxiety. We have no doubt, that she has been able to hold out against the attacks of this fell destroyer, for months longer than she could have done, had it not been for the quiet repose of spirit which her well-tried hope has imparted.—N. Y. Evangelist.

ON HUMAN LIFE.—Often does the question come to us—what is a religious use of life? If we change slightly the terms, and ask, what is a wise use of life, few would find it difficult to answer. It must be wise, to use life for the greatest good to ourselves and others which it is capable of yielding. And this cannot be done, it cannot be even known, until all the relations of life are known and regarded, especially its duration, its destiny. These, then, must be studied, as the first and simplest wisdom. And with these, all the uses of life must be made to harmonize. If you are mortal, and only mortal, eat, drink, for to-morrow you die.—But if you have a mind capable of infinite growth, a heart which thirsts for that which the world cannot give, a conscience that is its own tormentor or rewarder, accordingly as it is used, it must so continue indefinitely. If you are living a life always exposed to death, yet nursing in its own bosom, the seeds of immeasurable happiness or misery, seeds sown by your own hand day by day—then it is wise to "live soberly, righteously, and godly in this world," and such words are no longer unmeaning. Nor is it a worthless consideration, though a low principle of action, that a good life can loose nothing, and may gain every thing; while wickedness or infidelity has no advantage, and perils all. "What will be your condition, Father, without another life?" "What will be your condition with it?" was the reply.—Monthly Miscellany.

A DYING MOTHER.—A few years ago, a gentleman was called to visit a dying female. On entering the humble cottage where she dwelt, he heard, in an adjoining room, an infant voice. He listened, and found that it was a child of the poor dying woman engaged in prayer. "O Lord, bless my poor mother," cried the little boy, "and prepare her to die! O God, I thank thee that I have been sent to a Sunday School, and there have been taught to read my Bible; and there I learn, that 'when my father and mother forsake me, thou wilt take me up!' This comforts me, now that my poor mother is going to leave me! May it comfort her, and may she go to heaven; and may I go there too! O, Lord Jesus, pity a poor child! and pity my poor dear mother; and help me to say, 'Thy will be done!'"

He ceased, and the visiter opening the door, approached the bedside of the poor woman.

"Your child has been praying with you," said he; "I have listened to his prayer."

"Yes," said she, making an effort to rise, "he is a dear child. Thank God, he has been sent to a Sunday School. I cannot read myself, but he can; and he has read the Bible to me, and I hope I have reason to bless God for it. Yes, I have learned from him that I am a sinner; I have heard from him of Jesus Christ; and I do, yes I do, as a poor sinner, put my trust in him. I hope he will receive me. I hope he has forgiven me! I am going to die, but I am not afraid; my dear child has been the means of saving my soul. O, how thankful am I that he was sent to a Sunday School!"—London T. S. Anecdotes.

Hope and fear, like light and darkness, conquer or resign to each other.

THE EYE OF A NEEDLE.—The practice of insulting the religion of such persons as profess a faith different from their own, has ever been characteristic of the Oriental nations, and is illustrative of a passage in the New Testament which I have not seen explained by any of the commentators—I mean the expression of our Savior, where he denounces the votaries of avarice by declaring that "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God." For a long time previous to Christ's appearance, it had been usual for the "sons of Ishmael," or pagan Arabs of Asia Minor, to make hostile incursions into the towns of Judea, and riding their dromedaries into the synagogues to desecrate the altar (whenever the Osmanliz take possession of a Greek village, they invariably ride into its Christian church, and endeavor to force their horses to defile their altar) in the manner here described. In order to put a stop to these enormities, the Jews hit upon the expedient of constructing the doors of their churches, &c., so low, that an ordinary sized man could only enter by stooping, and thus they completely foiled their persecutors; for the disinclination of the Arabs to dismount, even on the most pressing occasion, is well known to such as have traveled among these sons of the desert. In the hyperbolical phraseology of the East, these diminished apertures were compared to the eye of a needle; and the impossibility of a camel making his way through them, became at length a proverbial expression for an impracticable undertaking.—Auldjo's Journal.

Persecuted but not destroyed.—Two hundred suffering Christian converts are now wandering as fugitives in the island of Madagascar. Their utter destitution compels them to wander about from mountain to mountain in search of something for food, and at the same time to escape the rage of their deadly persecutors. Executions, ordeals, and miseries increase throughout the country, so that 3,000 persons have recently taken the tangena (poison water) by order of the sovereign. Still they do not lose courage, they place their confidence in God.—Report of the British and Foreign Bible Society, 1842.

Those who are most impetuous in the pursuit of happiness usually meet with the severest disappointments. Happiness enters most freely into the mind which is the most tranquil in its desires.

No principle, but fear or love, will effectually influence human conduct.

Children's Department.

I cannot call thee fair, my Child.

BY THOMAS H. BAYLEY.

I cannot call thee fair, my child,
I cannot call thee fair,
Unless a perfect form and face,
Be joined to gifts more rare:
If to thy features, blameless thoughts
The boasted charm impart,
I'll own that thou art beautiful,
And press thee to my heart.

I cannot call thee eloquent,
Nor listen with delight,
Like some, who deem that ruby lips
Are ever in the right:
But if from truth's integrity
Thy accents ne'er depart,
I'll own that thou art eloquent,
And press thee to my heart.

I cannot call thee fortunate,
E'en though I see thee count
Thy worldly treasures o'er and o'er,
And boast of the amount:
But if the friendless of thy store
May claim an ample part,
I'll own that thou art fortunate,
And press thee to my heart.

TWO SIDES TO THE PICTURE.

